Preface

The story of the people of Converse County is a very interesting story. Who were they? Where did they come from? What did they do? They were fur trappers, fortune seekers, gold miners, coal miners, cowboys, cattle barons, remittance men, adventure seekers, railroaders, homesteaders, uranium miners and just plain folks. They came from all parts of the United States and the World and for many reasons, such as: health, wealth, adventure and the pursuit of happiness.

This then is the history of Converse County and of the people who founded it, settled it, ranched it, mined it, managed it, cried over it, fought for it, and died for it. To appreciate the County is to understand it better and how it came to be.

"Pages From Converse County's Past" had its beginnings several years ago when the LaBonte-Wagonhound Community had a series of meetings in which the history of its ranches and people were presented. Late in 1982 the project got further impetus when at the urging of Faun Cole a Heritage Book Committee was organized to gather the history of Converse County and its people and to put it into a published form.

The Heritage Book Committee has attempted with the cooperation of the Wyoming Pioneer Association, during the past three years, to obtain participation of all Converse County citizens, both present and past. The response was overwhelming. The histories and stories have been written by hundreds of individuals and reflect life and experiences as they remember them.

Some histories have been abridged but still retain the substance and style of each individual writer. Although the contents are historical, no attempt is made toward a documented history. Coverage is complete in so far as what information people furnished us and is only as accurate as their memories and their records.

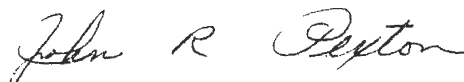

Special recognition is given to the Heritage Book Committee who planned, wrote, edited, typed, and proofread the chapters for this book. They are as follows: Sarah Nachtman, Velma Steckley, Faun Cole, Jewell Reed, Ruth Pellatz, John and Catherine Pexton, O. L. "Nick" Nicholls, Ruth Grant, Lee Ann Siebken, Gene Potter, Jacque Pexton, John Rider, June Wilchek, Agnes Higgins, Douglas Senior Citizens Center, Joan Pexton Woodin, Converse County Library, Converse County, Ada and Wilbur Wright, Vee Hageman, Gale Lane, Annie Laurie Danaher, Gladys Hill, Alice Vollman, Alice Bush, Audrey Munkres, Betty Alberts, Betty Pellatz, Esther Ryder, Ruby Preuit, Dorothy Taylor, Gerry Schmidt, Cherie Daly, Sana Conley, Sue Selby, and Len Sherwin.

A special thanks goes to Donna York for many, many hours spent on photography.

The committee is most appreciative of the cooperation and technical assistance it has received from the staff of Mountain States Lithographing Company in the publishing of this county history.

We are also very grateful for the help, encouragement and financial assistance of the Wyoming Pioneer Association.

As chairman of the Heritage Book Committee, the preparation of the book could not have been successful without the untiring efforts of my wife, Kati Pexton.

Converse County, Wyoming

Dakota Territory, a small part of the Louisiana Purchase, which was named after the Dakota Indians, paved the way for Converse County, Wyoming Territory.

The counties of Albany and Laramie were in Dakota Territory when the Territory of Wyoming was created in 1868. The Wyoming Legislature established the boundaries for the above counties shortly after the Territory of Wyoming received them from South Dakota. Twenty years later, in 1888, Converse County, Wyoming Territory was carved from the counties of Albany and Laramie.

The first definite move toward a county of our own was made at a mass meeting held in November 1886, at which time funds were pledged and a committee appointed comprising J. M. Wilson, DeForest Richards, C. F. Maurer, J. W. Foster, C. M. Garver, F. E. Caffey, C. H. King, C. E. Clay, W. R. Brown, and M. C. Barrow. The committee selected Clay and Barrow as being best acquainted in Cheyenne and Laramie and sent them down to visit these two towns, collect necessary data as to assessed valuation and in a general way, boost for a division. The Territorial Legislature convened January 10th following, at which Hon. C. A. Guernsey introduced the bill, which with some slight amendment, became the law where Converse County was created March 9, 1888. The new county was named after Amasa R. Converse, a Wyoming pioneer and Cheyenne banker. Governor Moonlight named E. J. Wells, J. M. Wilson, and J. K. Calkins as commissioners protem for the purpose of organization and they called an election May 15, 1888. Although a full complement of officers were to be elected the contest centered at once on the question of county seat. Douglas, Lusk, Glenrock and Fetterman were the candidates. At the last moment Fetterman withdrew and supported Lusk. The vote was counted May 18th and Douglas had won by a plurality of 1014. The following county officers were elected: Malcolm Campbell, Sheriff; C. M. Garver, Clerk; Ed J. Wells, Treasurer; F. H. Harvey, Attorney; Messrs. F. E. Wolcott, George H. Cross and E. T. David, Commissioners; W. R. Renwick, Coroner; S. Slaymaker, Assessor; and A. T. Seymour, Surveyor.

Seven new counties were added in 1911 by the State Legislature. Among these was Niobrara County, fathered by F. S. Lusk of Lusk. Niobrara was carved out of Converse County, which reduced the total area of Converse County considerably. According to "Bill Barlow's Budget" anniversary edition 1907, Converse County contained 6624 square miles of land. It stretched east and west for a distance of 170 miles and north and south for 92 miles at the widest part. The county presently covers approximately 4200 square miles. The area has historically been predominately agricultural with livestock production (beef cattle and sheep) as the principal source of agricultural income. Leasing and production of minerals is a very important source of income throughout the county.

Cattle were introduced into Wyoming Territory in the very early years. A few hundred breeding cattle were wintered on Chugwater Creek in 1852-1853 by trader Seth E. Ward. Alexander Majors reported starting the first breeding herd in Wyoming in 1862. The assessment rolls for Wyoming Territory listed 8143 head of cattle in 1870. From that time cattle numbers increased until they crested in 1884-1885 and 1886 when there were 1,500,000 head. These cattle were run pretty much on public land until the early 1880s when some barbed wire fencing was started, including fencing in of some public land by the private land owners. Cattle numbers in Converse increased proportionally with the state numbers until Converse County's assessed figures for 1984 were 81,607 head. According to 1955 figures on agricultural income in the state, 60 per cent came from cattle, 20 per cent from sheep and 20 per cent from crops.

The introduction of sheep into the country dates from the year 1878 when Jim Davis herded a small band down near Muskrat in the Rawhide Buttes. In about the year 1880, Wilson Brothers brought a band near Lusk; and about the year 1883, George Powell brought a band over to Lower LaPrele. These several ventures were unsuccessful due to a variety of causes. In 1889 John Morton and others came up from the Union Pacific Country with bands of sheep. In the year 1892 the Platte Valley Sheep Company was organized by J. M. Wilson, W. F. Hamilton and Governor DeForest Richards. The hard winter of 1892 wiped out 70 per cent of their herds. This company inaugurated the trail business from Oregon to this county; bought new herds and ultimately increased the company into a corporation worth $200,000. The introduction of sheep met with decided opposition. Ranchmen and cattlemen objected to anyone invading what they considered their territory and the free use of the public range. Various altercations took place but the sheep business persisted and grew from a total number of sheep returned for assessment in 1890 at 10,733 to a total of 287,581 head in 1906 and the actual number of sheep was estimated at 500,000 head. The wool clip in Converse County in 1906 was over 3,500,000 pounds. Sheep numbers have fluctuated up and down over the years to a point where there are only 86,622 sheep recorded on the assessment role for 1984.

What is now Converse County, and in later years as "Fetterman Country" was, during the days of the Hudson Bay Fur Company and the life time of Laramie, Bridger and other historical trail blazers, the scene of probably the first mining excitement north of Santa Fe. These pioneers found outcroppings of silver and copper, but as they sank their prospect shafts the silver gave way to copper. Subsequently, in the days of '49, the California Argonauts on their way to the Golden Gate and soon after them the Mormons, in search of the promised land, prospected this region. They all found some silver and much copper; but owing to the lack of transportation and the low price of copper, they abandoned and left behind the treasures they had opened for future generations. Twenty years later Emanuel George, an intelligent and experienced prospector, came alone, found the old shafts and sank many of them to fifty feet. He found plenty of copper but little of the precious metals. Other prospectors would come and go but it was not until the early 1900s that any extensive and modern attempt was made to develop the mineral resources. These mines were situated throughout the county beginning at the extreme east end near Lusk and extending west to Glenrock. There were also good properties in the Laramie Peak district with ore rich in both copper and silver and developed by several open cuts and shafts, the deepest shaft being about 300 feet. Other developments were made in the LaBonte Canyon district, Warbonnet district, Elkhorn Mine south of Glenrock, the Saddle Mine in Mormon Canyon; the Surprise Mine at Hazenville and the Mewis Mine at Spring Canyon. The ore in most of the mines ran well in copper and some had good value in gold and silver.

Development of oil and gas in the Glenrock area began as early as 1910. Oil and gas is now a major industry, drawing from underground reserves in the Big Muddy Field near Glenrock, the South Glenrock Field and the newer Flat Top field on the eastern edge of the county. Other developments in more recent years make Converse County an important oil and gas producing area.

Other mineral developments such as uranium and coal have made a giant economic impact in the county. The Exxon Uranium Mine itself employed over 600 people at the time of its peak operation. Electricity, which depends for its output on some of the states largest coal deposits, is the best known manufactured commodity. Pacific Power and Light Company's Dave Johnston Steam-Electric Plant near Glenrock, was the largest in the Rocky Mountain Region when developed at a cost of over twenty-five million dollars. Other developments currently in production include Phillips Gas Plant and Bear Creek Uranium Mine. The Exxon Uranium Mine has completed its mining operation.

In the early 1900s several towns were of importance historically in the development of Converse County.

Douglas was born of industrial development, as a result of railroad extension through central Wyoming. The old Overland Trail passed within sight of the town; one of the frontier posts, Fort Fetterman, was situated only eight miles away and all travel between the Union Pacific and Fort McKinney and Fort Laramie and western points crossed here. Douglas became the county seat for the county and the hub of activity for the agricultural community.

Glenrock was a thriving coal mining camp of about 500 population and also enjoyed quite a ranch trade. The first settlement at the mouth of Deer Creek was called Mercedes. Later when coal was discovered the place was known as Nuttall after William Nuttall who first found and opened the mine. The name Glenrock was later suggested and adopted. The name had reference to the local glen which opens on the valley at that point, and a very picturesque rock just west of the town, known to early daycampers as the Rock in the Glen, where thousands of emigrants had camped enroute to the West.

Lusk was 50 miles east of Douglas, had a bank, a live newspaper, churches, schools, and probably 400 inhabitants. It depended for its trade almost entirely on surrounding ranches and the livestock industry. Lusk was originally known as Silver Cliff, from an old abandoned mine near there. The railroad later named the station after Mr. F. S. Lusk who was a prominent citizen of the town at the time.

Manville, 45 miles east of Douglas, was a thriving town of probably 250 people enjoying the trade of a thriving livestock and dry farming section. Based on the belief that a proposed northern extension of the Burlington would cross the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad, the first settlers named the town Fetterman Junction, which the railroad people changed to Manville in honor of a pioneer stockman.

In those days a politician who wished to be elected to a two-year term of office in Converse County was obliged to travel upon horseback or in a buckboard from ranch to ranch from the town of Glenrock in the western part of the county to the town of Lusk, in the eastern part of the county. Such a campaign took weeks to accomplish; therefore, even though a division of the county meant the loss of the prosperous town of Lusk and the town of Manville, Converse County officers were glad when the County of Niobrara was carved from Converse County.

Coal mining continues to play an important role in the economy of the area, mostly in Campbell County, but is becoming important in the northern part of Converse County. These mining operations prompted the Burlington Northern and Chicago Northwestern Railroads to build extensions to their lines from Orin Junction and Shawnee to the coal mines. The main line runs nearly the length of Converse County and was built in the late 1970s and early 1980s. The settlement of Bill, long a place with only a store, post office, community hall and school has taken on a new dimension. The railroad has increased activity in the area and added greatly to the valuation in the county. Tonnage on both of these railroad lines has shown a fantastic increase and has given the railroads an opportunity for a profitable operation.

Land Acquisition By Homesteading

In the 1870s pioneer cattlemen depended almost entirely on free use of government land. Only one seventh of Wyoming's land had been surveyed by June 30, 1880. The territory had only the Cheyenne Land Office, 1870-1877. Other offices were opened in the state after 1877 and one was opened in Douglas in 1890. At these offices, under various laws, pioneer cattlemen acquired title to small amounts of land along streams where they established their headquarters. The Pre-emption Act of 1841 entitled citizens to squat on public land, until it was put up for sale, then they had first chance to buy up to 160 acres at $1.25 per acre ($2.50 within a railroad grant).

Under the Homestead Act of 1862, any person who was the head of a family or had arrived at the age of 21, was a citizen of the United States and who had never borne arms against the United States Government, was entitled to enter up to 160 acres of unappropriated public lands. He had to make an affidavit that the entry was made for purpose of actual settlement and cultivation and not for the use or benefit of anyone else. He had to maintain residence for five years. Commutation was possible after six months, (later changed to 14 months) that is, he could buy for $1.25 per acre and thus avoid further residence and cultivation requirements. Fees had to be paid for homesteads varying from $18.00 to $43.00.

Under the Timber Culture Act of 1873 a person could get 160 acres free, paying the same fees as under the Homestead Act. To get these acres one had to plant, and keep growing, 40 acres of trees for eight years. In 1878 the required acreage of trees was cut to ten acres.

Another act under which land could be acquired was the Desert Land Act of 1877. Under this act one could buy up to 640 acres of desert land, (land that could not be successfully farmed without irrigation), for 25 cents per acre. The land could be occupied for three years, after which an additional one dollar per acre had to be paid to gain title. Meanwhile, water must be delivered to the desert land filing, and part of it irrigated, before patent could be obtained.

In 1909 Congress passed a 320 acre homestead law which doubled the amount of free land available to homesteaders in Wyoming. The enlarged Homestead Act brought more dry farmers to Wyoming.

In 1912 Congress lowered the homestead residence requirement from five years to three years and permitted the homesteader to absent himself from the property for five months each year.

In 1913 Congressman Frank Mondell proposed a 1280 acre grazing homestead law. Three years later, grazing homesteads were made available, but they were limited to 640 acres and the Federal Government retained the mineral rights.

The extraordinary prosperity enjoyed by farmers and ranchers in 1917 and 1918 persuaded many rural people to enlarge their holdings. Some large stockmen who were favorably situated with respect to free federal range, filed on what free land they could get under the 640 acre grazing Homestead Act.

Almost ten million acres of land were patented under the homestead laws in the decade of the 20s.

Another one and one half million acres passed to patent in the 1930s, before vacant, unreserved and unappropriated lands were withdrawn by executive order on November 26, 1934, after the passage of the Taylor Grazing Act of June 28, 1934. This executive order virtually ended homesteading, except on reclamation projects, and meant that the Federal Government would hold onto the bulk of its remaining land.

Thousands of homesteaders gave up in the 1920s and either abandoned their lands before patent or sold them to neighbors. They found it difficult to make a living because this period of farm depression reached almost everywhere and because little of Wyoming's land could be farmed successfully without irrigation and even less could be ranched successfully in 640 acre units.

Much of the deeded land in Converse County was obtained through homesteading under the various acts that were developed through the years.

Of particular interest is the LaPrele Irrigation Project, established by homesteading and in compliance with the Carey Act, which was adopted by Congress in 1894.

The Carey Act was designed to supply Federal and State aid to irrigation projects. It provided for donation, by the Federal Government, of up to one million acres of arid lands; to each state having such lands, on condition that the state cause the lands to be reclaimed and settled by actual settlers on small tracts.

Wyoming was the first state to accept the Federal Government's offer under the Carey Act. The Board of Land Commissioners and the State Engineer were given detailed assignments by the Legislature. They were to study the feasibility of proposals for irrigation works, advanced by individuals or companies, and to make contracts when the projects appeared sound. The State would charge the settler 50 cents per acre for the land and the private construction company would charge him $20 or more, per acre, for perpetual water rights. By January 1897, eight projects had been approved in Wyoming and only two, in the Big Horn Basin, were pushed with any vigor.

The LaPrele Project had its beginning in 1905 when the LaPrele Ditch and Reservoir Company was organized to develop the irrigation system to serve 27,000 acres. Included were 18,000 acres to be developed in compliance with the Carey Act.

The LaPrele proved to be the largest irrigation development in the county and was economically important to Douglas and Converse County.

Abney, James, Frances and Opal

James M. Abney was born on January 20, 1860, in Savannah, Missouri to Jackson and Margaret Abney. His mother's maiden name was Moody.

His family moved to Nebraska where his father was a contractor on the construction of the Union Pacific R.R. in the early 1860's.

At an early age James M. joined his brother James C. in Cheyenne in a joint livestock venture. James C. was later to operate the first stage and mail line between Cheyenne and Fort Laramie. He also ran a livery barn in Cheyenne. Their sister Margaret married James Caragher.

James M. was a Rep for several of the big cow outfits in the Goshen Hole country. He worked for the Wyoming Stock Growers as an inspector in 1887.

Mrs. Frances Bacon, the widow of Billy Bacon, and James M. were married on November 19, 1886. Frances, the daughter of John and Margaret Oates Gill, was born on October 17, 1859 in Pennsylvania. Frances had an adopted daughter, Eula E. Erben.

James and Frances homesteaded on Little Boxelder Creek, close to where the Bill Barber ranch buildings are now located. A water right was filed in 1886 by James on Little Boxelder.

Eula married Percy Brockway on June 9, 1904. Previous to her marriage, she had taught school for $15.00 a month in schools nearby.

Frances died on July 20, 1927.

James married Opal Entzminger on October 2, 1929.

Rachel Entzminger Reider, daughter of Opal tells about her mother, herself and James Abney in the following story:

In the summer of 1921, my mother, Opal Entzminger, 35 years old, and I, Rachel Entzminger Reider, nine years old, came to Douglas from southeastern Kansas. Mother wanted to file on a homestead. I suppose she came to Douglas because the land office was there. We stayed at the LaBonte Hotel our first night there.

We found a room with Mrs. Frank Malecky and lived there a few months. Mother applied for work at all the banks. There were no vacancies but she was advised to go see L. B. Potter, an insurance agent. Mr Potter suggested that she be a public stenographer. For helping with his work she could have office space. His younger partner, H. H. "Red" Wyne let her use his typewriter for taking care of the correspondence for the commercial club of which he was secretary.

She did stenographic work for Paul Showalter, an attorney. She typed menus every day for at least one cafe. She also reconciled bank statements for small businesses that didn't have bookkeepers. Occasionally she took down court proceedings for people who were involved in suits whose offices were in other localities. It was interesting work and a very good living until other people saw the possibilities and there were too many in the business for any to make a living.

Next, she worked for a while as a clerk in the A. R. Merritt store. She much preferred bookkeeping and when there was a vacancy at the Douglas Mercantile Co., she went to work there. Billie Burgess was manager. Later she worked for Charles Clark at a plumbing shop. It was while she worked there that she met James Abney, whom she married in 1929.

Mother had the idea that one could find a square mile exactly like that - all in one piece and close to town. That wasn't the case. There were 80 acres here and there - 160 someplace else. The land parcels had to be within 20 miles of each other. This made it considerably harder to find land to file on. She finally got it put together; 80 acres were by the highway about seven miles from Douglas between Douglas and Orin; 240 acres were in the Irvine Community, partly in the "badlands"; a half section was north of Shawnee.

We built the traditional tar paper shack near a well she had drilled. The yard was fenced, a garden plowed, a clothesline put up. All those things were to make it look as if it were really a home. She used to do the washing there so people could testify they had seen clothes on the line. We did raise a garden. Since she had to work we could only go out weekends.

At first we had no car so we would ride out with Vincent Merritt as far as his place and walk over to the homestead. It was a good mile. Mr Merritt offered to drive us over, but mother refused. We had to carry our groceries. She had a black oilcloth bag with two handles. We'd carry it between us. We only had to go out seven months a year so we didn't go out in the winter. In 1926, we bought a Model T. Ford coupe. That made life easier. We also had a garage built. We often took a friend out to spend the weekend with us. Once we had all the groceries stolen, but I can't remember any really bad experiences. She finally "proved up." Eventually she sold the 80 acres to Fritz Reed; the Irvine land to T. Lee Reno; and the half section to Harry Crawford.

I attended the old North Grade School from the fifth to eighth grade and graduated from high school in 1929. That fall I entered the University of Colorado and Mother and Mr. Abney were married. They moved to the ranch in January. Mother still kept books for Mr. Clark and continued to on a part time basis as long as he was in business. The big depression was beginning, although at the time we didn't realize that was in store. Mr. Abney died on June 20, 1930, and we were left with a ranch, a mortgage and little experience. I continued in college for three years. At that time, money was very scarce and my own father's estate suffered losses. So I stayed home and taught school.

My first school was at Rhea Tillard's where I taught their two children. That was a result of the depression for them too. They had a house in town, but they could rent it and not keep up two households. They charged me $20.00 a month board and had to turn it back to the school district. The district wouldn't hire a teacher for less than four pupils unless the parents paid $10.00 per month for the students they lacked. My salary was $76.00 per month for eight months.

The next two years I taught at the Boy Scout camp on Box Elder Creek at $75.00 for nine months. I taught two of the Tom Brubaker children and the caretaker's grandchildren. After that I was at the Tank Farm for a year. Jim Robinson and his twin sister Elizabeth, two of Robert Hildebrand's children and Bobby Harris, who was the manager's son, were my pupils.

The last school was at Careyhurst. I was there two years. The first year a lot of children came and went during the fall when crops were being harvested and railroad work done. The Cadys and McGeehees were the permanent ones although the Cadys left that winter. The last year I had only Silas and Mabel McGeehee. My salary had been increased each year until I was making $90.00 a month.

Mother stayed on at the ranch until 1942. We often wondered how we could meet the payments when they came due but something always seemed to happen. She sold the cattle and leased the pastures. There were a series of young men, old men and couples who worked for her.

In 1938, I was married to L. C. "Pink" Reider. He had come to Wyoming in 1933 while I was teaching at Tillards. He came with a friend, Bob Crakes, a nephew of Joe Reynolds. In the spring he went to work at the CY Ranch. Eventually he became cattle foreman. We lived on the CY for about three years. The depression was beginning to level out, and Mother was finding it harder to employ help. So we moved to the Abney ranch and lived there from 1942 to 1948.

After World War II started, Mother went to work at the Casper Air Force Base. She was transferred to Ogden, Utah, where she met and married Frank Sorensen. They owned grocery stores in New Mexico and Utah, finally settling in Hot Springs, South Dakota, where they lived until their deaths. Mother died in 1980 and he in 1982.

While we were in Wyoming, we became parents three times. Carol Rae was born in 1940, Robert J. in 1942, and Julia Ann in 1945.

In 1948 we sold the ranch to O. D. Ferguson and bought another between Edgemont and Hot Springs, South Dakota. We ranched there until 1975 when ill health forced us to retire. We sold the ranch and are now living in Hot Springs, South Dakota.

Adams, John Q. and Lydia

John Q. Adams was born Nov. 28, 1839 in Georgetown, Ohio. He was in the jewelry business in Ohio and came to Douglas in 1889 with his wife Lydia Howater. They had three children: William, Earl and Edna.

He had a jewelry store in Douglas — "Watch Repair a Specialty" — and also served two terms as Converse County Treasurer from Jan. 1897 to Jan. 1901. His salary was $250. per quarter. He left Douglas and in 1902 was appointed first Postmaster in Tucumcari, New Mexico.

Son William Ernest Adams, born in Harrisonville, Ohio Jan. 29, 1881, received his early education in Douglas and attended the University of Wyoming. He joined the U.S. fighting forces in 1898 for service in the Spanish-American War and served 17 months.

In April 1905, Ernest married Josephine Jarchow; they had two sons: William E. Adams, now of Austin, Texas, and John Q. Adams, now of Glendo. Josephine died in 1910, and the two young boys were cared for by their grandmother, Mrs. William Jarchow.

Ernest, for many years, was foreman for the Platte Valley Ranch near McKinley, Wyoming. In early summer Ernest and other hired men would go to Hepner, Oregon for the Platte Valley Ranch and buy 60,000 sheep, divide them into 10 bunches of 6000 and drive them home to sell.

In 1935 Ernest became nationally known as the busiest mayor in the United States and was depicted in the American Magazine "Who's Who". He was mayor of Glendo for several years.

Alberts, Henry and Mary

Henry H. Alberts, an early-day resident of Converse County, was ranch foreman for one of the largest ranches in the county in the early 1900's. He arrived in Wyoming with a buckboard, one horse and all his belongings packed in one trunk.

Henry was born to Genie and Mary Alberts in Deadwood, South Dakota on February 14, 1885. His parents had emigrated from Germany a few years before and lived and worked in the Deadwood, South Dakota area. Mary's health was not good so the family returned to Germany when Henry was about five or six years old. At age 16, Henry decided to return to South Dakota so he boarded a ship for the United States. He worked on various jobs in the Deadwood area, then worked on ranches in Niobrara County, Wyoming before coming to Converse County. In Converse County he hired out to the Mountain Home Ranch owned by Roscoe Cray of New York. The ranch headquarters were located west of Glenrock and is now owned by the Valentine family. Ed and Helga Smith were managers of the Mountain Home at that time as Cray spent most of his time in New York.

On one of Henry's trips to the 1924 Wyoming State Fair in Douglas he met Mary Rudloff at the LaBonte Hotel where she was staying after arriving from Illinois to homestead in Wyoming. He invited her to a day at the fair. Since he had no car he had to rent one for the occasion! Henry and Mary were married June 1, 1925 in Douglas.

Their first home on the Mountain Home Ranch was a small place on Sand Creek about a mile from Monkey Mountain north of Glenrock. In the fall of 1925 Henry and Mary moved to Fort Fetterman (then a part of the Mountain Home Ranch) where they lived in the fort headquarters supervising this end of the ranch operation. There was lots of hay to be put up, so Mary cooked for the crew on her new blue enamel stove which was a dream in itself! Some of the "hands" were life-long residents of Douglas including William Sundquist, Rodney Sundquist, Leslie Sundquist, Jack Bennett, Slim Richards, Ralph Olds and Harry Brewer to name a few. When the hay crew finished, the sheep crew moved in to work sheep in the fall, so there was always plenty of cooking to do on the dream stove.

While living at Fort Fetterman, Lila Mae was born March 9, 1926 and Henry Eugene, March 6, 1931. One morning after Lila was born, Mary mentioned to Henry that she was worried there was not going to be enough milk for the baby. Henry was just walking out the door to feed their cow who had a new-born calf. He didn't come back for the longest time and Mary began to wonder what in the world he was doing. When he did come in he had a bucket of milk in his hand and said "We'll have enough milk now." He had killed the calf and buried it.

In 1929, the Mountain Home Co. sold the Fort Fetterman Ranch so Henry and his family had to leave. When they left, Ed and Helga gave them a team and wagon, a cow and the chickens that were on the Fort. Henry and Mary moved to a small place close to Orpha and farmed there for about a year and a half. Robert Allen was born at Orpha on September 26, 1934. After Robert was born, Henry took a job herding sheep for Frank Amspoker and Mary moved into Douglas.

While working on the Amspoker Ranch, Henry saw one of the strangest episodes he had ever seen in Germany, South Dakota or Wyoming! Gertrude Sundquist had been watching the sheep for Henry while he was doing another job. Gertrude came tearing up on her wild-eyed horse shouting that a coyote was chasing a bear and they were BOTH headed for the band of sheep. Henry yelled at other workers on the ranch and they started in the direction of the bear and coyote to head them off. The bear, seeing this "wild bunch" coming (two on horseback, four in an auto), promptly turned tail. The coyote facing the bear, horsebackers and auto decided it was in his best interest to turn tail too...so now the bear is chasing the coyote! After a speedy chase the bear was killed. The story was printed in issues of the "Douglas Budget" on June 16 and July 21, 1938. A photograph substantiating the story shows the group with the bear at the Amspoker Ranch after the excitement had cooled. The bear was footsore from his long travels and is the only known bear around here to have been seen in such open country as Sage Creek.

Henry passed away suddenly on October 13, 1938, however, many of his children and their children spent their entire lives in Converse County.

After his death, Mary married Fayette Harris. Robert Allen was a small child when he lost his father and could not remember him, so was adopted by Fay Harris and then had the name of Robert "Beeb" Harris. The children grew to manhood and womanhood and Lila Mae married Alvin "Sonny" Burgland in June 1944. They divorced and she married George Tarrant on May 28, 1949. To this union two children were born, Chris and Steve. Lila was killed in an accident December 22, 1972 in Casper, Wyoming. Henry Eugene married Betty Tiedt on October 4, 1951 whose children were Dale LeRoy and Deborah Dee. Robert Allen married Janet VanDine, October 7, 1953 and they had two boys, Greg and Richard and three girls, Joyce, Julie and Judy.

Alexander, Joe and Bea Family

This story of Joe and Bea Alexander is written by their daughter, Iris, who makes no guarantees as to the accuracy of her memory.

Joe's father, Benjamin Norman Alexander, was a farmer in South Carolina. Cotton and corn were their cash crops. They gardened and raised hogs to feed the three boys and four girls that they raised.

Joe was born February 15, 1895, in Pickens County, South Carolina.

Joe, as a boy and young man, wanted most of all, to be a railroad engineer. When he graduated from high school he applied and was accepted at a school that trained engineers. He had to have $20.00 cash for his first month's rent and food. He was unable to raise the cash, therefore he was not able to attend the school. To his dying day he loved trains.

Joe first came to Converse County in 1915. He followed his uncle, E. Crayton Alexander to Wyoming, as did his brothers, Walter Lee and Elbert Houston Alexander. I do not know where Joe first worked, but I remember stories of his driving teams of mules and horses to carry freight from town to the ranch. And stories of cooking for cowboys were related, too.

He went into the United States Navy during World War I and served aboard the USS Rhyandam. He crossed the Atlantic Ocean 28 times. He shoveled coal in the boiler rooms. Can you imagine the hot, back breaking job that must have been?

After the war, in January of 1922, he returned to Wyoming and went to work for Bill Eastman. A pretty young woman named Beatrice Elaine Runnion, daughter of Ace Ellio and Jennie E. Runnion (born February 9, 1902 in Ponca City, Oklahoma) followed her sister, Hallie Smith, to Douglas and she went to work for Mrs. Eastman where she and Joe met. They were married September 16, 1922 at the Presbyterian Church in Douglas.

Joe went to work for a Mr. Johnson on a dairy on the north edge of town. They were furnished a teeny little house, milk products and were paid a salary of $1.00 per day.

Joe went to work for a Mr. Judevine at the Judevine Creamery and he and Bea moved to a little brick house on North Fourth and Antelope Creek. Their daughter, Iris, was born while they lived there.

Joe and Bill Ames, of Casper, formed a partnership and bought the Creamery from Mr. Judevine. Mr. Ames owned a malt shop-restaurant in Casper. He used the creamery products in the shop and also distributed the products to customers in Casper (wholesale/retail). Joe operated the Creamery.

Somewhere in those years, they started buying registered Golden Guernseys and had a nice dairy herd at the Johnson Dairy north of Douglas. One evening, due to the spontaneous combustion of hay kept in the loft (it was reported), the barn caught on fire and they lost most of their herd.

They moved the remainder of the herd to a ranch out of Casper and a Mr. Willie came into the partnership and they rebuilt their herd. Later, the partnership broke up so Joe bought the Henry Bolln Ranch and brought his cattle there. Hugh and Beulah Alexander ran the ranch for him and they frequently let a little "city girl" (Iris) come stay with them.

Later Joe sold the Bolln Ranch and bought a ranch west of the river and had his dairy there. During World War II, the U.S. Government confiscated a large portion of his acreage to build a prisoner of war camp. With his acreage limited, Joe sold his beloved Guernseys to ranchers and farmers in the area in order that he could keep the cows in the area to buy their milk for the Creamery. He also sold the ranch.

He bought Bill Ames' share of the Creamery in the 1940's and sold the business to Meadow Gold Company in 1954.

He worked hard all of his life. He manufactured a prime product at fair prices and never cheated anybody in his life.

In days when Douglas' water supply was not as dependable as it probably is now, many a summer evening, after supper, we'd all drive down to "check the ice machines". That was supposed to take "only a minute" but if water pressure was low, he'd spend hours down there trying to keep the ice machines and refrigeration machinery going.

Warren and I frequently went out to the car and went to sleep in the car. No matter how hot it was, we'd roll up the windows and lock all the doors because we were afraid of the hobos who rode the rails. When the freight trains came through town, the hobos would drop off and go around town looking for work or for something to eat. Dad always carried the day's money and that always worried Mother. I guess they didn't have night depositories in those days and anyway he needed cash to start the next day's business.

He worked 12, 14, 16 hours a day (and more) seven days a week. Even in the evening some restaurant or cafe would call up for something if they hadn't ordered enough during the day. Winter or summer he'd deliver it to them.

He was a 50-year member of the Samuel Mares Post of the American Legion.

He furnished and packed more gallons of free ice cream to churches and service clubs than I care to think about.

Prior to World War II, when things were economical-ly tough, many a family got milk for their children whether they could pay their bills or not.

Bea and Joe purchased a house at 409 North 5th Street in about 1929. Their son, Warren, was born while they lived there. In 1941 they bought the Speer house at 700 South 5th Street where they lived until their deaths, Bea on July 27, 1974 and Joe on June 29, 1977.

Bea would have liked to have been a nurse, however she did not have the opportunity to pursue that career. Her dad died and left her mother with a bunch of little kids. Bea left school early and went to work to help her mother with the kids. Then she came to Wyoming, got married and her husband, kids and family became her "career", as ladies did in those days. She was a fine daughter, wife and mother. She was a good cook, a good housekeeper, she gardened and raised flowers. She did beautiful embroidery and crocheting. She belonged to the American Legion Auxiliary. She enjoyed her family and friends.

Their daughter, Iris, married David Dean Ditzler of Douglas on January 12, 1947. Dave was in the U.S. Navy until 1964 when he retired and they moved to Mountlake Terrace, Washington. They have four sons and one grandson.

Their son, Warren, married Lanora Mathis of Gainesville, Florida on April 12, 1952. Warren served in the Air Force during the Korean War, and now lives in Kalispell, Montana. He and Lanora have three sons and one grandson.

Alexander, Walter L. Sr. and Edna Family

Dad was the second child of seven born to Benjamin Norman and Martha Ann Alexander on January 1, 1897, in Pickens, South Carolina.

After attending schools in North and South Carolina, his adventuresome spirit brought him to Wyoming with an uncle in the spring of 1916 at the age of 19. He went to work as a roustabout for the Lightning Creek Livestock Company until the fall of 1916 when he returned to South Carolina. He remained there until spring of 1918 and again returned to Douglas to make it his permanent home.

He went to work for Mike Williams, north of Douglas, on the Williams Sheep Company Ranch. This was the beginning of his love for Wyoming and his desire to be a landowner and raise cattle one day. He became foreman at Williams Sheep Company and worked there for eight years. He took up a homestead in the Walker Creek community, later selling to the Williams Sheep Company as many of the employees did. He used this money to get started on his own place on LaBonte Creek later on.

He used to tell me tales of his travels to the town of Douglas by horse and wagon for supplies for the ranch and of the whiskey staches along the way which the revenuers were always looking for. He loved to tell stories about the old time dances and referred to them as good "boot stomping" times. He also told of his trapping for wolves (not coyotes) and using his money from the sale of these furs to buy his first car.

On November 30, 1925, he married Edna Ann Pfeifer, daughter of Andreas and Anna Pfeifer. They made their home on Duck Creek. I remember Mom telling me of their first home they had - how it had been used as a sheep barn, and they had to chase the sheep out and clean it up to make the home livable.

To this couple were born two sons and one daughter, Walter Lee Alexander, Jr. (deceased), born September 17, 1926, died April 12, 1982, Donald Andrew Alexander, born April 4, 1936, and Shirley Ann Alexander Forgey born March 30, 1946.

In 1940, Dad purchased the Archie Picklesimer ranch on LaBonte Creek from Saul & Zimmerman. On the Picklesimer place, an old two story horse barn and hay mow had been built in the late 1800's. It was a huge barn with two large storage sheds attached to each end. This barn withstood many winds and floods until the flood of 1970. That flood took every last bit of the old barn including the rock foundation and scattered bits and pieces up and down the LaBonte Creek. I remember the flood also took the bridge out, and I still have visions of the people from neighboring communities and town coming out and parking on top of the hill at the White School House and walking down the road to see the debris left by the flood. The water managed to reach as high as the foundation of the house which was an old timer too. Dad and Mom had built on additions but the main kitchen, porch area and dining room had been an old dance hall at one time. At least it withstood the flood. Because of the high water, when the time came for my husband and me to build a home, we moved and elevated the new house to where it now stands because of the memories of this flood.

Dad and Mom lived here on the LaBonte until 1975, raising Hereford cattle and crossbreeding them with Charolais bulls. In 1975 they retired and moved to 231 North Fifth Street in Douglas and lived there until their tragic car accident on September 22, 1976, which claimed both of their lives.

Allen, Harvey and Edith Family

Originally the plantation home of Hugh and Mary E. (Driscoll) Allen was in Virginia. The family, of Scottish descent, consisting of the parents and two children, a son and a daughter, evidently became weary of the terrible fighting between the Union and Confederate Armies. When the son, Harvey Preston, was a very young boy the family moved to Lawrence, Kansas. Of course they couldn't escape from the conflict because in 1863 Quantrill's Raiders burned Lawrence to the ground.

Harvey, born on November 25, 1860, received his common school education in the public schools of Kansas; his schooling was not extensive. As was the case with many families of that time, Hugh and Mary were not able to afford to support their children after they were old enough to support themselves. Therefore, Harvey made his way to the west, arriving in Colorado when he was but 16 years of age. He lived in Denver for a time and later was hired by a man named Bell who ran a freighting business. Beginning in 1880 and continuing until 1887, Harvey worked as a bull whacker. "Preacher Bull Whacker" Bell would not hitch up on Sundays. Instead, he would hold prayer meetings and preach to his bull whackers. It was said that no man could drive bulls unless he could swear, and though Bell was a religious man, he sometimes forgot himself, especially when his wagon got stuck.

Harvey freighted out of Colorado for a time, but later in the summer of 1882, drove the road from Rock Creek on the Union Pacific Railroad to Fort McKinney near Buffalo. Eventually, in the interest of saving time, the bull teams were replaced by mule teams. They freighted the Rock Creek to Ft. McKinney route, also known as the

Mrs. Harvey (Edith) Allen at the state fair.

Harvey Allen Sr. and Harvey Allen Jr. at the Buckshot Ranch.

Ft. Fetterman Road, until the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad reached Douglas in 1886. Then they freighted from Douglas to Buffalo.

Harvey quit the freighting business in favor of homesteading in 1887. He filed on a claim southwest of Douglas, which he named the "Buckshot". He also opened a livery stable in the same year in the town of Douglas, part of which is still standing on Center Street, east of the railroad tracks. Harvey kept his homestead for five years, raising cattle and sheep; but in 1892, disposed of his land to the Cross family and devoted his time exclusively to the livery barn.

Edith Clair McAllister, a full-blooded Scotswoman, was united in marriage to Harvey P. Allen in Stockville (or Curtis), Nebraska on September 23, 1889. Edith was born May 25, 1873 in Sedan, Chautaugua County, Kansas. When Edith was a young child, the family traveled to Camp Supply, Oklahoma by covered wagon. Here her father, George McAllister, was commissary manager for Stith and Watkins, a large ranch outfit.

Edith and her brother Vern attended the Osage Mission School. Edith remembered a herd of about 2,700 head of Longhorn steers was brought to the ranch from Texas. Her mother, Mary Jane Crosby McAllister, was given the honor of branding the first steer, which had a horn spread of over six feet. The cowboys had to cut twelve inches off of each horn in order to run the animal down the chute, and even then, his head had to be turned sideways so he could pass.

Later, the McAllister family moved to Rico, Colorado, a mining camp where Mr. McAllister was manager and his wife cooked for the miners. After completing this job, Mr. McAllister went to Arizona in search of work and his family moved to Kingston, Illinois. During that winter, while George was eating his supper in his bunkhouse, he was shot by an Indian.

Mrs. McAllister subsequently went to Nebraska to visit friends, and while there, filed on a homestead. Edith helped with the plowing and planting. The dwelling on the homestead was of sod. The family lived there for about three years, and then the mother went to Curtis, Nebraska to cook for cash at a hotel. Vern worked for the friends and Edith stayed alone at the homestead.

Drawn by stories of Douglas, described as a bustling, growing western town, Mrs. McAllister and Edith traveled in 1887 to Wendover by train and then by stagecoach to Douglas. Enroute, the stage became stuck in the mud at the McDermott Ranch, where Mr. McDermott pulled the stage out of the mud for $5.00. The passengers had to take up a collection to pay for the service.

In Douglas, Mrs. McAllister bought a restaurant, financing the venture with money borrowed against her homestead. The restaurant was located on North Second Street.

Edith and Harvey met each other in front of the College Inn, underneath the cottonwood tree by the town pump. Edith was 16 years old when she and Harvey were married in Stockville, Nebraska. On the trip back to Douglas, the stagecoach driver became intoxicated. Another passenger, W. C. "Billy" Irvine, persuaded Harvey to take over the reins. So, as Mrs. Allen said, "the young Lochinvar of the West drove his bride into the cow town of Douglas."

The Allens were the parents of four children, two boys and two girls. The eldest was Verna, who was born on May 26, 1890. Doris was the second child, followed by Robert, and then Harvey Preston, Jr. All these children were born in Douglas.

Mrs. Allen was active in many projects in the young town of Douglas, including membership on the first board committee of the Wyoming State Fair along with Miss Dickson, Dr. Wilson, John Flynn and L. J. Swan. She was active in the needlework and culinary departments, being in charge of the entering and displaying of the exhibits.

Mr. and Mrs. Allen belonged to the Dancing Club in the early 1900's. Upon completion of the Temple Ballroom, members wore evening dress — tuxedos for the men and train gowns for the ladies.

Mr. Allen at one time was Mayor of Douglas, Converse County Commissioner, and deputy-sheriff under Malcolm Campbell, during which time Harvey arrested Mike Shonsey, the killer of Dudley Champion.

Harvey apparently had a quick temper. At one time, he took offense at something Merris Barrow had printed in "The Budget." He met Mr. Barrow in front of the J.J. Steffen Drug Store and words were exchanged. The words became heated and Harvey promptly hit Barrow and knocked him through the plate glass window.

In their later years, Mr. and Mrs. Allen spent much of their time, especially their winters, in southern California. Harvey died in 1948 at the age of 88. Edith continued to live in California in the winters and spent the summers in Douglas until she died on January 15, 1966 in Los Angeles. She was 92 years old. Both are buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery, along with Mrs. Allen's mother.

Their eldest daughter, Verna, married Ronald L. Swan, the son of another prominent Douglas pioneer family, the L. J. Swans.

Amend, Heinrich and Anna Family

The German-Russian is in fact a pure German who moved to the United States from Russia. Their history in Russia goes back to the 16th century when Czar Ivan The Terrible invited German officers, technicians, craftsmen, merchants, and scholars, particularly to Moscow to help build the city.

Nearly 200 years after Ivan, the Empress Catherine II The Great, issued a manifesto inviting rural-agriculture Germans to settle in her adopted land of Russia. Catherine, born Princess Sophia Augusta Frederica at Stettin in the German state of Anhalt-Zerbst, remembered the hard working intelligent people of her native land of Germany when she realized the need for increased cultivation of vast areas of untilled lands in Russia. The manifesto dated July 22, 1763 guaranteed freedom of religion, enforced military service, taxation, and the right to leave Russia whenever they desired. In addition, each family was granted land, not ownership of the land, but the right to use the land forever. Fathers were also allowed a parcel of the land for each son with the youngest son inheriting his father's land rights.

The response to Catherine's invitation was large. Whole villages sometimes emigrated "en masse". Frequently an entire family unit, such as the Amends, moved to the Black Sea and Volga River areas. They kept close to themselves, retaining their language and customs, and marrying only Germans.

For about 100 years the arrangement of special privileges for Germans in Russia was preserved, but a sharp reversal in official policy came in 1871 with the abrogation of Catherine's manifesto. From that time on, taxes were due, enforced military service was required, records were to be kept in the Russian language, and under Alexander III, a Danish Emperor, an anti-German policy began.

Unrest in the country spread rapidly. Cruel treatment was common. One story is that Russian soldiers living off the land could ride into a farmstead, order a meal of "turkey oysters" (that delicate round morsel of dark meat nestled on either side of the spine of a turkey) and require the farmer to slaughter enough of his flock to provide a meal of this delicacy. As the soldier rode off, the farmer, with no refrigeration to preserve the remaining parts of the birds, could only watch the winter food supply spoil. With the increased tensions, a few of the German-Russians left Russia to settle elsewhere and those few were followed by a flood.

They left at first with the consent of the Russians going to Canada where an 1872 law allowed a homestead of 160 acres to be taken for ten dollars, or to America where the Homestead Act of 1862 opened up the Mid-West to settlement. As their numbers increased, they were sometimes forced to leave Russia in darkness and secrecy. Sometimes they sold all their possessions, bought passage on a ship, and sailed for the freedom of America.

The Adam and Elizabeth Amend family were German-Russian. Their son Heinrich Fredrick Amend was born May 14, 1879 at Saratoff, Russia. Alexander II was in power at this time and Nicholas II was his successor in 1894 bringing with him governmental inefficiency and corruption. Conditions became unbearable; and according to the Amend passport papers, which are written in Russian, they left Saratoff for America on June 19, 1893. All of the Amend family left Russia at this time except for one daughter who chose to remain behind.

Anna Catherine Giess, who later became Heinrich Amend's wife in America, was also born in Saratoff, Russia in 1879. She also left Russia with her family and parents, Adam and Barbara Giess, for the land of hope and freedom. After almost a month's ship voyage, they landed at a Canadian port where they then took the railroad to Quebec, Canada arriving July 5, 1893. Through the help of the German-Russian headquarters for emigrants located at Lincoln, Nebraska, the Amend and Giess families and others took the railroad to Lincoln, arriving July 8, 1893. These specific dates were reported in Heinrich Amend's Petition for Naturalization papers. The Amends stayed in Lincoln buying a house, and the Giess family slowly moved to Colorado where they took up farming near Greeley.

Heinrich Amend and Anna Giess were married in Lincoln, Nebraska, on January 11, 1900. They lived there for eight years working on the railroad. Their first four children were born in Lincoln: Katy on June 4, 1901, John on October 27, 1903, Henry on September 27, 1905, and Maria on October 28, 1907.

On March 30, 1908, Heinrich Amend declared his intentions of becoming a citizen of the United States of America in the District Court, Lancaster County, Nebraska. He became a citizen on June 24, 1914 at Lusk, Wyoming. Anna became a citizen later.

Heinrich's dream of owning his own land was finally realized when he moved his family by railroad from Lincoln, Nebraska to Keeline, Wyoming, where he had bought a homestead of 160 acres, five miles southwest of the town. He moved his family from Lincoln on the Chicago Northwestern Railroad. Anna Amend who could speak little English and the four small children were the first to arrive at the Keeline depot. They were met by their new neighbors, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Bopp, where they stayed until Heinrich arrived. These arrangements were made by Heinrich on an earlier visit when the homestead was filed. The family remained at the Carl Bopp place for about three weeks until a one room house could be built on the homestead.

The journey from Lincoln took Heinrich several days longer since he came on the emigration car with their household goods and livestock. His late arrival caused much concern for Henry, age three, who cried those several days thinking he would never see his father again. April 2, 1908, is the official arrival date of the Amends to Wyoming where they remained for the rest of their lives.

The move from the beautiful green settlement around Lincoln to the barren prairies of the Wyoming homestead was difficult for Anna to adjust to and accept. She spent many times those first few years behind the one room homestead shack crying to herself. Two more children were born after their move to Wyoming; Emma was born on January 29, 1910 and Fred on January 30, 1912.

The entire first summer was spent turning the tough sod for farming, building fences and shelter for the livestock. Heinrich walked to work the first two winters at a coal mine north of Lost Springs, Wyoming for added income. The family's first Christmas was celebrated at the Fred Runser homestead with many of the neighbors attending. The Heinrich Amends close neighbors included: Jacob Amend, a brother; Joe Panno; George Amen; Walter Galbraith; James and Albert Brink, brothers who homesteaded and taught school; the Dieleman family; and many others.

On May 10, 1909, a General Land Office receipt shows an additional application by Heinrich Amend for 160 acres in Section 26 was made at $1.25 per acre plus $10 for filing fees and $6 for the commission. At this time the one room homestead house was moved one-half mile west to this additional homestead. Three rooms were added to the house which still remains at this location today. A patent for these homestead rights was granted for 320 acres on January 17, 1913 by President Woodrow Wilson. Forty acres were later purchased from James and Leila Brink for $200 in 1942. This final addition brought the total acres of Heinrich Amend's place to 360 acres.

Somehow, Heinrich and Anna Amend raised their six children and kept their bills and land taxes paid even during the depression and drought years when so many of their neighbors were forced to move off their homesteads. However, land mortgages were made to Lucy Jones Bergeson for \$500 in 1914; the Federal Land Bank of Omaha for \$1,600 in 1917, and the First National Bank of Manville for \$2,500 in 1921; and some mortgages were made on the cattle and other chattels. One such mortgage, dated 1927, listed all livestock as nine red milk cows, one heifer, one red bull, and seven work horses all branded  $\nabla$  as collateral. The Federal Land Bank Loan was the last mortgage to be paid 30 years later in 1956.

The first doctor of the rural community was Dr. Christiansen. Anna Amend was a much needed and loved midwife and nurse. Sickness and epidemics played a large role in the life of these people. The year of 1909 brought scarlet fever and Maria, at the age of one and one-half years was the only one of the family to have this dreaded disease and her entire body peeled from the sickness. "The Black Death" (diphtheria) came in 1916 and 1917. Somehow the Heinrich Amend family escaped this disease, but the entire family of George Amen had diphtheria. Their small daughter, along with many other children, died. After the funeral, Mrs. George Amen walked over the hill and gave the little girl's china bisque head doll to Katy, the oldest girl, who never had a doll. Katy inherited her mother's skill for caring for the sick and soon took over as the family nurse. The terrible flu epidemic came in 1918. Once again, the Amend family escaped the sickness without a tragedy. Although both Henry and Grandfather Adam Amend, who was visiting at the time, had the flu. One book, "The People's Home Library", played a large role in the lives of the Amends. The well worn pages explained everything from farming, cooking, and especially illness, birth, and death.

The winters were very severe. The snow fall was so heavy that sometimes the family had to tunnel from the house to the barn to care for the livestock. Grandfather Amend was visiting once during a blizzard and became lost a short distance from the house, but the family's pet dog found him and brought him to the house. Regardless of the weather, the Amend children walked a mile and a half to the Prairie View School for class. In the winter, they wrapped papers and burlap sacks around their feet to keep them from freezing and carried their lunch which was packed in a lard pail. Emma was the only child to ever ride a bus, which she did for her last three years of high school at Manville. She went to Keeline for her first year of high school. Emma later taught at the Prairie View School that she attended as a girl.

Most of the family's social life centered around the Prairie View Church and School where the community had carry-in dinners, box socials, plays, etc. The Fourth of July celebration in Lost Springs was something not to be missed. They attended Lutheran Church services and catechism classes at the Peterson School which was south and east of the Amend place. One of the very old traditions was dropped when all the Amend children learned their Lutheran catechism in English rather than the traditional German language. An Evangelical Lutheran Church was finally established in Keeline in the creamery building which still remains.

Anna Amend passed away on April 7, 1947, at the age of 68 years, and Heinrich Amend passed away on July 30, 1958, at the age of 79 years. They spent their remaining lives on the homestead after their children were raised. This homestead was sold to their son, Henry Amend of Lost Springs in 1959. They were both laid to rest in the Lusk Cemetery.

Katy's wedding was the first of the Amend children. At the age of eighteen, she was married to Marvin V. Skillings of Manville. For two years after their marriage, Marvin drove a truck for Frank Kettler and Katy rode with him, camping along the way. Marvin then got a job with Ohio Oil Company at Lance Creek where they lived until after their retirement. They had no children of their own but were a very devoted Aunt and Uncle. Katherine Skillings passed away in January 1965 and Marvin in August 1970.

John married Marie Hahn and they had two daughters, Darlene and Dorothy. John worked on the railroad for a few years and then went to work in oil fields. He passed away in September 1970 at Cody, Wyoming.

Maria was married to Burnice Cox in 1928. He was starting out as a young farmer in the Keeline community. He finally gave this up and went to work at Lance Creek for Ohio and Marathon Oil Company. They had one daughter, Lyola, born in 1929. Upon his retirement in May of 1966, they moved to Cody, Wyoming, where they still reside.

Emma married Allen C. Gaukel in 1929. His parents were also homesteaders in the Jireh community. Shortly after their marriage, they moved to Twin Falls, Idaho, where he was employed by the city. They had two children, a daughter, Patricia Ann, born in 1938 and a son, Allen Charles Jr., born in 1941. They still live in Twin Falls, where they have retired.

Fred was the only son to serve in the armed forces. He joined the army in 1943 and served three years. He was never sent overseas but spent most of his time in Florida. After his discharge, Fred and his father lived on the homestead until Heinrich passed away. He then moved to Newcastle, Wyoming, where he did oil field work. He later moved to Cody where he lived until his death in May, 1972.

Henry married Gladys Sims on May 31, 1930.

Amend, Henry and Gladys

Henry Amend, son of Heinrich and Anna Amend, attended the Prairie View School and worked on his parents' homestead as a young boy. In 1927, he helped drill on one of the first wooden rotary drilling rigs in the discovery of the huge Lance Creek Oil Field. He married Gladys M. Sims, daughter of Albert and Della Sims who owned the Twenty Mile Ranch north of Lost Springs. Gladys was a school teacher having attended the University of Wyoming for two years prior to their marriage on May 31, 1930. The young married couple went into ranching with the Sims for about three years.

The dry years of the 30's forced Hank, as he was better known, to seek employment in the oil fields again. They lived in Utah, Colorado, and Wyoming, and they were constantly moving with the drilling rigs. They first lived in a tent with a wooden floor but later got a small trailer house to follow the work. A daughter, Mae Ann was born in 1932. The family continued to follow the oil field work during the depression and before the war. They lived at Medicine Bow for a while and at Lovell when a wild cat well which Hank was working "blew out" for several months. Many acquaintanceships were made during these times, and many stories could be told about early day oil exploration in Wyoming.

Hank and Gladys had been saving their money for a ranch; and in 1938, they purchased the Harry B. Card Ranch one mile south of Lost Springs, Wyoming. The historic ranch had gone into receivership and Frank Barrett, a Lusk attorney, made the sale. The two main buildings of the ranch were a huge two story barn which measured 30 feet by 80 feet and a long log bunk house and cook house combined that was used by the men who worked the ranch. The barn was built in 1918 for the many teams of horses that were used in haying the meadows. The original Lost Springs is located below the barn and is the head of Lost Creek which rarely flows except for the springs.

Gladys' brother, Cecil Sims, of Manville wintered his cattle on the newly purchased ranch for a while; but in 1941, Hank had purchased enough cattle to stock the ranch. So they quit the oil field work and moved into the log house until a two story house could be moved onto the ranch from the town of Lost Springs. A son, Marvin A., and daughter, Mary A., were born in 1941 and 1945 respectively.

Hank and Gladys continued to increase their land by purchasing adjoining property. The purchases included early day homesteads of such people as James Brink, Walter Galbraith, Moses Galbraith, William Bohnenkemper, Albert Brink, W. R. Bridgroom, Delford McGrew, Raymond White, and others. In 1959, Heinrich Amend's homestead was also purchased. The ranch land now lies in both Niobrara and Converse counties.

Mae Ann Amend married Robert Manning on February 11, 1951. They purchased the Twenty Mile Ranch from her grandmother, Della Sims, in 1952. They have two children, Alvin and Debra.

Marvin Amend was killed in an auto accident in July, 1970 at Fresno, California where he lived with his wife the former Patricia Lovgren, whom he married in 1969. Marvin had been employed by Pacific, Gas and Electric Company for seven years. He spent three years in the U.S. Army and was stationed in New Jersey.

Mary Amend married Charles Engebretsen on September 5, 1965. They have two children, Merritt and Marlisa. Chuck graduated from the University of Wyoming in 1967 with a Bachelor of Science Degree in Business Administration, and Mary attended the University of Wyoming and Chadron State College. She graduated from the Academy Beauty College in 1967. The family now lives on the Amend Ranch at Lost Springs.

Gladys Amend died in May 1963 and Henry Amend died in December 1970. They were laid to rest with their son Marvin in the family plot at the Lusk Cemetery.

Amspoker, William, John and Frank

When the Amspokers first came to Wyoming, William Edward, or Ed as he was better known, came through with a trail herd from Texas to Montana. Ed was the son of Samuel and Mary Jane Amspoker of Cadiz, Ohio. He was the oldest of nine children.

Ed made three trips trailing cattle in the years 1885-1887. He worked for big cattle barons such as Abel Pierce. It was said that Mr. Pierce owned 50,000 head of cattle but owned only 11 acres of land. Ed also trailed longhorns for Dudley Snyder. Mr. Snyder was very strict and did not allow his employees to drink whiskey, play cards, or swear in his presence or in his camp.

Ed Amspoker decided to stay in Wyoming while herding horses north of Lusk for John B. Kendrick (future U.S. Senator). Ed married a school teacher, Hattie Brooks. About two years later, she caught typhoid fever and passed away. He moved to Douglas and then drove freight wagons from Casper to Lander. With one line, he drove twenty horses and pulled four wagons. He used to tell that it took seven days to go one way, and it was mighty cold!

Then two of his brothers, John and Frank Amspoker, came to Wyoming. They opened a livery barn on Center Street in Douglas where the Burlington Railroad lawn was.

When the railroad company bought them out, Frank started to ranch where the Sage Creek Stage Station was then. It was on the Bozeman Trail some 25 miles northwest of Douglas. Frank raised cattle and sheep and put together a nice ranch. He was Converse County Commissioner for eight years. He married Grace and had one adopted daughter, Gertrude. Frank resided in Converse County some fifty years. Frank died in Tucson, Arizona on March 2, 1952. His ranch was sold to Wm. J. Smith who ranches in that same community.

John Amspoker became Converse County Clerk in the 1920's and served six years. He married Carrie Robertson and lived some time in Glenrock. He had an active business career and had substantial business interests in Douglas and Glenrock. He died December 18, 1962 in Denver at the age of 97. He had no children.

Ed Amspoker moved back to Douglas and married Lillian Hormel. He worked in the oil fields in the Brenning Basin just north of Natural Bridge.

While he was there, he traded a mule for a horse from a co-worker. When the fellow told his wife she had to ride behind a mule, she declared she wasn't going to. Ed told the man he would meet him on the road and would trade back making his wife more pleased. Ed picked up a hitchhiker who was walking to town. Ed and the other horse trader met and stopped without saying a word. They unhitched the mule and horse, made the trade, returned to their wagons and went on their way. The hitchhiker sat there a short while and then said, "Sir, I've seen a lot of horse trading in my time, but never seen anything such as that". No one ever told him any different.

Ed got the job of hauling the cement for the LaPrele Dam in 1904. He hauled all of the cement, part of the gravel, and later built part of the ditches for the ditch company. He later worked on the county road crew.

Ed and his wife, Lillian, rented the Peyton place on LaPrele Creek for a few years. There was a small school house there that also served as a Sunday School and Literary. (That same school house has since been moved to the State Fairgrounds in Douglas). Literary was where all the people had a part in a play, gave speeches, recited poetry, or just had a good sociable to visit and have fun. Ed liked to play jokes. He would turn the girls' saddles backwards on their horses and then get into a water fight with them. He usually lost the battle.

Ed and Guy Burson played for dances around the country. Ed played the organ and the harmonica at the same time while Guy played the fiddle.

About 1914 Ed bought a small ranch on Six Mile Creek west of Douglas. He raised horses and cattle until his death on December 24, 1935. His two children, Lois and Sam went to a country school and later to Douglas.

In 1922 Lois married Edgar McClurg, a mail carrier in Douglas, moved to Deadwood, South Dakota, and after a divorce, came back to Douglas. Later she married Bob McMillan of Sheridan and lived there until her death in 1982.

Sam Amspoker worked on a number of ranches until he graduated from school. Then he was a bookkeeper for Coliseum Motors Company until he took charge of his father's ranch. He raised registered horses and pureblood sheep and also did contract hauling. He married Patricia Brow of Douglas on August 4, 1935. Four daughters were born to this family.

Sam lost his right arm in a tractor accident in April of 1953. He continued his ranching business and was elected Converse County Assessor in 1959. After 16 years of serving the county, he sold his ranch, retired and moved to Hulett, Wyoming in 1976. He enjoys his four daughters: Mrs. Thea Nuckolls, Mrs. Sherry Sims, Mrs. Bonnie Henson, and Mrs. Seba Clayton, and his eleven grandchildren.

Anderson, Burch and Sadie

Phillip and Clara Anderson, parents of Burch Phillip came to Douglas, Wyoming in 1907. There they settled on a ranch northwest of Douglas and raised their family. Burch Phillip was born in Kearney, Nebraska on June 29, 1888, coming to Douglas with his parents when he was 19 years old. There he met Sadie Theresa Schloss, and they were married January 17, 1917. They homesteaded on some land seven miles west of Douglas. They bought horses and farm equipment and raised hay and grain. They raised five children.

Mr. Anderson belonged to the Woodman of the World and participated in their activities. We were also active in community meetings and had a concession at the State Fair, where we sold soft drinks and popcorn; we also had the concession at the Ayres Natural Bridge Park, selling homemade ice cream and popcorn. Burch had a team of horses that took first prize at the State Fair in 1920.

We attended many community dances and won first prize for the waltz at the Temple Hall - also won a blue ribbon for square dancing. We held community dances in our hay loft for as many as 50 people. We danced from sundown to sunup after which everyone drank the rest of the coffee and finished up the cakes and then went home to do the necessary work that must be done on a farm.

In 1937 we moved to Astoria, Oregon, where we worked in fish canneries. Mr. Anderson passed away in October 1957. At that time, I moved to Eugene, Oregon to make my home with my daughter Reta, and I am residing there at this time. Elmer is deceased, Edward lives in Silverdale, Washington, Allan lives in Eugene, Oregon, and Maxine Schreul lives in Camarillo, California.

I have ten grandchildren and 16 great-grandchildren.

Anderson, Charles and Charlotte

Charles Anderson lived on a homestead in Nebraska near Blue Hill. Mrs. Anderson's father homesteaded at Exeter, Nebraska. Her maiden name was Charlotte Sweely. Charles and Charlotte were married at Clay Center, Nebraska on December 31, 1901.

They lived near Nelson, Nebraska where their son, Wayne, was born on March 3, 1903.

They lived on rented farms, and they moved three miles out of Fairfield where Lucille was born on April 6, 1907. Lois was born January 7, 1916.

Charles went to Wyoming and filed on a homestead in February of 1917 in the Walker Creek vicinity. They moved there in April 1917. They lived on the homestead until in the 1940's. When Charles' health failed they sold the place and moved into Douglas.

When we arrived in Douglas on April 26, 1917 it was snowing. The snow was knee deep. We stayed in Douglas until May 5, 1917 when we made it to the homestead, twenty-five miles out.

Several cabins were already built along the way. The Lemly cabin had the stove pipe sticking out of the window, as they were living in it with no chimney.

We lived in a tent and kept our chickens in a dry goods box. Our cabin was ready to live in on the second of June.

There were two ranches in the vicinity: the Roy Baughn's ranch was 1½ miles up the creek and the Mike Williams' ranch was five miles down the creek.

The first picnic was held on the school section. Those present were the Marion Whiting, Nate Barrett, C. Sharder, Fern Lemly and Charles Anderson families.

The first school was held in the fall of 1917 at Mrs. Nicholl's homestead until the Walker Creek School was built. The first teacher to teach in the Walker Creek School was Maude Goldsby. Pupils were Lucille Anderson, James and Gerald Sawyer and Howard Lemly.

Farmers Union was organized in 1921.

A mail route was also established in 1921, and the post office was up north at Bill Kinder's and was called Janet. The first mail carrier was Roy Lathrop.

The Hageman's, Spragers, and Vesseys homesteaded west of the school house, also the Johnsons and the Herricks.

The Thatchers and Wilemans came in 1918. The George Gillespies came a little later. The Lewendowskis, the Crams, and Willard Vernons had homes in this vicinity. Mr. Vernon was a disabled veteran of World War I. After he passed away, Mrs. Vernon married Roy Elder. The place is now called the Kimball place. The Crams were an elderly couple who had three sons, Raymond, Orlando, and Harold who all had homesteads.

The five Beaver Boys homesteaded on Piney Creek east and south of the George Gillespies. They were Ernest, Raymond, Charles, William, and Irette. Their places joined except for Irette's whose place was farther north.

Wayne Anderson graduated from Douglas High School in 1921. He was married to Bethel Smith on June 28, 1926.

Lucille Anderson was married to William Beaver on November 6, 1924.

Lois Anderson was married to Virgil Lore on October 16, 1937.

Lois passed away July 30, 1958; Charlotte Anderson passed away September 24, 1960; Charles Anderson passed away June 27, 1961; Wayne Anderson died October 4, 1964; and Bethel Anderson died on June 27, 1978.

Anderson, "Soapy"

Fetterman, Wyoming, was a railroad station named after Colonel W. J. Fetterman. It was located about five miles east of Inez, Wyoming. It was a livestock shipping point for the country around. A large set of corrals and loading chutes was built by Northwestern Railroad. A section house and several other buildings made up the small settlement. At one time, plans were made to build a refinery and pipe oil from Brenning Basin area. This was a small oil field to the southwest. However, the oil was low grade and failed to produce the quantity as planned so the plans were abandoned.

One couple, Mr. and Mrs. Anderson, lived at Fetterman in the early thirties. He received the name "Soapy" as he had a formula for making soap that was a good grease remover and at the same time was easy on the hands. He also invented a letter opener. This was a knife mounted on a stand, when pressed down it would cut one end off a letter.

Another invention was a machine run from an air compressor that fluffed feather pillows and mattresses.

Besides his inventions, he used the upper floor of his two story house for a dance hall. An outside stairway led to the room and this made a good size community dance hall.

The Andersons moved to Douglas, and railway station and section employees transferred to other areas. The stockyards remained and were used for shipping livestock.

Anson, John and Mamie

John William Anson, known as "John Will" was the son of John William and Margaret (Golightly) Anson, a coal miner who migrated to the United States about 1838. John Will was born at Pittston, Pennsylvania in 1872. He came west to Williamsburg, Colorado, with his parents where he grew up and became a coal miner.

He came to Glenrock, Wyoming, about 1890 to work in the newly opened coal mine there under the direction of his brother-in-law, Noah Young, who was mine foreman. (Later appointed State Mine Inspector by then Governor Richards).

On April 13, 1896, John Will married Mamie Williams. Mamie, the daughter of Sara and Nathaniel Williams, was born in Hubbard, Ohio, in 1878. She came west to Williamsburg, Colorado, with her parents. Here, her mother divorced Nathaniel and married George Walkinshaw. With her new stepfather Mamie migrated to Glenrock, Wyoming. To John Will and Mamie Anson five children were born: Margaret, Noah, Thomas, Paula, and Sara.

Noah died in infancy. Margaret married Bill Wood and lived their life in Glenrock; where Bill owned and operated the Chevrolet garage until his death in 1964. Thomas lived most of his life in Glenrock as an electrical repairman. He died in 1983. Paula and Sara live in Casper as a retired beautician and retired school teacher, respectively.

John Will and Mamie left Glenrock soon after the death of their baby, Noah, to accept the position of mine foreman at Diamondville, Wyoming. Thomas was born here April 2, 1902. In 1904, the family moved on to Dietz, then to Crosby, Wyoming, where Paula was born in 1910. Here, John Will ran the coal mine and a butcher shop he had bought. Mamie established and ran a boarding house for miners. Finally, about 1912, the family returned to Glenrock.

At this time a ranch on Deer Creek, a few miles south of Glenrock, was purchased. Sara, their last child was born here on January 31, 1916. A year later, in 1917, the ranch was sold and the family moved for the last time, to Glenrock. They bought a garage and the Chrysler Sales Agency for John Will to run and an apartment building for Mamie to run. Later the garage was sold to Bill Wood, and John Will became the owner and operator of the Canondale Meat and Grocery Market. He remained in this business until his death, in 1941.

John Will was known and respected in the communities in which he lived as a hardworking, capable business man. He was a willing supporter of community activities with his time and his money. He served as Mayor of Glenrock four terms and was a member of the town council and the Glenrock School Board. He was a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Physically he was about five feet, eight inches tall, a bit on the over-weight side, but very muscular and active. He was well-known for his witty personality and cleverness at labeling his friends with saucy titles. He was always sure to laugh with people and never at them. He was generous to a fault. Life for the business man was rough during the depression years of the 1930's; but John Will never let lack of money interfere with his concern and charity for the less fortunate. He could always find a bag of oranges or a box of cracker jack for a hungry child. Many Christmas boxes of food were delivered to the needy with no trace of the donor. Fortunately, during these times, Mamie, the thrifty one of this partnership, and a clever operator of the apartment house, could always come up with the cash to pay the bills.

Mamie outlived John Will 19 years. She continued to operate her apartment building and care for herself until she died on December 23, 1960. Mamie was a thrifty, hard-working, and dependable woman, a faithful member of the Community Baptist Church. She served as the chaplain of the Golden West Chapter of the Order of the Eastern Star for over 25 years. She was an exceptionally good cook, a stern, but loving mother, set in her ways of what was proper and good for her children. She is buried beside her husband at Glenrock, Wyoming.

Anthony, Fred and Cora Family

Fred W. Anthony was born in Escanaba, Michigan on December 2, 1861. As a surveyor for the Fremont, Elkhorn, and Missouri Valley Railroad, he helped lay out the railroad through Nebraska and Wyoming.

He first came to the Converse County area in 1886, but returned to O'Neil, Nebraska where he married Cora Parker. Cora a daughter of Judge Parker was born May 16, 1860. He was back in Wyoming with his wife within the year. After working and following the railroad to it's completion in Casper he returned to Douglas where he opened a livery stable.

During the several years that he operated the stable, he built and lived in a house on 4th and Poplar Streets.

Fred and Cora had seven children: Belle, Wallis, Lura (1871), Rick (Jan. 27, 1896), Nell J. (Nov. 20, 1900), Frank and Freddie.

When Lura (Mrs. Victor DeMott) died in childbirth, Fred and Cora took their 4-year-old grandson to raise.

After many years in Douglas, Fred Anthony moved to Washington, D.C. where he died on Oct. 4, 1933. Cora lived until Sept. 9, 1941.

Rick Anthony stayed in Douglas working as a cowboy for the Fiddleback Ranch. He served with General Pershing in the Mexican War and in France during World War 1. After the war he worked for the Chicago, Northwestern Railroad and for Barrett's Creamery in Lusk. He spent many years with the Douglas Cavalry Troop of the Wyoming National Guard and was greatly disappointed when he could not accompany them into active service in World War II because of his age. At the time of his death on May 21, 1951 he was a State Probation and Parole Officer living in Cheyenne.

Rick and Viola Jane Sater were married in Douglas. She was the daughter of Henry and Irma A. Sater having been born May 24, 1902 and dying Nov. 22, 1965. They had 3 sons: Doug (June 24, 1924), Rick (June 26, 1927) and Udean (Nov. 10, 1929).

For several years the three Anthony brothers ran a service station "Doug's Super Service" on the corner of 3rd and Center Streets. At this time Udean is the only Anthony living in Converse County. Rick Jr. lives in Kalamazoo, Michigan working for the federal government. Doug passed away on February 26, 1971.

Ashby, William and Mona Browning, Dana and Edith

William Henry Ashby was born June 15, 1848, in Northampton, England. In 1862, at the age of 14 years, he signed on as a cabin boy and came to America. He arrived first at Ottawa, Canada, going from there to New York City, then on to Iowa. On October 8, 1867, in West Union, Iowa, he became a naturalized citizen of the United States. Continuing westward he reached Wyoming in 1868, where he worked for the Union Pacific Railroad.

Later, from Cheyenne northward to various points in Wyoming, he took up freighting and hauling supplies with a four- or six-horse team and wagon. The railroads did not come to central Wyoming until the 1880's and prior to that the only way to get supplies, such as groceries, building supplies, clothing or materials of any kind, was by freighters.

In 1872, Ashby became a range rider for cattle owners and later was foreman for the Fox Creek outfit (using the Bridle Bit brand) of the Union Cattle Company. Fox Creek is a tributary of Bear Creek, which is a tributary of Horse Creek, which in turn runs into the North Platte River near the Wyoming-Nebraska state line. The Union Cattle Company ran altogether some 35,000 head of cattle. They used the open government range, but had buildings and headquarters at various points, usually along creeks where water was readily available. According to old brand books, their range extended from North Wood, Johnson County, throughout the Goshen Hole Country, and northern Laramie County.

On January 1, 1890, William Ashby married Mona Furnall. Mona Furnall was born May 20, 1853, in Keigs County, Ohio. Some time after their marriage they moved to Grant, Oregon where Mr. Ashby started a cattle fattening operation in connection with a distillery which was run by his partner. They used the mash and residue from the distillery in fattening the cattle, along with other usual feed. A terrible flood wiped out their entire operation, cattle and all. With nothing left they returned to Wyoming and Ashby managed the Van Tassel Cattle Company outfit near Lusk, Wyoming for several years.

Wanting to be on their own, they used $5,000 from a savings account of Mona's and purchased land on Moss Agate and LaPrele Creek from George LeVasseur, closing the deal on July 22, 1898. Later he homesteaded some land in that area and purchased state land, which made up the ranch holdings.

George LeVasseur was a bachelor at the time, and the building used for a house was just a shack. It had a dirt floor, so it didn't need scrubbing. It wasn't much of a house, but Mona made do while their log house was being built. The floor was worn hard and smooth from use, but Mona spoke about how hard it was to keep house with a dirt floor to sweep. It was 1902 before their log house was finished and they moved into it. The house was built on Moss Agate Creek and they named their ranch "Moss Agate Ranch."

The Ashbys had no children of their own, but all the children in the neighborhood knew and loved Mona Ashby. If there were sick children and someone had to sit up with them at night so their folks could get some sleep, it was Mona who went to help. They kept diaries during all their years on the ranch and these show Mona sitting up with May Cross and with Bessie Horr at different times when they had long sick periods. At Christmas there was always a candle lit tree at the Beaver school house and the school children put on a Christmas program. Under the tree was a small gift for every child from Mona. They weren't expensive gifts, but just small things a child would like. Many of them were handmade, but they always made Christmas special.

To show how many more people lived in the country in the early days than do now, I notice in one of the diaries an entry dated November 6, 1906, that showed 87 votes were cast at the Beaver school house in the election that year.

On December 16, 1905, Mona Ashby went to visit her relatives in Chicago. Her sister, Alice Furnall Browning, was living there with another sister. Frank Browning, her husband, had deserted her at an earlier date. Frank Browning had worked for cattlemen around Torrington and had a cattle outfit of his own in that area for a number of years, but a terrible storm had wiped out all his cattle, and about the same time, floods in Ohio had destroyed or ruined rental properties he had there.

Alice was seriously ill at the time with a heart condition. Mona made a lot over her son, Dana, and when Mona got ready to return home, she told Alice she had always wanted a red-headed boy. Alice said, "Why don't you take my red-headed boy home with you?" Alice Browning died January 29, 1906. The boy who came to visit stayed with his aunt and uncle, who were from that time on, the same as parents to him. They wanted to legally adopt him, but his father would not consent as he wanted him to carry on the Browning name. Dana was born September 30, 1898, at Waltman, Ohio.

Mona and Dana arrived in Douglas on January 1, 1906, but it wasn't until January 3 that they got home. At that time there were only a couple phones in the neighborhood. For Mona to let Billie know she was home, she had to phone a neighbor, who in turn had to ride to Ashbys with the news that Mona was in town. Then the trip to town by horse and buggy had to be made. Usually, if roads were at all bad, 20 miles was about all a team could easily make in a day. Consequently, one stayed overnight and went home the following day.

In the 1920's, Dana and Mr. Ashby took up homesteads in the 20 Mile country in Albany County, Wyoming adding mountain range to their ranch holdings.

In 1928, Mona and Billie Ashby left the ranch when Mona's health was failing. They spent several months in San Bernardino, California, and then in Morrill, Nebraska. Neither place seemed like home, so in the spring of 1929, they returned to Douglas and rented an apartment. William Ashby died August 16, 1929, shortly after spending several weeks at the ranch. In the fall of 1928 they had turned their ranch over to Dana Browning to run for them. Mona Ashby continued to live in Douglas until her death in April of 1936.

Dana Browning and Edith Leman were married on January 17, 1929, at Douglas, Wyoming. Dana and Edith had attended the Beaver School in the same grade through elementary school. Dana took the 8th grade over again as the Ashbys thought he was too young to go away from home. Edith went to the Holy Child Academy in Cheyenne for four years of high school. Dana spent his first year in high school with his sister in California. The next three years he went to Jireh College, a school run by the Christian Church at Jireh, Wyoming.

When Edith first went to the convent to school, Dana wrote her, signing his name as "Daisy," as boys were not supposed to correspond with girls there. He received letters in return. John (Joan) Kennedy and Thomas (Teresa) Virden decided to get into the act and they started writing to Grace Leman (now Bartshe) and Emma Cross (now Morton). They weren't so careful and the nuns caught on and we were in trouble. We had to write the boys and tell them not to write any more and had some other penalties attached.

The first child of this marriage was Donna Louise born October 23, 1929, the day before the stock crash on October 24 which ushered in the GREAT DEPRESSION. Their second child, Marilyn Elizabeth, was born October 8, 1933.

The years 1932, 1934, and 1936 were drought years. During those years there was one year when the drought was so widespread and the depression so deep that there was no sale for livestock of any kind and no feed for all the livestock on the ranches. To help out, the Government agreed to buy all livestock that owners could not carry over to the next year. They paid $20.00 per head per cow, $12.00 for a yearling, $8.00 for a calf, and $5.00 for a ewe or a lamb and then sent men around to shoot the animals so purchased. Donna watched them and says it took ten shots to bring down the milkcow who just stood and bellowed. To see all those animals, one had raised and cared for, lying around dead was a terrible sight. Only a small part of the meat could be kept. There were no freezers in those days.

Tragedy of a different kind struck in 1935 in the form of a hunting accident. Dana and Stewart Horr had planned on going hunting on October 31, the last day of the legal hunting season. It snowed off and on all day long. On November 1, even though the season was over, they decided to go to the Downey Park area and see if they could find some game. They took off on a cold sunny day in high spirits about midmorning. The two of them had hunted together for a number of years and Dana said they had worked out a number of bird calls to be used in signaling the sighting of game or a change in direction when they separated.

They spent a number of hours hunting by vehicle or on foot and found nothing. They were about to give up and return home when they came onto deer tracks leading into a rather large thicket of trees. they decided to try to track the deer down and it was decided that Dana would follow the tracks into the thicket while Stewart was to position himself on a hill at the edge of the thicket so if the deer broke cover he would get a shot at it.

It was very cold and there was about three or four inches of new snow on the ground and it was hard to move without making a noise, so Dana slowly trailed the deer. Suddenly there was a movement in the trees directly in front of him and he raised his gun and fired. The target was not a deer, but his friend. Stewart called out to him and told him he had been hit and Dana hurried to his side. Stewart was fully conscious and told Dana he had no business being in there and that he hoped he (Dana) would not get in trouble for hunting out of season. Stewart didn't think anything could save him as he had taken the shot in the side.

Dana stayed with him a short while and then he knew he had to go for help. The pickup was some distance from where they were and there was no chance of his being able to carry or drag Stewart from among the trees. He took off his coat and covered Stewart the best he could and headed for a neighboring ranch some five miles away. By the time he got help and a makeshift stretcher lined up and got back, Stewart was dead. There were no regulations requiring bright colored hunting clothes in those days and Stewart was wearing a brown shearling sheep skin jacket and a brown cap of the same material. Dana had on dark clothing also.

From the tracks in the snow, as the scene was traced the following day by the sheriff's office, it appeared that Stewart had stayed at the upper part of the hill for some time as there were a number of cigarette butts on the ground there. He then had moved about half way down and smoked a couple cigarettes and then, for some reason, with long running steps he had gone into the thicket directly in front of Dana. Why he did it no one will ever know. Evidently he had seen some movement he thought might be the deer. He had not given the usual signal to denote a change in position or to warn that he was on the move. Dana lost a good neighbor and a friend.

In 1936 the drought was almost total. What little grass or hay that managed to grow was eaten by grasshoppers. They were everywhere and poisoning them only seemed to make room for others. After rains came in early September the lilacs, which had been stripped of leaves by the grasshoppers, leafed out and bloomed in September.

The sheep were summered in the mountains, but there was no feed to come home to. Dana had to take the sheep to Wheatland to winter. Dana had to stay with them. He had to have the pickup and so there was no way to get Donna to school. Edith had a chance to get her position back that she had left to get married, and so in September of 1936 she and the two girls moved into Douglas and into a house that her mother owned. Dana kept on with the ranch with his family helping as they could over weekends and vacations and he spent what time he could in town with them.

Dana loved life and loved people. He had a keen sense of humor and a quick and ready wit. Somehow he always seemed to see the funny and sunny side of life. He loved music and had a good ear for it. For a number of years a trio made up of Arthur Horr with an accordion, Stanley Lass with a banjo, and Dana with a saxophone played for country dances throughout the county. Dana also liked the great outdoors, hunting, fishing, and trapping, or just watching crops and livestock grow.

Many of the neighbors stopped by to visit Dana and among them was his neighbor and friend, Sandy Cross. Sandy said a visit with Dana did him more good than a visit to a doctor. After Dana's death following a coronary on August 2, 1952, Sandy wrote and sent to Dana's family the following poem:

OH! WHERE HAS HE GONE TODAY?

Oh, where has he gone today?

To the fields to gather new mown hay,
Where the larks assert their musical sway,
Where the cricket chirps
The summer hours away?

Oh no, farther still - quite away.

Oh, where has he gone today?

To yon pasture green
Where the lowing cow is seen
Browsing grasses sweet and lush,
Where the colt romps the time away?

Oh no, farther still - quite away.

Oh, where has he gone today?

To lofty mountains of pine
Where dwells the lonely porcupine,
Where the coyotes mocking howl defies all,
Where you can hear the wolf's beving call?

Oh no, farther still - quite away.

Oh, where has he gone today?

To the village where all is gossip and heresay
Where the wine glass
Is the devil's tool?

Oh no, farther still - quite away.

Oh, where has he gone today?

To starlit skies,
A celestial being that never dies
He with friends wait
Those they love

Ever anxious for them
To come above.

Austin, Charles and Tillie

Charles Leander (Lee) Austin, born in Kalamazoo, Michigan July 10, 1854, was married on July 3, 1880 in Beatrice, Nebraska to Mathilda (Tillie) Campbell who was born in Canada in 1860. Joining the westward movement, they homesteaded near Fetterman west of Douglas in Converse County, Wyoming. In addition to ranch activities, Austin operated a freighting business. He was killed in May 1916 when a freight wagon he was driving was struck by a train at a blind crossing near Douglas. His wife, Tillie, had preceded him in death in 1911 of natural causes. Three children, Lee, Willard and Norma died in infancy or early childhood. Other children are Charles Ronald, Donald Harrison (Harry), Sarah Helen (Davenport), Katie Ellen (Davies), Elbert Roy, John Basil, and Margaret Blanche (Averill). Surviving at this writing are Harry of Lusk, Wyoming, John of Apache Junction, Arizona, and Margaret of Porterville, California.

Donald Harrison (Harry) Austin was born December 21, 1888 in Douglas and grew up on the family homestead at Fetterman west of Douglas. At an early age he worked as a cowboy/ranchhand for the Lee Moore Cattle Company and for Pax Irvine at the Ogalalla Ranch. He was married to Edna Vivian Senters of Douglas on April 24, 1918. The daughter of Charles E. and Etta (Thralls) Senters, Edna was born October 11, 1897 in Long Pine, Nebraska. Because of Senters' longtime employment with the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, the family lived in several towns along the line in Nebraska and South Dakota before coming to Douglas when Edna was a young girl.

During World War I Harry served with Veterinary Hospital No. 9 at Saint-Nazaire, France; and Edna, who prior to her marriage had taught at the Bedtick School south of Douglas, continued her teaching career at Spanish Diggings School south of Keeline. After his discharge, Harry returned to Douglas where he and Edna established a home and he worked for Peyton-Bolln Grocery Co. until 1930 when the family moved to Lusk, Wyoming.

Daughters Maxine Elizabeth and Charletta Louise were born in Douglas, and Donna Marie was born in Lusk. After a few years farming and as custodian of Lusk Grade School, their years in Lusk were spent as owners and operators of Gay's Cafe and Lusk Econ-o-Wash. Daughter Donna died at age 20 in 1954. Maxine married Bruce H. (Bud) Koch of Harrison, Nebraska, now deceased, and has been a Congressional Secretary since 1953 when she went to Washington, D.C. as personal secretary to U.S. Senator Frank A. Barrett. She lives in Arlington, Virginia and has no children. Louise, a registered nurse, married Lester William Lawrence of Brooklyn, New York. They lived in Porterville, California and have six children, Leslie Louise (Woodstra), Donald William, Dorothy, Paula (Kleitman), Robert Francis, and Wendy Louise, and one grandson Christopher Damien (Woodstra).

Harry and Edna retired from business in 1973, and in early retirement years enjoyed travel in the United States and have remained active in St. Leo's Catholic Church, American Legion and Auxiliary, and other civic organizations.

Ayres, Alvah and Sallie Family

Alvah Washington Ayres, one of Wyoming Territory's early residents and one of the early settlers on LaPrele Creek in Converse County, first came to Wyoming in 1865. He was born in Luzerne County, Pennsylvania on December 28, 1841, the second eldest of seven children born to James L. and Patience M. (Vincent) Ayres, who were both born in the State of New York. They were married November 11, 1837, in Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, moved to Illinois in 1857, then in 1858 moved to Missouri, then on to Kansas. In 1860 they moved to Nebraska, their permanent home being in Beatrice.

In 1860, Alvah Ayres came West to Colorado, there following teaming until 1882, the last four years being in business for himself making his first trip to Wyoming in 1865, Fort Laramie being his destination, going on to Fort Fetterman in 1867, he was exceedingly troubled by Indians upon this trip.

In 1882 he located his ranch home on LaPrele Creek, with a rare scenic attraction, the Natural Bridge, being on the ranch. He built up a fine ranch, with irrigated land along LaPrele Creek, and pasture land adjacent thereto, on which he raised cattle and horses.

He must have had many dangerous encounters in his work. One account found in a family scrapbook tells of an experience on one trip from Cheyenne to Deadwood, South Dakota, as follows: "The writer remembers one queer and exciting experience well. A man named Leighton in Ayres' train shot a Mexican just for the sake of being bad, and when about to escape on the best horse in the outfit, when the other boys, sixteen of us, who had been too excited to be watchful, saw Al lying under a wagon with his needle gun through the spokes of a wagon wheel, and he said coolly; "Drop that bridle Jimmie, and don't go near the horses." Jimmie dropped the bridle quick as he looked down the barrel of the rifle. Leighton was afterwards hung in Deadwood."

On April 6, 1890, Alvah W. Ayres and Mrs. Sallie O. (Clay) Button, a native of Virginia, were married in Douglas, Wyoming, her maiden name being Clay and her first husband being William D. Button, a native of Vermont. Mr. and Mrs. Ayres had one son, Andrew Clement, who was born of her first marriage, at Brandon, Vermont, August 26, 1886.

Mrs. Ayres traced her American ancestry to the seventeenth century, when four brothers, John, Charles, Henry and Thomas Clay, emigrated from England. They settled in Virginia; her grandfather, Reverend Charles Clay, a brother of the grandfather of the eminent Henry Clay of Kentucky, being one of the first Episcopal clergymen of America, had to cross the Atlantic to London to be ordained. He was a close and intimate friend of Thomas Jefferson. Mrs. Ayres brought with her to Wyoming an original letter written, during his presidency, to her grandfather, who lived on an adjoining plantation. I think the subject matter especially fascinating; it read as follows:

"Washington January 11 - 07

Dear Sir:

Yours of December 10, has been duly received, and I thank you for your friendly attention to the offer of lands adjoining me for sale. It is true that I have always wished to purchase a part of what was Murray's tract, which would straiten the lines of the Poplar Forest, but I really am not able to make a purchase. I had hoped to keep the expenses of my office within the limits of my salary, so as to apply my private income entirely to the improvement and enlargement of my estate, but I have not been able to do it. Our affairs with Spain, after which you inquire, do not promise the result we wish, not that war will take place immediately; but they may go off without a settlement, and leave us in constant bickering about indemnification for spoils, the navigation of the Mobile and the limits of Louisiana.

"Burr's enterprise is the most extraordinary since the days of Don Quixote. It is so extravagant that those who know his understanding would not believe it if the proofs admitted doubt. He has meant to place himself on the throne of Montezuma, and extend his empire to the Allegany, siezing on New Orleans as the instrument of compulsion for our western states. I think his undertaking effectively crippled by the activity of Ohio. Whether Kentucky will give him the coup de grace is doubtful, but if he is able to descend the river with any means, we are sufficiently prepared at New Orleans. I hope, however, Kentucky will do it's duty and finish the matter for the honour of popular government, and the discouragement of all arguments for standing armies.

L. to R. Eula Abney, Mrs. Al Ayres, Doc Safely, Al Ayres, Clement Ayres.

Accept my friendly salutations and assurances of great esteem and respect.

Mr. Clay

Thos. Jefferson"

Mrs. Ayres died April 5, 1911 and is buried in the Douglas Cemetery.

Sally Ayres had a sister, Nannie E. Steele, and two brothers, William L. Clay and Charles E. Clay, who all played a part in settling Wyoming. Nannie and William lived in the Chugwater area and in Cheyenne later.

Mrs. Ayres died before I was born and Mr. Ayres the year after my birth, and I really regret not having the chance to know them. Aunt Nannie Steele is the only relative of my father's that I knew, and I was only about six or seven when she spent several years with us at the ranch. My brother, Alvah, learned to talk with a southern accent from listening to her. She told many interesting stories of her childhood on a Virginia plantation. She was an excellent seamstress and had made many shirts for the cowboys around Cheyenne.

In 1892, Al Ayres was elected to serve as State Representative from Converse County.

In 1914, Al Ayres built a new home on the ranch, and the following is a memo of this, as found in a cornerstone when the house was torn down, years later:

"October 17, 1914

At the time this box is found may the contents of same be of interest to all who took part in building this house.

"The owner, Al W. Ayres, came to this county in 1865. Lars Johnson of LaPrele, head carpenter. Curley Ayres, brother of Al, of Beatrice, Nebraska, was assistant carpenter. Henry Matsel of Willow Creek, assistant carpenter and stone mason. Ed Breuer, stone mason. Geo. Kelley of Chicago, painter. Nick Burke of Douglas, Wyoming, plasterer. Mrs. Curley Ayres and daughter, Ruth, also of Beatrice, Nebraska, were the first housekeepers.

"May we add that at the time this house was completed, it was a model in house building and a credit to the country."

This house was the family home from then until the ranch was sold in 1949. It had eight rooms and a bath downstairs, and four bedrooms with walk-in closets upstairs, with plumbing in the house and electric lights, powered by a Delco light plant.

Mr. Ayres died August 13, 1918 in Douglas, as the result of injuries received on a trip from the ranch to Douglas with a team and wagon, when an automobile frightened the horses and they ran away.

My mother and father, Andrew Clement Ayres and Edna May Howard, were married April 14, 1908 at her parents' home at Beaver, Wyoming. She was one of ten children born to William and Georgia (Rice) Howard, and the oldest living girl, so she had to take lots of responsibility and the work of caring for the family when her mother's health began to fail at a rather young age. William Howard was born in Iowa, June 14, 1853. He married Georgia Rice on October 21, 1880, and shortly after that came to Wyoming Territory to check out the opportunities it might offer. He returned to Iowa and he and his wife and baby son, Fred, traveled to Wyoming by wagon and settled in the LaPrele area known as Beaver, their ranch now being the Bill Leman ranch. William built many of the early roads in the area and had one of the first threshing machines in the county. He was killed in a logging accident November 13, 1925, and Georgia died December 29, 1929.

I think that for some years after their marriage, Edna and Clement spent summers on his homestead on Willow Creek, south of Glenrock, and winters at the home ranch on LaPrele. Mother loved to fish and was good at it, and I remember following her and watching until I was big enough to hold a pole and fish too.

Another special memory of my childhood was going along when cattle were trailed to the homestead for summer pasture. It took about three days, first gathering the cattle and then head them up the Windy Ridge road. We camped the first night usually on top of Windy Ridge, then went on the next day, and turned in to the pasture, then worked them around into the pastures the next day. Dick Burks also had a homestead adjoining ours, so we trailed together. Our families were always very close, and I was named for Ida Burks.

Mother and Dad worked hard, as the haying and farming was done with teams of horses, and there were always extra men to cook for, and she raised a large garden, which she canned and preserved for winter use. She also raised chicken and turkeys, which they sold around Thanksgiving.

Their first child was born in 1917, Ida May, and six years later a boy, Alvah William (named for both grandfathers) was born.

In May 1920, Andrew C. and Edna M. Ayres gave a deed to Converse County for the land known as Ayres Natural Bridge Park, dedicated to the memory and work of the men and women who pioneered this western country.

There were very trying times during the "thirties" as evidenced by sale receipts that Dad had saved, when cattle sold for give away prices, and in 1934 during the Depression and the drought years. There is a record of 29 head of cattle sold to the government for $322 under an emergency cattle agreement.

They managed to have fun times too, with neighbors and friends, getting together to celebrate birthdays, anniversaries, or other excuses for a party, and always ready to lend a hand and food in times of illness or need. It was a closely knit community, and the neighbors got together and built the LaPrele Community Hall, with kitchen and dance floor large enough for neighborhood activities and public dances.

Mother belonged to the LaPrele Homemakers for many years, until her death.

Dad was always interested in community affairs and was always trying to find some new crop or way to bring more income into the community. There were several years that peas were grown and marketed through the Woodruff Seed Co. in Douglas. Then for a number of years, most of the neighbors and my folks as well, raised dairy cattle and sold milk. This brought in some cash income, but was hard work for the returns.

Dad served on the School Board of District 6 for many years, and hauled children, water for the school and built fires in the morning in the school house stove for a number of teachers. Mother boarded several of the teachers. Alvah and I attended school in the school house now located on the State Fair Grounds in Douglas, then graduated from Douglas High School with Alvah graduating from Denver University.

Dad and Mother worked hard to get the Wyoming Pioneer Association organized and the first museum built, which is the log cabin. I remember the buffalo barbecue put on to raise money for the building, with Robert D. Carey donating the meat and Mother and Dad in charge of the meal.

In 1938, Ida May Ayres and Joe L. Carmin were married and have continued to live in Converse County. They raised three children, Andrea Richardson, Joe Carmin and Jim Carmin, who are all married and have families and are living in Wyoming.

In 1943, Alvah married Marguerite Holstein, and they have two children, Robert and Kathleen. They have lived in East Alton, Illinois, for a number of years.

Mother became ill during the 1949 blizzard and we had a difficult time getting her to the hospital and going to Douglas to see her. She died January 29, 1949, at the age of 60. The love that neighbors and friends had for her was evidenced by the number that came to her funeral, even though roads were almost impassible. Dad sold the ranch in the spring of 1949.

In later years, he moved to Thermopolis and when he could no longer live alone, he went into the Pioneer Home there, where he lived until his death on January 15, 1968.

Bacon, Billy and Frances

Many stories have been told about Billy Bacon. Many of them are true but some of them have been fabricated.

The first we know of Billy is in an account by Charley Horr in a letter to Clark Bishop. Charley writes, "The first I ever heard of Billy Bacon was by Billie Ashby, who was foreman of the Bridle Bit Outfit in Goshen Hole. Bacon and Jimmy Abney both worked for him. They used to have some fun with him, they would saddle Bacon up and Jimmy would try to ride him. Bacon came to LaBonte in about 1879 and ran a road ranch at the LaBonte Crossing."

The next we hear of Bacon is in a story of Bacon's adopted daughter, Eula E. Erben, by Eula's granddaughter, Shirley Bear Chase. She writes, "In November, 1880, in Omaha, Nebraska, Mr. and Mrs. Billy Bacon watched Mr. and Mrs. Amell Erben lay their small daughter, Eula, down on a street corner on a pillow and walk away. Eula E. Erben was born August 9, 1880. She was a colicky baby who cried alot. She was picked up by her Aunt Frances Bacon and husband Billy and put in their wagon."

Charley Horr tells of the Bacons after they left the LaBonte Road Ranch. "Bacon sold his ranch to Harry Pollard's father in the spring of 1883 for $5,000 then he went to Cheyenne. He was drinking and gambling but some of his friends got him to leave so he went back to LaBonte and bought a bunch of cows. He took the cows up to Bacon Park in June 1884. He traded the cattle to Frank 'Sodcorn' Gore. 100 head for Frank's saloon in Fetterman."

Frank Gore relates the rest of Billy Bacon's life in his letter to Tom Rowley. "Jack Sanders did not build Hog Ranch. Harrison Kane built it about 1880. John Lawrence and Jack Sanders ran the Hog Ranch in the fall of 1883 until the winter of 1884. I was running a saloon in Fetterman and sold it to Bacon in November, 1884. I think it was December, 1884 that Bacon and Sanders went into partnership, they fixed up the old government hospital for a dance hall. Bacon and Sanders had a fight and Bacon killed Sanders. Sanders shot Bacon in the chin. The doctor was probing for the bullet when it dropped in his windpipe and Bacon choked to death. He lived two or three days longer than Sanders. I was in Fetterman when Sanders died."

Bacon's widow, Frances, married James Milton Abney on November 19, 1886. (For the rest of Frances and her niece's story see James Abney.)

Baker, Ralph and Anastasia

Ralph Olin Baker was born in Nebraska on December 14, 1902. He came to Wyoming to teach the Walker Creek School for the 1926-27 term. Some of his students were children of the Porter and Hansen families. He boarded with the Amsdens and Whittings.

Anastasia Elizabeth McCarthy became his wife on December 30, 1926 in Broken Bow, Nebraska.

During the 1927-28 term, Ralph continued teaching the Walker Creek School while "Stasia" taught the Hanlin School. They lived in John and Peg Poulson's cement house up the hill from the bridge on Willow Creek.

Raymond White was Superintendent of School District #17 and Marsha Hollindrake was Converse County Superintendent during this time. The salary for teaching a term of school was $90.00 a month.

Ralph homesteaded at the foot of Flat Top. Stasia's sister Gata McCarthy (Beaulieu) stayed with the Bakers during the summers.

For the school term of 1928 - 1929, Stasia taught the Ayres school while Ralph worked for Clement Ayres on his ranch.

In the spring of 1929, the Bakers moved to Casper where Ralph found work. In 1930 - 31 Stasia taught the Morton School and stayed at the Westons.

Ralph worked for Safeway Stores until he retired in the 1950's while Stasia continued teaching schools.

They have two boys, Ralph and Howard.

Baker, Raymond and Lucille

Raymond C. Baker was born in Clay County, Nebraska on September 4, 1898 to Samuel Ferguson and Amanda Z. Overturf Baker, of strong Dutch, French and Irish descendants.

The Bakers came from Indiana, but the Overturf grandparents were homesteaders in early Nebraska history with a wanderlust that took them to the Pacific Coast by train and back in a covered wagon in 1906. The Great Grandfather, George Overturf, went west to Virginia City to find his fortune in gold and there he did quite well.

He bought two teams of mules and wagons there, and with others, started back to Nebraska, but the Indians overtook them. Seeing they had been surrounded, they all put the bare necessities and ammunition into one wagon, turned the horses and mules loose and burned all the rest of the wagons and possessions. The women and children took turns riding in the one wagon that the men of the wagon train pulled to the next fort.

All these pioneering stories and experiences meant much to Raymond so it was little wonder that he too wanted to go west and homestead in Wyoming. When just of age, he did so and filed on his portion of land in 1919, about 37 miles north and west of Douglas, Wyoming. Raymond and I, Lucille Cress Baker, were married at Eustis, Nebraska on August 22, 1925.

While some would say, a homestead was a "free gift" those who stayed and proved up, can tell stories of hardships of that early day and experiences that I know, it was not such a free gift in any sense of the word, and the problems and trials which were still afloat since 1931, stagger the minds of many today as being quite unreal.

Raymond would work in the beet harvest around Bayard, Nebraska, in lumber camps around Kellogg, Idaho, also in California as a carpenter's helper in the months away, to make a grubstake for the months on the homestead.

The homesteader's homes were, for the most part, shacks. At least for the single guys, many were built much like the railroad boxcar, at least with that type of roof, and they were covered with tar paper.

Most of these "castles" boasted of a trap door in the floor where a small hole was dug out and a few of the more perishable foods could be kept a might cooler or warmer, as the case might be.

Many a homesteader could tell how his fence would be cut, by the already established cattlemen, who resented him coming and fencing land he had been using for free grazing, or a road he had used to go to his holdings.

Wooden apple boxes and orange crates made many a cupboard, a "topsy stove" some having an oven in the stovepipe to bake in, nail kegs served as extra chairs and maybe the only chairs. The gals who took claims, fixed theirs up more homey, little curtains on the windows, etc., but the guys were more interested in getting the job done and getting out.

Varied were the types of people who came to homestead, in fact from all walks of life! There was always that one, who could embellish his stories so vividly, that after repeated tellings, he believed himself.

One old man would tell how he was caught in a sudden Wyoming hail storm when out fencing, he jumped into his wagon and headed for his shack. He made it, but looked in the back of his wagon and the wagon box was half full of hail and the storm was gone and not a one ever hit him!

Raymond returned to Nebraska while homesteading and was asked if the wind blew in Wyoming. His answer was, "I'll let you be the judge, I rode up to the shack one day, threw my hat down on the ground, the wind blew it up against the shack and six months later it was still there!" I was never sure what he did without his hat that long. Must have been what started the bare head fashion!

Although 1931 was not exactly early day as settling of the country is concerned, the depression years made many hardships for people in a new country. Raymond had come back with his family to the homestead he had proved up, the froggy water holes and a spring he dug out on top of a hill a mile from his new building place, provided water until a well was drilled in 1933 by another earlier homesteader, Mr. Ernest Nauman from south of Douglas. Raymond heard that Mrs. Peter Clausen could locate water by witching, using a gold ring, a string, and a glass of water. We couldn't afford a dry hole, so we went after her and then marked the place she said would be abundant water. Mr. Nauman had little faith on such, but did agree to drill there and on June 30, 1933 found water that he couldn't pump dry at 77 feet. Raymond paid Mr. Nauman $29.00 and the Log Book states $26.00 to be paid when the hogs were sold and was then paid in August of 1933 in full.

Money in the '30s was as scarce as hens teeth, but words were good. Raymond realizing that "necessity, the mother of invention", set about to build his own windmill. He had borrowed a pump from the neighbor, Mrs. Cliff Powell, who had moved to town, but to pump that handle up and down to provide water for the household and stock, wasted energy, when Wyoming had a lot of wind for free. So with a Lodgepole pine pole from the mountains for an axle, some 12" about eight feet long for fins, some two feet by four feet for the arms, he built a reel, not unlike the reels on the modern combine or the paddle wheel of a steam boat principle. He built a box around this reel so the wind would catch the top fins only, and in turn, run the large wheel rigged up so it would lift the rods and pump the water.

It was somewhat difficult to stop this wheel in a hard wind. We would wear leather mittens to keep from burning our hands or getting splinters. Even so, it would almost lift us over when the wind was hard before it could be stopped and chained to a post. Again, lack of money, Raymond took a cottonwood block from a 10" diameter tree, hollowed out a cup in one end, then bored a hole to the cup for a pipe and thus was a lead pipe fixed to carry water from well to tank, and it worked. I still have that wooden block yet today.

About two years later, we did get a mill and a tower as the other version was wearing out. It wasn't always windy enough when the water was needed and even though much axle grease was used, the axle was wearing out.

Quite a number went on relief, but with our gardens and friends, who shared what their families out grew, we made it through the depression. We did, however, have to let our new John Deere tractor go back to Gene L. Payne Co., but we had horses and when the crops didn't grow, Russian Thistle (tumbleweed) grew and we put them up for hay. Many an insole was cut from the waxed lard boxes, but they barely lasted half a day and foot was on the ground again.

There was a time when "horse power" meant horse flesh for plowing, planting, harvesting, and hauling. Each fall meant trips to the coal mine, a three day affair for Raymond. He had a good team but usually took the third horse along in case one played out. The price of coal seems so small now but plenty then. I'm sure we did get some for $1.50 a ton but it went up along with the years but even in the 40s only $3.50 a ton. There were three different mines we went to, the Badger, Antelope and Sand Creek Mines.

On one trip Raymond saw his first ghost. He was making camp near a water hole as it was just getting dark when his horse snorted and nearly broke loose from him. He tightened his hold on their lead ropes and looked up to see a figure in white flowing robes coming straight towards him. Although he didn't believe in ghosts, this was almost too much and he ached to run, but he had to hold onto his horses as they were not yet hobbled and he was miles from nowhere. His heart pounded in his ears as the creature continued his way. How long could he stand there, when the pressure was so great! What sweet relief filled his soul when a familiar sound came from the sheeted figure, the bleat of an Angora Billy Goat coming to the water hole for a drink. The next morning he found he had made camp just over the hill from another homesteader.

When trips such as this were made and he was overdue getting home, I'd become concerned so lying down on the ground with my ear pressed close to the earth, I could hear the rumble of the wagon and the hoofs of the horses as they plodded homeward some miles away. I was relieved and then could patiently wait his return, thankful for that means of communication.

Sheepherders would build monuments of rocks on the highest hills where rocks were available to pass lonely hours and use as land marks out in isolated unfenced areas. These enabled them to keep their bearing and were as important to them as the lighthouse to the sailors. Many have been destroyed over the years by people who didn't know what they really were.

One time in the night, Raymond rode up to a shack hoping to spend the night and as he raised his hand to knock, it froze in mid air as he heard the first cry of a new born baby, then other sounds. He silently mounted his horse and rode the several miles on to his humble shack, he didn't even know the guy was married before.

The Christmas of 1933, I believe, Raymond put the side boards on the wagon box, filled it with straw and covered the straw with a bed tarpaulin and we drove seven miles to a school program. It was a beautiful moon-lite night and the children and I were quite cozy covered with quilts in the bottom of the wagon nestled together for warmth.

Raymond didn't seem to mind the long drive there and back. We had a car but to buy the gas in the '30s was a problem of its own. Truthfully the car was used for the longer trip to town.

It would take many a book to hold all the stories that could well be told of the hard, but many good times also. Like the hail storms that took all the crops, but the cows were driven in and milked and we made ice cream with the hail stones to freeze it, and made all the ice cream we could eat. The American Sunday School Union Picnic, when people came from all around with carry-in-dinners, visiting and services were enjoyed by all. School programs, where someone would pull a boo boo, made for a good laugh.

A Sad iron or hot rock wrapped in paper and cloth helped warm a cold bed. Each morning the bucket of water gave forth refreshing ice water. Bed clothes would be frozen to the outside walls and each nail in the ceiling could easily be counted with its coating of frost that would soon turn to drops of water after the fire was built. Wiping the table for breakfast with a wet dish cloth made an ideal skating rink for dishes. In fact, I saw a pint-sized sugar bowl scoot across the table and land upside down on the floor. The bowl was saved and so was the precious sugar. It was cleaned up, boiled for syrup to kill any germs from the floor because precious food could never be wasted.

Badly frozen legs but too far to a doctor, a three day blizzard when it took us four hours to go seven miles, a fire in 40 below weather and no fire department, no telephone or close neighbors!

In 1935, I believe, Raymond and four or five other men took the running gear of the wagons and teams, grub boxes, bed rolls, horse feed, and headed for the mountains to cut poles, a trip of ten to 14 days. It was a welcome and beautiful sight to see those wagons come back with poles for corrals. In 1937 Raymond bought the two homesteads he had been leasing from Mrs. Mabel Powell and her father, Malcolm Johnson, which joined him on the south and west.

Because many were leaving the isolated area and since the surveyed Gillette Highway was to be built east of us which we had hoped for, Raymond sold out and bought the Jerry Evans place seven miles from Douglas where his children could go to school more easily. Mr. Evans had been gone from the place a number of years so it was again a time of rebuilding as well as a long move, tearing down buildings and rebuilding was hard.

Raymond never bore arms for his country, but often wished he had enlisted. World War I closed just after he had been called for his physical, then the other wars, he was farming and was exempt. Neither did he belong to any lodges, but was a born-again Christian, one of First Share Holders in a Bible Camp at Fletcher Park, served in various places in Calvary Baptist Church in Douglas, where he was one of the charter members.

Raymond passed away after a long illness November 18, 1983, leaving his wife and five daughters; Mrs. Shirley Jean Reed of Douglas, Beverly Rae Chamberlain, Lucille Marjorie (Teil) Chamberlain of LaPrele Community west of Douglas, Delores Lorraine Gutherie of Boone, Colorado and Sharon Patricia Quam of Woodland, California. He also left 25 grandchildren and 22 great grandchildren.

Ballard, Arthur E. and Ethel Family

Arthur E. Ballard, wife Ethel M. Ballard and family, Dale Arbor, Forest O., and Marianne, came to Wyoming in the spring of 1917. They had farmed in western Kansas until cyclones touched down three times in one year on their farm. They decided a homestead in Wyoming sounded better.

They came to Wyoming in style, in a Saxon Six car. The trip took a week with camping out at night. After filing on a homestead 30 miles north of Douglas, the family lived in a tent until a homestead shack could be built and a well could be dug with a post-hole digger. A ten-acre sagebrush flat was broken up with a borrowed team and walking plow. The first crop was Wyoming corn and a garden. The dry land was not Kansas soil. The first crop was a terrible disappointment. Arthur went to Douglas and went to work in the Northwestern Coal Chutes. When the homestead was proved up on, the family moved to Douglas. Arthur worked at the Coal Chutes until they were torn down. He then worked at various jobs until 1930, when he went to work as a janitor at the North Grade School. He worked at the school until his family had graduated from high school.

Marianne was killed in a car accident near Wheatland the fall of 1938. Forest moved to California in 1941. Arthur moved to California and went to work at Lockheed in 1942. Dale married and remained in Douglas. Arthur died in California in January, 1953. Ethel spent her winters in California and summers in Wyoming. When Irwin Towers was completed she moved in and made her home in Wyoming until her death in 1984.

D.W., as he preferred to be called by his friends, was a wheat farmer in western Kansas (Decatur County). After nine years of poor crops, drought, dry winds and hail he decided to try the mercantile business in the town of Jennings. He had an auction sale, selling everything but the household goods. He had traded the farm of about 380 acres for this establishment and we moved to town the summer of 1914. This was the life of Riley for us kids as we had lived in a sod house on the farm and had to carry water. Here we had a frame house with lots of room and a supply tank in the tower. This was not so with the folks, as they discovered at the end of the year that they had lost $1,000 and more, and decided to try something else. Dad had a quitting business sale and traded the store building, warehouse and lot for a half section of prairie land at Burlington, Colorado. We moved back to Dresden to a rented place and were literally back to farming. This was the spring of 1916. There was a great deal of unrest. World War I was in progress. Pancho Villa had raided the border. Arizona and New Mexico had become states in 1912 and were advertising that homesteads were available as were Colorado and Wyoming.

The stockraising homestead act had been enacted and a section of land was available per family. It sounded great. The folks had their fill of dryland farming and never once considered moving onto the land at Burlington. I have heard them say that it was so level that one could stand at any one corner post and see the other three markers. It was just too bleak. They had decided to homestead and Dad preferred Colorado so he put the title to this land in Mother's name and went to Craig, Colorado in the fall of 1916. He did not like the big sage around Maybelle and farther west and had heard of land available in Wyoming, so he came cross country by Baggs and Rawlins to Douglas to look at land. He was shown this land by A.P. Knight who was working as a locator in conjunction with the C.B. & Q. Railroad. The land he chose was Section 1, Township 36 N-R 71W of 6 P.M. which is 4 miles east and 26 miles north of Douglas. I think Mr. Knight's fee was about $40 and of course there was a government filing charge also. I do not know the exact filing date, but it had to be very late November or early December of 1916, which made it necessary for us to be in Wyoming in mid-1917.

Brother Emmet and I were thrilled on learning we were going to Wyoming and knew we would need a saddle. We had been trapping during the winter with quite a bit of success. Our product was skunk hides with occasional badger. We tended our traps on the way to school as our quarry might get loose if left too long. We walked about a mile to school and a time or two things got a bit odoriferous. We got $87 for our pelts. We had a Fred Mueller Saddle & Harness catalog and had literally memorized its contents. There was a saddle with a 14" swell and 14" seat which was the one we wanted. The price was $114 and dad made up the difference. So it was ordered out of Denver and sent to Dresden. Was it beautiful! It was shipped with the freight car and was in use for many years.

The Burlington Railroad was completed through Douglas and they were pushing a settler program to increase their revenue. One inducement was the emigrant car. One could ship housegoods, livestock, machinery, hay and grain, and "what have you" in this car for one lump sum and a passage for a hostler was included.

The folks had another auction, selling everything they figured they wouldn't need or couldn't get into the car. Four horses and four cows, household goods, two lumber wagons, farm machinery, hay and grain for the livestock, a small tank and some barrels of water were shipped. Our town of Dresden was on the Rock Island and Norcat was on the Burlington, 24 miles distant. Dad loaded there and saved any car transferring. The car was on the way and a neighbor, Wren Wright, went along as hostler. He had been through Gillette in 1911 and was anxious for the trip. This was about the middle of April and we left in the touring car.

A short time after the sale, an old hen showed up with nine or 10 little chicks. Mother was undaunted, she merely made a crate and we brought them along on the running board of the car. We visited relatives at Eckley, Colorado and drove cross country to Sidney, Nebraska and stayed all night there. There was a lot of prairie between Sidney and Eckley. Very few fences. We went from Sidney to Cheyenne and there I saw my first street cars and the mountains west of Cheyenne were black with timber. It was a beautiful sight. Dad thought we could make it to Wheatland or perhaps Douglas, as we had whizzed right along from Sidney, but we ran into rain and sleet at Chugwater so we stayed there. The next morning was no better but we took off and it was nearly noon when we got to Wheatland which had the first trees I had ever seen that leaned with the wind as they grew. Mud all the way. Wheatland to Dwyer to Wendover and up the river to Glendo. We crossed the river at the Platte Valley Ranch and across Shawnee Creek then to Orin, between the tracks. It was here I saw my first irrigation ditches and I was sure they ran uphill. We got stuck near George Jewell's homestead and he pulled us out with a four horse team. Such gumbo we had never seen. We got into Douglas after 11 that night. We went to the LaBonte Hotel and registered. They were full so put us in the Annex. We ate at Art Wiker's restaurant and put the car in Rice's garage. We stayed several days at the Annex as the wagons had to be assembled, loaded and everything made ready for the trip to the homestead. Mr. Wright had learned of some cows for sale and Dad bought seven head.

On the sixth of May, 1917 the folks figured they were ready to start for the homestead and Emmet and I left about 7, driving the cattle. We were on foot and pushed them right along. The folks were to load the wagons with some minor items and then overtake us, but they didn't. We boys were about two miles past the E.B. Combs' ranch (about 12 miles out) when we met a chap with a trap wagon and told him our problem. We were tired, hungry and scared and it was getting late. He thought we should go back as far as the ranch and wait. He said he was going to town and would let the folks know where we were. We started back and met the folks directly across from the ranch and we camped there. I have never been so glad to see my folks as I was then. One of the horses (a tried and true draft horse) had balked and took several hours to coax him out of it. He had never balked before and never did so afterwards.

The next day we arrived at the homestead about 3 p.m. We set up a tent in which we lived until the house was finished, about late August. There was not a fence all the way, just the Fiddleback's telephone line. When we arrived we found the Fiddleback was lambing a band of about 3,000 sheep on the place and were using some waterholes. We used them too and later hauled water from Box Creek until a well was drilled. J.G. Bushey drilled our well and it was quite late in the fall. The water was hard as a rock. We grubbed about two acres for the building site and were surprised at the pile of cactus and sagebrush. The house was two rooms and an attic, with the entrance door in the west which proved to be a very poor idea.

When freighting materials for the house and barn that summer, Dad had me go along once, intending to bring back the car which he had left at Rices' garage when we arrived in Douglas. I could drive since I was 14 but was to bring the wagon back. He had asked them to do some kind of repair and was presented with a bill of more than $300.00, which he couldn't or wouldn't pay so he gave them the car. Mother was furious and vowed she wouldn't come to town in a freight wagon. She stuck by her guns and never left the ranch until 1921 when Dad bought a Model T touring car. During this time our transportation was horses or on foot. You really get to know the country this way.

Fencing was needed and one could get a permit for cutting timber by writing Cheyenne. Most of the posts for the homestead came from the Cow Buttes and Twenty Mile area and were pitch pine or cedar. There were no near neighbors with children so we had no school. The closest was the O'Leary school. Angelina O'Leary was the teacher. She later married Rhea Tillard, our neighbor to the north. Emmet, Mabel and Carroll rode cross country six miles to this school our first year here.

This same fall the folks bought 100 head of Corriedale-Rambouillet cross ewes from Vic DeMott, partner-manager of the Fiddleback Co. They were hand-picked and very good ones. The price was $17 per head. Since the other kids were in school, the herding job fell to me and Mother, since Dad had gone to town shortly after this to work in Charley George's livery barn. He got to know many old-time ranchers and also newcomers. When he returned in the spring we plowed about 30 or 40 acres and planted it mostly to GEHU corn. It was sure to mature in this short-season country and besides it would make good stock feed and save lots of freighting. If you have never harvested GEHU corn you don't know what you've missed. Somehow, during the winter I had 14 head of these sheep get away and, of course, when we found them the coyotes had killed them all. The lamb crop was good and they sheared well. The folks decided that sheep were what they wanted and that they should get more so that they could have a full-time herder.

I started high school the fall of 1918 so was in town the spring of 1919 when Dad made a deal with A.A. (Humpy) Johnson for 500 head of ewes, gate run. We worked them on a Saturday so that I could help. Humpy's ranch was west of town on Five Mile Creek and we trailed them into town and put them in the Burlington stockyards. We had barely got up town when here comes Humpy claiming we had 100 head too many sheep. It was late in the afternoon and they agreed to work them Sunday. It started snowing that night and continued all day Sunday and most of Monday. One of the heaviest snows I have seen here, about 14" on the level, wet and heavy with no wind. Dad was in those yards about 10 days and had Slonakers Dray haul hay from the B.J. Erwin ranch (about 2 miles) and cotton cake from the Grain and Storage Co. which was run by Freeman and Witt. The sheep had not been worked so everything was fed. There was a big loss of sheep. Dad and Humpy were never too friendly after this. Laughing about it in later years, Dad said all he made out of that deal was the pleasure of buying cotton cake out of the first carload shipped into Douglas. The price delivered was about $44 per ton, but I don't know if it was the hay or the cake. If I remember correctly it started snowing the ninth of April.

The homestead law allowed the time World War I veterans had spent in the service to be applied as time spent on their claims and by 1922 land was becoming patented and some was for sale. Land was bought when available and many homesteads were leased. There were lots of free roaming horses and cattle and a fencing program was needed to protect what one was paying for. We had very good neighbors and they cooperated and many could use fencing as an improvement when proving their claim. When completed, we had 44 miles of fence to maintain. By 1928 just about everything in the north country was fenced. These were perimeter fences as all the sheep outfits were still using herders. The big barn was built in 1923 and the poles and dimension stuff were hauled from the Dawes and Marshall Mill at Cold Springs by teams.

We mined and hauled our coal from the Mountain Home coal bank (Cow Buttes, which later caught fire and was abandoned) or from the Woody Creek mine. These were about a 24-mile haul. When Dad got a truck, he hauled from the Antelope mines which were operated by Jess Morsch or Felix Niemcyk. They did not weigh, just guessed a five ton load for $5. We used about seven tons a month.

Dances were one of the popular social activities and were held wherever they could find room. Albert Spellman had a big barn and held some dances. He lived west of us, up on the Hyland flats and Frank Rothleutner had a big barn where he often had dances. He lived at Dull Center. Both these places were quite some distance. When Dad enlarged the ranch house in 1925 and added on a big front room and two bedrooms, he put hinges on the partitions so they could be swung back for dances and people came for miles to them. We had a pet antelope that had free run of the place and at one of these dances, while everyone was having their sandwiches and coffee, she came through the kitchen door, marched across the dance floor, looked the crowd over and went out the front door. She stole the show. We called her Betty and always thought she knew her name. Many baseball games were held at the ranch. After the Dry Creek Community Hall was built, the dances were held there.

The great depression of the late twenties and early thirties was here, and drought also. Farming was given up as a bad risk. The railroad companies made one pay the freight in advance on old ewes when you shipped. Lots of families left for greener pastures. Wheat was worth 17 cents a bushel when you sold. I have personally sold and delivered wheat for 25 cents a bushel during this time. Then there was a grasshopper invasion. At this time the Fiddleback Co. decided to disperse and in spite of the troubled times, Dad bought their Arnold ranch in Niobrara County, which the family still owns.

Coyotes got to be very bad about this time and Dad, Jack Morton and Rhea Tillard organized their own predator control program. They hired an old trapper named Breckenridge, each paid him $50 a month and he could have the pelts. They bought 300 "coyote getters" for him. These were 38 caliber cyanide guns and very effective. Jack Morton furnished the sheep wagon, Rhea Tillard an old horse and Dad some old ewes. He was a good trapper and for many years we did not have many coyotes.

A fire in January 1944 destroyed the ranch house (homestead house) and mother perished. Nothing was saved other than what was in the bunk house and sheep wagons. The house was replaced and brother Carroll ran the ranch until it was sold in 1955. Dad was a member of the District 17 School Board for many years and resigned when he retired and moved to Phoenix where he died in 1958. Mother and he are buried in the cemetery at Douglas.

There were lots of incidents, both amusing and sorrowful, and one cannot look back at these years without a tinge of regret. It was a different era, an age of opportunity. A place for young people with courage and ambition. Honesty, reliability and self-sufficiency were their assets. Unemployment on a sheep ranch was unheard of.

Ballard, Samuel and Elizabeth Family

Samuel "Sam" Ausborn Ballard was born in New-castle County, Brandywine, Delaware on May 12, 1848, the son of George and Anna Deal Ballard. George was born in England.

At the age of 15 Samuel entered service in the Union Army by claiming to be 17. He served the majority of his time fighting for his country in the Civil War in Alabama.

After being mustered out in 1865, Sam moved to Missouri where he entered law school and later was admitted to the bar.

Elizabeth Roberts of Missouri became his bride there. A son, Samuel A. Jr., was born on June 24, 1878 in Stansbury, Missouri.

The family moved to Chadron, Nebraska where Sam Sr. practiced law and also served as a judge for six years.

Coming to Wyoming in either 1898 or 1902, the Ballards settled on homesteads in T32, R73, Sections 34 and 35 near the future LaPrele Dam. Later in 1915 parts of the land were sold to their neighbor, Melvin Stinson, who in turn sold it to the Douglas Reservoir Company in 1922. The Ballard-Jones Oil Company also purchased part of the land.

Samuel Jr. married Ida J. Ward in 1903. Ida was born on January 13, 1881. Their children were: Ethel (b. March 17, 1904), Nellie (b. July 5, 1905, d. June 3, 1919), Ralph, Samuel A. III (b. March 31, 1908), George W. (b. May 27, 1910, d. May 27, 1934) and Leslie (b. July 31, 1917, d. December 17, 1923).

Samuel A. Sr. and Elizabeth moved to Douglas shortly after they sold their lands on LaPrele. Elizabeth died on August 11, 1915; Samuel on January 27, 1940 in Eaton, Colorado.

Samuel A. Jr. and his wife, Ida, also lived in Douglas. He died on December 21, 1936; Ida on June 7, 1938.

Ethel, daughter of Samuel A. Jr., married Clarence Clark. Three daughters, Vivan, Virginia and Helen and one son, Lee, were born to them. Ethel lives today in Dubois, Wyoming.

Samuel A. III married Mabel Gitthens, daughter of Frank and Mary Gitthens on August 20, 1932. Their children were Samuel IV, Monte and Barbara. Samuel A. III, a longtime employee of the Postal Service, died in 1953; Mabel on April 4, 1978.

Bansept, John B. and Emma

My father, John B. Bansept, was born in Haute Rombach, Alsace, France, June 16, 1866, the son of Jean Bansept and Barbe Noel Bansept.

In 1871, as a boy of five, with his mother and two sisters and all the women and children of the town, watched from a hilltop the takeover of Alsace by the Germans. The French fought valiantly to prevent this but the German forces were much stronger and the battle was over in a few hours. It was not until after World War I that Alsace was returned to France.

He received his elementary and secondary education in Rombach. After graduation he attended a machinist trade school in Strassburg, Germany.

Germany had compulsory military training and Dad served under three Kaisers, the last being Kaiser Wilhelm of World War I days. He received a six month early discharge for good behavior.

My grandfather and his two brothers had been to the States a couple times, once to fight for the South during the Civil War. Dad's uncles returned to the states after the war and at least one followed the gold rush to California. Grandfather wanted to return to America but grandmother had a fear of crossing the ocean so they remained in Europe. But Grandfather always encouraged Dad to come to America.

After the death of his parents in the 1880's, he made plans to emigrate to America. In 1888, after visiting Paris, he set sail on the ship "La Normandie" for the United States. Since he had friends in Missouri he traveled there in order to get his bearings.

I think that it must have been there that he met two Frenchmen, Emil and Eugene Poirot and two Germans Andreas and Joe Pfeifer. Dad was the only one who spoke both languages fluently and he served as interpreter. All five began the business of learning English—all were self taught. All were lifelong friends.

Since the Pfeifer boys had a sister who was married to a Werner (I'm not sure but I think he was a Captain) who was serving at Ft. Fetterman, they took the train to Sheridan which at the time was the closest place by rail to the Fort. They bought horses and rode from Sheridan to Ft. Fetterman. Dad and the Poirots intended to go to California, so they headed for San Francisco. They found jobs in the vineyards but had not been there very long when they contracted typhoid fever. When they recovered they headed back to Wyoming.

Back in Wyoming, they filed on homesteads in what is now Converse County. They had several encounters with the Indians. Dad had a string of horses and he always thought that they might appropriate them but they never bothered him.

His original homestead was in the Pumpkin Buttes area, but since that location was a long way from any town, he relinquished it and filed on land about three and a half miles north of Douglas.

By this time he had met some more French speaking people—the Jules LeVasseurs and Mrs. Lea Cross and he started working for one of them (I don't recall which one). It was while working there that he met my mother.

My mother was born May 21, 1871 in St. Charles of Caplan, Gaspé, Quebec, Canada. She was the daughter of Joseph and Angélique Day Briere. She was one of ten children. Her father was of French descent and her mother was of English Irish extraction. Grandmother's parents had come to Canada to escape the religious persecutions in England.

Mother received her elementary and secondary education in St. Charles. After passing the strict Dominion teacher's examinations, she started teaching in Bonaventure county in Quebec. She was an outstanding teacher and was the recipient of two Prince of Wales Awards for being an outstanding teacher.

Meanwhile her sister Florence met and married Jules LeVasseur who brought his bride to the LaPrele area in Converse County sometime after the turn of the century.

Mother decided to come out to Wyoming and visit her sister. She arrived at Orin Junction, a trip which took seven days. She became a governess for the older George Cross children and the next year she taught the Boxelder School. Some of her pupils were the Hiser and Robbins children. There were a couple other families but I can't remember who they were.

My parents were married in 1904 and their first home was on the Foxton place west of the river. They then moved to the Bolln place about three miles north of Douglas on the east bank of the Platte River. My brother John and sister Juliette were born when we lived at this place.

Dad started buying sheep and had acquired a nice flock, but the blizzard of 1909-1910 hit us, along with every other sheep owner in the area. We lost nearly everything. Some of the growers were completely wiped out, but by pulling the wool after the thaw and selling the few sheep Dad was able to save; he was able to pay off the mortgage he had signed to buy the sheep. My parents always felt that they were fortunate to do so.

It was very difficult for parents of that era to get a school. The larger stockgrowers had no children and didn't want to pay the extra taxes needed for education. But with a lot of determination and hard work, the community was finally able to build a small school about two and one half miles north of Douglas just south of Harvey Gulch.

Among the children who attended this school were the Frank and Milton Gitthens children, the Emil Poirot children, the Bansept children and the John Hartman children.

Some teachers that I remember were Mrs. John Amspoker, Edna Smith (Mrs. Bob David), Lottie Sleight (Mrs. Tucker), Hettie Sleight (Mrs. Vinson Merritt), Amber Feezer of Glenrock, Mildred McMahon (Mrs. Emil Schulte of Brunswick, Nebraska.)

Some of the neighbors that I remember vividly besides the above named parents, were the Chelewski family, Henry Von Appen (Dutch Henry) a German titled person. Nearest neighbors were Mr. and Mrs. Richard Clark, but after spending a hard Wyoming winter, they decided to go back to Liscomb, Iowa. The Jamisons (he was a photographer) and Nels Perry whose avocation was prospecting for gold and copper in the Downey Park area. He had formed a mining company known as the "Copper King" with Carl Green and Ben Campbell. Ben was Malcolm Campbell's brother and when he had a disagreement with his brother he would come out to stay with us for a while.

Some of my early memories were the big Bull Durham sign on the north side of a livery barn on North Second. It was there for many years. The first funeral I remember was that of Bill Barlow which was held from Temple Hall. I remember that I had never seen so many flowers in my life. Catholic services (and probably those of other denominations) were in the same hall. So were community and other social affairs. I remember the Old Opera House and C.W. (Fatty) Hardenbrook's car. I remember that for a few cents he would give rides to interested residents. I also remember the five cent jitney dances held on a dance pavillion built on a vacant lot on main street.

The dry farm years were rough what with hail, drought, grasshopper infestations, World War I and the strict rationing and very severe winters.

I remember Dad getting up at 4:30 a.m., riding into town and working with Fred Cannon building the LaBonte Hotel. They worked ten hours a day at fifty cents an hour, after which he would ride another three and a half miles home. Mother stayed home and did the gardening, the chores and everything else that a farm wife was expected to do. Like everyone else they were able to cope.

Even though times were difficult, we children never felt deprived. We had strict but very loving parents who endeavored to give us a sense of security, desire for reading, an education, love of country (I don't remember my parents every failing to vote), moral values and above all, a love of God.

In 1918, they sold the farm to Albert Sims and an army horse buyer bought all of our horses for the unbelievable sum at that time of $165.00 each. I remember being so relieved that the war ended before the horses had time to be shipped overseas, so they did not have to be killed in combat.

They bought the house at 333 North Fifth St. The main reason my parents sold the farm was education. I was in junior high and they wanted us to have the benefits of better schooling instead of just six months of rural school.

In retrospect, though, I think that we had a good foundation during our rural school days. If we had any trouble in understanding anything at school, Mother gave us some concentrated tutoring. She was a super teacher and after her drilling, we never had any problems with math, reading comprehension or rhetoric.

Dad worked for many years at the fairgrounds. After that he was in charge of the city park—that was the original park where the hospital now stands. It was a pretty park and he had a way with flowers. They were always beautiful.

Although George Snyder and I were both born in Douglas, we did not meet until 1929. At that time I was teaching school in Glendo and George was employed by the Wyoming State Highway Department.

We were married December 31, 1931 and had three daughters.

George started working for the Wyoming Highway Dept. in 1927 and worked continuously with the state except for the World War II years when he was doing defense work in South Dakota and Utah. He retired in 1974 with 43 years of service. He served as Project Engineer and Resident Engineer in Fremont County for 26 years.

Mother passed away July 17, 1938, just 15 hours after the death of her sister, Florence LeVasseur, who had died at the Casper hospital.

Dad continued to live in Douglas for several years but eventually sold his home and moved to Lander to make his home with our family.

I deem it one of the privileges of my life to have had him with us. He had a nice disposition, enjoyed gardening and beautifying our yard, enjoyed his grandchildren and lived to enjoy 17 of his 20 great grandchildren and they in turn all loved him. Even today after nineteen years since his passing, the older great grandchildren have fond memories of him. He loved to read and kept up with current events, never lived in the past and was very interested in politics and the emerging Space Age. He was interested and enjoyed life until his last illness just two weeks before his death in April 1965 at the age of 99. My parents final resting place is in Douglas Park Cemetery.

Barger, Roy and Fern

Roy Ward Barger was born February 9, 1898, to Isaiah and Annetta Barger, the ninth of ten children, on their farm 10 miles southwest of Chariton, Iowa. I, Fern Wilma Lemley, was born June 9, 1901 to Jacob and Cavilla Horner Lemley, on a farm eight miles east of Russell, Iowa. We both lived in Iowa until we finished school there. I worked for Roy's sister, Adda Wright and family, on a farm 12 miles south of Chariton, Iowa for two summers. Roy worked there, too. That was how we got acquainted. I finished taking a one-year business course at Simpson College at Indianola, Iowa. I went to live with my sister, Margaret Stewart and family, in Absarokee, Montana where I worked. Roy was staying at his sister's, Jennie Patterson and family, farm 18 miles north of Mitchell, Nebraska. Roy wanted to live there. He wanted me to come to Scottsbluff, Nebraska to get married at the home of his sister, Ida Singleton.

On November 27, 1919, Thanksgiving morning, we were married in Ida and Bill Singleton's home at 10 a.m. It was snowing, blowing, and really cold. They took us in their two-seated model T Ford car, with no heat, and loose side curtains to the home of Roy's sister, Jennie and Lee Patterson, north of Mitchell to a wonderful wedding and Thanksgiving dinner. Bill and Ida had a little white dog named Fritz. He took turns laying on Ida's feet, then my feet, to keep our feet from freezing. Fritz was not happy changing feet while Roy and Bill were out of the car digging it out of snow drifts.

Roy rented a house in Mitchell, Nebraska and worked in a lumber yard there for $100.00 a month until the following spring. Roy bought a big team of horses, dump boards, and sugar-beet rack for the wagon wheels. He hauled beets from farms to railroad cars. His brother, Jay Barger, from Chariton, Iowa, came out to help Roy haul cement to build a new sugar beet factory outside of Mitchell. Roy hauled sugar beets from farms to the factory after it was built, and shoveled beets with a hand shovel at the factory until the sugar beet factory shut down in January 1921 and there was no work.

Roy's brother-in-law and sister, Bill and Ida Singleton, were staying with us. Bill wanted Roy to file on a homestead. He had filed on a homestead 54 miles north of Douglas, Wyoming. Roy filed on one about five miles southwest of Bill's. It was a cold January in 1921. Roy and Bill loaded our furniture, etc., on the beet rack, then with the horses went to Douglas, Wyoming out to the homestead, 184 miles from Mitchell, Nebraska. They hauled lumber fifty-four miles from Douglas with horses and beet rack. It took four days to make a trip — two days to go to Douglas, sleep on the ground or in someone's home, and two days to go back to the homestead. They built two shacks, 10 by 20 feet on each homestead.

Ida stayed with her sister Jennie and family at Mitchell, Nebraska. I went to the home of my sister Margaret Stewart at Absarokee, Montana and stayed with them until May. While there, on April 14, 1921, Kenneth Roy was born, a still-birth. The burial was in Absarokee. I came to the homestead in May. I walked many times to Bill and Ida's homestead five miles northeast of our place. There was a big prairie dog town on a flat going to their place. In summer, there were a lot of rattle snakes. Southeast of our place, straight east of a spring on a bright red shale hill that could be seen from our place, was a den of rattle snakes. One hot day Roy went over to it and started to kill some of them. They were everywhere, so he got away from there.

We had a nice view and close neighbors. William (called Bill) Boehler lived one-quarter to one-half mile north. Daddy Wilson lived about one block west of Boehler. Lawrence "Mickey" and Eva Allen lived one mile straight north of us and Boehler on a higher hill. We could see all of them from our place. Roy went ten miles north to Antelope Creek to get free coal. There was a thirty-two foot vein in the high creek bank and below ground vein. He drove close to the high bank with a team and wagon, dump boards, and knocked it off with a pick into the wagon. Roy went northeast of Antelope Creek where there were trees to get posts, and some longer poles. He made a barn in the side of the bank with poles and dirt on top for the roof, and a hen house in the bank with lumber on it, also.

I had made some pumpkin pies; and friends John and Rubie Wohlford lived about one mile south of the Cheyenne River (about 15 to 20 miles away) came with team and wagon to spend the weekend with us. She thought those pies were so good. I made them using no eggs or fresh milk, just canned milk.

We hauled water from the spring one-quarter to one-half mile south on the hill with a team, sled and barrel. Sometimes I took Kate and the sled, when I was there alone and Roy was away working. (Kate was a gentle old riding race horse I rode).

On April 15, 1922, Maudra Maxine was born in a snow storm. Roy went with the team and wagon to get his sister

Ida. It took him two and one-half hours. She lived four hours. We could not get to Douglas. Easter Sunday, April 16th, we buried her a little way northwest of the house where there was the least amount of snow. It was so hard to do that. We never got her moved to the Douglas cemetery which I wanted to do. We put a tombstone with her name on it, a fence around it, and a box for flowers on the grave. Thanks so much to Velma and Lou Steckley for taking care of the grave. I appreciate it very much.

One summer Roy herded sheep, or buck herd, around ninety-five head for Bass Jacobs. I stayed on our homestead alone. Bill Boehler and Roy had a trap line one winter and caught a lot of coyotes and two badgers. They would take turns riding horseback every day to check them. There was a ranch house northeast of our place where they would stop and get warm. The man there would always give them hot hot chili that warmed them up, which they enjoyed. Roy would come home telling about something like an ear phone they put to their ears and could hear faint music. He was so excited about it. Our neighbors, Lawrence and Eva Allen, took Roy and me over to the ranch in their car to hear it. We thought it was so wonderful to hear a faint sound of music.

We first got mail at Teckla, through Gillette, and later had a Post Office at Verse, at Bill Boehler's place. It came from Douglas to Bill.

Our neighbor, Mickey Allen, and Roy took our team, beet rack, and wagon to Mitchell, Nebraska, to work in sugar beets there one fall. Eva Allen and I stayed on our homestead. One fall I went too and worked at the hospital in Mitchell, Nebraska. Roy's sister lived on a farm there. We canned a lot of fruit and vegetables. I took a lot to our homestead. One winter we rented a room in Douglas, Roy washed dishes in a restaurant there. I baby sat, and took in sewing. Fall and winter of 1923 and 1924, Roy worked as a welder at a tank farm west of Douglas and northeast of Glenrock. We lived at first in a tent, eight-by-ten feet. I ripped up gunny sacks and sewed them together and nailed them to the ground for a floor.

After a time, a large piece of steel fell on Roy's foot and broke several toes. He was in the hospital in Casper for several days. There was no way to lock up the tent, only tied it from the outside. A man that worked with Roy lived with his wife in a ten-by-twelve shack. She said to me, "Fern, you are not staying alone in that tent at night without a lock on it. You are staying with us." They had one bed, so I slept next to the wall, she slept in the middle, and he slept on the outside. I turned my face to the wall when he got up and dressed. He went outside while she and I got up and dressed.

When Roy got out of the hospital, he had a cast on his foot up to his knee and walked with crutches. He could not work. We decided to go to our homestead and stay until he was O.K. again. We had bought a one-seated Ford car with a box in back, the first car we had bought since we were married. We packed tent and all in box in the back of the car and started out. Roy thought we should take a short-cut to the homestead, go north and east, instead of going through Douglas. It was the first time we had gone this way. There was a long steep hill not far from the tank farm to go over. I could not drive. It was so hard for him to drive with one foot and leg in a cast. He would make a run for the hill and get almost to the top and no farther. I was out pushing and putting stuff behind the wheels. We were there until almost dark before we got over the hill. Roy was trying to make up for lost time before dark and was driving fast for those days. The trail was level, no traffic, and BANG, we hit a narrow washed-out deep ditch we didn't see. It broke the axle on a front wheel, and we could not go on. As there was no house in sight, and Roy was on crutches; we got out and put the tent on ground with the bedding inside of the tent by the side of the road. In the night it began to snow. By morning it had snowed several inches. Roy could not go any place in the snow with crutches. There was no way to get anything to eat. (I was expecting.) I covered Roy up the best I could with the tent and started out walking. It was still snowing. I saw one house, but before I could get there, they drove the other way with a sled and team of horses. I walked and walked, five or six miles, until I came to a house where someone was home. I was exhausted. They took me in, gave me tea and toast. The men took a team and sled to get Roy. We stayed there five or six days until we could get repairs for the car on the mail route from Douglas. The people we stayed with fixed the car. We were so thankful to the people who took us in and helped us.

Spring of 1924, Roy's brother Virgil (Bert) Barger and family lived on a farm north of Palisade, Nebraska. He wrote Roy that he had gotten a piece of corn stalk in his eye and lost sight in it. The eye doctor said he could lose sight in the other eye, too, so he wanted Roy to come down and stay with them to put in his crops, corn and cane. We took our car and stayed with them until the crop was laid by in June. He wanted Roy to go back to the homestead and get our furniture and move to Nebraska. He put our furniture on the beet rack with the team and wagon. It was hot weather. It took several weeks for it was 379 miles from our homestead to Palisade, Nebraska. I stayed with Roy's brother and family on the farm while he was gone. We rented a house in Palisade. On July 11, 1924, Veta Marlene was born. She was a perfect baby, but only lived one week before she died. Burial was in Palisade Cemetery.

Fall of 1924, Roy's sister Ida and Bill Singleton came to Palisade, Nebraska from their Wyoming homestead. He was sick with TB and died the last of January 1925. Burial was in a lot close to our baby in the Palisade Cemetery.

We lived in a rented house in Palisade until the spring of 1925, when we moved to a rented farm northwest of Benkelman, Nebraska, for four years. In the meantime we sold our homestead for $1000.00, to Fred Dilts and put the money into cattle, sold the cattle, and put money into a farm. Later, we bought more. We had 560 acres before we sold it. It was 15 miles northwest of Benkelman, Nebraska. We lived there 16 years.

On April 15, 1926, Leland LeRoy Barger was born on the Star place. On April 13, 1927, Lyle LeRoyce Barger was born on the Star place also. We farmed mostly corn at first with horses. We had great big piles of cobs, and burned them in the cook stove and heater.

When Roy farmed with a tractor, he farmed around 400 acres of corn. Leland and Lyle helped him. On August 22, 1931, Dickie Dean was born, lived one week and was buried by side of Veta Marlene in Palisade Cemetery. We lived on the farm until Leland and Lyle were through school, and Leland was in the Merchant Marines. We sold the farm and had a big sale. We lived in Benkelman, Nebraska for one year. Roy bought a big truck and trucked for one year.

On February 22, 1946, Lyle married Ila Mae Cline of Parks, Nebraska. They lived on a farm four miles east of Haigler, Nebraska. In June 1946, we moved to a farm six miles east of Salem, Oregon. We lived on this farm for five years. In 1951, we moved to a new house in east Salem. Roy worked at Blue Lake Cannery in West Salem until he retired at 62 years of age. We lived there 15 years.

On May 8, 1948, Leland married Edna May Thackery at Needy, Oregon. They lived in Portland, Oregon in a new house Leland had built until July 1959 when they bought 238 acres close to Eagle Creek, Oregon.

While in Portland, Leland had a big logging truck and hauled logs from the mountains to the valley; he continued trucking several years after they moved to the ranch. After the children were married and gone from home, in September 1981 they moved to a new house in Portland which their oldest boy Bill had built and their oldest son Bill and family moved on the ranch and live there now.

Lyle and his wife Ila lived on a farm in Nebraska for one year then moved to Oregon. They lived in Salem, Oregon in a new house he built, then on a farm south of Stayton, Oregon. He raised wheat for three years, then moved to Renton, Washington where he built houses. They still live in a lovely home he built himself.

On February 22, 1966, we moved to Woodburn, Oregon from our home in Salem, Oregon to Senior Estates. Roy loved to fish; we went to the ocean, mountains and lakes fishing.

On November 27th, 1969, we celebrated our 50th wedding anniversary at Senior Estates Club House. There was a big crowd. It was a nice day, with surprise program put on by the men's chorus. Everyone enjoyed it so much. So many people said it was the best program they had ever been to. I made my dress and some of the flowers. We had a big dinner at our home after it was over. We got a lot of nice gifts and money.

On March 12, 1977, Roy went to be with Jesus and loved ones in Heaven. Roy saw Heaven before he went. He said it was a wonderful place and the angels were going to take him there. Burial was in Rest Lawn Cemetery in Salem, Oregon.

I am just past 83 years old. I have been in this home in the Senior Estates for over 18 years. I have many happy memories of life on the Wyoming homestead and had many wonderful and true friends there, for which I am so thankful.

Barnes, Ross and Phoebe Family

Herbert Erwin and Matilda Maria Spencer Barnes came to Wyoming from Sibley, Iowa in 1908 to homestead south of Lusk, Wyoming. The youngest son, Ross Ellis, who had been born in Iowa on Feb. 10, 1895, found work herding buck sheep for the Elliot Sheep Ranch that year. The following year, he started riding the "rough string" on the roundup for Tom Bell. Besides breaking horses, he acted as a representative for the Bell outfit at roundups held by other cattlemen in the vicinity.

Ross' older brother, Fred, along with their mother, Matilda, and their sisters had taken homesteads on 20-Mile Creek. When Ross and his younger brother, Emmert, were old enough, they took homesteads on Walker Creek. The three brothers worked together improving their claims, though Fred and Ross did not always get along well with one another. Once, while the brothers were building Ross' homestead shack, they all went to the timber to cut a load of logs. At the end of a long, hard day, as they were returning home, Fred and Ross commenced to argue about which of them would climb down off the load and open a gate in a line fence which was built across their road. Upon arriving at the gate, both Ross and Fred got off the wagon and began to fight. Emmert, the third brother, watched them for a while, climbed down, opened the gate and proceeded to go on home. Finally, Fred and Ross decided that they had had enough, only to realize that their brother had deserted them. They were obliged to walk home. When they arrived, they both piled on the luckless Emmert for having left them afoot.

When World War I began, Ross and his brother, Fred, enlisted in the army. Ross was stationed at Ft. Lewis, Washington, where he acted as a horse orderly for the officers, as well as breaking horses to be used by the Cavalry. Fred was sent overseas, serving in France with the Infantry.

The influenza epidemic of 1918 claimed the lives of the younger brother, Emmert, his sister Mary's husband and their baby son. Ross' parents were unable to tend their home place near Lusk, and in addition, look after the homesteads of the other members of the family on Walker and 20-Mile Creek, so Ross was given an honorable discharge from the military and allowed to return home to help his family with the work.

Ross, while riding after some estrayed horses in the fall of 1920, met Phoebe Shrader, whose family lived on the Dry Creek Flats. Phoebe Hazel Shrader had been born in Humbolt County, Nebraska on Nov. 19, 1899. She lost her mother when she was but eight years old. Her baby brother, Paul, was only 6 months old. It fell to Phoebe to care for the baby as well as to cook for her father, and older brothers. She was obliged to stand on a stool in order to knead her bread or to cook at the kitchen range.

Phoebe finished her common school education in Nebraska, and attended one year of Normal Training before coming to Wyoming with the family in 1918. Her father, Nathaniel Sanders Shrader, brought his motherless family to the Dry Creek Flats where he had taken up a homestead. Nathaniel decided that his first task must be the construction of a barn to house his livestock against the winter storms which would soon be upon them, since it was late fall at the time they arrived. The family dwelling could be constructed later. As a result, Phoebe and two of her brothers were very seriously ill. They caught the measels, and the illness was intensified due to the fact that they had no adequate shelter.

On April 10, 1921, Phoebe and Ross were married in Casper, Wyoming. Phoebe's brother, Lafe, and his sweetheart, Rhua, were married at the same time, the two couples having a double wedding. It is of interest to note that only one child was born to each couple, and in each case, the child was a daughter.

Besides his duties on the homestead, Ross worked as a ranch foreman for various outfits. At the time of the birth of his daughter, Irene, on Feb. 25, 1926, Ross was employed by the John T. Williams Sheep Company, whose land joined that of the Barnes' on the west.

The winter of 1926 was very severe, with much snow and cold. When it was time for Phoebe to give birth to her baby, she was taken to Douglas by Mike Williams in a Model T. Ford. The maternity home in Douglas was located in a section house between the railroad tracks. Ross loved to tease Irene about being born "on the wrong side of the tracks". The section house has been long since moved to another part of Douglas, where it is used as a family dwelling.

Phoebe accidentally broke her arm when Irene was about 6 months old. Phoebe was on her way, horseback, to attend a dance at the time. The horse hit a fence, and in the course of events, Phoebe was left with the injury. For several weeks she was unable to pin a diaper on her infant daughter, so the task fell to two young men, Bill Nuttall and Clyde Strand, who were working for the Barnes at the time. They assumed the duties of baby-tender and nursemaid until Phoebe was once again able to manage.

Ross Barnes followed the rodeo circuit as well as caring for his own place and working for other established ranchers. It was said of him that he could ride anything with four feet and covered with hair. Ross also clowning at several State Fair rodeos in Douglas in the late '20's and early '30's. His act included a small Shetland pony named Jerry, and a Spitz dog Phoebe, who accompanied Ross to these performances, rode in horse races, as did her sister, Dorothy.

Ross, determined to build up a ranch of some size, would work at any job to make a dollar or two. Many of the other homesteaders were starving out and giving up their land. Some of it brought as much as $2.00 per acre, while other tracts brought as little as 50¢. Ross, by hard work and frugal management, was able to buy out seven different homesteaders, and later on he was able to buy part of a larger ranch which was called the Kitchen Cattle Company. With this land, Ross also got part of the mineral rights.

It was the duty of Phoebe and her young daughter to care for the home place while Ross was working away from home. Besides looking after the range cattle, Phoebe and Irene milked cows and fed bum lambs which Irene herded during the day to protect them from the threat of coyotes.

During the depression and drought of the 1930's, the Barnes were obliged to sell their cattle and sheep to the government, as did so many others who were engaged in the agricultural business. A price of $2.00 per head was paid for the sheep, while the cattle brought from $5.00 to $7.00 per head. The ultimate heartbreak came, however, when the agents of the Government took the stock over the hill and shot them. The Barnes were among the relatively few small operators who managed to hold on to their land in spite of the severe financial loss.

For most children reared in rural Wyoming at that time, education was very costly and placed a heavy burden upon parents who were trying to "make ends meet". In addition, the small children had to travel several miles each day to attend school, either by foot or by horseback.

For the Barnes' daughter, Irene, school began when she reached the age of five years. She rode horseback some 2½ miles to her first school, making the trip on a one-eyed mare. The mare, part Shetland and part Indian pony, raised a colt annually. The foal was left at home when Irene set off to school. It took all the physical strength which the girl possessed to "persuade" the mare to leave her foal for the morning trip, but in the evening the distance was covered in record time. Enroute to the school, Irene had to pass through two fences. In order to make it easier for his daughter, Ross built wooden gates in these fences and placed a wooden mounting block on either side of the fence.

Mable Townsend taught the first school which Irene attended. There was an enrollment of nine children. However, all nine of the students were obliged to repeat this year of schooling since Mabel Townsend married a Government trapper and left — her term was uncompleted.

During her second year, Irene "boarded" with the Zip Thompson family. The schoolhouse, made of sod, was located about a mile distant, and Irene could walk to school. Esther Whitman taught that year.

The following two and a half years, Irene lived at her own home, riding her one-eyed pony a distance of five miles to school. It was on a cold, wintery day just before Christmas in 1935 that the child came near to disaster. She had made the trip to school, arriving half-frozen, only to find that the teacher had not come. She climbed back on her pony and returned to her home. Upon arriving there, she was so bitterly cold she could not get off her horse. She had frozen her face, hands and feet very badly. Had it not been for her trusty mare, she probably would not have gotten home at all.

This incident convinced Ross and Phoebe that other arrangements would have to be made for their daughter, and therefore Irene was sent to Lusk to stay with her widowed Aunt Mary. She delivered the Denver Post and did other jobs to earn her keep.

To complete the sixth and seventh grades, Irene lived once more at home and rode 2½ miles to a bus line which ran to the Walker Creek School. Phoebe moved to Douglas when Irene entered the eighth grade. Her teachers were Ruth Numerich and Clara Owens.

Irene boarded and roomed at the L. D. Wallis home when she started to high school. She saw the Wallis' oldest son, Robert, only occasionally, since he was employed by the William E. Taylor Ranch, and seldom at home. The following year, however, Bob and Irene began dating. Then Bob enlisted in the Signal Corps of the Air Force and was shipped out to England in the early spring of 1944. It was on a practice range in England that Bob lost the sight in his right eye. He was struck by a shotgun pellet. The eye became infected and later had to be removed. He feels that he lost his eye to save his life, however, for the crew members of the B-24 to which he had previously been assigned failed to return to England. Bob and Irene were married in September of 1944.

Ross Barnes died at his ranch home on Walker

Creek, where he had spent so many years of his life working to build a flourishing cattle ranch. He passed away in April of 1964 two months less than four years before his wife, Phoebe died. She lived her last years in the nursing home in Douglas. Both Ross and Phoebe are buried in the Douglas Cemetery.

Ross' place on Walker Creek is now operated by his eldest grandson, Richard, who continues to raise black Angus cattle as did his parents before him.

Barrow, Merris C. and Minnie

Merris C. Barrow was born at Canton, Bradford County, Pennsylvania, on October 4, 1860, the son of Rev. Robert C. and Helen Harding Barrow. Robert was born in New York and was educated for the ministerial life. He entered the ministry of the Christian Church in Pennsylvania and was also married there. Later the family moved to Missouri and then to Nebraska.

Merris received his education in Nebraska and learned the printer's trade at Tecumseh, Nebraska. He leased the "Tecumseh Chieftain" for two years.

He married Minnie F. Combs, daughter of Ellsworth B. Combs, on March 1, 1877. They had three children: Elizabeth, Helen and Merris C. Jr.

In 1878 he received an appointment of U. S. Postal Clerk in Omaha. He was then transferred to Wyoming with headquarters in Laramie. In 1879 he became the city editor for the Laramie "Daily Times" and was later associated with the "Laramie Boomerang." In 1884 he left Laramie to go to Rawlins to work for the "Wyoming Tribune." Upon hearing that a new railway was being built through central Wyoming, and Fort Fetterman in particular, he decided to move his family to the abandoned fort in 1886.

Upon arriving in Fort Fetterman he started publishing a newspaper and called it "Bill Barlow's Budget." Merris had earlier taken up the pen name "Bill Barlow."

On September 15, 1886 he moved his family and newspaper to the new town of Douglas which had been started by the Pioneer Townsite Co.

Minnie took an active part in the publishing of the paper as well as running a stationery store adjacent to the Budget office on South Third Street.

Merris was active in local politics serving as the first clerk of the town of Douglas and in 1890 as its mayor. In July 1889 Barrow was selected as a member of the Constitutional Convention for the new state of Wyoming.

Barrow also published the "Sagebrush Philosophy." He did most of the writing for it at his new house west of Douglas. It was located northeast of Forrest West's buildings. A fire destroyed it later.

Mr. Barrow died on October 9, 1910. His funeral was one of the biggest in Douglas. Douglas school children, dismissed from classes, marched as part of the funeral procession from Unity Temple to the cemetery.

Minnie lived until 1944 when she died on October 24 in Thermopolis.

Barry, Sydney and Effie Family

Sydney Field Barry was born on January 23, 1864 in Bromley, Kent, England, son of James and Amelia Barry.

Mr. Barry came to Douglas in 1886 after receiving his education at Tumbridge Wells College and working in a London mercantile house for a time. Upon his arrival in Converse County he became associated with the Phillips brothers in their cattle venture. In 1900 he purchased a ranch on upper LaPrele Creek.

Mrs. Sydney "Effie" Barry

Sydney married Effie Williamson. Their children were: Margaret (born May 6, 1895) and Constance (died March 18, 1921). Sydney died on May 2, 1935.

Margaret was educated in the Douglas schools and attended the University of Wyoming. She served as County Superintendent of Schools for Converse County from 1919 to 1921.

In 1922 she married Harold Park. They moved to Salt Lake City in 1923 to make their home. Four children were born to them: Evelyn, Bob, Barry and Marilyn. Bob married Shirley Jo Currier in 1956. He died on January 14, 1973. Marilyn married Harold Carothers and after their divorce she married E. Justin Werner.

Margaret came back to Converse County to live on the family ranch in 1943. She died on October 20, 1970.

Bartshe, Henry and Grace Family

Henry Hamilton Bartshe was born in Iowa on August 21, 1860, the youngest of seven children. Grace Augusta Wood was born in Ohio on April 20, 1866, the youngest of nine children, to Captain William and Mary Wood.

Because Wood was in the Union Army during the Civil War, he moved his family to a number of locations: Mississippi, Louisiana, and later to Buffalo, Missouri. It was in Buffalo that Henry met Grace; they were married in 1884. Two sons, Leonard Henry, born October 8, 1885 and Tracy David, born March 26, 1887, were born in Buffalo, Missouri.

In 1891 they moved to Wyoming where Grace's brothers, Batchelar Wood and Charles Wood had moved earlier, each filing on a homestead. They lived with her brother, Charlie, and his wife, Flora, at the Vernon Brown Stone Company Camp where Henry worked at the Red Rock quarry. Grace helped Flora run an eating establishment at this camp. At the quarry they cut huge blocks of stone from the hillside located northeast of the Boxelder Road, below what is known as Clayton Hill. There was a railroad spur to Glenrock which joined the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad. Much of the grade is still visible. Up until a few years ago a number of the stones were still piled in the Hugh Duncan ranch pasture.

After a short time they moved to Garfield, Washington. Henry worked for his brother David in his blacksmith shop. Leonard attended school there. One day a pack of hounds attacked him. His Uncle David heard them and was able to beat off the dogs.

Grace often mentioned their dislike of the weather and homesickness for Missouri which caused them to move back to Missouri.

Henry still wished to acquire some land and came back to Wyoming where he filed on a homestead near where he bought his brother-in-law's place. It is now a part of the Lester Grant ranch in Boxelder Park. Many years later Leonard and Tracy would recall that on February 14, 1894, Grace and the boys got off the train at Inez, Wyoming. Henry met them with a team and wagon, borrowed from Grace's brother, "Batch". With their belongings and supplies, they started their long cold journey to their new home, via Spring Canyon route, a distance of about 40 miles. The nine and seven year old boys, covered with a tarp, felt this was the longest and coldest trip they had ever made.

Henry had always been a farmer. He raised oats, wheat, rye, barley and potatoes which he sold and traded for things they needed. He also raised horses and cattle. There being no cars at this time, they would take their produce by team and wagon to Glenrock or Douglas and bring back groceries, such as large quantities of flour, sugar, beans and "Arbuckles" brand green coffee beans, which they roasted and ground. They also got lugs of fruit, such as apples and oranges, that they could keep for some time in the cellar. These trips would take two to three days.

Leonard and Tracy attended a school that was located between what is now the Fred Grant and Lester Grant ranches. Students at this time were children of the Robbins, Smith, Carlson, Johnson and Lingreen families. School was held at the time of year when the children were not needed to help with the ranch work. Later on the Bartsches owned this land and lived in the old school house. This was after a log school house was erected, more centrally located, east of the Charles Grant home, where the Fred Grant Hall now stands. At this time the school age children attending with the Bartsches were the Sullivans, Whites and Olins.

In 1898 Henry and Grace bought the "Hank Root" place, now the Leonard Bartsche ranch, from Charles Smith. Henry filed for an additional homestead adjoining this land. He built more rooms on the house and a number of out buildings. Their youngest son, Hugh Batchelar, was born at this ranch on January 14, 1905.

Leonard and Tracy stayed on the home place attending school after morning chores and before evening chores. They had to walk several miles to and from school. At this time they cut native hay to feed their stock during the bad winters and spent their spare time breaking horses to ride and for teams, some of which they would trade or sell to neighbors.

In 1902, Leonard, 17, and Tracy, 15, borrowed money to purchase the Steve Smith place from their uncle, Elmer Wood, now the Tracy Bartsche ranch. They ran this place in partnership for nearly 20 years. Leonard worked for Willard "Cap" White during the busy season to help earn money to pay their loan to George Lambe who ranched on LaPrele Creek. He also worked for Elias Hiser running the engine for the sawmill they purchased from Marshalls in 1912. The boys also worked for Davie Smyth, herding sheep and other work in between their own chores. When they each became 21 they filed on homesteads, adjoining their folks' place and each others.

During this time, Leonard, Tracy and their friends, the Robbins, Smiths, Hiser boys, Frank Philbrick and Ed Virden would ride horseback to Beaver School in the LaPrele Creek Community to attend the dances, pie suppers, picnics, etc. a distance from 12 to 14 miles for most of them, getting back home just in time to start their chores and go to work with no sleep until the next night. Tracy related that one evening they rode over in deep snow only to find that the dance was cancelled and had to turn around and ride back home.

There being few fences in those days, all cattle ranged together in the summer time, from Boxelder, Spring Canyon and east of LaPrele. In the fall there would be a large roundup that lasted several days. They would cut out their own stock and head them back to their ranch to winter or sell them.

In the early summer of 1918 Tracy went to serve in World War I. He, along with several local boys, were assigned to the Cavalry unit and served in France.

Later that year, on October 30, 1918, Leonard married Grace Leman, daughter of Dennis and Bessie Leman, from the LaPrele community. They lived on Leonard and Tracy's place until 1920 when they bought the Hank Root place from Leonard's parents. After they moved here they soon installed a galvanized tank in the ceiling above the kitchen. Water was pumped into it with a gasoline engine, heated by a waterfront in the wood and coal cooking range and stored in a hot water tank. Therefore, the house had a complete bathroom and kitchen with hot and cold running water. For a number of years this was the only place in the community with these conveniences. Here Leonard and Grace raised their four children: Ruth Arlene (Warnock), Elizabeth "Bette" Jean (Olsen), Leonard Leman, deceased 1978 and James Hugh. They resided here until October 1970 when they moved to Douglas and bought a home. Leonard passed away May 8, 1974 at the age of 88. Grace still resides in the family home in Douglas keeping busy with her garden, lawn and flowers.

After Tracy returned from the service he married Ella Sullivan, daughter of William and Nora Sullivan, from the LaPrele community on June 22, 1921. They lived on the partnership place. Later the boys divided their places and this became Tracy and Ella's ranch where they raised two children, Robert Kenneth and Phyllis Mary (Hardesty). Ella passed away April 20, 1959. Tracy lived on the ranch with his son, Kenneth, until 1968 when they bought a home in Casper where Tracy took care of the house and yard until a few months before his death, at 96 years of age, on September 24, 1983.

Henry, Grace and their son, Hugh, moved into Glenrock after they sold their ranch to Leonard. Henry built a house in Glenrock and shortly thereafter moved back to the country residing on his homestead which he later sold to Charles Grant. While living on the homestead he built the local school house and helped build the new house for his son, Tracy, replacing the house that burned to the ground earlier that year. He also built the Fred Grant house. In the winter time when Henry had little to do he liked to work with wood, making furniture and a number of items by inlaying different kinds of wood. He was also an avid reader, wrote poetry and many children's mystery stories.

In 1928 Henry went to Alaska, which was a lifelong dream, and spent several months visiting a friend. While he was there he shot and killed a Kodiak bear. Shortly after he returned home he became ill and passed away November 20, 1930.

Grace and her son, Hugh, stayed in Glenrock. Hugh finished school and became an accountant. He managed the O. L. Walker Lumber Co. for a number of years. He served as yeoman in the submarine service during World War II and was in Tokyo Bay when the peace treaty was signed on the battleship, Missouri. After completing the service, he and his mother moved to Casper where he was employed.

Mrs. Henry Bartsche passed away in Casper on January 18, 1954 at the age of 88.

Hugh married Charlotte Stevenson Curry in Casper on December 21, 1951. They later built a home at the foot of Casper Mountain in the Garden Creek area. They both retired and enjoyed this home for several years. Charlotte passed away on November 15, 1976. Hugh later sold this place and now resides in the Veterans Home of Wyoming at Buffalo.

Leonard and Grace's descendants are:

Ruth married Doug Cook who was killed in World War II. They had one son, Warren. In 1953 she married Ray Warnock. They have one son, Gregg, and one daughter, Arlene Kay (Valdez). Ruth is a long time employee of the Converse County Bank; Ray is a well known locksmith.

Bette married Martin "Marty" Olsen. They had six children: Jeri Lee (Philbrick), Marti Jeanne (McNamara), James Dean, Vicki Joyce (Weiss), DeWayne J. and Gary Joe. Marty and Bette made their home on upper LaPrele Creek for many years on the Sullivan Ranch. They later moved to Bette's parent's place on Boxelder Creek. On February 24, 1976 Marty was killed in a tragic accident while cleaning and working on a gun. Bette continues to live on the home place in 1985.

Leonard L. married Louise Perry of Brownwood, Texas. They had one daughter, Sharon (Bailey). Leonard operated the Bartshe Appliance and Electric business for many years until his death on December 18, 1978. Louise is a long time employee of the Converse County Memorial Hospital.

James H. married Vera Epperly. They have two daughters, Debra and Rebecca. Jim is a mechanic and operates his J. B. Repair Shop in Douglas. Vera is the secretary for the Thunder Basin Grazing Association.

Tracy and Ella's descendants are:

Robert Kenneth who never married and lives and operates his parent's ranch.

Phyllis Mary (Hardesty) married Robert Hardesty. They have three daughters: Lauren A., Kerry L. and Kathryn M. Bob works for the Pacific Power at the Dave Johnston Power Plant in Glenrock. Phyllis is a ski instructor on Casper Mountain.

Barth, Albert and Edna

Albert F. Barth was born on January 6, 1899 at Silvercreek, Nebraska, the son of John and Julia Barth, whose parents came over to the United States from Germany. John and Julia (Scholl) Barth were married in Decatur, Illinois on January 14, 1858. They first settled in Illinois and later came to Nebraska; first in Seward County for a time and later moved to Silvercreek, Merrick County, where Mr. Barth operated a mill.

In the late spring of 1900, the family moved to York, Nebraska and bought a farm. This was where Albert grew up and received his education (in the York County schools and was confirmed on March 16, 1913 at Peace Lutheran Church at Waco, Nebraska).

Albert ventured westward in 1919 to find work and visit his sister Emma and brother-in-law, U. Grant Evans, who had come to Wyoming in 1915 following their marriage and homesteaded in Converse County, Section 11-T.34N.-R.69W. in the Walker Creek vicinity.

Albert's brother, Harry E. Barth, had applied for homestead rights in 1917 on 640 acres on Section 21, T.34N., R.69W., but after applying, he later decided he didn't want it and relinquished his rights to Albert who then applied for homestead rights on February 14, 1920 on the same 640 acres in Section 21 in Converse County in the Walker Creek vicinity, not far from the Evans homestead. After attaining the age of 21 years he proved up on the homestead by fencing, building a shack and cultivating forty acres on the south half of the section. His only way of transportation was his saddle horse which he rode to Douglas sometimes and to visit the other people in the neighborhood. At one time his horse was bitten by a rattlesnake when he was out riding near the Alfred Edison place, and Mrs. Edison knew what to do and saved the horse.

The homestead was filed for record on October 27, 1924 and was duly recorded by Roscoe R. Schlecty and was given the patent and the seal of the General Land Office in Washington, D.C. on the 22nd of May 1924 by the President of the United States, Calvin Coolidge.

Albert went to work in the oil fields at Tea Pot Dome, among others, after having leased the homestead land to Paul LeBar for grazing sheep. I believe that he went back to York, Nebraska in 1926, and helped his brother on the farm and also worked in the Meyer Music Store as a radio technician for his sister Bertha and brother-in-law Fred Meyer, and on April 28, 1929 after the death of U. G. Evans as the result of an automobile accident, Albert and his mother were called back to Douglas to be with Emma M. Evans and attend the funeral of U. Grant Evans who was buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Emma's mother returned to York, Nebraska but Albert stayed there to help Emma that summer and in the fall, I, Edna Evelyn Beattie, went to Douglas and Albert and I were married on September 19, 1929 at the Grace Lutheran parsonage in Casper, Wyoming.

I was born September 12, 1904 at York, Nebraska to William and Mary Choffell Beattie.

Mrs. Emma Evans had a sale in November 1929 following her husband's death, and moved to Boulder, Colorado where she was superintendent of nurses for a number of years at the community hospital, having been an R.N. since graduation from nurses training school in 1909 at Sioux City, Iowa.

After that, she returned to York, Nebraska and was head nurse at York General Hospital for several years until her retirement. She passed away on October 15, 1964 and is buried in the Greenwood Cemetery at York, Nebraska.

After our marriage we continued living on Mrs. Evans' place which we rented and made that our home for the next 21 years and taking back the homestead land for grazing cattle.

We became parents of a daughter, Mary Yvonne Barth, born October 25, 1934, and a son, Harold Albert Barth, born May 19, 1936. Another daughter Juliann was stillborn on September 23, 1937 and she is buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery near where Mr. Evans is buried.

Harold and Mary attended Walker Creek School. After Mary graduated from eighth grade she was a freshman in Douglas High School. Harold attended Walker Creek School through seventh grade in 1950.

We sold the land in Wyoming in 1950 and left Wyoming because of my ill health and moved back to York, Nebraska and bought land near Grafton, Nebraska.

Mary and Harold continued going to school and attained their education through Nebraska schools. After college, Mary worked as a secretary in Lincoln, Nebraska before she married Charles R. Hickstein on July 12, 1958. They lived in Camarillo, California and have two sons, David and Charles, Jr., and a daughter Deborah. Charles R. Hickstein is a metalsmith at Point Magu, California.

Harold married Evangaline (Vangie) Duer of Staplehurst, Nebraska on December 3, 1960. They have two daughters, Deann M. Barth, born March 13, 1964 and Denise R. Barth, born August 3, 1966. A daughter Teresa was born on October 18 and passed away October 19, 1962.

In 1965 Albert and I moved to York, Nebraska, having bought a house here where I still live. Harold continued farming after Albert retired, since they had been associated in farming together; and Harold and his family are still living on the farm and also renting more land to farm.

Albert F. Barth passed away on October 10, 1975 at the age of 76, 10 months and 4 days, and is buried in York, Greenwood Cemetery.

Now in 1984 I can look back to those twenty one years that we lived on the homestead. They were happy years although quite different to get used to for me. No modern facilities in the house and we had to use kerosene lamps and lanterns. Cleaning those lamp chimneys was an every day chore that I didn't enjoy. Then we got a gasoline lamp. We had to carry water in from the well that was pumped from the well with a gasoline engine. Before, we had a windmill built to pump water to fill three water tanks for the cattle and horses.

The 1930's were really awful with all the wind blowing dirt and sand and it was hot and dry and the crops were poor. Albert farmed the ground with four horses on horse drawn machinery. He didn't buy a tractor. He planted corn and wheat, raised alfalfa and also stacked prairie hay, which was hard work. He hauled wood from the timber to burn in our cook stove and heater, and made many trips to a north coal mine fifty miles or less from home with a pickup truck. Sometimes he hired Dickau's to haul the coal in a large truck. We were always warm and comfortable during the winter. We always raised chickens and turkeys to sell and to eat; we always had chickens and eggs to sell.

We raised good gardens by irrigating from the tanks. The vegetables tasted so good in the altitude and I canned lots of vegetables for our winter use. Albert milked cows so we always had milk and cream to use and cream to sell.

The January 1949 blizzard was real bad and we had hay dropped from a plane over the pasture that was delivered from Casper, Wyoming. The bales broke and scattered the hay.

I think that I could write a book about the experiences we had. We attended church and Sunday school in the school houses.

I will end by saying that Albert loved that country and regretted leaving out there, and probably would not have left if my health had not forced us to leave. We left many good friends out there and not many are left, I'm sorry to say.

Beach, Lloyd and Ellen Ica

Lloyd O. Beach was born in Moulton, Iowa in 1888. On February 26, 1908 he married Ellen Ica King in Udell, Iowa. It was shortly after their marriage that Lloyd went to Wyoming in search of work. The job he got was working for Bill Hamilton at the Green Valley Ranch near Douglas. He was hired as a handy man around the ranch. However, he laughed about that in later years, because he was the real greenhorn of the outfit. He was supposed to be helping on the ranch, but he didn't know anything about ranch life in Wyoming. He was told to go bed the sheep down one night and he wasn't to sure how to do this. He decided finally that he had to go get some straw and scatter it out for the bedding, then get the sheep to lie down. Needless to say, it didn't take the other ranch hands very long to realize that they had a live one on as helper. They sure had a lot of fun with him. They would set him up and get a laugh when he would do something silly.

With this job, he felt he could send for Ellen (known more commonly around Douglas as Ica) to join him. So she joined him in Wyoming. He was still having a hard time on the ranch and wanted to keep his job. He knew Ica was a good cook, so he got her a job at Green Valley Ranch as a cook. They both worked there but decided that it was time to get a place of their own. Lloyd and Ica took up a homestead located southeast of the Green Valley Ranch. They put up a homestead shack, and made a dugout in the bank for their barn. They lived on this homestead to prove it up and also worked at the Green Valley Ranch until about 1912.

Then both of them went back to Centerville, Iowa, Ica Beach's home, where Afton M. Beach was born in 1912. As soon as he could Lloyd returned to the homestead in Wyoming. Six months later Ica and Afton climbed aboard the Burlington train and headed for Douglas. Lloyd met them at the station in Douglas with a team and wagon to take them home.

When Ica returned to the Douglas area she spent some time cooking again, this time for the crew that was working on the LaPrele Dam that was now under construction.

By 1914, Lloyd was in partnership with Adam Schmeidlein on a place west of Douglas, 7 or 8 miles. By this time Lloyd knew a little more about ranching, and he began to collect some sheep and cattle. Adam Schmeidlein was a bachelor. He was from Germany. He spoke German fluently, and English poorly. He and Lloyd worked together there for about a year or maybe a little longer, then they sold that place to Tom Pexton. Kenneth Beach was born on this place in 1916.

When it came time to move from the Pexton place, Ica got very upset and mad over the situation. It would appear that the communication about when to move wasn't too good. Some people showed up one day to move in and Ica wasn't out yet. Afton recalls that day, Ica was so mad, she sat Afton in the front seat of the old Model T, called Ole Betsy, and plunked Kenneth down on Afton's lap, took the pot of beans off the stove and sat them between Afton's feet and drove off down the road for the Powell place. Boy was she mad. They just bounced down that old dirt road with dirt just a flying.

During these years they moved around a lot. From the Powell place they moved to the Elder place right on LaPrele Creek. Here Lloyd had a band of sheep, and put up a lot of hay for various places.

Alice E. Beach was born on the Powell place on May 28, 1920. It was shortly after this that Lloyd Beach lost everything he had to Sara Morton. She foreclosed on him. Then Ica and Lloyd moved to the Ward Brooks' place over by Table Mountain. At this time Lloyd went back into partners with Adam Schmeidlein. Adam knew Lloyd was in hard times and Adam had this place. It was during this time that Lloyd bought about 85 acres on LaPrele Road. He lived here until he sold out in 1960 and moved into Douglas. While he lived on the place on LaPrele Road, he kept buying up land around him. He farmed, raised sugar beets, grain and milked cows. Lloyd always had a matched pair of black Percherons and was always very proud of these beautiful animals. Ica always raised white poultry, chickens and turkeys.

Kenneth died on August 15, 1944 in World War II, Lloyd on August 16, 1962, Ellen on October 13, 1962 and Alice Beach Nunn Murphy on March 5, 1981.

These remembrances were put down by Afton M. Sears, and she used the old family Bible for dates. Afton is the only living child of Lloyd and Ica Beach. She now resides in Bend, Oregon.

Beaulieu, Leon and Gata

Before the turn of the century, Leon Beaulieu came to Converse County from Cacouna, Quebec Province, Canada. He had been born there in 1875, and was in his early teens when he came to Wyoming. He made his home with his mother's sister, Lea LeVasseur Cross, wife of George H. Cross. He worked for his uncle George and for his uncle, Jules LeVasseur. He could not speak or understand the English language. Leon, whose full name was Charles Leon Beaulieu de Hudon, dropped his first name, Charles, and the Hudon title when he took out his naturalization papers.

After he had learned some English, he worked for many of the local ranchers, as well as working on the construction of the LaPrele dam. One day he was helping a blaster on the rock face when the blaster dropped a can of percussion blasting caps. The can fell almost 100 feet, hitting rock between two workers below. Fortunately, the caps did not explode, but the practice of laying charges while men worked below was stopped. Leon believed the dam to be well-built since steel was imbedded in the bedrock on both the sides and the bottom. It was his opinion that the seepage which occurred later on was caused by the fact that cement was not run to bedrock, and in addition, some of the facing cement was mixed with boiling water since the temperature was below freezing at the time which resulted in the cement sloughing off.

Leon took a homestead on Crazy Horse Creek around 1896. Wild horses wintered near his land on a big ridge. He built a one room cabin, a barn, chicken coop and a blacksmith shop all made of logs and located at the foot of Caffee Hill. He bought a new wood-burning stove and some of the chairs from the Douglas Opera House, all of which are still in use. This was the beginning of Leon's ranch.

Some folks called Leon "Trapper Frenchy" but to most he was just "Leon". He trapped in winters, taking any sort of fur bearing animal, but his real ambition was to trap 100 wolves in one single winter. He did average a wolf catch of 75 to 85 animals, but his goal of 100 was never realized. The nearest he came was a total of 99 one winter.

With a team and a slip, Leon built a ditch from Crazy Horse Creek to Buckhorn, from Buckhorn to Rabbit Creek, and from there to Badger Creek, continuing two miles further, for the purpose of irrigating his mountain meadows. He gave the names to Buckhorn and Badger Creeks. He bought land from the county for taxes, and obtained a water right at the completion of his ditch.

Leon had many friends. Western hospitality prevailed, the latch-string was always out. He was a very good cook, setting a fine table with his home raised vegetables and chickens. His cabin welcomed visitors even in his absence. Leon took his dog with him when he went away to work for others, so he trained a cat to act as a guard for his chickens. Everyone knew that until Leon's return, the cat would not allow anyone or anything in the chicken coop. Many persons brought their dogs along with them, and if the dog was polite, the cat would tolerate him; if not, the dog would suddenly develop a love of sleeping out, never approaching the buildings.

Leon had one cat who would give him a grand welcome when he returned home. After greeting him, the cat would disappear only to return with the largest trout she could drag, placing the fish at his feet.

Leon fashioned a hole in the wall of his cabin to serve as a door for his cat so she could come and go as she pleased. He covered the opening with a sack. When someone came while Leon was absent, the cat left the cabin to return only when the visitors had gone. One night at supertime, a roving wolf decided to try to enter the cabin through the cat's door. The wolf thrust its snout inside to sniff but the cat disapproved. One jump and she had her feet braced on either side of the opening, her teeth buried in the nose of the wolf. The snarling and spitting which ensued were deafening! Finally, the wolf pulled loose and lit for the timber, wailing its loss of a cat-sized bite of nose.

After Leon had built a second room on his cabin, another incident occurred. The cat habitually slept on the foot of Leon's bed. This particular night, she must have been unusually sound asleep, for it was the only time Leon could remember when something got into the cabin without the cat being aware of it.

The cat bolted off the foot of Leon's bed and into the kitchen. The intruder was a skunk which the cat killed where she found it - under the stove. Luckily the weather was warm, for cat and man were obliged to live outside for a few weeks!

The first telephone line in the LaPrele community left much to be desired. As with other rural phones, it had the usual persons who listened in and gossiped. If too many receivers were taken down at once, the phone was rendered useless. There were several families who spoke fluent French. They would converse with one another, and the non French speaking persons could not understand the conversations, much to their chagrin. This was called the "French Line." Though Leon did not have a phone himself, he had a French speaking friend who did. Other members of the French Line were unaware that Leon's friend spoke French, and when their secrets about him kept getting back to him, they grew suspicious of each other. Thus, the French Line lost its popularity.

During World War I, Leon hired a fellow to look after his ranch. He joined the infantry. Since he spoke fluent French, he was assigned to the police section as interpreter. During the war, he had the misfortune to be gassed, a disability from which he would suffer the remainder of his life.

After the war, Leon returned to his mountain ranch. He made improvements in his cabin, and built more outbuildings. For a few years, Leon used his horses to haul mail, trying to establish a route into the mountains. He was not compensated for his efforts. The route was finally established, extending from the Beaver School to the Beaulieu Lane. Folks from the Downey Park area and from Cold Springs came to the Beaulieu Lane to pick up their mail. Leon built an 8 × 8 food shed with a stove in it for the convenience of the patrons and the mail carriers. Most of the mail carriers were conscientious, walking or riding the last few miles when the winter was bad. Among these carriers was Myrt Miles, one of the best carriers, and one who held the position for the greatest number of years.

In the beginning, there were many families living in the hills, but their numbers dwindled, especially during the winter time. Finally, Joe Williams and the Beaulieu family were the only persons who stayed during the winter months. Eventually, even Joe Williams left. The Beaulieus felt that the mountain temperatures were more constant than those of the lowlands, there being less fluctuation. The altitude at the Beaulieu ranch was over 7,500'. The winters were noticeably warmer, the summers cooler.

Leon Beaulieu married Gata Angela McCarthy on May 13, 1931 in Casper, Wyoming. Gata was born in Gibbon, Nebraska in 1898, daughter of Daniel Benedict McCarthy and Gata Mary German McCarthy. She was the third in a family of seven children. She received her education in Nebraska, coming to Wyoming to teach school in the Lightning Creek School. Her younger sister, Anastasia, "Stasia," had been teaching but was obliged to resign, thus Gata was hired to finish her sister's term. She made the trip to Wyoming from Thedford, Nebraska in her new Model T roadster. Having come from the Nebraska sandhills, Gata was unprepared for the rocky roads which she encountered on the trip. Though she carried three spare tires, she barely made it into Lusk, Wyoming. She had used practically all her traveling money for tire repair and gas. Arriving there, she found all the filling stations closed, so she continued her journey, hoping that the next small town might provide her with badly needed gasoline. Fortunately, she was able to buy two quarts of gas at a station a short distance from Lusk. She arrived in Douglas, only to run out of gas as she drove up to a filling station owned and operated by Earl Copenhaver, in addition to which she had another tire going flat. He was kind and helpful to Gata, insisting that she must have four new tires on her vehicle. Since she only had 10¢ left, Gata was reluctant to agree, but Mr. Copenhaver said she could repay him at her convenience.

Gata looked up Maude Dawes who validated her teaching permit for the State of Wyoming. Maude gave Gata $2.00 to tide her over. Gata proceeded to her school, and finished Stasia's term, after which she contracted to teach the Hanlin school for the next term at a wage of $90.00 per month. However, a member of the school board hired his own daughter to teach the Hanlin school and Gata was jobless. She found that the teaching position at the Cold Springs school was vacant, and was able to gain that position. She had only one pupil, Earling Dawes, son of Pete and Jean Dawes.

Gata eventually took a stone and timber claim in the Cold Springs vicinity. The Cold Spring was on the northwest corner of her land. The regulations governing claims during those years were as follows: When a claim was filed under the Homestead Act, it could be for as much as 640 acres, 320 acres, or as little as 160 acres. The government retained the minerals on the two larger amounts of land, but on 160 acres the mineral went with the land. A homesteader had a choice of three or five years to prove up. On a five year basis, one had to live on the claim five months out of the year, but on a three year agreement, one must live on the land seven months out of the year. In addition, a person was required to make a certain number of dollar's worth of improvements in the form of cabin, corral, fences, etc. A desert claim could be any number of acres up to 160; a stone and timber claim, 40 acres. Both of these claims could be had with the minerals, but one was required to pay $1.75 per acre in lieu of having to prove up on it. Each adult citizen was allowed one homestead. However, due to a flaw in the law, one could sell his relinquishment before completing proving up, file on another homestead, sell it before proving up, and so on. As long as one did not complete the requirements for proving up, one could file again and again.

Gata was introduced to Leon Beaulieu by the Dawes family in the late 1920's. After their marriage, a group of the local ladies told Gata, "We don't know as we will like you! Now we won't get all of the nice vegetable from Leon's garden."

About 1931, Leon started running 1,500 head of sheep. Except for 35 head of registered ewes, he sold the sheep in 1941.

Leon enjoyed prospecting and mining. He worked in most of the neighborhood mines. He was able to keep a precise and complete log of each mine in his head. None of the mines were worked for a long period of time. Mismanagement, liquor or a combination of both lead to most of the failures of the mines. The equipment was usually divided among the laborers when the mines failed. Most workers also owned shares. Pete Dawes and John Bansept prospected with Leon at times.

Leon's favorite mine was the Copper King on Crazy Horse. The shaft was approximately 25' deep with step-stones on one side. Leon had found the old hole before he homesteaded. Part of the expenses of the Copper King were paid for by "float or drift balls" of practically pure silver which they found during mining. Most were the size of marbles, some were as large as your fist, and one very large or about the size of a man's head was found. It was displayed for a while in a Douglas store window, from which it mysteriously disappeared. Leon felt that the potential of the Copper King was never realized.

Leon's many aged French or French-Indian friends supplied him with much information of the Indians in the area. The creek upon which Leon settled was named Crazy Horse and the story of its namesake is fascinating. There is some controversy as to whether it was named for Whiteman Crazy Horse or for Crazy Horse George. Leon believed that it was Whiteman Crazy Horse. He lived with the Indians who gave him his name. He must have been Caucasian, or half-breed, for the Indians to call him Whiteman. They claimed that Whiteman Crazy Horse would catch a silvertip (grizzly) bear, collect an Indian audience and wrestle the bear to the finish. Indians feared the silvertip and avoided any contact with it. The Indians said that "The cripple had to be like a locoed horse to do such a thing." It is not clear how Crazy Horse was crippled. Indians might refer to any physical or mental impairment as "being crippled." One account told of Crazy Horse being shunned by the tribes and expelled from their camp when Crazy Horse took his own daughter as a wife.

He then must have lived on the creek for a long time, since he built one cabin and then much later, another. Both were built the same and the location of each was identical to the other. Each was centered in a large willow patch, made of logs and about 10' x 10' x 4' high, having a flat roof of logs. The east side had an opening that one could crawl through. The other walls had only a rifle port closed by a wooden plug. Apparently he used a central fire since there was a vent hole in the roof. The shelter was not visible above the willows, being only 4' high, but movement within it certainly must have been curtailed. About 1940, the roof of the second cabin had caved in, but the sides were still solid. Later on, the structure was engulfed in the backwater of a dam which the beavers built.

Intrigued by the tales he heard, Leon was determined to find War Bonnet swamp. Legend had it that the name evolved from an incident which occurred there. It seems that two tribes were embroiled in a long and devastating battle east of the peak. In desperation, a great chief of the tribe which was losing the fight, donned a war bonnet believed to have strong medicine, and charged the enemy. The medicine failed to save the chief. His warriors recovered his body and head gear, keeping the good medicine. It was obvious that if any of the warriors were to survive, they would have to sneak away through the timber one at a time. It would be impossible for them to carry their dead chief through the timber, so they decided to place him and his war bonnet in a swamp which lay at the foot of the peak. It was so boggy that anything which happened to get in it sank quickly out of sight. Having disposed of their chief in this manner, the remaining warriors escaped, and the peak was named Medicine War Bonnet. Years later, Leon was convinced that he had found the swamp, which during the years had dried up, so that he could never be absolutely certain.

This area was the Indian's Medicine Rivers. Two of the creeks are the River of the Medicine Bow Willow and the River of Medicine Grass. Before the original French name was shortened to LaPrele, it was interpreted as "joint grass" which is a medicinal herb. Leon considered Moss Agate to be an Indian Medicine mountain and that Chimney Rock was used to carry medicine smoke to the heavens. When Leon first saw Chimney Rock, it was a perfect chimney, accessible through a small hole in one side. Inside, it was blackened by the smoke of many fires.

Leon's large garden was his joy. After a hard day's work, he would tend his garden for relaxation-sometimes by moonlight. He raised all sorts of vegetables, but always had a row of pansies about 2' x 30' on one side of the garden. They self-seeded and were covered with blossoms during the summertime. He also raised roses in half barrels in the house, resting them during the summer and bringing them to bloom in the winter.

Leon never ceased to marvel at the advancements made during his lifetime, but not all progress is a pleasure. He often spoke so admiringly of the square-riggers, three masters and schooners that one knew he had given up a dream of being a sailor. He told of the two whaling trips he went on when he was very young. It was fifty-five years before he made a trip back to Canada. The only sailing ship he could find was rotting aground near Cacouna. The romance of the sea no longer intrigued him, and he ceased to speak of his love of it.

Leon's wife, Gata, had always been fleet of foot, winning all the women's foot races held at the local picnics. She was banned from the women's races after a time, and competed in the men's races. Much to the men's chagrin, she lost very few of those.

Gata Leone was born in Douglas on July 8, 1932. When Leone was four years old, the family went to Douglas to shop. The girl wanted to see a train and it happened that she and her mother were about half a block from the tracks when they heard a train coming. Gata told her daughter to watch, for she was going to see a train! It was a "through" freight going through town, wide open. That big, black iron-horse burst from behind a building with a squall that could peel the hair off a Texas steer's backbone! Terrified, the small girl raced up the center of the street with her mother in hot pursuit. Gata must have been a bit out of trim that day, for the child made three blocks before her mother caught her.

On another occasion, the Beaulieus were in Douglas with both their pickup and their truck, the reason being that Leon had to stay late for a meeting. Leone and her mother were to drive the truck home. The year was 1935, and the place - the bridge across Blue Nose Creek. On the sharp hill south of the bridge, Gata missed her gears and before she could stop the truck, it rolled backward onto the bridge, which had no railing. The wheels on the passenger side were hanging over the edge - a fifteen foot drop to the creek below. Gata tossed her daughter out of the window on the driver's side and told her to run up the road. The drivetrain of the truck ground and chewed on the plank ends of the bridge as it slid sideways. It finally stopped and teetered side to side, with nothing touching the wheels. When it quieted down, Gata sprang out the window, almost sending the truck over the edge. The two walked on home, and returned with the team and wagon in which they had loaded necessary tools and gear. The truck was still teeter-tottering in the rising wind which threatened to push it on into the creek. Leon came along, twisted poles in chains and with a jack, drug the truck back onto the bridge. The damage to the truck was minor, but the planks of the bridge would forever carry the marks of the near disaster.

Leon Beaulieu died in November of 1956 at his ranch home in the mountains. Leon and Gata were snowed in, all alone. After Leon's death, Gata walked out to get the coroner, who was obliged to use a snow "weasel" to get up to the ranch. Gata spends winters at the home of her daughter, Leone Beaulieu Olds and her son-in-law, Ralph M. Olds in Douglas. Gata has sold all of her land except 90 acres where her buildings stand. She returns in the summertime to live in her beloved mountain.

Leone and Ralph were married in 1950. They own and operate a scrap yard in Douglas. For many years they were engaged in the trucking business as well.

Beaver Family

The Beaver family can trace its ancestors back to the 1500s. At that time the family spelled its name Bieber. They were living in the Alsace area of Germany and France when the majority of the family emigrated to the United States between 1730 and 1770.

The family gradually migrated throughout the country with one branch settling in Lincoln, Illinois and later moving to Tekamah, Nebraska in 1898. It was in Illinois that the story of George and Elizabeth Beaver began.

George married Elizabeth Fulcher, a native of Illinois. They became the parents of nine boys. The first four were born in Lincoln, Illinois. They were: Ernest V. (born April 3, 1893), George Raymond (born July 3, 1894), Charles C. (born November 30, 1895) and William L. "Bill" (born October 26, 1897). The last five were born in Tekamah, Nebraska. They were: Lorella Irette (born September 17, 1899), Ralph O. (born October 6, 1901), Richard B. (born February 1, 1903), Harold B. (born March 20, 1905) and Arthur R. "Johnny" (born September 23, 1907).

George and his sons all farmed near Tekamah. The desire for land of their own brought several of the sons to Wyoming to seek homesteads.

The first members of the family to arrive in Wyoming were Ernest and Raymond who, with their good friend, Miles Larkin, came in 1919. They traveled west in a Model T Ford truck which was jointly owned by the five older Beaver boys. They brought tents and other necessary camping equipment with them. Homesteads were selected in the Walker Creek area near Piney Creek.

Charles, William and Irette came shortly thereafter and also homesteaded in the same area with all six homesteads being on adjacent sections in Township 35, Range 68.

At first the six men lived together in the cabin they had built on Bill's homestead until they could build the other five cabins. The cabins were made of logs from the nearby timber. They helped each other and jointly purchased needed supplies and equipment.

In 1920 Charles returned to Tekamah where he married Helen Lester on August 14. He brought his bride back to the homestead where they resided until it was proved up. Charles and Helen moved back to Tekamah in the fall of 1921. The homestead was sold to his father, George, in April 1922.

Irette moved to California in 1924. He married Eileen Sullivan in the late 1920s. They presently live in Glendale, but Irette still owns his homestead.

Ernest married Frances C. Keller in Douglas on April 25, 1924. Frances was the daughter of James A. and Anna Keller of Council Bluffs, Iowa where she was born May 3, 1893. Frances attended school in Council Bluffs and took courses at Bellvue College in Nebraska and at Colorado Teacher's College in Greeley. She had taught school in Iowa before coming to Wyoming with her sister, Helen, to homestead. Frances was teaching at the Whiting School at the time of their marriage.

George, the father, came out and bought the Peter Lewandowski homestead in October 1924. He remained but a short time and returned to Nebraska.

William married Lucille Anderson, daughter of Charles and Charlotte Anderson, on November 6, 1924. Their first child, Kenneth was born on September 13, 1925.

Ernest, Raymond and Bill bought a threshing machine and every fall they would thresh grain for themselves and for the neighbors. Most of the grain grown was wheat and oats and some barley. Usually the threshing was done on a share basis with payment being made in grain.

Their younger brother, Richard, also came out for a short time. He helped during harvest time by driving the threshing machine engine. While here he courted and married Flora McCartney, daughter of G. H. and Lulu McCartney, on October 10, 1925. They returned to Tekamah to farm one of the Beaver places.

When the Converse County Farm Bureau was organized in 1926, Ernest was elected vice president. He was also instrumental in starting the Douglas Co-Op and was its first president and manager. Frances was also employed by the co-op as bookkeeper. Ernest and Frances left Douglas in the late 1930s. He sold his homestead in November 1941 to Tom Robinson, Sr. Ernest was employed in Laramie and Casper prior to buying a store and locker plant in Banner, Wyoming with his brother and sister-in-law, Johnny and Dorothy Beaver. When the store was sold, Ernest was employed by the Bureau of Indian Affairs on the Flathead Indian Reservation in Dixon, Montana until his retirement in the late 1950s. At that time they returned to Douglas where Ernest worked as secretary for the Douglas Chamber of Commerce.

Ernest then retired for a second time and he and Frances moved to McAllen, Texas where Frances died June 19, 1983 and Ernest on March 8, 1985.

Ernest was known for his dry sense of humor. He could tell the funniest story so seriously and never crack a smile. The listener(s) would be in stitches.

Bill and Lucille moved to Omaha, Nebraska about 1927. There two daughters were born: Merna on January 20, 1929 and Mildred on September 13, 1931. They returned to Douglas about 1933 and Elizabeth "Beth" was born January 13, 1935. Bill sold his homestead to Walt Dickau in April 1946. He worked at various jobs in Douglas until he retired from the Converse County Memorial Hospital. He died on May 9, 1983. Lucille still resides in Douglas.

Their son, Kenneth, served in Europe during World War II. He later earned a degree as a petroleum engineer and went to work for Amoco Oil Company in Midwest. There he met Janice Mahler whom he married on July 22, 1954. They moved to Denver in 1965 and in 1973 Amoco transferred him to Egypt and later to Iran. They returned to Houston, Texas before he was assigned to London. Kenneth retired in 1984. He and Janice have two children, a boy and a girl.

Merna married Wayne Blackman in September 1948. (He was born April 24, 1927 in Douglas, the son of James A. and Pearle Blackman; he died near Gillette on December 5, 1965.) They had three sons and a daughter. In 1967 Merna married Barney McKillip and now resides in Batesville, Arkansas. Mildred married Earl Shatto, Jr. in November 1950. Beth married Stanley Lundberg on April 9, 1955.

Raymond married Juanita Hageman, daughter of Henry and Freda Hageman, on December 22, 1926. Juanita taught school before she was married, first at the Flattop School and then at the Willow Creek School where she taught Helen and Harold Hublein, Lois Anderson and Edith Thatcher. After her marriage she taught at the Willow Creek School again.

The couple set up housekeeping in Raymond's one room homestead cabin which was divided with a curtain to provide a bedroom. Three children were born to them: George Raymond, Jr. on November 22, 1929, Donald Roy on March 21, 1933 and Ramona Elaine on January 5, 1937.

With the increase in family, an additional room was built onto the cabin and a cellar was dug underneath.

Raymond expanded his farm and ranch operation with the purchase from his father, George, in June 1950 of the Lewandowski and Charles Beaver homesteads. He also purchased the Roy Wampler and Jewett lands.

George Beaver died in Tekamah on Thanksgiving Day 1951.

Raymond and Juanita lived on the homestead until 1960 when they moved to Glenrock to live in an apartment owned by their son, George. Raymond died in Blair, Nebraska on October 13, 1961 while he and Juanita were visiting his brothers. Juanita presently lives in Irwin Towers in Douglas.

Benham, George E. and Lottie V.

George Ephriam Benham was born in Cedar Falls, Iowa on April 25, 1870. When he was 14 years of age, he along with his parents moved to Chadron, Nebraska. During the Indian uprising of 1891-1892, he served as a message bearer for the army.

George married Lottie Vera Wells on Feb. 23, 1883 in Chadron. She was born in Iowa on March 15, 1878.

After their marriage, they lived in Chadron. It was in Chadron that nine of their ten children were born. They are: Faye Luella, Lola Beatrice, Mayme, Charles Richard, George Jr., Mabel Gertrude, Maude Catherine, James Henry, and Esther Marie. In April of 1917, they sold their property in Chadron and moved to Douglas.

George worked for the county for some time on the road and bridge crew. The county had a White truck with steel wheels and a large grader that he used to build the cut off road that starts about five miles east of Douglas and ends close to Shawnee. He also built the old bridge at the Platte Valley Ranch across the North Platte River. They drove piling in the wintertime and used a big gray team on the pile driver. He also built several of the roads around Converse County and the older wooden bridge across La Prele Creek. In later years he built many of the sidewalks that are in Douglas today. He had a big cement mixer that straddled the sidewalk and fed gravel from a wagon alongside the mixer as it was pulled along. The wagon also had a big tank for water and another tank for cement. They poured about one city block a day.

Dick Emery had a ranch on the Cheyenne River with lots of cattle. In 1921, he ran out of hay so he hired Bob Randall who had four big four-wheel-drive trucks with hard rubber tires to haul hay. He also hired John Hartman to haul with wagons and horses. The horses pulled the trucks out of the mud and snow when they got stuck. It took them five days to get to the ranch.

One daughter, Betty Lou, was born in Douglas. She later married Avon "Bud" Pickinpaugh.

Having been a Deputy Sheriff of Dawes County, Nebraska under Sheriff Vet Canfield for five years, George was appointed Acting Sheriff of Converse County when one of the sheriffs died. Lottie Benham spent many years as a midwife and practical nurse, working under Doctors Hylton, Storey and Shaffer. She was well respected as a nurse.

George and Lottie also owned a restaurant on Center Street at one time.

George died on June 10, 1948. Lottie died on Sept. 16, 1962.

Benway, Floyd E. and Hazel

In the year 1915 I, Floyd E. Benway, spent my first summer and fall in the State of Wyoming working for Vernon Griffith, a sheepman, on his winter's range headquarters ranch, 50 miles east of Sheridan, Wyoming, and 20 miles north of Clearmont, Wyoming. I came from Union Township, Rock County, Wisconsin, a very rich farming section of southern Wisconsin, where I was born and raised. I was a few months past my 19th birthday when I left Wisconsin in March, for Montana, and due to not being able to find work, as I had hoped to do, I was soon running short of funds. Like many more were doing the spring of 1915, I threw away my suitcase and took to touring by freight train, and I came into Wyoming aboard a long freight train from Billings, Montana, destination Sheridan, Wyoming. After about two weeks in Sheridan, I hired out to Vernon Griffith, a sheep man, to help in shearing and trailing a 95 mile trail into the Big Horn Mountains to his summer's range. My work was to end at the end of the trail, but it turned into an all summers job, and as long as I cared to stay in the fall, before returning to Wisconsin.

It was the wonderful outdoor life and freedom that I found in Wyoming that year of 1915 that brought me back to Wyoming and to Douglas. My father coming out with me the first of September 1916 and to eventually file on 320 acres in the Wagonhound District on Magpie Creek, including Magpie Springs in October 1916 making me a resident of that community. We put in a number of years there building up a small ranch, and running sheep. The homestead that I took had been filed on some years past, by a man then living in Kansas City, who had never done anything with it, and was about to lose it. Wade Fowler, then head of the United States Land Office in Douglas, obtained a relinquishment back to the government from him. I then filed on it.

The man in Kansas City at the time he filed on the claim was promoting a scheme whereby he asked the government to withdraw two or three thousand acres of the open land adjoining his claim from homesteading rights for the purpose of establishing a boys home or orphans home. His request was granted by the United States Land Office, setting a time limit for starting the project, which he did not meet. It was again open for homesteading in March, 1917, when I took my additional 320 acres. My father who had returned to Wisconsin soon after I had made my filing in October returned to Wyoming and filed on 320 acres on Magpie Creek adjoining my land on the east. This 320 acres later became the Walter Jeffres homestead. Because my father was 63 years old and I couldn't leave him alone, and I being subject to be drafted into the army at any time, we didn't know that he could have held it, even if he were back in Wisconsin, as long as he was doing some work on farms back there, so he relinquished it back to the government and Walter Jeffres took it.

All of the land that had been reopened to homesteading in March of 1917 was all taken the day it was opened. This just about finished up all the open land from Muddy Wagonhound, north to Schofield Pass through Sheep Mountain. Naming those who took their homesteads the fall of 1916 or the spring of 1917 a little before or a little after starting from Schofield Pass were John Snooks, Joe Johnson, Henry Yanda, Frank Stauffer, Tony Steiber, James Stults, Pete Zaichkin, Constantine Zaichkin, Walter Whitaker, Mike Kinney, Clifford Peterson, William Levi, Slivers Jeffres, Perry Cargill, Robert Benway, William Magee, Floyd Benway, Charley Thompson. Up on top and adjoining the Thompson claim were Albert Urban, and Mrs. Dickerson and sister and David Friend whose homestead went nearly to Wagonhound Falls. Charley Morse was settled before any of us took only 160 acres. He said, "That was all he wanted." He finally did take some more. John Yanda also took 480 acres some time later.

Tom Wilkinson a sheepman who lived in Nebraska had for some time been using all this open range for his winter grazing range and summering up on 40 Mile. He leased the O.P. Witt place, later the Rainbow Outfit. There was no house there at that time for headquarters, but he never returned after he left in the spring of 1917. I tended camp and took care of things for him the winter of 1916 and 1917 up until the first of March, hauled corn and supplies from Douglas. He came up from Nebraska every two or three weeks.

I hadn't become acquainted with any of the homesteaders except James Stults, Frank Stauffer and Charley Morse also Charley Thompson until I came back from serving nine months in the marines, being discharged the 19th of January 1919. I enlisted in May 1918 for the duration of the war.

James Stults and Frank Stauffer drove a pair of burros broke to drive belonging to James. He also owned a small saddle broke mustang that Frank rode and James rode and drove the burros hitched to a light spring wagon from Burns, Wyoming where James had been working, coming there from LaCrosse Wisconsin, wanting to take a homestead. He and Frank Stauffer, who came from Illinois, became acquainted at Burns. They both took homesteads close together, near the Zaichkins, about five miles northeast of my land. James Stults and I worked our homestead improvements together some before and after I returned from the service. His sister Hazel came out to visit him in April 1919, sending him a telegram that she would arrive on a certain date. He did not receive the telegram until he made a trip to town. He borrowed my team and wagon to make the trip to town for supplies and stock salt, Mrs. Wait part owner of the Rainbow Ranch going with him. I stayed at his dugout cabin. He found his sister at the LaBonte Hotel.

The next morning it was storming and against the advice of those who knew what an April storm could turn into, the three of them started for home. It turned into a real bad storm, and I never expected them to try and come back on such a day. There was about three feet of snow piled in front of the dugout and just about dark they came driving in, the horses tired out, they all were wet and cold had thrown out the stock salt and had been walking. I took his sister, Hazel, off the wagon, and carried her into the dugout, and it just so happened that Hazel went back to San Francisco that fall, and returned the following summer. Hazel became my wife and James Stults became my brother-in-law.

We first lived in the Brooks house, later become the Adam Mueller Ranch, west of Douglas, where I rode ditch. The summer of 1920 we moved to the LaPrele Dam, into a house not there any more by the powerhouse. I rode the west side ditch summers and took care of the dam and diversion dams. Also we took care of the Ayres Natural Bridge Park until the fall of 1922 when we returned to my homestead. Then the real proving up on a homestead began for us, but one thing I did have this time was a good partner, and plenty of good work horses. With some old machinery I traded for, we made out and after the bank closing on a little money I borrowed at 6% we had to wait a year until, we could borrow it back at 8%, we bought a little start in sheep. Like everyone else who homesteaded at that time, or came before us, that stayed and tried to make a go of it, starting on, as you might "say, on a shoe string," we had our ups and downs, our good years, and our bad years, our grasshopper years. We had cold winters with their snow, wind, and blizzards, but always the meadowlarks came back and the grass became green. The mariposa lilies and shooting stars blossomed, and there were always those wonderful sunsets and sunrises, the pure air to breath, and pure water to drink.

We had our neighbors, far and near, and dances, some of them lasted until the sun came up. I remember the old Douglas as it was in 1916 and for some time after, with its livery barn, two busy depots, the same people, the same stores, and those state fairs, when every day was climaxed by the wild horse race, the broncs being driven in from the north country. There was one jerkline string team with these two large wagons, and schooner freighting out into the north country. We often talk about our Wyoming years, and I place my Wyoming years, at the top of the list.

We had our grasshoppers, and once when I was in town with my old battered up Model T pickup, with its chewed up fenders, Jeff Scott, who once owned a ranch on main Wagonhound, wanted to know if the grasshoppers chewed them up. Another time, it was one of those drought years, when some were putting up Russian thistles, for hay and many were looking forward to loading their livestock into boxcars, and shipping out of the country. Jeff Scott came by just as I was leaving for home. He said "How is everything going Floyd?" I said, "Oh just fine and dandy." He said "Floyd, I think you are a 'dam liar'". Well I wasn't quite that much of a liar, my sheep were in the mountains and doing fine. I had my plans for the winter all attended to.

We had a few very bad storms late in the spring of 1917. It was some time after I had brought my team and saddle horse back from Guy George where I had wintered them, and I was going some place with my team, saddle horse and wagon. I always had my bedroll, grub box and grain for the horses and had camped at Bill Levi's cabin for the night. The cabin wasn't finished yet, and only part of the floor was in. There was an old range cooking stove set up there, but very little wood. Some of the cracks in the siding let in the daylight. I fed all the horses and turned them all loose. They were a good camp team, and I knew they wouldn't go farther than Muddy Wagonhound, but that night it started to snow, and then blow. There were drifts outside and inside. I couldn't build a fire and keep it going, as there wasn't much wood, so I just stayed in bed for three days and nights, only getting up and starting a fire for a few minutes, to cook a hot cake or so, and then back to bed. My black saddle horse came from somewhere each night and would back up and rub against the cabin. I would jump up take the gallon can, fill it out of the oat sack, and dump it outside in the snow. The bedroll of mine had a feather tick in it and with wool blankets, so I just took a good rest.

The very bad blizzard of April 1920, caught me in Denver. I was working at a dairy there, and had just quit to come back to Douglas and to my homestead. I had bought a new team and saddle horse and outfit the spring of 1919 and was wintering them at Clarence Redenbaugh's. I was nine days getting back to Douglas, two nights and days of that I had to stay in Cheyenne, as the cuts through by Chugwater hadn't been opened yet. When I did get home and went after my horses, I caught the saddle horse on foot out on the range. He fell down three times when I was trying to catch him. The team wintered very well, but some grain and that Wyoming grass put them all in fine shape in a very short time.

James Stults and I both broke up some land for planting that spring. After working at his place a while we moved up to mine and James was always proud of his packing, so he showed me how neat and compact the load was for moving. I had a very nice pair of leather shoes, and he showed me how he packed them and a lot of other things in the oven of the little cook stove. When we arrived at my place we set up the stove right quick, and James built-up a quick pitch pine fire and started to cook dinner. I took care of the horses. Well, he hadn't thought of anything but to get us something to eat, until the smoke started rolling out of the oven. Everything he had packed in the oven was just about ruined. Those shoes of mine were sure plenty done. He said, "Look what I did." Then he told me it isn't any laughing matter.

Frank Stauffer taught school in the Zaichkin and Snook district a couple of years, while proving up on his homestead. He became a lieutenant in World War I and married a school teacher. They had two children, a boy and a girl. They came to see us several times. The boy died in World War II and the girl a little later. He was in business for himself in Texas and died there sometime ago. Over all these years we have heard from his wife, until this year we received word she had died also.

Each year takes its toll, but I hope that as long as I live, I can keep in memory that same old Wyoming, the same Douglas, and those same fine people I dealt with, and many of those of 1886 and before that I knew still walking the streets, our homestead neighbors and friends, and all those of main Wagonhound, the mail route I had for three and one half years, with the 32 gates to open and close, those wonderful pies that Mrs. Milt Hammond made, and gave me a piece of, and the fine dinners that Clarence Redenbaugh and wife insisted I come in and eat. All that and more in my memory, it is just the same, and still there. And the wind it must have been much harder than it is now, because after a day when the wind was passing our place in an awful hurry, headed for the flats, one of my neighbors who lived about four miles below me, came up the next day and wanted to know if the wind blew much there yesterday. I told him "no" but it sure was going past plenty fast. I figured it might be blowing real hard down this way. He said "It sure did, you know Floyd, it blew so hard down at my place yesterday that it picked a log chain right up off the ground, blew it up against the side of the barn and held it up there all day." Well I knew that at the rate of speed that wind was hitting when it passed our place with four miles of the flats to help it gather momentum that he was telling the absolute truth.

James Stults received his schooling through grade school, high school, and business college at LaCrosse, Wisconsin and he built his homestead up into a very nice little place and raised turkeys for a while. He also had a small herd of cows. His brother, Dean, an army career man, bought the Frank Stauffer homestead and then bought out James, and then James and his wife and daughter, Beverly, moved to Douglas. His wife whose maiden name was Gladys Doss, came from Colorado where her father owned a large ranch. Both she and James worked for the Great Western Sugar Beet Company, where they met and were married in 1921. They had one daughter, Shirley, who was killed in an auto accident. In 1930 he was elected to the office of Converse County Assessor and died while in office.

We sold our sheep, cattle and equipment the fall of 1937 and leased our land. In 1949 we sold our place. The war and circumstances also my age prevented me from returning to Wyoming ranch life again, but the memory of those years I spent, and my wife and I spent in Wyoming brings me much joy and it is said, "He lives again who finds joy in past memories."

Floyd E. Benway died in 1985.

Bible, Ralph and Grace

I am Juanita (Bible) Louderman, daughter of Ralph and Grace (White) Bible who homesteaded in Converse County, Wyoming in 1917. Pat. #911803 - 320 acres.

My father, mother and I lived there for approximately 6-7 years. I have pictures of them building their own log house and living in it. My sister, Betty Joe, was born at the home of a great-aunt in Chadron, Nebraska on August 7, 1922. About a year later, my mother developed tuberculosis of the lungs, and spent part of a year in a sanatorium in La Jolla, Colorado. My father worked in the oilfields in Salt Lake City to keep her there. During this time my sister and I lived with an Uncle Otto E. Bible and his wife, Pearl, at Lost Springs, Wyoming.

Then we all went to Macomb, Illinois to live with our grandparents, Harry and Effie Bible. My mother died there on December 8, 1925. Less than a year later my father was killed in a car wreck, by a hit and run driver.

My sister and I continued to live with our grandparents and with other relatives until we were able to make our own way. With me, this started at age 17. Even though times were hard, I always managed to have a job doing cleaning, taking care of other children, etc. Then I met a lady who owned a flower shop and I worked in the flower shop for her. She was a wonderful and kind person. I was married on my 21st birthday, July 22, 1937, to Roy Louderman from Macomb, Illinois (but previously from Kansas). We lived 44 years in Illinois and have three children, all born in Macomb, Illinois.

Connie Joan married Lyle Hoener of Ft. Scott, Kansas and have four children. Gary Lee Louderman of Henderson, Nebraska, who has one son. Kenny Joe Louderman of Bartlett, Illinois.

My sister, Betty Joe first married Lester Riddell of Macomb, Illinois. They had a daughter and a son, Anita Kay (Riddell) Hill of Macomb, Illinois and Dennis Riddell of Denton, Texas.

My sister and I sold the homestead in Converse County but retained the oil rights. The first oil well was drilled in 1975 and then in 1976 another was drilled partially on our property.

My mother was a good horsewoman and helped my father with the cattle, raised lambs, chickens, etc.

I attended my first years of school on the homestead riding my pony five miles, meeting the school teacher part of the way. She also rode horseback and stayed with one of our nearby neighbors.

My father and his brother, Otto E. Bible, both homesteaded the same year and had adjoining properties and helped each other. Otto's homestead went to his wife, Pearl, when they were divorced around 1929. A year later she was killed in a car wreck and the property then went to her family in Nebraska.

Then Otto married Mabel Kamp of Lost Springs, where they lived on a ranch for many years. She lives now at Torrington, Wyoming. He raised a lot of cattle and bought for Swift & Co. for many years. He acquired a lot of land and oil rights in trading in Converse and Niobrara Counties. He also leased thousands of acres. He later moved to Lusk, Wyoming, was divorced and re-married to Evannah Bible. He passed away in 1967. Evannah moved to Mesa, Arizona and died there in 1981.

Otto never had any children of his own but was very dear to my sister and me. We spent a year with him in Lost Springs in 1929 and visited there for many years afterwards.

Bicknell, Elva Myrtle

My mother, Elva Myrtle Bicknell was born in Minnesota on Jan. 18, 1876.

In 1918, mother and I (Colista Bicknell Combs Clements) came from North Dakota to file on a homestead one mile south of where the Bill Post Office is located now. The eastern portion bordered the road to Gillette.

Dry Creek was south of the homestead on someone else's land. It was the source of our water supply being carried in a tin bucket by me. The water was also used for cattle and sheep which belonged to the Fiddleback Ranch.

A land office in Douglas had "locaters" who for a fee helped people find the land to be homesteaded. The system left a lot to be desired.

Our shack was a small room with tar paper on the outside and a small window to look out and a door. The sagebrush at that time had large roots on the surface of the ground which along with cowchips furnished the fuel in the summer.

As this was years before the so called liberation of women, men did not take kindly to a woman "taking up land". Mother was told she didn't have any business on a homestead. Before "proving up" Mother had been protested and contested. It was a costly and troublesome time. The fact that she supported herself and a child and tried to have the legal improvements on the land was difficult.

"Dudleyville" was a store in a home about four miles northeast. As there was no refrigeration, the only staples available were the basic ones including slab bacon not sliced bacon as it is now. A telephone was also available at the store.

In 1918 the Gillette Road was just a wagon track. There weren't any bridges across the creeks including Dry Creek. If one car a day went up the road it was an event. Many days there was no traffic at all.

Children often came to town and worked for board and room during the school year. School was held in the two rooms upstairs in the City Hall, the basement of the Congregational Church, the Carnegie Library basement and the old North Grade School.

In July 1926 I married Eugene Combs.

Mother died Jan. 23, 1960 in Douglas.

Bishop, Loren Clark and Sadie

Loren Clark Bishop, son of Spencer Adelbert and Edith Luella Bishop, was born on the homestead on LaPrele Creek near old Fort Fetterman, Wyoming Territory, March 4th, 1885. He attended the public schools of Converse County, Wyoming, until the age of 14. He left school before finishing the eighth grade to earn a livelihood and help support the family at home. He worked on cattle and sheep ranches. During the winter of 1904 -1905 he herded sheep on the Laramie plains for O. P. Witt. Both Albert and Chester Sims were working for Mr. Witt at that time.

He also owned and operated a restaurant before his 21st year. An excerpt from Clark's memoirs tells about his experience as a restaurant owner: "During the summer of 1905, with money saved from pulling dead wool and from herding bucks, I purchased the Saddle Rock Restaurant from Louis Falkenburg located between the Happy Jack Saloon and Harvey Allen livery barn in Douglas. Falkenburg was killed by Indians in a battle on Lightning Creek the next year. I did well at this business for about three months when I was stricken with typhoid fever. The day I entered the Douglas hospital I sold the restaurant to a fellow by the name of Cooper and accepted an unsecured note in payment. After ten weeks of sickness, I found that Cooper had sold out and skipped and I never heard of him again. In addition to beating me out of the money for the restaurant, he stole my Forty Five Colt revolver and my best suit of clothing from my room."

In 1906 he secured employment in a surveying party with Frank C. Emerson which was working on the surveys on the LaPrele Irrigation System. Later he worked with the same engineer on the surveys of the Paint Rock and Shell Creek projects in the Big Horn Basin in the north central part of Wyoming.

In the year 1908 he returned to Douglas and started in the general practice of surveying, having secured a surveyor's license, and in 1910 was employed as Chief Engineer of the LaPrele Irrigation System, which position he held during the time the principal part of the ditches and structures were built. The system went into the hands of a Receiver in 1912 and was operated in such a lax manner that after seven years when taken over by the Douglas Reservoirs Company, it became necessary to practically reconstruct the entire system. He was employed by this company April 1st, 1919 as engineer and manager to do this work and supervise the operation of the project. The lands, having been taken under the Carey Act, made it necessary that the project be accepted by the Interior Department before patent could be issued to the state and then to the settlers.

After much work in preparing maps, petitions, etc., in addition to expending over $100,000.00 on the reconstruction work, and making two trips to the National Capitol, the project was officially accepted the spring of 1922 at that time he was employed by the company to look after their interests.

On April 10, 1911 he was united in marriage to Sadie Almeda Greenwood, daughter of Charles S. and Sarah Cook Greenwood, who was born in Lime Springs, Iowa on April 26, 1877, and spent her girlhood days in Colorado.

Loren and Sadie had four children. They were: Loren Emerson, born December 15, 1911 and married Eleanor Corbett; Clara Almeda, born March 6, 1917 and married James Froggatt; Floyd Albert, born August 10, 1920 and married Wilma Knisely; Ella Mary, born July 15, 1922 and married Edward Halsey.

His military service extended over a period of 14 years in addition to his service in the World War. He served as an enlisted man with rank from private to sergeant continuously for nine years, all as a member of Co. "F" 3rd. Reg. Wyo. Inf., and five years continuously as captain of the same company. He commanded this company on the Mexican Border 1916 and 1917. During the World War he was commissioned as First Lieutenant of Engineers U.S.A. September 21, 1918 and sent to Camp A. A. Humphreys, Virginia, for training where he was discharged December 2, 1918 at the termination of the war.

With a new governor assuming office in January, 1938, the water users throughout Wyoming mounted a campaign to convince the governor that he should appoint Clark as State Engineer. Between November 1937 and January 1938, hundred of letters of endorsement were written to the new governor, and endorsements from county political chairmen were submitted from two-thirds of the counties in the state. Although there were other applicants for the job, the governor announced Clark's appointment as State Engineer in late January of 1938. He served in that capacity for the next 18 years under governors of both political parties and established a reputation as a capable engineer and administrator.

Loren recalls the following incidents that happened to his father: "In 1919, after World War I, Dad was a participant in the National Rifle matches in Caldwell, N.J. Each participant was issued a chit good for one case of 30-06 and one case of caliber 45 ammunition. From other participants Dad bought these chits for $2 each which netted him a "box car" load of ammunition - it lasted over 30 years and took up a lot of room in our basement but made it possible for him to pursue his hobby even during the depression.

As water superintendent, on occasion he had to shut down headgates and stop ranchers from using water they wanted and needed. One occasion when I was with him at Pass Creek near Saratoga, a rancher threatened to shoot the local water commissioner so Dad was called to turn the water off. As we drove up to the ranch we saw a big hawk swoop near his chickens. Dad grabbed the 30-06 and killed the hawk high in the air with his first shot. After that exhibition, the headgate was closed with no trouble. Another incident was on the Laramie River when a rancher locked his headgate open with a big padlock and dared anyone to close it. Dad arrived on the scene, broke the padlock with one round from his 30-06 and closed the gate, later learning that the rancher was hiding in the brush with a 30-30 which he had planned to use on Dad."

Clara remembers the following things about her mother: "Loren was first to go to college and when he wrote home asking permission to join a fraternity, he mentioned how good the food was at the frat house. I remember the parents conversation when my sweetly naive mother said 'If the food is good, he'd better join.' They made many sacrifices to give us as much education as we cared to get.

Our mother's era was a time squeezed between the pioneer women and the liberated women. She wore her hair in a modish coiffure using a "switch" to make it bouffant. On several occasions I remember mother's conversations over the fence with our neighbor of many years, Agnes Rohlf. Agnes had long, dark hair which she braided and wound around her head in an attractive crown effect. They both wanted to cut their hair short which was then on vogue, but there would be serious consequences - divorce was mentioned - their husbands wouldn't even discuss it. This was in the late 20's. The haircuts finally came in the early 30's with no divorces. This was the beginning of their liberation."

Clark's wife, Sadie, died in 1942. He married Claire Tanner in 1943. Clark died in San Diego, California in 1961, and his second wife, Claire, died in Worland in 1973.

Bishop, Spencer and Edith Family

In the year 1852, Spencer Adelbert Bishop was born to Artemus Clark Bishop and Matilda Hanchett Bishop. When Spencer was four years old, the family moved from his birthplace in Ohio to LaFayette, New York. He received his education in the public schools and taught for one term on West Hill near LaFayette. After that, he served as a carpenter's apprentice for four years.

At the age of 22, Spencer came to Wyoming and worked in a grocery store in Laramie for several months. In the spring of 1875, he worked as a bullwhacker for George Powell. In addition to this job, he acted as ranch foreman and overseer of the government hay reserve on Deer Creek. Under contract, the hay was delivered to the authorities at Fort Fetterman. The teamsters were instructed to load sand in the hay to gain additional weight, and additional profit. This practice was abandoned when tell-tale sand hills were obvious after some of the hay had been fed. Arrangements were made then with someone in authority to allow the same load of hay to be weighed twice, or sometimes three times. The hay contractors undoubtedly padded the pockets of those persons authorizing and supervising the weighing of the hay.

At that time, the nearest railroad point enroute to Fetterman was Rock Creek, a distance of 120 miles from the fort. Rock Creek was located on the Union Pacific Railroad. All food commodities were expensive. The bullwhackers bought foodstuffs in Rock Creek, as well as other places and transported them to Fetterman. Bacon or side pork of very poor quality brought $1.00 per pound; flour was selling at 50¢ per pound.

After working for a time for George Powell, Spencer bought an outfit of his own and freighted for the government as well as other private and business concerns.

In the year of 1882, prior to the public land survey in the vicinity of Fort Fetterman, Spencer secured a squatter's right from a squaw man, Noel Seminoe, who had settled on LaPrele Creek about eight miles from the Fort, then Albany County, Wyoming Territory. This gave him a prior right of entry. When the surveys were finished, he filed a homestead claim, a desert claim and a pre-emption entry on 480 acres. The initial land acquired from Seminoe cost Spencer $75.

He entered into a partnership with Henry W. Kellogg who had filed on adjoining land, and together they developed a fine ranch. Kellogg and Bishop formed a freighting outfit together as well. They had two bull wagons and eight yokes of oxen. They freighted from Cheyenne, Fort Laramie, Rock Creek and Medicine Bow to Fort Fetterman.

Among Spencer's acquaintances were Wild Bill Hickock, Pawnee Bill, and Buffalo Bill Cody. Evidently, Cody was not one of Spencer's favorite persons, for he said that Cody was a coward at heart and was forever seeking publicity.

Spencer Bishop was united in marriage to Edith Luella Smith in Jamesville, New York in 1884. Edith was the daughter of Loren Lorenzo and Harriet B. Hungerford Smith of that city. She was the fourth child in a family of eight, and was born near Jamesville in 1860.

When the newlyweds reached Rock Creek, it was in the month of March. The snow was so deep that the stage which made the trip to Fetterman twice a week, could handle only one passenger at a time. The trip from Rock Creek to Fetterman required two days. Spencer took the first stage, leaving his bride in Rock Creek. Four days later he met the stage with his own team and sled at the Fort and took his bride to the home he had prepared for her.

The house on LaPrele was the first frame house built in this part of Wyoming. It had a sitting room with a bay window, bedroom, kitchen and a pantry on the ground floor, with two bedrooms upstairs. Near the house was a cellar where vegetables were stored for winter and where Edith kept her milk and cream. The log homestead cabin was used then as a tool and repair shop.

Edith and Spencer were the parents of 12 children: Loren Clark, born in 1885; Hattie Rose, born in 1887; Jessie Viola, born in 1889; Clarence Alfred, born in 1890; Oren Calvin, born in 1892; Maude Matilda, born in 1894; Edith Luella, born in 1896; Spencer Adelbert, born in 1898, and Arthur Artemus, born in 1899, had as their birthplace the homestead near Fort Fetterman. Cecil Lawrence, born in 1904; Edna Mae, born in 1906; and Mable Pearl, born in 1908, were to have the Tobin Ranch as their birthplace. Hattie Rose died in 1918 and Jessie Viola in 1910.

Glenrock and Douglas were opposing each other for the county seat. At an election held in the LaPrele precinct, John D. O'Brien was serving as one of the judges. After 49 O'Brien's had voted, John told them "no more O'Brien's today." They kept voting, however, under other names. Spencer didn't mention how many Bishops and Kelloggs voted.

Joe Hazen, who was killed near Kaycee by the Hole-In-The-Wall gang that held up and robbed the Union Pacific passenger train near Wolcott, was a friend of Spencer Bishop. He ran a livery stable in Douglas, and was respected and liked by the community.

John T. Williams was the sheriff of Converse County when he received a tip that a group of ranchers were to raid a sheep camp belonging to Henry Brenning on the head of Little Boxelder Creek. John deputized his brother, Ab, and the two rode into the camp just as eight of the raiders had tied the herder and were starting to kill the sheep. When the raiders, called gunny-sackers because they had red handkerchiefs tied around their heads, saw the officer, they fled. Ab Williams pursued one, shooting his horse from under him when he failed to halt. The man lit running. Again Ab asked him to halt, but again the raider ignored the command. He fired once more. The raider shouted, "My God, Ab, don't shoot! I am a man with a family." Ab recognized the man as George Lamb.

The only casualty was self-inflicted. Bill Howard had his pistol discharge, accidentally shooting himself in the foot. Bill told Dr. Jesurun that his horse had fallen with him, and that is how the accident occurred. Most of these raiders were arrested, but all, including George Lamb, proved alibis and were freed.

In spite of the fact that the Bishop family was a large one, Mrs. Bishop managed to make sufficient butter for her family and have some to sell. She had only a couple of scrubby cows. Bill Young, noted joker, used to say that

Mrs. Bishop skimmed her milk on both sides.

The Pleasant Valley School house, which was built by Mr. Bishop on the Ed Smith ranch in 1884, was attended by all of Bishop's older children. Four of the sons and two of the sons-in-law served their country in World War I. Loren Clark was in the engineers; Oren Calvin and Arthur Artemus served in the infantry, Spencer Adelert in the air service, Clyde Ebbert in the hospital corps, and Jock Rockwell in the infantry.

Spencer Adelbert Bishop died November 23, 1914, his wife died in 1922.

Blaine, George W. and Mary Family

George W. (Washington) Blaine was born in England August 20, 1854. I don't know when he came to the U.S.A. He came to Wyoming in the 1880's. He ranched on the Cheyenne River. In 1889 he went back to Boone, Iowa and married Mary E. (Ellen) Rochelle who was born in Boone, Iowa, September 18, 1859. They traveled back to Douglas in a covered wagon when Douglas was just a tent town.

To this union five children were born: Mabel, Luther, Arthur (my father), Mary and Frances. All children were delivered by my grandfather (George W. Blaine) who died in 1912. My grandmother raised the first two children, Mable and Luther in a sheep wagon, my father (Arthur) was born in Keeline, Wyoming, April 22, 1895. They then lived in a cabin on the ranch on the Cheyenne River. Mary and Frances were born on the ranch.

Mable had four children: Ronald, Blanche, Jack and Lorraine Robinson.

Luther became a dentist in Chicago and had one child, Russel Blaine.

Arthur married Eva Black on Christmas Day, 1917 at her home on the Elkhorn Creek, out of Glendo. He served in France in World War I, returning home in April 1919. To this union two girls were born, Mary Eva (Robinson) and Hattie Jean (Dahonich) who are still living.

Mary had two children (Richard Copsey) who was killed in World War II and Frances (McCrew) who is still living. Frances (Mintzer) had no children.

All of the Blaines are now deceased.

Mary E. Blaine lived to be 96, passing away on March 24, 1955. She was known to all in Douglas as Mother Blaine or Grandma Blaine as she was always taking care of the "old people", many who were younger than she.

Arthur (my father) passed away in 1963. Eva (my mother) passed away in 1933.

I married Roy R. Robinson of Wheatland in 1938. We have two children, Janice Pullen and John B. Robinson and we have four grandchildren, Jimmy Pullen, and Heather, Erin and Amber Robinson who live in Douglas.

The Blaine Home is now Millie's Apartments.

Blomquist, Elof and Anna Family

Charles Elof Blomquist was born in Krakshult, Smoland, Sweden on April 3, 1871. After spending twenty-two years of his life in his native country, Mr. Blomquist came to America in 1893, living for awhile in Jamestown, New York and Warren, Pennsylvania. In 1896 he went to Omaha, Nebraska, and in 1898 claimed his bride, Anna C. Johannson.

Anna C. Johannson was born in Heda, Smoland, Sweden on September 26, 1874, coming to America at age seventeen to make her home with her grandparents in Salina, Kansas. She resided there a few years, then moved to Omaha, Nebraska, and in 1898 was married to Charles Blomquist.

They ran a very successful dairy, driving a white top buggy to church and social gatherings. Five children were born to them: Ruth, Rudolph, Arthur, Mildred, and Evelyn. The older children attended the Swedish Lutheran Sunday School, of which Mr. and Mrs. Blomquist were church members.

As a young man, seeking adventure, Mr. Blomquist's friend, Lars Johnson, and he went to Wyoming to look at land, ending up homesteading, each of them, 640 acres under the LaPrele Irrigation Project. Returning to Omaha Mr. Blomquist sold his dairy, and in 1910 moved his family and all of their belongings — horses, furniture, etc. by train to Wyoming, to the location of their future home. Their place was located fourteen miles west of Douglas, near which is now the road to the Natural Bridge Park.

After grubbing sagebrush and a lot of hard work, a two-story home was built. Many tears were shed by Mrs. Blomquist, enduring the hardships and caring for five young children, thinking they should have never moved from Omaha.

The following year, Violet was born, March 1911, and in 1913, Esther came along, making seven children now. The family was stricken with scarlet fever, taking the life of their son, Arthur, age eleven. Blomquists had no phone at that time and were quarantined, but a dear friend and neighbor, Edna Ayres, rode horseback and brought food to them, and left it at the gate near the house.

Many more Swedes had moved to the LaPrele Basin, and were good neighbors of the Blomquists, and the area soon was called "Swedish Valley".

The farm prospered with hard work, raising alfalfa, grain, sheep and some cattle. As the family grew, their son, Rudie, left the farm to seek adventure and employment elsewhere. The girls all helped in the fields, putting up hay, and shocking grain, while Mrs. Blomquist always managed, with all of her other duties, to bring coffee and some goodies to the hay crew in the field.

Mr. Blomquist had the first electric lights in the basin, having his own Delco engine to make the electricity, which was about the early 1920's.

The children all attended the Pleasant Valley School, three miles from the farm. The school was the first frame school building in the state, and is now located near the Museum at the State Fair Grounds at Douglas. Later years, Mildred taught at the school and Esther was her pupil. They all attended the high school in Douglas, Ruth and Rudie taking it in three years.

Family and friends were deeply saddened by the death of their youngest, Esther, who was killed in an auto accident August 21, 1932.

The four daughters were married at the ranch home, Rudie residing now in Chicago, but came home often for visits with the family, getting married in 1935. Ruth was married to Charles Huntzinger, a contractor around Douglas, in 1925. Mildred married Walter Reed and they lived on the 77 Ranch out of Manville. Evelyn married James C. Willox, prominent rancher south of Douglas. Mrs. Blomquist always pronounced her name as Evaleen, so Jim thought that should be her name, from then on, she was Evaleen to all. Violet married Edwin Potter, or "Bud" as he was known around Douglas. He was cashier of the Douglas National Bank, later becoming Executive Vice President of the bank. Violet, Bud and their three children moved to California in 1948.

The Blomquists had a sale in 1936, and leased the farm to Jess Irwin. They planned to retire and travel some. Ruth's husband was to build a home for them just west of Douglas, but Mr. Blomquist underwent emergency surgery for a ruptured appendix and died April 12, 1936.

In 1939, Mrs. Blomquist made her only trip back to her native land, on the Swedish American line. She still had some of her family living there yet. On her return the little house was complete, and she lived there until her untimely death from complications from a broken hip, on June 19, 1951. Her daughter, Mildred who was widowed with two small sons, made her home with her mother. Mildred still resides there, one mile west of Douglas, known to some as West Douglas Heights.

Boehler, William and Catherine

William Boehler was born in Raymond, Illinois on July 13, 1882. He was one of a family of nine boys and two girls belonging to Nicholas and Sara Boehler.

William's health was poor during his early years, and he was given little chance to grow to manhood. He attended a business school in Cincinnati, Ohio, and after his graduation, he joined the Brotherhood of the Franciscan Order. Since it was believed at that time that William was suffering from tuberculosis, he was sent to the New Mexico Indian Reservation to work as a teacher, instructing the Jemez and Navajo Indians.

After three years, he migrated north to Montana to teach at the Crow Indian School at Lodgegrass. Ill health still plagued him. A year later, after a serious disagreement with the Indian Agent, he gathered his belongings and walked south into Wyoming, working at ranches along the way.

William's first permanent job in Wyoming was at the Bill Wright ranch near the present town of Wright. When that job ended, he moved on to the Lee and Spaeth Ranch where he worked as a cook and handyman.

In 1917, William decided to join the army. He walked to Gillette, where the local board refused to accept him since he was over-age. He was determined to enter the service, however, so he walked on to Sheridan, a distance of 101 miles. Here, he was accepted by the Powder River District Office. He spent only a few months in France, since he was stricken with the dreaded influenza of World War I almost immediately after his induction. He served in France in the capacity of cook and medic.

After the war, he met Catherine "Kate" T. Hillmes, daughter of John and Elsie Hillmes. She and her sister attended a dance at Emporia, Kansas, and met William there. He was waiting at a base near Emporia to be mustered out. Their romance began. After he returned to Wyoming to work once more for Lee and Spaeth, they corresponded with each other.

Eventually, William decided to take up a homestead. He lived with "Daddy" Wilson, a man who had filed on an adjacent parcel of land. He erected a sod house complete with a dirt floor and one door. The windows were small, covered with gunny sacking to protect the dwelling from the elements. Later on he dug a cellar and added a one room frame shack. Since ranch work was slow in the winter, and jobs were hard to find, he decided to take up trapping. He set up three trap lines. With his horse, Old Sol, Bill would run a trap line a day, recover his catch, reset and rebait his traps. One winter he sold over a thousand dollars worth of hides, principally coyote, to Maas and Stephan furriers of St. Louis.

In 1921, Bill and Kate were wed at Humboldt, Kansas. Kate was a hardy girl of pioneer stock, excited about homesteading in Wyoming though she had never been west of Kansas. Together they gradually built up their place and completed all the requirements needed to "prove up." They were issued their final papers in 1922.

The community gradually grew as more people settled in the area. Roy Barger, William Singleton, Louis Buckridge, Earl Moore, Earl Haney, the Johnson brothers and William Boehler began a drive to establish a post office. William was officially appointed the postmaster on May 18, 1922. Louis Buckridge was appointed mail carrier, and Earl Moore was the deputy carrier. The post office was officially named the Verse Post Office, the name being derived from the last syllable of the county, Converse. It was rated a fourth class post office in which the postmaster had to keep and submit records of all transactions. In lieu of a salary, he was allowed to keep the money from the postage sales. He was subject to an audit by a postal inspector at any time, being required by federal law to be audited at least once a year. The mail was first delivered to Verse from Bill by team and buggy, but later the route became a Star Route, and then the mail was brought out from Douglas twice a week.

With the establishment of the post office, Verse became a center of community functions. Bill was obliged to acquire a team and wagon to accommodate his patrons. Previously, he had walked back and forth to Douglas (55 miles), but as the members of the community demanded more services, such as bringing groceries and supplies to Verse, he became aware of the need to stock a few staple groceries such as sugar, flour, salt and tobacco. This was the beginning of the Verse store.

In the summer of 1923, Kate became pregnant at the age of 43. After the first week of March in 1924, Bill decided it would be prudent to take her to Douglas to stay until her confinement was over. The couple started their journey, but were stopped by a severe blizzard near Dry Creek. They decided to seek shelter at the home of Doctor Lynch, a Medical Doctor, whose home was about one half mile north of the town of Bill. After three days of howling winds and drifting snow, Kate gave birth to her son, Leo V. Boehler. When the weather cleared, Bill loaded Kate and the new baby into the wagon and headed home again.

In 1928, excavation began for the Boehlers new home located just a few feet from the well which furnished water for their dwelling. It was quite a large house, having six rooms and a full basement. The post office and store were located in the basement. With the increase in the size of the Boehler home, it followed that the gatherings there increased in numbers. Bill expanded his store, stocking all types of non-perishable items. In addition, Bill added a one-pump gas station and garage. He purchased a truck with which he hauled coal to Douglas and Casper, at the rate of one dollar per ton. He brought groceries from Walter Shultz's wholesale house in Casper and barrels of gas from Slonaker's in Douglas on his return trip to Verse.

In 1930, Leo started his education in a small school house about a mile and a half south and east of the old Robertson place. Kate became dissatisfied with the education he was receiving after a short time, and sent Leo to Douglas to attend the North Grade School.

Soon, demands for better schools in the Verse community became more insistent. On one occasion, the county superintendent made a surprise visit to the little school near Sand Creek, only to find that the teacher had taken the boys out to hunt rabbits, leaving two little girls alone to play in the school yard. This teacher was immediately dismissed.

The schools were consolidated in 1921, and small panel-type school buses were furnished. The south bus was driven by Jim Stevens, the north by Warren Koch. Miss Gladys Hanlin was the first teacher of the consolidated school which was held at the newly-finished community hall.

A defective flue caused the complete destruction of the Boehler home in 1938. The family was left with only the clothes they were wearing. They set up housekeeping in a small building on the property. Within a few days, however, the community responded by showering the unfortunate Boehlers with food, clothes, dishes, etc. Bill and Kate were rewarded a hundredfold for the compassion and good heartedness which they had shown their neighbors over the years.

The post office was housed at the Steven's store which was the old community hall, and in May of that year, Alma Stevens was appointed to be the new post mistress.

The Boehler land was sold in the spring of 1938 to Fred Dilts. The family then moved to Sheridan.

When Highway 59 was completed, it was situated about a mile and a half west of Verse. A building which housed the store was moved over to the highway. This arrangement lasted for only a short time.

Six miles south of the Campbell County line there are a few boards from the old granary, the basement of the burned home and a lonely mulberry tree which Bill had brought from Missouri to transplant there in 1936. The memories and dreams live on-a part of the history of northern Converse County.

Bolln, George

George Bolln was born in 1847 in Hamburg, Germany. He was the son of Joachin Bolln and Catherine Heitman Bolln, who were also natives of Hamburg. The family was engaged in agriculture.

George was educated at The Gymnasium, as well as other excellent schools. He learned the baker's trade after completing his schooling. In 1876, George emigrated to America, and almost immediately upon arriving, he traveled on to Cheyenne, Wyoming, but remained there only a short time before going on to the Black Hills of South Dakota. It is probable that George was engaged in some sort of mining venture in South Dakota, but evidently was unsuccessful, since he returned to Cheyenne about a year later, where he was engaged in a bakery business for three years.

It seems that young George, at the age of 34, was undecided as to what he really wanted to do with his life. In 1881, he bought forty head of cows in Cheyenne and drove them to Leadville, Colorado to start a dairy business. This lasted only four months. He disposed of his dairy, and returned once more to Cheyenne where he purchased 210 head of mixed steers and heifers. Within a year from the date of purchase, all but three head of these cattle were stolen. He sold the remaining three head of cattle as well as a few horses he had accumulated, and went to work in a hotel in Cheyenne. At the end of six months, he leased the hotel, and assumed the operation on his own. He did succeed in this business for about three years.

In 1885, he sold his furniture and property which he had accumulated during the years he operated the hotel, and moved to Fort Fetterman where he bought Altman and Company. He had a busy trade in general merchandise.

In 1887, George married Pauline Muegel, a native of Bohemia. They had two children, Henry and Esther.

Bolln moved his stock into a building which he had purchased in Douglas in 1888. He dealt in both wholesale and retail merchandising. Shortly he enlarged his business, adding another store building so that he had 50' of frontage on the street. One building was devoted to dry goods, while the other was stocked with groceries, hardware and crockery. His business flourished, and became an important establishment in the young town of Douglas. In addition to his stores, he obtained two large warehouses enabling him to carry a large and varied stock of goods. His business was numbered among the leading mercantile houses of the entire county.

As a side-line, Mr. Bolln invested in sheep in 1900. He acquired 500 acres of land upon which to pasture his animals.

George was a staunch Democrat. He worked actively in the party. He was elected for two terms as commissioner, serving as chairman for one term. He served also as city councilman, and as Mayor of the town. He was one of the men who organized the First National Bank of Douglas, and was a member of its directorate.

In 1894, he won the nomination of his party for state treasurer, but was unsuccessful in that campaign.

George's son Henry attended Notre Dame University after having completed his high school education. His major was electrical engineering, but upon his return to Douglas, he entered banking pursuits. He was book-keeper and later the assistant cashier in the First National Bank. He was also associated with his father's mercantile business. After the death of his father, Henry was co-operator of his father's business with his aging mother. Henry was a veteran of World War I having served six months in France.

Bolln, Otto and Elizabeth

Otto Henry Bolln came to Douglas, Wyoming to make his new home in 1900. He was the son of Henry and Margaret Bolln of Omaha, Nebraska. Although he had been a traveling salesman for Western Tinware Company when he arrived, a better business opportunity developed with his Uncle George Bolln (the twin of Henry) for a mercantile business in Douglas. His wedding to Elizabeth Lee Willox on May 30, 1905 marked the beginning of a most happy marriage. On February 25, 1907, their son George Willox Bolln was born. When his uncle died, Otto reorganized the store using the name George Bolln Mercantile Company which he managed. During this time he also served as a Converse County Commissioner and was very active in the Masons. Hunting trips for sage chickens, antelope and deer in Wyoming were often supplemented by trips to the Pot Hole country of Nebraska for ducks. Sunday afternoons, the fairgrounds saw great rivalry at the clay pigeon traps between Otto Bolln, Al Rice and the two Saul brothers.

In 1915, Otto sold his share of the mercantile store and with Al Rice formed the Springhill Ranch Company, buying several ranches along Horseshoe and Roaring Fork Creeks on the north base of Laramie Peak. During the 1921 depression, a combination of circumstances including a most severe winter, extremely high prices for hay and cotton seed cake, plus a high percentage loss of cattle during the spring storms, spelled the end of the Springhill Ranch Company.

Otto Bolln served as chairman of the Wyoming State Fair for the next two years. During this time he was also instrumental in the formation of, and became the first president of the Douglas Kiwanis Club.

In 1923, Otto was invited to come to Casper, Wyoming to be manager of the Richards-Cunningham Store. This was the largest store in Casper at that time, selling complete lines of ladies' and mens' clothing and shoes, yard goods, hardware, saddles, groceries, cattle salt, etc. At this time the Richards-Cunningham Store was heavily in debt to the Continental Illinois Bank in Chicago. In fact, Otto's becoming manager was a condition of the loan renewal. Elizabeth Lee Bolln was born on October 26, 1926. One night in the spring of 1934, there was a disastrous fire. While payments were adequate to cover all of the losses, the Continental Illinois Bank called all of the loans, leaving insufficient money to rebuild and restock the store. Unfortunately, this meant the end of the business. The death of his good wife, Bess on June 12, 1935, made the offer of a job in Washington an attractive one.

In 1936 Otto Bolln became Secretary to Senator Robert Carey and worked in the Washington, D.C. office until the Senator's untimely death two years later. Otto's next move was to California where he joined his sister, Elsa Gordon and her husband, in a travel agency. Restrictions on travel due to Hitler's march into Austria limited the travel agency's income so that it could not support three people. Otto returned to Douglas where he lived until his death on February 12, 1942.

George Willox Bolln attended high school in Douglas and Casper, and spent one year in the Engineering School of the University of Wyoming at Laramie. He then transferred to the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor. This gave him many wonderful opportunities to spend the holidays with his Aunt Elsie Willox Bancker in Jackson, Michigan. After receiving his BSEE in 1930, he started working for Cutler-Hammer in Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

In 1939, George married Helen Murray Pfeifer and they were blessed with four children. Although George never returned to Wyoming for any length of time, he maintained strong ties with his relatives and friends. On alternate years, vacations were in the Douglas and Glendo areas while the children were young. Since the departure of the kids for all parts of the country, he and Helen return for branding, hunting, rodeo or some combination of activities and good company.

In 1970, George retired from Cutler-Hammer to enjoy, with Helen, the pleasures of spending big chunks of time gardening on their Springhill Farm near the Mississippi River. They also enjoy playing golf and bridge, hunting, fishing, traveling, and visiting their four children and seven grandchildren.

Elizabeth Lee (Betty) Bolln began high school in Douglas. After the death of Otto, she lived with George and Helen, finishing high school in Shoreland, Wisconsin. After spending two years at Knox College in Galesburg, Illinois, she transferred to Western Michigan University at Kalamazoo. There she received her degree in Occupational Therapy, a skill which has served her well over the years.

In 1949, she married Donald L. Drolet and they were blessed with five children. The Drolets have maintained very close contacts with Wyoming. Currently, four of the five children are living there and are putting great pressure on Betty and Don to join them. The Senior Drolets make most of the Willox and Gray brandings and calf sales.

The Drolets have lived in Richland, Michigan since their marriage. Don has sold Prudential Insurance most of his working life and Betty is now Township Treasurer.

George Willox Bolln

Bolln, Waldo and Margaret Family

Waldo H. Bolln was born in Omaha, Nebraska on December 27, 1878, the son of Henry and Margaret Bolln. He received his schooling in Omaha.

In 1901 he came to Douglas to work for his Uncle George, a twin brother to his father. Waldo's brother, Otto was already working at the George Bolln Co. store located on North Second Street.

Waldo met and courted Margaret Reid, daughter of Charles and Eliza Reid. Margaret, or Maggie as she was better known, was teaching at a rural school on Mill Creek. Some of her students were Ferris Bruner and the Francisco children.

John LeBar was courting Artie Hamilton; they decided to be married with Waldo and Maggie as best man and maid of honor. Waldo and Maggie changed their minds and decided to have a double wedding. They were married on April 31, 1908 and the four went to Omaha for their wedding trip.

Two children were born to the Bollns; a daughter, Margaret Pauline on January 26, 1910 and a son, Otto Reid on March 27, 1912.

In 1914 Waldo decided to go on his own and planned to go into the dairy business. He went to Wisconsin and bought a registered dairy herd. Upon arrival of the dairy herd in Douglas, all of the animals were found to have tuberculosis. The entire herd had to be killed immediately. The Wisconsin State Veterinarian had fraudulently passed the herd as being of good health. He received a prison term for his offense which was the only return for what was paid for the herd.

In 1915 Waldo and Albert Peyton decided to start Peyton Bolln Grocery on Center Street where the KWIV radio station is now. Waldo and Albert applied for enlistment in the army during World War I, Albert was accepted, but Waldo was rejected because of bad ulcers. Waldo then purchased Albert's interest in the store. The store was moved to its present location in 1940.

Waldo was the sole owner of the grocery business until February 1936 when his son, Otto "Beef", bought a one-half interest. At that time Waldo became the Douglas Postmaster, a position he held until his death on April 8, 1938. In 1940 Beef purchased the other half from his mother and operated the store until 1970 when Beef's son,

Margaret Reid (Bolln), winner of Ladies Relay Race, first state fair 1905.

Francis Otto "Butch" bought into the store and in 1983 bought out his father's interest. Beef graduated from the University of Southern California in 1935 with a degree in engineering.

The Bollns have all had nicknames over the years. Waldo was known as "Do" most of his life. He acquired the nickname as a child while playing tag. Everyone was to have the name of a nut and being a late comer the only nut that was not taken that he could think of was that of a donut. He was branded for life as "Do." Otto received his nickname, "Beef" from an incident that happened while sleighing down the Williams Hill as a youngster. Everyone had a meat name so Otto took beef steak as his name. It was shortened to "Beef" and the name stayed with him the rest of his life.

The Peyton-Bolln Grocery Store or Bolln's Food Market, as it is known now, has seen many changes over the years. In the beginning there were only five kinds of bar soap to select your hand or laundry soap from. Many items were in bulk such as candy, crackers, cookies, beans, all sugar, dried fruits and many other things. Everything had to be sacked and weighed by the clerks as well as all items written by hand and itemized in order books. Pricing was all done in multiples, such as 10¢, 20¢ and 30¢ or 5¢, 10¢ and 15¢, and as there wasn't any sales tax to figure, pennies weren't needed to make change.

Fresh fruits were very limited and were available only in season. Fresh vegetables were not handled by stores at that time.

Trucking of groceries started in the late 1920's and with it came fresh staples such as vegetables, fruits and meat. Until this time meat markets were available to people for them to be able to buy fresh meat. The meat usually was from local sources such as the farmers and ranchers who sold the animals to the meat markets who in turn either butchered the animal at the farm or in town.

World War II brought with it big changes in the grocery business such as pre-packaged items, letting people pick up their own items and a bigger variety of things. Frozen foods also started to appear when refrigeration became a reality.

Beef married Beverly Gorman of Casper on June 3, 1941. They had one son, Francis Otto "Butch" (b. March 24, 1942) and one daughter, Ann "Sukey" (b. February 12, 1944). Beverly died on August 25, 1956. Beef married Virginia Hylton on September 19, 1958.

Butch is married to the former Gay Turner. They had two children, Britton and Marnie. Sukey is married to John Obrzut. They have a daughter, Krystopher.

Waldo and Maggie's daughter Margaret married George R. Curry on October 6, 1928. They have two daughters, Nancy and Mary. Maggie died on November 14, 1975.

Booker, William, Louise and Cora

William Booker, long time manager of the VR Ranch south of Glenrock, was born in Hamilton, Ontario, Canada on the 5th of May, 1857. The son of William D. and Sarah (Field) Booker, William was a treasurer of an insurance company.

In the fall of 1875 he came to Cheyenne. He spent the winter on a ranch on Horse Creek and in the spring of 1876 he began work for the CY outfit at the spring roundup. In the fall of 1876 he was employed by Charley Clay and Al Ayres with a freighting outfit, making trips from Camp Carlin to Fort Laramie and return. In the fall of the same year, Mr. Booker went to work on Chugwater Creek for the firm of Hunter and Abbott on the old TY ranch, remaining there until 1878. He was then employed with the Swan outfit until 1896 when he went to work for the Tolland Co. at their VR Ranch south of Glenrock as their manager.

William married Louise Vreeland of Cheyenne. They had three children: Mrs. F. N. Stuart, Frank V. and William. Louise died in 1896, just a few days after they had moved to the VR Ranch. Mr. Booker married Cora Dean in March, 1901. They had four children, Albina, Alfred O., Helen C. and Effie F.

William served as a representative from Converse County in the State Legislature during the sessions of 1907, 1913 and 1923.

Mr. Booker died on October 22, 1927.

Bowell, Clyde and Lindie

It all started back in the year of 1883, when Clyde Bowell was born in Argos, Indiana and Jennie "Lindie" Ladd was born in 1885 also in Argos. They both attended grade and high school there, graduating in 1903. In 1904 these two high school sweethearts were married. They remained in the Argos area, farming for the next five years. Their first child, a son, was born in 1907 and lived only ten days.

In 1908, Clyde filed on land out in Wyoming. This he did due to the doctor's advice to seek a drier climate. During this time the west seemed to be a popular place for so many Eastern people to relocate. It was not long before their dreams were fulfilled but not before their second child, a girl, was born in 1909. She was named Mildred.

When Mildred was three months old, Clyde and Lindie (as she was fondly called) headed west. Clyde traveled on the Chicago Northwestern Railroad in a boxcar, along with a cow, dog, furniture, lumber and farm equipment. Lindie, with baby Mildred, followed in a passenger train.

After arriving in Lost Springs, they soon built a two story house on their 320 acres, three and a half miles south and east of Lost Springs. In the years following, they kept busy farming, raising cattle and horses.

In 1915, Marie was born. As the years passed, both daughters attended the Hoosier Grade School located three quarters of a mile south of the Bowell home. During 1918, Clyde built onto the original home, making it larger and more comfortable. For the next several years, Lindie supplied the Chicago Northwestern passenger trains with garden produce, dairy products and poultry.

In 1920, Clyde and Earl Stickney rented the Springs Garage building. They supplied gasoline, auto parts and repaired autos for the surrounding community. Along with this work, Clyde was Deputy County Assessor and Secretary-Treasurer for the Federal Land Bank in Omaha.

Lindie, being an excellent cook, became interested in the Springs Hotel. For six years she served meals, sold groceries and rented sleeping rooms to the weary travelers.

Clyde and Lindie returned to the 2B Ranch in 1929. They resumed raising hay and grain for the Guernsey cattle they were raising. Clyde was appointed State Land Appraiser for several years and later became a State Seed Loan Inspector.

Clyde and Lindie sold the ranch in 1947 and returned to Argos to care for Clyde's aging parents. In the meantime, Clyde went to work for the Bendix Plant in South Bend. He worked there for ten years when an accident in the plant put him in the hospital with a broken back. It was two years before he could walk and get around by himself.

Due to Lindie's failing health, they lived with their daughter, Mildred in California, and then because of their love for the state of Wyoming, they returned to Cody where their daughter Marie was living. Lindie was hospitalized in Powell, where she died in 1971. Clyde remained with Marie until his death in 1980. They are both buried in Cody.

Mildred married Frank Vanderwalker of the Twenty Mile area north of Lost Springs in 1927. Three children were born to them, Betty Weybrew of San Jose, California, Donald Vanderwalker of Tempe, Arizona and Richard Vanderwalker also of San Jose. Mildred has ten grandchildren and five great-grandchildren. Frank passed away in 1949 in Palo Alto, California. In 1956, Mildred married Lou Tomlin of Soledad, California, where they are now living.

In 1932, Marie married Carey Fowler of Douglas. Three children were born to them, Clyde Fowler lived in Denver, Colorado until his death in 1976, David Fowler of Whittier, California and Mildred Bakke of Saskatchewan, Canada. Marie has six grandchildren.

Marie later married R. C. "Punch" Johnston of Cody, where they are now living.

Marie Bowell Johnston

Bower, Clyde and Hazel Family

Clyde Hibberd Bower, my father, (I am Maurine Hardesty) was a descendant of an old Indiana family which had gradually migrated westward from Ohio to Indiana then to Nebraska in 1885 and finally to Wyoming in the early 1900s. Dad's grandfather, Philip, a cabinet-maker, moved from Ohio to the forests of Indiana. To develop a farm, he cleared timber, which he converted to coffins and furniture. Dad's father, Almon Greenleaf Bower (known as A.G.), was born in 1851 in that frontier Indiana home and was raised there. As a young man, A. G. taught school, then traveled west to work at a mill in Helena, Montana. He returned to Indiana to farm but in 1885 moved west again to Ulysses, Nebraska where Dad was born on April 18, 1892. Dad was one of seven children, only four of whom survived infancy. In 1898 the family made Kearney, Nebraska their home. A. G. was engaged in both the furniture and undertaking businesses. He became one of the state's first licensed embalmers, served many years as Buffalo County Coroner and founded the A. G. Bower Undertaking Parlors at Kearney, which remained a family business until recent years.

Apparently, the "westward urge" had not left the very proper looking A. G. for in 1907 he purchased a ranch in Wyoming, seven miles west of Douglas in the LaPrele Community (T 33, R 72, Sec. 33). That suited his son, Clyde (dad), just fine; for although Dad had attended Kearney College in preparation for entering the family business, he did not care to become a mortician. He, more like his grandfather, Philip, much preferred the idea of woodworking, farming and ranching. It was agreed that he would go to Wyoming to put the Bower ranch into operation. On April 30, 1912, before leaving Kearney, he married his long-time friend and fiancée', Nema Hazel Tracy (known as Hazel), daughter of Addison E. and Ida (Nichols) Tracy of Mesopotamia, Ohio and Fairport, New York, respectively. Hazel's family had moved west from Illinois to Kearney where she was born on October 24, 1892. She had also attended Kearney College.

Immediately following their wedding, Clyde and Hazel departed by train for, so far as her family was concerned, the "uncivilized west." They found Douglas to be much better than that. Although, upon arrival here, they discovered that her carefully packed wedding dress had mysteriously disappeared. Small problems aside, Clyde and Hazel loved it here. They made an easy transition to Wyoming and because they were such happy, friendly people, soon made many life-long friends in this area. Three children were born at the ranch: Bruce, myself (Maurine, Mrs. Harold Hardesty), and Erma (Mrs. Warren Edwards), in 1912, 1914 and 1919, respectively.

Wyoming life was often a hard one with stock and crops at the mercy of the weather. Too much rain or none at all, devastating hail just before harvest, blizzards, and even snow in the summer as recorded in an old journal on July 3, 1915! Because irrigation water for crops was very undependable, Dad became involved with the LaPrele irrigation project. As members of the LaPrele Water Users Association, he and others fought to protect their water rights. In 1919 the association renegotiated their rights with the Douglas Reservoirs Company, hopefully for the better, when it purchased the North Platte Valley Irrigation Company, which had been foreclosed. Ironically, access to water contributed later to a problem in the community. Years of constant field irrigation had created some bad swamp areas. In September 1928, after other methods had failed, DuPont Chemical Company did experimental blasting of some swamp land on the Bower place to drain it and to demonstrate the most modern method of creating irrigation ditches. Blasting was hailed as the coming thing, better than digging ditches with horse and slip. Repercussions of this experiment had more to do with startled neighbors whose windows had been shattered than with a useable new method of drainage.

Through the years Dad grew a variety of crops. He contracted with Holly Sugar Company to grow sugar beets and with F. H. Woodruff and Sons of Connecticut, later the world's largest wholesaler of seed, to raise prime grades of flax, pea and bean crops for their seed, which was shipped in bulk by rail to major seed-packaging companies around the world. Woodruffs built a bulk-seed sorting plant in Douglas which was their central distributing plant for the western United States. It provided much needed employment in this area. Eventually seed was even packaged there too. The Woodruff Building (now the Douglas Livestock Exchange) originally sat at the corner of First and Center Streets.

Dad also raised cattle, sheep, dairy cows, swine, chickens, ducks and geese (which terrorized us kids with their honk-chase-and-pinch ways). He was proud of his huge Morgan horses which were used in the fields and to pull great wagonloads of coal. Periodically Dad, Frank Brown, and others in the community gathered their teams and wagons for a trek of several days duration to the coal mines north of town to haul home our main coal supply.

An avid hunter and outdoorsman, Dad was an early promoter of the Sportman's Association here and throughout his life enjoyed hunting the area's bountiful game and fowls. There were many wagon trips to the mountains for hunting-camping trips with the C. O. Browns. Each fall, when flocks of migrating geese and ducks filled the sky, Dad was in sportsman's heaven. In the summer he and the neighbors hunted sage chickens together. The women and children often accompanied them, riding in horse-drawn wagons and buggies. At the end of the hunt, we'd have a picnic and sage hen fry. We also traveled by horse and buggy to picnics in the hills near Green Valley Spring, the source of Douglas' water supply and to community picnics at Natural Bridge. However, upon return from these excursions, our first chore was to check crops for hail damage and the swamp for mired livestock, which were very common occurrences, especially on holidays for some strange reason.

Mom (Hazel) was a wonderfully sweet, warm person and an excellent homemaker. I particularly remember her cheerful bird-like whistling and the lovely songs she sang as she worked at her chores which involved everything from making soap to smoking meat and canning most of our food. Music was important to her, so it was always a part of our home and social life, whether it be from a hand-cranked Victrola playing precious records ordered from Kearney or mom playing "The Old Rugged Cross" or a John Philip Sousa march on the piano. She played with that particular lilt and verve that caused people to tap their feet and join in singing. Being an accomplished pianist herself, she arranged for Erma and me to take piano lessons. We remember well each week dutifully riding our horses over two miles to our music lessons, no matter the state of the weather. There was a time in later years when our auto fell off the unrailed side of a bridge during a blizzard. None of us got broken but the new records did. Mom issued one of her worst epithets: "Oh, fiddle!"

In 1919 when land opened up farther west of town we homesteaded near the present road to Natural Bridge (T33, R73, part of Section 28 and 29). Interstate 25 runs through the old place now. I especially remember the sorry year our unwary sheepherder allowed too many sheep at one time to wander onto the ice-covered watering pond. 1,800 sheep broke through the ice and were lost causing quite a setback. Another vivid memory of the homestead is of the day my brother, Bruce, and I learned the hazards of adding one too many sticks of pitch pine to a fire. We wanted to build a hotter fire in the stove to heat wash water; instead, we built a chimney fire. I carried our new baby sister, Erma, to the safety of a nearby hillside and watched, horrified, as mom and Bruce fought to put out the fire. The old highway, along which tourists traveled even then, was about a quarter of a mile from the house. Several tourists, seeing the fire, stopped their cars, vaulted fences and came running across the fields to help, packing their auto fire extinguishers with them. The water well, dry as usual after pumping wash water, was hopeless. They finally doused the fire with tubs of wash water poured down the chimney. I can still see those sooty socks dripping from the rafters and the jagged black hole burned in the roof around the chimney. Main headquarters was eventually moved back to the original Bower ranch.

Gypsies roamed the countryside in those days, occasionally traveling through this area. When someone spotted them coming they would call out a warning to anyone within earshot, "The Gypsies are coming down the lane!" We hurriedly locked up everything, chickens included; and people of the community, in watchful defense, carried guns at these times. The Gypsies swarmed all over the place, even trying to get inside the house. While some bargained and traded goods, others picked up whatever was not locked up. Once they even ran off with our dog, Rags, but Dad managed somehow to rescue him.

Dad's inventive nature was a real boon on the ranch, for he contrived many "modern conveniences" for us, including his use of "The Hearses." I remember anxious neighbors, aghast at observing big, black hearses at the Bower place on two different occasions, inquiring as to the state of our health. These were hearses which, when retired from service at the funeral home in Kearney, were driven out here for Dad to use however he could. He immediately stripped them down and converted them into other useable vehicles and some of the first rubber-tired farm equipment in the area. Those hearses were the source of many a good laugh among us and our neighbors; although, due to old superstitions, a few remained rather skeptical at getting near them, even after their conversion. In the early years Dad built an elevated water storage tank to provide running water in the kitchen, and he delighted mom by obtaining a hand-turned clothes washer to replace her old scrub board. That was followed by a most new-fangled washer, rigged up by removing a tire from the car and running a belt from the turning wheel to the dasher in the washer. Voila! An "automatic" washer! He also used this process to run his wood-cutting saw.

A terrific opportunity came knocking about 1920. The great Reliance Oil Well was being drilled about a mile east of our place. All hopes ran high, so when shares were sold to finance the drilling, Dad invested $800. Unfortunately, the geyser of liquid gold turned out to be a 2,800 foot dry hole. Many a local investor's dreams dried up with it. Years later, in 1938, Dad received a check which he never did cash, for eight cents. The company was being dissolved and this was the settlement! The location of the Reliance, where the abandoned wooden rig stood for many years, was approximately five miles west of the present Douglas city limits, just a few feet north of the Interstate 25 right-of-way.

During the years leading to the Great Depression we sold milk to the creameries in Douglas and Casper; payment was based on the percentage of cream in the milk. Those weekly checks of seven or eight dollars was a big help. Saturdays everyone went to town and we kids were delighted to see a Laurel and Hardy movie for a nickel. No matter how lean things may have been we never realized it. The folks made every effort to make life a wonderful experience with the small joys of everyday life, like Dad's love of a good cigar after dinner or the annual Fourth of July fireworks display he put on for family and friends were just as important as the big events.

Our social lives revolved around several organizations. 4-H clubwork was one of the greatest influences for us as rural youths. Our deep involvement in it provided many years of educational and fun experiences. It led to Bruce and I being awarded trips to Chicago as Wyoming representatives to the National 4-H Club Congress and to a scholarship for Bruce to the University of Wyoming. There were also the LaPrele Community meetings, held the last Friday of each month, which included a short business meeting followed by a social. For many years Mom played piano at these gatherings (and so did the Methodist preacher, Reverend Methvin). Church was always important and in the early days a traveling minister conducted Sunday school and services at the District 20 school house. (Later it was also the site of the LaPrele Community Hall). Mom was a charter and life long member of the LaPrele Homemaker's Club and she and Dad were charter members of the LaPrele Farm Bureau. Dad served as its first president and Mom as its first secretary.

In 1938 mom and dad moved into Douglas where they built their home themselves. It included a large vegetable garden and a workshop, of course. They remained active in those organizations that had been so much a part of their ranch lives and were faithful supporters of the Methodist Church. Dad and Bruce worked together on many projects including building dams and drainage systems, opening the first cement-block plant in this area, and they built their own apartment units. On April 27, 1945, the family was saddened by the death, at age 94, of Dad's father, A. G., the man who had seen the promise of the good life in Wyoming.

As the old LaPrele neighbors gradually moved to town, "community picnics" at the Bower home became common. The only thing new about them were the grandchildren who got a taste of the good old days. In 1962 Dad and Mom celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary. Dad died unexpectedly on April 17, 1967, the night before his 75th birthday. Not long before he had made the remark that he was "so tired of carrying all our old friends up to Boot Hill." Mom died January 27, 1970 at the age of 77.

As for us kids, I taught rural school then married Harold Hardesty in 1934. We left Douglas to find work but returned to raise our two daughters here. Bruce married Dessie Weller in 1938, built his home beside dad's, and raised seven children there. Dessie died in 1970 and Bruce passed away March 7, 1983. Erma married Warren Edward of the Dry Creek Community in 1939. During World War II they were transferred to Washington state where they still live. Their home is in Everett and they have a son and a daughter who also live in Washington.

Braae Family

Anders and Anna Braae, natives of Denmark, came to America about 1875 with their children, Anthon, Steve, Andrew, John and Nelson. They went to Omaha, Nebraska and a few years later they moved to a ranch near Chugwater.

Anthon, Steve and Andrew Braae came to Douglas later and homesteaded about 30 miles south where they lived with their families in the vicinity of where the Charles Pextons live now and known as "Braae" where a Post Office of that name was established in 1926. John Braae lived in California and Nelson Braae lived at Astoria, Oregon.

Anthon "Tony" Braae was born in Denmark on June 19, 1872. He became a cowboy and range rider trailing Texas longhorns from Texas to Billings, Montana. He was united in marriage to Minnie Olive Lester on Christmas Day, 1894, at Maxwell, Iowa. They had four children,

Anthon and Minnie Braae 1916

Mrs. Pansy Dunn, Mrs. Gracy Herlihy, Arnold and Lyle.

Anthon worked for the Burlington railroad for a number of years and in 1916 was transferred to Douglas. His wife, Minnie, died in 1917. He had a homestead in the Braae area and died of a stroke in 1946.

Steve Braae was born in 1877 near Omaha, Nebraska and was employed as a welder in the Union Pacific shops. Later, he moved to the Cottonwood country near Wheatland, Wyoming and in 1908 was married to Louise Marie Frances Schmelling. Louise was born October 3, 1875 and was the daughter of John Ferdinand and Augusta Johanna Lemke Schmelling, and was born at Ft. Atkinson, Wisconsin. They had one daughter, Hattie Margaretha, who married an Eddy. Hattie had one son, Stephen Eddy.

In 1917, they moved to Cheyenne, Wyoming where Steve worked on the railroad. Hattie was not well and the doctor told them to get her out of Cheyenne, so they moved to the country near Braae where they homesteaded and lived until 1943 when they moved to Douglas. Louise died in 1948.

Steve played his fiddle for many a country dance and held the fiddle down against his chest instead of up under his chin. He used to go up and help Frank Prager put up hay. He was working at the Converse Lumber Company in 1962 and died in 1965 at Huntington Beach, California.

Andrew Braae and his wife, Hattie Leonard Braae came to this area about 1912 and were working for Sauls (LaBonte Livestock Co.), living at the Gambol place which is northwest of where Larry Philbricks live now. Andrew went over to Willoxs and built an addition onto their house. In November, 1915, Andrew and his oldest son, Alvin, were killed when their threshing machine crashed through a bridge on the Esterbrook Road east of Bruner Lane. Their children were: Gladys Spracklen,

Andrew and Hattie Braae

L. to R.: Andrew Braae and Alvin Braae with their steamer tractor.

Beulah Morton Bricker, Alvin, Leonard, Dean, Mildred and Irene. After Andrew was killed, Hattie, Dean and Leonard filed on homesteads around the Braae community. Leonard and Dean built a two room log cabin for them to live in. It was close to where the Braae Post Office was established in 1926. They were living there in 1918 when Mary Dunn (Bruner) came to teach Mildred and Irene. When Mary arrived, on a cold day in February, Hattie had just gone on up country to her daughter, Gladys Spracklen, who was having a baby. Dean was about 15 years of age and did the cooking quite well until his mother got back. Hattie and Mildred climbed a ladder to sleep in the loft at night. Irene slept with Mary Dunn, and Dean and Leonard slept on the kitchen floor. Hattie was an excellent cook, making the plainest and simplest food into banquet fare, long remembered by friends and strangers alike, who were always welcome to stop for meals.

One stranger who wandered to her home and ate with them was the famous train robber, Bill Carlisle. It was 1919, and after they ate he followed Hattie to the kitchen and asked her to dress his hand which had been shot and told her who he was. Shortly they saw the posse coming, so he hurried out and hid on the mountain nearby.

The next day the posse caught up with him near Esterbrook and he was taken back to prison. Hattie later married Bill Pexton and the family moved to Sandpoint, Idaho in 1934, where Hattie died in 1963. At the Braae Post Office when Hattie Pexton left, the next postmaster was Earl Day who took it in 1935 and then Mattie George was postmistress from 1938 until 1939 when it was discontinued.

Hattie's daughter, Beulah, had married Claude Morton, Sr. and they were living on the lower end of what is now the Lloyd Nunn ranch with their six children in 1924 when another tragedy struck. Claude was on his way home from the upper country with a team and wagon when the team ran away and he was thrown out. He walked on home but died that night. Later, Beulah married Raleigh Bricker and they moved out to Idaho, too, where in 1949 she was running a home for old folks, having 16 patients. Her son, Claude Morton, Jr. was helping cook at the home. Hattie and her daughter, Irene Shrake, won some prizes on poultry at the county fair in Idaho in 1949.

Leonard and Dean Braae used to have a sawmill up in the LaBonte Canyon country and they had a loud whistle they blew every day at noon that could be heard for miles around. They went to Idaho, too, and worked in the timber there.

Mildred Braae married Oscar Bricker, Jr. and they had three children, David, Ione, and Lenore.

Irene Braae married Mr. Shrake.

The Bricker family also homesteaded around the Braae country. Oscar Sr. was the father and the children or members of the family were in part: Jack, Raleigh, Oscar, Houston, Raymond, Randolph, Donald and Charley. Charley worked for his room and board for the Ferris Bruners about 1930 and could sing quite nicely with Lenora Dunn chording on the piano. At the Douglas High School there were: Miles Bricker, Class of 1939, Mildred Bricker, Class of 1940 and Ernest Bricker, Class of 1942.

Brady, James and Jessie

James Brady was born in Milwaukee, Wisconsin on April 12, 1882. He ran away from home and went west to seek his fortune when he was 15 years of age. After living in Denver for three years, Jim came to Wyoming in 1900 to work at the Platte Valley Ranch at McKinley as a blacksmith.

After several years there, he moved to Douglas to work for T. S. Cook and A. C. Rice. Later he started his own blacksmith shop located on South 2nd Street across from the old Ford Garage.

On October 16, 1906, he married Jessie Mewis (born January 9, 1887 in Douglas), daughter of Herman R. and Emma Mewis, pioneer settlers of Douglas. The Mewises at one time had a confectionary store at the corner of 2nd and Center Streets. Herman later was a Justice of the Peace.

One daughter Florence was born to the Bradys. She married Clarence A. "Tye" Slonaker on December 31, 1931.

Mr. Brady became interested in the oil business, working as a driller and later engaged in the oil promotion activities in Wyoming. He worked for Ohio Oil Co. and Standard Oil of Louisiana.

In 1936, the Bradys opened a confectionary shop at 325 Center Street, known as the White Palace. It became popular with the high school students and coffee groups from around town.

Mr. Brady died on July 10, 1945.

Mrs. Brady continued to run the White Palace by herself until her death on November 17, 1973.

Brenning, Henry B. and Annie

Henry Brenning was born on March 22, 1851 in Maine. He married Annie Davis, daughter of B. L. Davis. She was born in 1847 in Massachusetts.

Henry came west to Leadville, Colorado in 1879, later spending a year in Denver, Colorado, two years at Boulder, Colorado and spent some time in Cheyenne, Wyoming. He was a carpenter and a building contractor.

The Brennings came to Douglas in 1886 with Mrs. Brenning being the first woman resident of the to-be-metropolis.

Mr. Brenning built many of the buildings that still stand in Douglas. He was also a promoter of the LaPrele Ditch and Reservoir Co. and had interests in oil in what was called the Brenning Basin.

The Table Mountain Sheep Company was incorporated on Sept. 21, 1908 for $75,000. The shareholders were Henry Brenning, Howard G. Peters and Abe B. Daniels. The company ran sheep east of Douglas on Sand Creek and on LaPrele Creek. The terrible blizzard of 1912 killed most of their sheep and eventually put them out of business. Sarah Morton held the mortgage of their lands which included the Boot Ranch at the west end of Table Mountain and the range lands on Sand Creek. In 1913, Mortons acquired possession of these lands. The "Boot" was the home of the Brenning family. It is now owned by Richard Cross.

The Brennings had an adopted son, Roy. Roy was born at Fort Fetterman on January 11, 1883.

Henry B. died on February 21, 1921, Annie on August 14, 1922 and Roy on October 13, 1949.

Bright, Charles and Belle Family

My father, Charles Bright, was born in Peoria, Illinois, September 13, 1879. He was the only child of Joseph and Elizabeth Foote Bright. He, with his parents, moved to Wyoming in 1886. His father homesteaded north of Manville, Wyoming. They lived here until the homestead had been proved up on, then they moved into Manville where they ran a hotel. He received all his education in Manville except one year, when he attended the Douglas School in Douglas, Wyoming.

On July 4, 1905 he married Belle Howard (my mother). She was the daughter of Robert and Prudence Fenwick Howard of Lost Springs, Wyoming. She was born in southern Illinois on January 11, 1884. In 1887 she and her family moved to Cimarron, Kansas. Here, her father homesteaded. They lived here until 1892. After selling the homestead they moved to Wyoming by team and lumber wagon. They settled at Glenrock and lived there for three years while her father worked in the coal mines. In 1895 they came to Lost Springs and started ranching.

At the age of eleven, my mother went to live with a school teacher and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Blaine, to work for her room and board. Mr. and Mrs. Blaine took her to Burwell, Nebraska where she received most of her education.

In young womanhood, she returned to Manville, Wyoming where she worked. She worked for Mrs. H. B. Card and later for Mrs. Joe Bright at the hotel. At the age of 21, she homesteaded southeast of Lost Springs. The land now belongs to her grandson, Jimmie Bright.

After my folks married in 1905 they lived on my father's homestead, four miles southwest of Lost Springs on the Robert Howard place. Five children were born to my parents. I, Cora, was born here on December 16, 1912. In 1915 my parents built a new home in Lost Springs. I attended school here, and on June 10, 1929 I married Daniel W. Dieleman at the Methodist parsonage in Douglas Wyoming.

Mother died on June 10, 1969.

Brockmeyer, Ben

Benjamin Gerhart Brockmeyer, Herman and Sam's bachelor brother, was born on May 1, 1884 in Colesburg, Iowa. He purchased the Vern Schrader farm in the Dry Creek Community in the mid 1920s. This farm was within a mile of his brothers. Ben moved on to a new home in Weldona, Colorado in the early 1930s. He hunted and trapped most of his life. His proudest possession was a Model T coupe.

Ben died August 8, 1963 in Weldona, Colorado.

Brockmeyer, Herman and Ethel

Herman Gerhart Brockmeyer was born in Hamburg, Germany in 1877. The family moved to the United States about 1881. Two of Herman's brothers, Benjamin and Samuel, who also later lived in Converse County, were born at the family home in Coleburg, Iowa.

Herman married Ethel Beulah Carew in Alpha, North Dakota, in 1910. Their daughter Herminnie May was born at Beach, North Dakota, in 1913. The family then moved to the Akron, Colorado area where Donald was born in 1916. From there, in 1917, they moved to a homestead in the Dry Creek community of Converse County, Wyoming where Charles was born in 1922 and Merlin in 1924.

Herman had one of the earlier radios in the 1920's. For energy it was run off of a car battery that was kept charged by a car generator that was geared up to a propeller he made, and installed in the wind. He also had a gas lantern that was unique for the 1920's.

The Herman Brockmeyer family remained in the Dry Creek area until 1937, when they moved to a farm near Golva, North Dakota. When Herman's health failed, he and Ethel moved back to Converse County and lived in the town of Orpha until Herman's death in 1954.

Ethel spent some time in Washington and later returned to Orpha until her death in 1961. During her stay at Orpha, she wrote the Orpha news for the local newspapers. She, her son, Donald and his wife, Vera, ran the Orpha post office for several years.

Herminnie May Brockmeyer attended the two year high school at Dry Creek and finished at Douglas including the year of normal school to prepare her for teaching. She taught one year at the Braae School near Esterbrook and then married Claude Leonard Sanford of the Beaver Community. They were the parents of three children; Leroy and Harry Sanford and Pauline Middleton, all of whom still reside in the Douglas area. Benny and Pauline Middleton have a daughter, Pamela and a son, Kelly.

Donald Diedrich Brockmeyer didn't complete high school and worked as a cowboy at ranches all along the Cheyenne River. At various times he was employed by Sadlers, Nachtmans and Combs. Donald tended sheep for Gene Combs. One day he had a rattlesnake crawl across his arm while relaxing on the ground. The warmth of his arm caused the rattler to stop on his arm. He said it was an eternity until the snake crawled away.

Donald was in the service during World War II, was wounded in action and received the Purple Heart. He married Vera Kelly in 1955 and they made their home at Orpha, Wyoming, until his death in 1961 from an accidental gunshot. They had no children. While at Orpha, Donald invented a machine to make snow fences. He took commercial orders.

Charles Herman Brockmeyer attended Dry Creek School until the family moved in 1937. He graduated from high school at Golva, North Dakota, and then attended college at Wahpeton. He married Thalma Olson in 1943 and was in the service during the war. They later moved to Littleton, Colorado, where Charles was employed by Martin Marietta. In 1979, they moved to their present home in Ogden, Utah. Their children are Sharane and Steven who are residents of Littleton, Colorado. Steven and Kay, his wife, have two daughters, Alison and Jackie.

Merlin John Brockmeyer also attended Dry Creek schools until the family moved and he graduated from the Golva, North Dakota high school. He attended college at Rapid City, South Dakota, was in the service during the war, and has been employed most of his life at Boeing Aircraft in Seattle, Washington. He married Loretta Province in 1959 and they are the parents of four children; David, James and the twins, Robert and Patrick. The family resides at Kent, Washington.

Brockmeyer, Samuel and Adah

Samuel Henry Brockmeyer, Herman's brother, was born in 1885 in Iowa. Sam married Adah Blanche Carew, Herman's wife's sister (sisters married brothers). Their first son, Harvey, was born at Fargo, North Dakota in 1916. The following year, Francis was born at Bellingham, Washington. The family moved to Dry Creek, Wyoming in 1920 after Sam had gone on ahead and built a small one-room wooden cabin on the homestead. The family went to Sam's father's home in Platner, Colorado during the winter of 1920-21 where Earl was born. On returning to Dry Creek in the spring of 1921, they got caught in a blizzard and had to seek shelter with a farm family near the road. They settled on the first of three homesites they were to have in the area. It was while they were at the last homesite that Elizabeth was born at the larger home of Jim Blackman in 1930.

During the depression, the family left Wyoming and moved to a farm near Lynden, Washington, which became their permanent home. Sam passed away in 1964; Blanche still lives in Lynden.

Harvey Brockmeyer attended the University of Wyoming at Laramie from 1936 to 1942 and immediately became a pilot in the Air Force in World War II. He married Laura Cederquist in California in 1945. He taught vocational agriculture at Bakersfield High School until he retired in 1977. They have a son, Richard, who married Cindy Rowland. Richard and Cindy have a son, Brett, and all live in Palo Alto, California.

Francis Brockmeyer married Eleanore Pearson in 1944. Francis died in 1947 as a result of stress from World War II. Eleanore and their daughter Shirley still live in the Bellingham, Washington area.

Earl Brockmeyer married Philura Voth in 1966 and they have two children, James and Julie. Earl still oversees the family farm near Lynden.

Elizabeth Brockmeyer married Paul Hiebert in 1951. Their "hobby" is a small farm near Custer, Washington. They have a son, Marvin.

Earl, Harvey and Elizabeth share the following memories of the Dry Creek experience with us: It was not easy living in Dry Creek in the early 1920s! Luckily there were wild rabbits, antelope and birds to supplement the scanty food supply. After 1925, on our last homesite, we managed to raise a large garden of more than an acre and another acre or two of potatoes. We raised several litters of pigs each year, which we slaughtered for something that they had, which we needed. We also had as many as 25 cattle, but year in and year out, it took a lot of hard work to raise them. We can remember pumping water with a hand pump in the coldest weather, when the ponds were frozen over the ice two feet thick. When there was a dry year and very little grass, we had to find other feed to keep the cattle alive through the winter; it was after a prairie fire that we found that cattle would eat cactus that had the thorns burned off! During the 16 years that we lived in Wyoming, we cannot remember slaughtering any cattle to eat; they were too valuable as a cash income.

One government agricultural program that was supposed to bring down the supply of cattle in the United States is forever etched in our memories! The plan was simply to kill a certain percent of all cattle. The government paid the rancher from $3.00 to $5.00 for animals a year old or younger and $10.00 for cows. It was an emotional experience when the selected cattle were shot while you watched! Then they were dragged out into the pasture to rot! No one was supposed to eat any of the animals that had been killed, but sometimes the gunmen looked the other way and the rancher cut the throat of a fat calf and later dressed it out. This drastic plan did cut down on the number of cattle in the country, but the real problem was that no one had any money to buy meat at any price!

In the early thirties, the weather was quite dry and the wind blew and blew out of the west and we experienced the infamous "Dust Bowl." All of the plowed topsoil just blew away. We left Wyoming in 1937. The government paid us $3.34 per acre for our land with the building thrown in for good measure. Our house was moved to Douglas and remodelled. Uncle Herman's was moved to the Featherston place as a shop.

One incident of the depression remains as a very vivid memory. We had helped trail fifteen of our cattle to Douglas, which was a distance of about forty miles. This traildrive took two days and was a tiring job. Then it took a day to get back to Dry Creek.

A month or so went by with Dad checking the mail twice a week, when the mail was delivered to see what we had gotten for the cattle; the money was to buy the winter's flour, sugar and clothes. One mailday morning, Dad didn't come back right away and didn't show up for lunch. He had never done anything like this before and we became worried, but he finally showed up about four o'clock after he had walked around the entire place. He came in looking terribly depressed and Mom asked him what was the matter. He handed her a letter and then she looked even worse than he did. The letter was from the Great Northern Railroad and it simply stated that they had paid for the commission of the stockyards in Omaha for selling the cattle, but that there was not enough money left to cover the hauling charge!!! So instead of a check for the cattle, Dad got a bill from the railroad!!! They never got paid!

Brockway Family

Not much is known about the Brockways except names and where some of them lived.

Herman Brockway married Ellen D. Blakmon on May 17, 1857 in Farmersville, New York. Their known children were; Herbert, James, Glen, Minnie, Earl, Percy, Lora, Vida and Burt.

Percy married Eula Erban Abney. They had at least nine children; Lester, Lorna, Loyd, Clifford, Eula, Twins, Minnie, James and Wesley. Percy and his family lived for a time on upper Bedtick Creek in the 1920's and later somewhere around the Morton Flats. Percy is mentioned in Guy Newell Sr.'s diaries as working in the Esterbrook area in a sawmill in the 1880's. Percy died on March 28, 1946 in Eureka, California. Eula passed away on May 30, 1968.

Some of the Brockway family were involved in starting the Brockway Ditch or the Morton Canal as it is known today. John Williams and John Morton took the project over and finished it.

George Froggatt married Tillie Brockway in 1885,

L. to R.: Frances Abney, Eula Brockway, Brockway family, far right, James Abney.

James Brockway married Mary Cooper and Alexander Brockway married Maude Cooper.

Earl Hadley Brockway married Mary E. Zeller, daughter of Isadore and Mary Dieterich Zeller. Mary taught school in Douglas for many years and was much loved by her many students. They had one son, Lester, who graduated from the United States Naval Academy and rose to the rank of Admiral. Earl died on December 7, 1920; Mary on December 1, 1935.

Brooks, Luther and Sarah

Luther Brooks was born on March 1, 1850 in Vermont. His parents were George and Houghton Brooks.

Luther married Sarah Jane Noble, daughter of John Noble, Feb. 1, 1872. The Noble family came from England. Sarah was born there June 14, 1853.

Three sons, George E., William and Frank, were born to Luther and Jane.

Luther followed his brother Orin D. to Wyoming where he homesteaded. Finding out that homestead life was not for him, Luther moved to Douglas where he was employed as the janitor for the North Grade School for many years.

The sons married and lived in the area around Douglas and Lusk.

Luther died Jan. 13, 1943 while Sarah lived until Feb. 1, 1943. They are both buried in Douglas.

Brooks, O. D. and Mariah Family

My father, Ward O. Brooks, came to Wyoming in approximately 1881 with his parents, O. D. and Mariah Brooks and six brothers and sisters. The family had lived near Omaha, Nebraska and traveled to Wyoming by team and wagon. The cattle, however, had to be shipped by rail. Ward and his brother, Walter, were assigned to ride in the cattle car and take care of the animals during the long trip. The trainman discovered that the two boys were on the train and only one was allowed. Even though the boys were both young, the trainman insisted that one get off. The boys decided that Ward would get off and he had to make his way alone the rest of the way to Chadron, Nebraska. Chadron was the end of the line for the railroad at that time. When Ward finally reached Chadron he was welcomed by a much worried family. The family then traveled together to Lusk. Lusk was only a tent town at that time.

O. D. had a brother, Luther, who also had made his way to Wyoming.

O. D. (Orin Dean) and his sons, Walter and Ward, each filed on a homestead west of Douglas. Their homesteads joined and were north of Table Mountain on the LaPrele Creek. Spring water from the mountain furnished water for the houses and the creek furnished water for irrigation. The Brooks and neighbors built one of the first irrigation systems and raised hay and cattle.

Walter taught school and served as part-time minister of the First Methodist Church which the Brooks helped to build. This church was located in what is now downtown Douglas. This building was sold to another church and moved to Glendö. The First Methodist Church bought some property on South 5th Street and built another church.

Walter sold his homestead to Mint Roush, a long-time Douglas resident. Walter went to Michigan where his wife had relatives.

A sister, Hattie, (Mrs. Ed Amspoker) also lived in Douglas. She served as choir director, and played the piano and organ for the church. She died of typhoid fever during an epidemic in which she nursed many others back to health.

Ward had a sister, Cora, who lived in Lusk, she married William Louger. This marriage produced several children. In later years Cora lived in Douglas near her daughter, Myrtle. After Myrtle's death Cora went to Midwest to live with another daughter and died shortly thereafter.

Ward married Blanche Brook and one daughter, Glendyn, was born to them. Blanche died in 1919 and Glendyn went to California to live with relatives so that she could attend high school.

Glendyn married Walter Snider (now deceased) and they had two children. The son, Stanley (now deceased) married Gloria and they had four children. The daughter, Beverly married Douglas Williams, and they have three children. Glendyn and her progeny all live near San Francisco at the present time.

In 1921 Ward married Irene Cook. Irene had come to Douglas in 1917 with her brother, Albert and his family, who homesteaded 35 miles north of Douglas. She became a school teacher and filed on a homestead near Irvine. Her first teaching was done at the Irvine School. There were 21 students, the youngest five years old and in the first grade and the oldest 16 and in the first year of high school. Irene had finished high school and two years of college. She found the carrying of water in buckets by hand, keeping the fire going with wood she often chopped herself and teaching students almost her own age was quite a challenge. The determination of the young, 5', 105 lb., woman enabled her to achieve success in these ventures. She taught at several country schools including the Leet School, Highway School, Lost Springs School, the Shawnee School, and in the Douglas schools for the next few years.

Her marriage to Ward Brooks produced two daughters, Phyllis and Edith.

Phyllis married Bill Himmelreich, had three boys (all with families of their own now) and lives in Oxnard, California at present.

Edith married Lloyd A. Scyler and lives in Hermiston, Oregon.

Ward died April 19, 1962 and is buried in the Douglas Cemetery in the Brooks' family plot. Irene lives in Oregon with Edith. She was 90 years old on August 22, 1984. 1984.

Brose, William and Crete Family

William Carl Brose was born on August 30, 1875 in Germany. He was the son of Carl C. Brose who brought his family to the United States from Germany in 1880 to settle in Michigan. There were five children born to the Carl Broses, two sons, William and Otto, and three daughters, Minnie, Tina and Anna. Otto and William Carl migrated to Wyoming as young men.

Crete Althea Leonard was born on November 6, 1880 in Maxwell, Iowa, the daughter of Effie Brooks Leonard. She was a member of a family of five, Hattie, Crete, Fred, Mose and Clyde. The family migrated to Wyoming when Crete was a young woman.

Crete and William Brose became acquainted and were eventually married in Guernsey, Wyoming in 1900, settling in the Laramie Peak area. To this union four children were born, namely Wilma Fay (b. April 4, 1902 in Downey Park), Dorothy Irene (b. January 17, 1904), Verne Fred (b. February 26, 1906) and Leonard (b. September 15, 1912).

Hattie, Crete's older sister, was married to Andrew Braae, a railroad engineer. They took up ranching northwest of the Saul Ranch. After the accidental death of her husband and one of her sons, Hattie moved her family. The new location was called Braae, Wyoming, where Hattie established the Braae Post Office, serving as Postmistress there.

William Brose worked as a sawyer near Esterbrook, Wyoming for a time, where he lost a hand in a sawmill accident. Later, William moved his family to the old Rutherford place where the family lived for many years. It was there that Verne was stricken with typhoid fever, but due to Crete's loving care, he recovered. There, as well, the youngest boy, Leonard, was born.

I, Fay West, would like to relate an incident that happened to me. "Mother and a friend took a team and buggy and went out in the pine trees to pick berries. They took my sister, Dorothy, and me with them. While they were out of the buggy, I decided to get in it. My mother saw me and started calling to me, which frightened the horses. First they walked, she kept calling and they started trotting. I fell over the dashboard and hung in the circle of the buggy. The horses were galloping just before they ran into a tree, one on one side of the tree and the other one on the other side, the buggy broken to pieces. Just before that happened, I had fallen out of the buggy and the buggy passed over me and I was unhurt. God had his arms around me I am sure. My mother was sitting on the ground holding me and crying. By that time the horses were out grazing and I thought how beautiful they looked."

Otto Brose, William's brother, lived with the family most of the time. The brothers, with the help of two men, Ferris Bruner and Clarence Knott, put up hay to feed the animals for the coming winter.

The Brose children and those of a family named Shephard attended a rural school located half way between the homes of the two families.

Later on, the Brose family moved to the Cole place at the mouth of Mill Creek where Dorothy and Wilma Fay finished the eighth grade. Some of their teachers were Laura Johnson Reid and Rose Fitzhugh Johnstone. It was while they lived there that both William and Leonard fell ill from typhoid fever. Crete acted as both nurse and physician to her ailing husband and son. The children completed their education in the Douglas high school.

After finishing school, Dorothy taught school. She taught at the Herman Werner School, the Spracklen School and other schools. Dorothy married Fred Ward and moved to North Hollywood, California. Then Verne married Doris Cunningham of Douglas, Wyoming and they went to California. Fay married Forrest West in 1923 and moved to Douglas. Leonard married Violet Stewart. Violet was a Clerk of Converse County Court at one time and owned a place near Irvine, Wyoming.

William homesteaded on the lower end of Indian Creek, a tributary of LaBonte Creek. They made their home there until 1947 when they sold out to Ed Carlon and moved to California. Verne died in 1962, Otto on January 29, 1964, William on September 15, 1968 and Crete Brose on July 1, 1974.

Brow, George and Chloe

George Simon Brow was born December 15, 1876, the son of George H. and Bridget C. Brow, in Grosse Isle, Michigan.

George worked as a youth in the lumber industry in Michigan and later in Washington state. In April 1906 he came to Wyoming where he and his brothers continued their profession in the lumber business. He homesteaded on a fork of Wagonhound Creek near Magpie Springs.

On August 6, 1911 he married Chloe Hammond, daughter of James Harvey and Sarah Jane McNealy Hammond. Chloe was born in Joplin, Missouri on February 13, 1893 and came to Wyoming in 1902 with her parents.

They were the parents of 19 children, seven of whom died in infancy. Some of the children are; George H., Loss, Edward, Victor, Kathleen, Shirley (Bryson), Jack, Jean, Barbara (Read), Ida (Jackson), Sister Mary Joseph, Betty (Domschat), David, Sue (Fulk) and Ruby (Sullivan).

George died in February 1946, Chloe on June 2, 1961.

Their ranch is now owned by Ben and Pauline Middleton.

Brow, Godfrey Patrick and Lillian

Godfrey Patrick (Pat) Brow was the sixth child of a family of seven. He was born in 1886 and reared on a farm near Grosse Isle, Michigan. In April 1904, Pat moved with his mother and family to Lake Stevens, Washington. His parents having separated in 1901, he became the family provider, working in a logging camp. There he met and married Lillian (Lil) May McDonald on November 21, 1906. Lillian was born in Seattle, Washington, April 10, 1889.

Pat Brow came to Converse County Wyoming in 1908 with his brothers George and Thornton for the purpose of homesteading. Pat worked on the Lyman Cooper place (where John Pollock now lives) until he could file on a homestead in the mountains east of Downey Park. The Chamberlain brothers now own the property and use it as summer range. Another brother, Edward, also came to Wyoming from Washington and all three filed homesteads adjoining Pat's.

That first winter, Pat came down with typhoid fever. He was pretty sick by the time someone found him. They took him by horse and wagon to Douglas where Miss Galbraith nursed him back to health. She also kept Pat's wife in Washington informed of his well being, for which Lil was always grateful.

Lillian and daughter Eva joined Pat on his homestead in 1909. Pat bought a sawmill from Mr. Marshall and during his lifetime logged from Esterbrook to Downey Park. That mill became his mainstay and numerous times when he went broke ranching, or misfortune struck, he went back to the sawmill to get out of debt.

Their children were; Eva May, born in Lake Stevens, Washington March 3, 1908, married Clarence Hart in 1928. Mamie Winifred, born in Douglas October 15, 1910, married Clarence Dunn in 1928. Stanley Patrick, born in Douglas on February 23, 1913, married Doris McCartney on July 2, 1950. Patricia, born in Douglas on September 9, 1915, married Samuel Amspoker on August 4, 1935. June, born in Douglas April 22, 1917 and died in January 1918. Wanda Jane, born in Burlington, Washington on July 29, 1918, married Willie Collins in 1936. Alma Jean, born in Douglas on June 6, 1920, married Joseph Tolle in 1938. Donald, born in Douglas on September 20, 1922, married Betty St. John. Thomas Boyd, born in Douglas on March 8, 1925 married Luetta Joy.

This is a little story about how a niece of Pat's, Marcella Brow, died in the mountains south of Douglas where the Brow brothers homesteaded: In the winter of about 1916, Eva and Mamie went to the home of Thornton Brow to visit, about one half mile away. Upon deciding to return home, Arbulah and Arvilla, Thornton's girls, were instructed to go along to borrow an item. Their baby sister Marcella, age three or four, had tried to tag along but the older girls had scolded her and sent her home. When the girls returned at dark, their mother was surprised to discover that Marcella was not with them. A search continued all night and men came horseback from miles around to help. At daylight the next morning, she was found by her father, where she had frozen to death in a quaken aspen patch a short distance from the Pat Brow cabin.

After a stove pipe fire burned their homestead cabin to the ground in the late summer of 1921 the family moved to the old Bruner place on LaBonte. There Pat joined his brother Thornton and Dr. Keller in the Brow-Keller Livestock Company. Lil often referred to it as the "Jawbone Outfit". This company dissolved in 1923.

Pat then moved his family in 1924 to what was known as the William Patterson place about twenty three miles south of Douglas, presently owned by Ben Middleton. It was quite small but Pat ranched, worked a sawmill, trapped and bootlegged to keep his family of eight. Little by little he bought adjoining homesteads and built a ranch home in the 1940's. Pat continued to operate his sawmill until 1950 and the ranch until his death on June 28, 1956. Lillian died March 19, 1967 in Douglas.

Pat and Lil were hard working, honest people who were always willing to help someone less fortunate than themselves. Because of the distance from a doctor, Pat splinted many a broken bone, delivered a son, a grandson, and numerous nieces and nephews.

Even though they never had much, and for years lived in one room cabins, they were always ready to help a neighbor. Pat seldom went to town without bringing back a bachelor that couldn't find work. They stayed around working for room and board until another job could be found. Two of Pat's sisters-in-law died when their families were young but Pat and Lil were there to take in nieces and nephews and help raise them.

Brow, Thornton and Ethel

Thornton Brow was born in Grosse Isle, Michigan in 1879 to George and Bridget Brow. The Brow family worked in the timber industry.

Thornton came to Wyoming in April 1906 to file a homestead on Sled Creek southwest of Douglas. His brothers, Ed, George and Pat either came at the same time or joined him later.

He married Ethel Wilson who was born in North Carolina in 1884. They had six children: Woodrow (born August 5, 1914), Havelock (born October 25, 1912), Arvilla, Arbulah, Marcella and Charles.

The family lived for a while on the George Goodwin place on LaBonte Creek. It was here that the children went to school for part of the time.

Ethel died on December 16, 1918 during the flu epidemic.

Thornton carried the mail by horse and buggy on the Esterbrook route for a time. Thornton died in 1948.

Woodrow married Elizabeth Isaac, daughter of Harry and Irene Shaw Isaac, On April 27, 1940. They had two sons, James and Paul Clay and one daughter, Nancy Gayle. Jim married Sharon Graves, Clay married Sarah Cousins and Gayle married Allan Ulibarri.

Woodrow "Rody" and his family lived on the Goodwin place for a while where they were in partnership with Commodore and Marian Burden running sheep. Later they moved to the Allen place where they still reside. Rody died on June 18, 1980.

Havelock was never married and died on September 30, 1968.

Arbulah married Martin Price. They ran the O. P. Skaggs store in Douglas for a number of years. They had six children. Arbulah died in 1968.

Arvilla married Mr. Dillon and has three children.

Charles married Louise Wickwire and died in 1982 in Denver.

Marcella died from exposure on a cold night when she became lost at the age of four. (There is more about this in the Pat Brow story.)

Brown, Cyrus O. and Viola

C. O. Brown, the son of Francis M. and Elizabeth Brown, was born in Tipton, Iowa on December 2, 1886.

He married Viola Cole, daughter of H. W. and Susan Cole, on May 1, 1901, in Lincoln, Nebraska, Viola was born May 21, 1872.

C. O. and Viola moved to Burwell, Nebraska where he had established a law practice earlier.

Cleone was born in 1902 and Eileen in 1906 in Burwell.

In 1907, the family moved to Converse County. C. O. homesteaded under the LaPrele Dam project. His homestead was north of where the LaPrele interchange on Highway I-25 is now.

Shortly after homesteading, the family moved to Douglas. C. O. built his own house at 500 South Sixth Street. Their nearest neighbor was W. F. Mecum at 435

South Fifth Street. The Browns bought milk by the bucket from them.

C. O. purchased a Rambler car from its former owner. The car had the distinction of being the first car in Douglas when its first owner had purchased it.

Wilma was born in Douglas in 1908.

C.O. was appointed to the bench as Judge of the Sixth Judicial District of Wyoming in 1921 by Governor Robert D. Carey. He served in that capacity for 14 years. He returned to his private law practice at that time.

Viola died on September 27, 1951, Judge Brown on February 19, 1953.

Brown, Frank M. and Rebecca

Frank M. Brown was born in Adair County, Iowa, August 1, 1879 to Francis M. and Elizabeth Kester Brown. He attended grade and high school in Iowa and went to business college in Lincoln, Nebraska. After completion of college, he worked in a bank in Lincoln, Nebraska.

In 1906 Frank decided to move to Wyoming and filed for a homestead which was 8 miles west of Douglas. He worked on the construction of the LaPrele Dam Project while putting up buildings and preparing his homestead land for cultivation. While visiting relatives in Burwell, Nebraska Frank met and several years later married Rebecca C. Beynon, (born December 21, 1884). Rebecca was the daughter of David S. and Christena J. Beynon. She was raised and educated in Burwell going to normal school in Fremont, Nebraska and taught for several years in both New York and Burwell, Nebraska before coming to Wyoming to make her home. Frank and Rebecca were married June 12, 1912 in Douglas. Four children were born: Marjorie Feb. 23, 1913; Vivian May 11, 1914; Frank in 1915 and Robert, Apr. 21, 1922. Frank died at age four in 1919 and Marjorie died in 1983.

As the community grew and new settlers were arriving to claim homestead rights, social and business activities began being organized, of which, Frank and Rebecca both took an active part and held responsible offices. One of the first things needed was a school which was built in 1919. This school was called "Central" being named such since it was then centrally located to all who would then attend. All the children rode horse-back to school. We had 3½ miles to ride, some further, but I do not recall ever missing a day for weather and very seldom for sickness. Both Frank and Rebecca were school board members many times.

Other activities, both social and business, began to grow such as the LaPrele Community meetings. Business, needs of the community, and politics were discussed at these meetings. While the adults carried on the business, it was play time for all the children. Lunch and a social hour always followed. Everyone had an enjoyable evening and looked forward to those monthly meetings. A Sunday School was organized and a missionary minister or one from Douglas would be present once in a while. The rest of the time local people would take part, teaching classes, singing, preparing programs, playing musical instruments, etc., each using his own talents and knowledge.

In the late 1920s (I am uncertain as to the dates), an extension club was organized for the women. This was called the Homebuilder's Extension Club. This was a great day, once a month, for all. Since most of the women did not drive, the men and children would go also, so it was a family and fun day for all. Each member took a turn entertaining in her home; it was a busy time preparing for the group. About this same time Farm Bureau was organized and the LaPrele Community was very active in all its projects. A dairy association was organized, the milk being shipped each day to Casper by truck. Since there was no refrigeration at that time the milk had to be thoroughly cooled and delivered each morning to the highway where it was picked up by a truck. It was a short meeting time for the men as they delivered the milk and exchanged thoughts and bits of news only to hurry back to a very busy schedule of farming.

Pioneering was very difficult as the equipment was very primitive, housing very meager, and Wyoming weather very rugged for many of these people. Many hardships were endured, many defeats and failures encountered but the challenge was great. The efforts were all worthwhile when one saw a new country developed, a community grow and prosper, and friendships made that lasted a lifetime.

In 1937 Frank, Rebecca and their son Robert moved to Fremont County, Wyoming. Frank and Rebecca moved to Casper, Wyoming in 1942 where they worked until retirement. Frank died June 22, 1958 and Rebecca died April 6, 1968. Both are buried in the Douglas Cemetery.

Brown, Walter J. and Blanche

Walter J. Brown was an early settler and pioneer in the ranching industry of Converse County, Wyoming.

Walter was born on August 23, 1890 in Camp Crook near Belle Fourche, South Dakota to Albert and Hanna Brown. His father settled in the Black Hills of South Dakota in 1875, before it was inhabited by white men. He had the first homestead on the Little Missouri River.

Walter's ranching ability was handed down to him by his father and grandfather at an early age. When he became a young man he worked for the Hash Knife and Mill Iron Ranches for six years. His next move was to buy a ranch on Powder River near Miles City, Montana. When World War I was declared, Walter enlisted in the army in 1917, and served until after Armistice Day in 1918.

Walter and Blanche Perkins were married on December 6, 1919 at Broken Bow, Nebraska. She was the daughter of Elbonson and Ollie Applegarth, who had a family of twelve children.

At an early age Blanche moved with the family to Broken Bow, Nebraska. Her mother died when she was five years old, and a year later she was adopted by Will and Grace Perkins. When she was 19 she moved to Miles City, Montana. It was there that she met and later became Walter Brown's wife.

Walter and Blanche came to Wyoming in 1921 and homesteaded on land in Converse County, seventy miles north of Douglas, Wyoming near Antelope Creek.

Their dwellings consisted of a two-room log house and an outbuilding. The animal sheds and corrals were also built of logs that Walter hauled in from the mountains. It was here that Walter and Blanche carried on a ranching operation for over twenty years.

To this union was born a son, William Albert (Billy) on February 24, 1931 at Douglas, Wyoming. Billy started his career in the rural school at Verse, Wyoming, and on his father's ranch in Converse County.

Cattle were Walter's major interest. He belonged to the Wyoming Stock Grower's Association.

During the years of operating their property in Wyoming, Walter and Blanche endured loneliness but exhibited the sturdy endurance and indomitable courage of the true pioneers. There were few men at that time, who had a larger knowledge of every phase of the ranching industry than Walter Brown. He was also an expert trapper of wild fur-bearing animals. He used his skills and clever ways to lure coyotes to his traps. Coyote pelts were worth good money in those days.

Over the years, Walter increased his acreage of land and livestock. In 1942, foreseeing that he was limited in expanding further, Walter sold his place to Irwin Livestock Company and purchased a larger ranch in Weston County, south of Upton, Wyoming.

Walter and Blanche's son, Billy, and Karen Guilford of Sundance, Wyoming were married June 30, 1951. They had a family of four children.

Walter later purchased another ranch near Upton and ran 1000 to 1200 head of sheep. Billy and Karen managed this place for awhile. In 1964 Walter sold part of his holdings south of Upton and bought a farm near Vale, South Dakota. Billy and Karen took over the operation of this farm. It was on the farm that Billy lost his life in a tractor accident on June 4, 1965.

Walter owned a residence in Newcastle, Wyoming where he and Blanche lived part-time. Blanche was an active member of the Baptist Church.

Mrs. Brown passed away at the Weston County Memorial Hospital on November 24, 1962. Mr. Brown spent his later years between his home in Newcastle and his farm and ranch. At the age of 80 he died of a brief illness on January 14, 1971.

Walter, Blanche, and son, Billy, are buried in the family plot in Greenwood Cemetery at Upton, Wyoming.

Compiled by Walter and Blanche's former daughter-in-law, Karen Paverud, and written by Billy's former teacher, Velma Steckley

Brownfield, Thomas J.

Thomas J. Brownfield was born in Smithfield, Fayette County, Pennsylvania in 1853. His parents moved to southeast Iowa when Tom was five years old. He grew to manhood there on his parent's farm.

In 1877 he married Emma Myers. They had three sons; Theodore C., Robert R. and George R.

He moved to Grand Island, Nebraska in 1879 where he farmed and taught school. In 1886 he organized the Farmers Union Fire Insurance Co. He was its first general manager, serving in that capacity for 25 years. In 1897 he moved the company to Lincoln, Nebraska.

His wife, Emma, died while they were living in Grand Island and he then married Mary G. Filsinger (born December 19, 1868) of Alda, Nebraska. One daughter, Edna Marie, was born to them. She later married Frank Kershisnik of Rock Springs, Wyoming.

Disposing of his interests in the insurance company, Mr. Brownfield moved to Converse County in 1911. He began ranching in the area. Among the places was the Green Valley on Little Boxelder Creek west of Douglas. Disposing the ranch soon after his arrival he then established a real estate business and opened a livestock and insurance exchange in Douglas. He was also very active in promoting the LaPrele Dam Project. A tract of land immediately southwest of Douglas is named after him.

Mr. Brownfield died on September 11, 1931 in Douglas.

Brubaker, Alvah and Ida Family

Al Brubaker first came to Converse County, Wyoming, in the spring of 1907. He had grown up on a farm near Wabash, Indiana, the son of a farmer and minister in the Church of the Brethren. He was 22 years old at the time, and came in response to an ad placed in a Chicago paper by the Mountain Home Sheep Company asking for ranchhands.

The Mountain Home Sheep Company ranch house is located on the south bank of the North Platte River a few hundred yards west of where the Parkerton depot sat by the Northwestern Railroad in the Big Muddy Oil Field. Their sheep ranged over what is now the oil field, part of the Big Muddy Creek, and well to the north of the Platte River into the Cole Creek drainage.

Al was so taken with sheep ranching in these wide-open ranges and his job of camp tender, that he decided Wyoming was to be his home. He went back to Indiana in the late summer of the same year, married Ida Genevra Livengood, on the 23rd of September, and returned to Wyoming and his job, accompanied by his bride.

The following summer, on July 10, 1908, Elbridge, the first of 12 children was born to Al and Ida. This event alerted the young couple to a need for ranch land and livestock of their own. Within a few months a partnership in the ranching business was formed with Walter Thayer on the Cannondale Ranch, located on Hunton Creek, eight miles southeast of Glenrock. The partnership lasted only a few years, terminated by the death of Mr. Thayer. Al continued to operate the ranch on a leased basis until 1916, at which time he and Ida purchased the Cannondale Ranch, on which they continuously lived until 1924, and then intermittently until 1937. At that time they moved to lands acquired adjacent to the town of Glenrock. They lived there until retirement from active ranching in 1949.

Al's 42 years of ranching comprised diversities beyond the usual concept of ranching. Some of these diversities were dairying, raising mules, turkeys, rabbits, and chickens; carrying the mail to the Boxelder Post Office from Glenrock; vegetable gardening, and raising navy beans, strawberries, sunflowers, millet, oats, wheat and barley. Most of these activities appeared, disappeared, and sometimes reappeared during the 42 years. All were superimposed at various levels of production on three constant activities of dairying, haying, and raising cattle and sheep. A controlling factor in most instances was market demand and a profit or loss.

Al was a very friendly, likeable fellow. He was innovative, adventurous, unpredictable — in some ventures, unrealistic. He was seldom dissuaded by others from pursuing a project. Some examples of his activities are:

- Texas longhorn cattle shipped in to fatten on Wyoming grass — a loser.
- A brooder for hundreds of turkeys — a winner.
- A horse gentler and breaker which consisted of two long poles arranged as a "V" anchored at the vortex on a pivot, with a wagon wheel attached to the opposite end of each pole. An unbroken mule or horse was hitched by tugs and halter between the wheels and turned loose to travel in a circle as he pulled the "V" after him as it turned at the pivot. At the end of two to three 4-hour periods working in this contraption the animal was usually troubleless when hitched with a well-broken horse — big success.
- A trip, via the stream-bed, through Boxelder Canyon — difficult and wet for a party of six and a shepherd dog.
- Training horses for jumping, lying down, Roman-riding, and performing as an act at the Wyoming State Fair — well received.
- Participating in the 1924-25 Florida Real Estate Boom as a real estate salesman — a bust.
- Organization of Brubaker Ranches, Inc. on lands procured in the immediate vicinity of Glenrock — a big winner.
- Procurement of oil leases on land poo-pooed by many, but paid off with the discovery and development of the South Glenrock Field — a handsome return. As in a fairy tale, Al and Ida's declining years were free of money worries.

Al and Ida were civic-minded. They regularly attended the Glenrock Community Baptist Church with all their children. The whole family had singing ability utilized in the church choir. Ida served as Sunday School Superintendent for over 30 years. The stained glass in the church windows is a memorial to Al and Ida Brubaker. Ida was a member of the Glenrock Rebekah Lodge and the Women's Club. She was designated Wyoming Mother of the Year in 1951 by then-Governor Frank Barrett.

Al was elected to the State House of Representatives, from Converse County, in November, 1916, and re-elected in November, 1918; and participated in the 14th and 15th sessions of the legislature. He was not a passive legislator, as the records of this body show that several bills were introduced by Mr. Brubaker, some of which were enacted into law. He served many years on the Glenrock School Board, and was assistant county assessor for two years, and chairman of the Converse County Welfare Board for four years. He was also a member of the Wyoming Pioneer Association and served as president.

The family of Al and Ida consisted of six sons and six daughters. As of this date, January 1, 1984, Al and Ida have 124 descendants, of which only six are deceased. The 12 children are listed here in chronological order.

Al died in 1967. Ida died in 1980.

Brubaker, Tom and Ruth

Thomas K. Brubaker was born in Peru, Ind. on June 4, 1888. He was one of 14 children, born to Mary Moore and Ellis Brubaker.

Father Ellis was first a deacon, then a minister in the Brethren (Dunkard) Church nearby, so Tom and his 13 brothers and sisters were all good Christians. They all worked hard and played hard and were a happy group.

The Wallace-Hagenbach Circus winter quarters were on a neighboring farm with a lot of ponies, mules and other animals in the pastures. So Tom and his brothers grew up learning to trick ride and how to do stunts with the animals. The neighboring Miami Indians were also playmates. Tom seemed to think he was an Indian as he grew up.

Tom went to college in North Manchester, Indiana along with several of his brothers and sisters, for about two years, in 1910 and 1911. He was too restless to stay in college very long, so he worked here and there and traveled.

While visiting his sister, Edith, who was teaching in California, he met Ruth Henderson (born Dec. 29, 1883). He went home to Indiana, worked in the Marshall Field store in Chicago but couldn't stay away from California and Ruth.

In 1914 he followed his brother, Alvah, to Glenrock, where they herded sheep and worked for a big sheep company in Parkerton (Big Muddy). Tom finally persuaded Ruth to come to Wyoming to marry him and live on his homestead, so she came with her foster father, R. J. Stuke. She and Tom were married in the old Henning Hotel in Casper on October 10, 1916. The ceremony was performed by his father, Rev. Ellis Brubaker.

The happy newly-weds set up housekeeping on Tom's homestead of 320 acres about 10 miles southeast of Glenrock, adjoining Bill and Addie Abadie and R. D. Carey's land at the foot of Boxelder Canyon (the old Boy Scout Camp). Ruth had a wonderful time learning about Wyoming and the ways of the West. Alvah and Ida, Tom's brother and sister-in-law lived two miles away on the old Thayer place.

Tom and Alvah decided to run a meat market, so they bought the old Cannondale Market on the corner of Birch and 3rd Streets (site of the present Taylor-Hoyt Bldg.). They ran this for awhile, while Glenrock was booming with the discovery of oil in the Big Muddy Field.

Tom was noted for his great sense of humor and practical jokes. He worked hard and could always find something to laugh about. One time he made a sizeable wager with a local man that he could ride horseback to Chicago within a certain time period, (I remember 30 days), carrying a letter from the Glenrock mayor to the Chicago mayor, for $500. Tom completed the ride in the time period, but was broke on arrival. He found a job on the stage, letting Will Rogers rope him while on horseback. That earned enough money to get him and his horse home to Glenrock. Don't know whether he collected the money he won or not. Then one spring, when the Platte River was high, he walked a cable stretched across the river, like he had seen the circus people do when he was a kid; he didn't fall in, either.

He and Ruth had a family of two children by now, Betty (born June 18, 1918) and Don (Buzz) (born May 31, 1920). They moved back to Indiana, where he worked for the Indiana Light and Power Co. as a surveyor.

Daughter Barbara was born in Indiana on Grandfather Ellis' farm. Then another move to Los Angeles, where son Tommy was born; he only lived 2½ years. The sorrow of his death drove the family back to good old Glenrock and the homestead again. Another son, John, was born in 1931.

Times were tough in the 30s, so with the older kids in high school, Tom and Ruth moved to Glenrock. Tom became a jack-of-all-trades, doing plumbing, wiring, and plastering. He bought the old Howard Jackson place on Birch Street and made a nice home.

Tom had been having secret heart pains for some time. His fishing buddies knew of them, but were sworn to secrecy. His family didn't know about his problems. One day he came in from a fishing trip, went to bed, and quietly died; just the way he wanted to — quickly. This was on May 31, 1946. He had a good and happy life, enjoyed his family and a host of friends.

He served one term as Mayor of Glenrock, 1941-43. During this term, he and Irby Lam landscaped and planted trees in the city park. He belonged to the Lions Club, I.O.O.F., and was a Past Master of A.F. & A.M. Lodge #22. He was respected and loved by all who knew him, and most of all by his children. He taught us to love and respect all of God's creatures, the outdoors and to respect and honor our elders and be kind to everyone.

Ruth died on Nov. 10, 1977.

Bruner, Thomas and Martha Family

Thomas Bruner, a native of Hope, Indiana, was born in 1855, the son of Charles and Eliza Bruner. His parents and grandparents were members of the Moravian Church group that founded the town of Hope. They had come overland from Winston-Salem, North Carolina, a town also founded by the Moravians, by covered wagon and ox teams. In 1882, Thomas moved to Dow City, Iowa, where he worked for Judge Dow, founder of Dow City.

In 1885, Thomas Bruner was united in marriage to Martha Almira Comfort Whaley Bruner. Martha was born in 1847, the daughter of Judge Simeon and Susan Wimmer Comfort, in a deserted Mormon cabin while her parents were enroute to Oregon by covered wagon. The cabin was near the present city of Council Bluffs, Iowa. The family remained there for one year after which they went to Holt County, Missouri for four years, before starting out for Oregon once more. When they reached their old home in Iowa, however, the Comforts decided to remain there, later moving to the Boyer Valley near Dow City so that they might be closer to school in which to educate their children.

Among Martha's early recollections were the Indian uprisings, the first railroad being built through Iowa, and the time her father brought home their first kerosene lamp. Before that time, candle making was a daily chore. When the Civil War broke out, she was working on the Denison newspaper, setting the newsheads by hand. At the age of 15, she started teaching school. In 1867, she was married to Charley Whaley, and to this union one daughter, Susie, was born. Mr. Whaley died in 1882, after which Martha went to Chicago to study nursing and midwifery. She delivered more than 200 babies during her career, most of which were born in Iowa.

Thomas Bruner and Martha Whaley Bruner were the parents of three children, Hazel (b. 1886), Mary Martha (b. 1889) and Morris, all of whom were born in Iowa. Morris died at birth. Ferris Bruce Bruner was born in Iowa in 1897, but was an adopted son.

In 1901, Thomas Green Bruner and his wife and family came to Douglas making the trip from Iowa in a Chicago and Northwestern boxcar. In addition to the family members, the car held a team of mares, a milk cow, a Shropshire ewe, the pet dog and cat, a buggy and numerous household goods. The sheep were trained to walk the treadmill that ran the cream separator.

The Bruners had been obliged to leave Iowa due to the fact that Martha had lung trouble which was worsening. The doctor advised her to move to a higher, drier climate. It must have been sound advice, since Martha lived to be 98 years old.

Upon their arrival in Douglas, they hitched their team to the buggy, and enlisting the help of Willard Saul, who hauled their belongings out to the ranch, they proceeded to the land on LaBonte which they had bought from Dwight Cole, which consisted of 404 acres. There was a four room house, several sheds and corrals on the property, but no water well, so they used water from LaBonte Creek. They also bought Cole's livestock, numbering about 100 head of cattle, two mules and two saddle horses. Later on, they shipped in a carload of registered Shorthorn cattle as well as their furniture.

Hazel Bruner, their eldest daughter, was married to Thomas Hodges in 1902. Shortly afterwards she became very ill and Martha took her back to Iowa to seek better medical care. However, Hazel died in 1902 and was buried at Denison, Iowa.

Thomas Bruner filed on a 160 acre homestead at the foot of Mill Hill in 1904 and Martha filed for a "timber and rock" claim on 40 acres. Martha had bought the Sam Cummings place on Mill Creek which joined the Cole place in 1902. The Cummings place consisted of 240 acres with a one room house close by a big spring. Later, the Bruners built their house in this location.

They moved from the Cole place to Thomas' homestead, living in a sort of barn about 8 x 10 with a lean-to along side for the horses and the milk cow. They built a two storied house later, the lower part made of logs, and the upper story made of frame construction. This homestead claim was pre-empted, which meant that the claimant must live for 14 consecutive months on the land instead of the usual six months for a period of three years. During that year, Bruners leased the Cole place to George Munday.

When Ferris started to school, his teacher was Mrs. Esmay. The desks were homemade double desks, two children to each desk. School was held for about three months in the spring and in the fall, depending on the availability of money.

It was about this time that Martha was called upon to act as midwife for Mrs. Joe Starr whose home was located near where Hubbard's Cupboard is today. She rode horseback to Esterbrook where she was met by a man who accompanied her the rest of the way to the Starr home. Martha was about 60 years old when she made this ride through stirrup-deep snow.

The Bruners moved back to the Cole place in 1905. They remodeled the house and enlarged it. Thomas bought about 100 head of pewee lambs from Mortons which Martha and Ferris herded in the daytime, bringing them to the corral at night.

Thomas had a certificate for 100 shares in the LaBonte Telephone Company, dated 1904. This line was contracted to Arthur H. Cook for putting in the poles to Douglas in 1903. The line extended from Douglas up LaBonte to Esterbrook, and on to the Laramie Plains. There were 27 phones, each having a card which explained the procedure for reaching a certain family. To call Central, it was necessary to ring one long ring. Thomas was the line repairman, also collecting the fees required for Central assistance. Luther Freeman was lineman after Thomas. The stockholders assessed themselves $24 per year, the balance of the renters paid $12 per year. The line was abandoned about 1930.

Ferris went to school during this time at two school-houses, one was southeast of the present Dick Pexton home and the other was down below Dick's on LaBonte, but above the Black Bridge School that was built later.

One morning while waiting for class to begin, several of the boys got to throwing snowballs at the transom over the school house door to see who could come the closest and Ferris aimed too well, broke the window and Miss Reid gave him a spanking he still remembers!

A sawmill called the Nicolaysen Mill had been established, and sale of timber from their claims supported a dozen or so families. Bruners sold timber to the mill, receiving payment by counting each stump. Thomas also contracted with the county to supply bridge timbers. He cut ditch posts and sold them for 10¢ each as well. Martha did her part, putting eggs in waterglass and selling them to Foxtons for their sheep camps at 75¢ per dozen. The sawmill closed in 1912.

Ferris' next school was at the Mill School.

During this time, 1909-1912, the Bruners leased the Cole and Cummings places to Fred and Helen Isaac. They ran the Bruner cattle for half the calves and also had the Bruner sheep to run.

In the fall of 1912, Ferris started to high school in Douglas, riding his bicycle into town over the rutty roads. It was a distance of some 25 miles. He stayed with the Rutherfurds at first and later with his sister, Mary, who had married Billy Gerlach in 1911. The next fall, Martha moved into Douglas with Ferris, renting a little house across the street from City Hall. They brought their milk cow which they put with the "town herd" and which was milked and cared for by Ferris. He did not finish his high school education however, for he contracted Scarletina, missed a lot of school and dropped out. He then worked at various jobs, haying for Willox and Brose, herding sheep for Foxton, working cattle for Ullman and finally riding with the Stirrup roundup for John Moran. He was also employed for a short time helping on the basement of the LaBonte Hotel during its construction.

In 1916, the Bruners built their house at the Sam Cummings spring. They brought the logs from their timber claim, hauling them down on bobsleds. Thomas hewed them with a broad ax. Jack Kreisler, an old prospector living on Mill Creek, helped run the cement and engineered the laying up of the logs. Thomas bought flooring, windows (which had curved glass at the top and two big panes below), and the big front door from the old courthouse in Douglas which was being torn down, and bricks for the chimneys. The indoor plumbing was installed by the firm of Charlie Clark. The water was piped down from the spring into a hydraulic ram which sent it up to the top of the hill into a cement cistern. From there it returned to the house by gravity flow. Theirs was one of the first "modern homes" in the area.

Ferris entered the army in 1918 along with Jim Willox, Carl LeBar and others from the county. He was sent to Colorado Springs where he was trained in telegraphy. He contracted influenza however, and was discharged later that year.

The land lying north of the Bruner house belonged to the State of Wyoming. Since it was an isolated tract, Bruners were able to buy it. Ferris bought land near the Esterbrook Road and filed on a homestead south of the ranch in 1919.

Thomas bought his first car in 1916. It was a 1913 Studebaker, fitted with kerosene lamps which served as headlights, and later he bought a 1918 Model T Ford. The Bruners also bought a new Galloway woodsaw rig in 1917. It was powered by a six horsepower engine and was made entirely of iron, including the wheels. Ferris toured the country side sawing up piles of wood for people, moving the saw from place to place with horses. The only trouble with the rig was that the exhaust came down underneath and the sparks could set the sawdust afire. Once it did and burned up George McDonald's woodpile.

Mary Dunn Bruner was the oldest child of Philip and Lenora Dunn. She was born in Harrison, Nebraska in 1896 and grew to adulthood there. She graduated from the Crawford High School in 1916 at the head of her class. She taught school for one term near Coffee Siding located between Harrison, Nebraska and Van Tassell, Wyoming. She earned $50 per month of which she paid $12 for board and room. In 1917, she came to Wyoming where she taught the Pleasant Valley School near Natural Bridge. Here she earned $60 per month. Later that year she became ill and returned to Nebraska.

In February of 1918, she returned once more to Wyoming to teach the Braae School. She arrived in Douglas on the train and the next morning the mail stage, driven by George Hammond, came to take her to school. The "stage" was an open buggy drawn by one horse and one mule. Mary was not suitably dressed for the long, cold ride. She was wearing a velvet hat, a lightweight coat, kid gloves and highly glazed kid shoes. The weather was cold, and soon after their departure from Douglas, the snow came down driven by a high wind.

They arrived at Thornton Brow's place in the afternoon where they had dinner and changed teams. Mary was so cold she didn't think about washing for dinner. The Brow's cute little son, Rody, put his hands in her lap and said, "Say, did you wash?" The Brows were terribly embarrassed, as was Mary, but George Hammond thought it was a fine joke. Rody kept rubbing Mary's shiny shoes.

They continued their journey to the Charlie Saul bungalow where they decided to stay the night. The following day they traveled to the Hattie Braae home. When Mary and George arrived, they were met by Dean Braae, a boy of 16 years. He informed them that his mother had left the previous night on a sick call and would not return for about ten days, but he assured Mary that he would do the cooking. He did, and was excellent at his job.

The Braae home consisted of two rooms, but the doorway between the two had no door. One room was to be Mary's and to serve also as the school room. It was furnished with a wood-burning heater, a table which would serve as a desk for the students, a small commode with a bowl and pitcher and a bed. The cabin, made of logs, was very cold.

Mary had no blackboard, not very many books, and used the table in her room for desks. She had the two little Braae girls, Mildred and Irene, and later Anton Braae brought his son, Arnold, down and then Steve Braae brought his daughter Hattie, so she had four pupils. She was hired to teach five months, but the district had to have six months to draw their oil royalty, so she was there six months. She got $70 a month and paid $15 for board. She went home that summer for a short time and came back to teach there again the fall and winter of 1918-1919.

For entertainment, dances were held in the neighborhood. All rode horseback to the dances, the ladies carrying their nice dresses in sacks, and changing clothes after they arrived. Music was by Elliot Hamner and John Dunn played mouthharp. They only knew about two waltzes, cadrills, two steps, so they played the same ones over and over. Breakfast was served before the parties went home, usually fried potatoes, bacon and biscuits.

Mary Dunn and Ferris Bruner were married in June of 1919 in the old Methodist Church in Douglas. They lived with Thomas and Martha at the Cummings place. Martha had a quick tongue, and once after Mary and Ferris were married, Mary was working in the kitchen. They had a man working for them by the name of "Red" Cole. He said, "Mary," and she stopped to see what he wanted. He asked, "How far would you have been if I hadn't stopped you?" Before Mary could retort, Martha whipped out, "Twice the length of a fool! Get down and measure it!"

Thomas and Martha bought a small place near Pomona, California in 1923. Ten years later they came to live once more with Mary and Ferris. Thomas sold the Cole place to Dr. Keller and Thornton Brow, (the Keller-Brow Livestock Company) in 1919. Brow had bought some high priced steers and the firm went broke, so they turned the Cole place back to the Bruners. Later, in 1929, they sold it to Elmer Enbody and the Timber place was purchased by George Ullman in 1935.

Thomas and Martha celebrated their Golden Wedding Anniversary at the ranch in 1935. Thomas died in 1939 and Martha in 1945.

Ferris and Mary were the parents of three children, namely Charles Philip, born March 31, 1920 at the Bruner Ranch, Archie Thomas, born April 2, 1921 at the old Fort Fetterman which Mary's parents had bought, and Sibyl June, born May 9, 1924 at the ranch.

Ferris sawed ice for his family and others in the community with a hand ice saw. Later, Clyde Rogers built a power saw for him from a railroad handcar. Once they were cutting ice at Pexton's Reservoir. The ice was 27" thick. The power saw cut only 11", so they had to finish the cutting by hand. It was a mighty cold job, but appreciated in the hot summer since there was ice for cold drinks and ice cream and a means of cooling the old fashioned ice-boxes. The ice was stored in special buildings, made with an air space between the double walls. The ice was stored in layers, separated with plenty of sawdust.

In the fall of 1929, Ferris discovered a rattlesnake den on his homestead. There were hundreds of snakes coming to the den to hibernate. Ferris got some dynamite, attached it to a pole and pushed it into the den as far as he could. He set it off and after that there were not nearly as many rattlers around.

In the spring of 1933, in late April, there was a wet, heavy snow which measured 5' deep. Ferris got up on all of the buildings and scooped off the snow so the roofs would not cave in. He rode one of the workhorses to break a trail so the children could walk to school. The horses, which were tied in the barn, lost their tails as high up as the sheep could reach, for Ferris put his sheep in the barn to afford them some protection. Later, they hitched four horses in tandem and pulled the plow to make a trail so that they could get the sheep up on the hills where the snow was beginning to melt.

Mary bought several hundred turkey poults which thrived on the millions of grasshoppers which descended on the parched land in 1934.

In 1935, the Douglas Sportsmen's Club donated the labor and material to build a fish rearing pond just below the Bruner spring. John Downs was the boss of the job. The pond was a dirt filled dam about 6' high with a cement and plank headgate. The Game and Fish Commission stocked it with small trout, transporting them there in cream cans. Eventually they put the fish in LaBonte Creek and never tried to raise any more.

The Bruner children were educated in the rural schools in the community. In 1930, a 4-H Club was organized, with Mary Bruner acting as one of the leaders. The 4-H camp was held at the Esterbrook Lodge. Mary was also a charter member of the LaBonte Homemakers Club.

The United States Government held a training school in Douglas to teach men to survey. Charles and Ferris attended. Each of them ran a Plane Table and had two chainboys a piece to help. They resurveyed much of Converse County. Ferris was also Water Commissioner for LaBonte, Wagonhound and LaPrele Creeks for a time. Ferris sheared sheep, his own as well as those of others, using blades at first and later using machines. He was also a Farm Bureau Insurance Agent for a time.

Ferris' mother-in-law, Lenora Dunn, gave Ferris a fiddle which had been left in the house they bought at Ft. Fetterman. After having it repaired, he learned to play it quite well, fiddling for many country dances. In 1939-40, he played in the "LaBonte Quartette" band whose members were Archie and Sibyl Bruner and Lawrence Prager. They played at Esterbrook, Walker Creek, Dry Creek, Grant's Pavillion, LaPrele Hall and other places. Ferris also did carpentering and plumbing for several of his neighbors. He was truly a "jack of all trades."

Mary's talents were many. She raised a big garden, canning vegetables and wild fruit with the aid of the old Monarch wood cookstove. She always raised chickens, helped put up the hay, herded sheep, took care of her aged mother-in-law, boarded the school teachers, and for many years wrote the LaBonte news items for "The Douglas Budget." Mary and Ferris were charter members of the Converse County Farm Bureau and worked in the LaBonte local as well as the county organization for many years. They left the ranch in 1970 to be employed as caretakers at the Natural Bridge Park until 1973. Then they moved to Douglas where Mary died in 1973. Ferris makes his home with his children, Charles and Sibyl.

The Leonard Strock homestead was just west of our place and was our source of playmates, living so close. Charlie, Dick and Jean Strock went to school with Charles Bruner started in 1925. The teacher was Beulah Walston, and the next year the teacher was Faye Reed. In 1927 Rody Brow stayed at Bruners and went to school, and Archie Bruner started, and also Havelock Brow with the teacher being Martha Meigs. In 1928 Mary Bruner taught and had the Strocks, Bruners and Fred Edwards. In 1929 the new Black Bridge School House was built by Albert Burns. The teacher was Miss Anna Seewall and some of the pupils were Charles and Archie Bruner, Helen, Frances and George Enbody, Margaret and Jim Saul, Julia and Ann Freeman, Eugene and Lorraine George, Bertha George and Elizabeth Isaac, and Chuck, Dick and Jean Strock.

Miss McClenahan was the teacher in 1931 and Anna Schick (Ballard) was the teacher in 1931. Pupils were Charles, Archie and Sibyl Bruner, Eugene, Lorraine and Betty George, Bill and Bobby Owens, Margaret McHenry, Helen, Frances, George and Betty Enbody and Julia and Ann Freeman. Muriel Metz taught in 1932 and 1933, then Margaret Oestrich taught in 1934, 1935 and 1936.

After Strocks left their homestead, Fred and Bea George family lived there, then Earl and Rosa Castle family for one summer, then the Leonard and Sadie Watson family.

Charles "Chuck" Bruner graduated from Douglas High School in 1937. He stayed with Bea George for the first year and with Marcus Nelson the other three years while attending school. His first paying job was broadcasting grasshopper poison bait from the back of a wagon for 50¢ a day on a ranch southeast of Casper. After graduation he worked for the U.S. Government surveying. In 1941 he and Dennis Rogers went to California where they worked for Consolidated Aircraft building B-24 bombers. In 1942 he enlisted in the Navy where he served at Jacksonville, Florida and Chicago, Illinois.

While serving the Navy at Chicago he met Mary Brankin, who was an inspector at a defense plant. They were married at Jacksonville, Florida on November 6, 1943. Their children are; James, Bill, Phillip, Marie and Thomas.

Chuck worked for Bob Sturgeon for a while after the war then worked as a mechanic for Jack York and Bill and Florence Canaday. In 1954 he started his own auto shop which he operated until 1966 when he sold out and moved to Denver where he taught at the Denver Automotive Institute. In 1981 he moved back to Douglas.

Archie Bruner finished high school in 1939. He boarded with the Forrest Wests and had an apartment with Sibyl while going to school. Archie is on the home place now after working for a while in southeastern Wyoming.

I, Sibyl Bruner Prager, graduated from Douglas High School in 1941. I played the tenor saxophone in school and the piano accordion in the LaBonte Quartette. I married Lawrence Prager, son of Frank and Ellen Prager on September 28, 1941. We have played for many dances in many places over the years. Many of them at Hubbard's Cupboard and sometimes carrying the instruments on horseback. You had to sit over to one side to balance the accordion.

After Lawrence came home from World War II where he served in the Navy and I worked for a while in San Diego and Oakland as a clerk-typist in Naval Supply Depots, we made our home on the Prager Ranch at the old Comely place. We have four children; Barbara Ellen, Rita Mary, Larry Frank and Norman Lisle.

Bullene, Tom and Margaret

At the age of ten, Margaret "Maggie" Ferretor came to Douglas with her parents Morris and Margaret Sullivan Ferretor from Sargent, Nebraska where she was born on January 25, 1890.

The Ferretors lived in a sod house near Sargent where Mr. Ferretor farmed. He did not like farming so he headed for Wyoming "to strike it rich." A coal miner by heritage, Morris visited several communities in Wyoming before selecting Douglas for the family's residence.

The family traveled all day by train from Chadron, Nebraska to Douglas in April 1900. No rooms were available upon arrival, but they were taken in at a rooming house on North Second Street operated by Mrs. Wright, a kindly lady who made beds for them on the floor.

As no houses were available in Douglas, Morris bought two lots on North Second Street (west of the LaBonte Inn which was then the site of Tate's Livery Barn.) The Ferretors lived in a tent until a two room house was built. A water well was dug, but the water was too alkaline to drink, so the Ferretors carried water from Robert Knittle's store (Irwin's).

One time a dead man was found in the town's water tank on Cemetery Hill and the neighbors came to use the Ferretor well. The tank was emptied and cleaned, but it was a few days before people started using the town's water again.

Morris worked for a time for the Northwestern Railroad section, and built a larger home which was eventually moved to 402 North Second Street.

After a few years in Douglas, Morris decided Wyoming wasn't for him, and he wanted to return to Nebraska. Mrs. Ferretor liked living in Douglas better than in Nebraska, and she didn't want to leave. Margaret Sullivan Ferretor and her daughter Margaret stayed in Douglas, and Morris returned to Nebraska to live with a brother. The couple never divorced.

Margaret Sullivan Ferretor was born January 25, 1853 in Blasburg, Pennsylvania, the daughter of the Peter Sullivans who were both natives of Ireland. To provide a living, she took in roomers from the Northwestern Round House.

Maggie went to work for Merris Barrow, editor and publisher of "Bill Barlow's Budget" when she was 13, working part-time before and after school for ten cents an hour. She folded and stapled copies of the "Sagebrush Philosophy" for mailing. She was given a raise to 15 cents an hour and put in charge of the other students who were hired to fold and staple. She quit school in the sixth grade to work for Barrow full-time. Bert Clough taught her to set type, which was her job when she quit working at "The Budget" in 1909.

Maggie may hold the record of being the longest continuous subscriber to "The Douglas Budget", a total of over 77 years.

After leaving "The Budget", Maggie went to work for the post office (located on South Third Street where Bolln's is now) under Postmaster Joe Kidwell for three years.

Upon resignation from the post office, Maggie went to Cheyenne to enroll in a business school where she took typing and shorthand. While in Cheyenne, Maggie worked at the Plains Hotel, typing menus and other items of business. In return, she was paid in meals. She was always amused at the surprised looks on the faces of Douglas "society members" when they saw her dining in the hotel's posh dining room.

Following her graduation, she returned to Douglas and went to work for Tom Doyle, the new owner of "The Budget." Later she was employed by Hiram R. Daniels in his music-jewelry store (Bolln's.) Maggie recalled that Maggie Wheelock's "girls" were the store's best customers.

In 1919, she went to Casper and was employed by C. and Glen Littlefield abstractors. They were early day residents of Douglas. She also worked for the old Casper National Bank.

Maggie took a good paying job with the Midwest Oil Company in the early 1920's at the gas plant office near the Salt Creek field. Soon she was transferred into the Casper office where she continued to work until her marriage to Thomas W. "Tom" Bullene in Casper in 1924.

Tom Bullene was born February 7, 1878 in Seattle, Washington and in 1900 went to Alaska where he spent 14 years. In 1920, he came to Casper and was also employed by the Midwest Oil Company.

The couple drove to Washington where they spent six weeks; they returned to Douglas due to the failing health of Maggie's mother, Margaret.

Looking for employment and unable to find it, the Bullenes decided to open a restaurant in a two-room house on Second Street. Neither of them knew anything about running a cafe, but they learned in a hurry. At times, cooks proved to be a problem. The first one they hired set the cafe on fire during one of the busiest state fair days. Others would have drinking problems, and Maggie was known to find and hide bottles of liquor during working hours.

Tom became the chief cook, and Maggie waited tables. The restaurant was moved to North Third Street (Edward's) where they remained for several years.

Tom and Maggie had one child, a son who was born and died on February 4, 1928.

On April 9, 1928, Margaret Sullivan Ferretor passed away.

They opened the Midget Cafe on Center Street (Oasis Lounge) and remained there until they retired in 1957 after having been in the same business continuously for 33 years.

The Bullenes lived in one of the oldest homes in Douglas at 215 North Second Street. It was originally the home of George and Rosie Tate.

Both Tom and Margaret possessed a fine sense of humor and were great story tellers. They were frequent targets for practical jokes (all in good fun) by the other business men on the block, particularly the Curtin boys.

Maggie never learned to drive. The one time she tried proved to be a near disaster for the Wyoming State Fairgrounds.

Tom died March 22, 1963, and Margaret passed away March 23, 1978.

Burgland, John and Esther Family

John Burgland married Esther Sundquist March 22, 1911 at Brady, Nebraska. Esther's parents were Nels and Caroline Sundquist. They came from Sweden and first located in Missouri, later moving to Nebraska where Esther was born April 25, 1889.

John's parents, Solomon and Mathilda Burgland, also came to Nebraska from Sweden where John was born December 20, 1887. John passed away January 15, 1972 and Esther on July 10, 1976.

John Burgland came to the Douglas area in 1917 accompanied by his wife's brother-in-law, Ed Preitauer. They came by covered wagon from Brady, Nebraska to prove up on their 320-acre homesteads. The land designated for Ed was not suitable for farming so he did not take his. He stayed to help John to get a suitable building (later used as a chicken house) erected so John could bring his family to Wyoming. They lived in the wagon-box while they were building. A well was also drilled which provided a plentiful supply of good water. In later years when some of the neighbors to the north came to homestead, water was hauled from this well for household use for many years. Neighbors of the Burglands were their cousins Gus and Tillie Larson and Ed and Jennie Latham.

In 1918, John moved his wife, Esther, and two daughters, Florence and Ethel, in a new Maxwell car to the homestead 21 miles north of Douglas. A new house was built and other out-buildings erected later. The Burgland's home, the only painted house in the neighborhood, was a community center. John played the violin in his granary every two weeks for many years for Saturday night dances.

Dryland farming which included corn, potatoes, oats, wheat and other grains were done by horse drawn machinery. Native hay was also cut and hauled in and stacked. They had a small herd of Shorthorn milk cows, hogs, geese and chickens. The children helped with the milking and chores before and after school.

The children attended school at J. R. Dugan's home for the first few years with his son, Earl, as teacher. Later, Eureka School was built as quite a few other families moved in nearby.

Alvin (Sonny) was born in 1920 followed by Caroline and Opal.

Wild game in the early days was very plentiful and supplied much of the meat for the homesteaders.

The mail was received at Orpha until a rural route was established. Orpha, 10 miles to the south, also had a small grocery store and gas station. John worked some time for the railroad. He also had a coal mine for awhile, known as the Sand Creek Coal Mine. He delivered coal to many ranchers in the area.

In 1939, the Burglands acquired a small herd of sheep as the wind had blown the topsoil away and dryland farming was not feasible anymore. A new barn was built in 1941 as extra room was needed for lambing.

In 1942 they sold the homestead and moved into Douglas so the children could attend high school. John established a painting firm which he continued for many years.

John and Esther Burgland had five children — Florence (husband Nick, deceased in 1982) Zaichkin who resides in Tacoma, Washington; she has three sons — Joe, David and Robert. Joe has three children — Joey, Kim and Leta; also three step-children — Phyllis, Polly and Patrick. David has three children — Kenny, Keith and Cindy. Robert has two children — Mike and Tari.

Ethel and Roy Price have two children — Royce and Carol. Royce has two daughters — Paula and Brenda. Carol Holloway has two sons — Terry and Randy Rider.

Alvin (Sonny) and Eva have two children — Barbara Tillard and Curry Burgland. Barbara has two children — Tara and Tye. Curry has one daughter — Katina.

Caroline has two daughters — Lynne and Sue. Lynne Nachtman has two daughters — Dena and Lorie. Sue Pexton has three children — Heidi, Candi and Matt.

Opal Stinson (husband Grover deceased in 1978) has five children — Ron, Diana, Gary, Bob and Dick. Ron lives in Omaha and has one son — Rhet and two step-children — Andrea and Ryan Felton. Diana lives in Denver, Colorado. Gary has two daughters — Kristina and Amy. Bob has two daughters — Jennifer and Jamie. Dick lives in Douglas.

There are also numerous great-grandchildren and great-great-grandchildren.

Ethel M. Price

Burk, Tom and Mary

Tom and Mary Burk were married in 1900 in Missouri. Mary's brothers, James and John Wooten and Tom's brother, Fred Burk, came to the Douglas area to settle in 1917.

In 1918, Tom and Mary and their two daughters, Myrtle (12) and Mary (5), came out to Converse County, Wyoming to file on land for a homestead in the Dry Creek vicinity. Uncle Jim Wooten met them at the train. They lived with Jim and Lydia Wooten and their family of seven children at a home near the fairgrounds until they could get their homes built on their homesteads out north.

The Burks were able to bring two milk cows, two head of horses, some farm machinery, feed and some furniture on the emigrant car. Uncle Jim Wooten had a little old Model T car and he took them out to see the homestead. It seemed like the middle of nowhere, Myrtle recalls, but she and the family all seemed determined to make the best of it.

The Burks made a one-room home on the land and broke up 12 acres to put in corn and raise a garden. The first thing they did was to fence their farm because of the range cows roaming around on open range.

They had to haul cottonwood for the fences and buildings from Box Creek with a team of horses. Young Myrtle Burk, 12 years old, learned to harness and drive a team to haul wood and worked like a man doing the hard, grueling work.

The ranchers, with their cattle and sheep, didn't exactly welcome the homesteaders and their farms. For their part, the homesteaders found it hard to fence out the cattle and even harder to keep the sheep out of their crops. The Burks ran their milk cows and horses and a few other cattle besides having their farm and garden.

Myrtle's mother, Mary, always raised a good garden. She and the girls were able to raise a lot of watermelons and cantaloupes and other things that folks didn't think could be raised in Wyoming. It took a lot of hard work of pumping and hauling water from the well to do it, though.

Mary Burk made all the clothes for the family, also comforters for their beds. The girls soon learned to sew, also. They made their own soap and did their wash in tubs.

In the winter, usually only one trip was made into town for supplies and mail. Several neighbors would go in together so they could help each other out if they got stuck or caught in a blizzard. In the better weather, they would go to town about once a month. They would bring back supplies and newspapers. This was the only way the homesteaders had contact with the outside world until cars came into use and a mail route was established twice a week.

James and Lydia Wooten and their seven children had a homestead near the Burks. Fred Burk and John Wooten, both bachelors, were also neighbors. West of them lived Olaf Hanson, also the Seckmans, who had two daughters about the age of Myrtle and Mary. Jim and Nina Vetter were neighbors, as well as the Jim Scenich family with daughters, Clara and Mildred.

Later, south of them, there grew up a settlement called Stringtown. It was so called because several of the nearby homesteads were in a string. Myrtle and Mary walked to the Stringtown School which was about one mile from where they lived. They traded books with Blanche, Robert, Lawrence and Talbot Hall and the Seckman girls, who also attended the Stringtown School, in order that they would have something to read.

Myrtle finished seventh and eighth grades in the Stringtown School. They only went six months to school, during the spring and summer, because the winters were too severe to allow for school. Catherine Clark, from Douglas, was one of the teachers. She boarded with Tom and Mary Burk.

After several families moved out, they discontinued this school because there were not enough patrons. Then Myrtle took Mary to the Riehle School on horseback. Myrtle went to 9th grade there because the teacher was qualified to teach 9th grade. They had to get books in Douglas and take achievement tests there.

A son, Paul, was born to Mary and Tom Burk in 1921. Mary came to town to have her baby.

There were some friends from Kansas City who came out to visit some of their relatives in Stringtown for the summer. "It was fun to have the girls come from the city", Myrtle said. They brought some cosmetics and perfume and lots of ideas from the big city. Of course, the girls from Kansas City thought it was a great adventure to come to the wild west. They thought the cowboys were quite glamorous and life was exciting. Myrtle said they didn't find out what it was really like because they only stayed for the summer and didn't really get in on the hard work.

The Bakers had a homestead 12 miles from the Burks and Myrtle and John Baker met and fell in love. They were married in Douglas on Christmas Eve, 1925. Ella Featherston made Myrtle's wedding dress. (The Featherstons ran the store at Bill. A family named Dudley ran it before them and Bill was once called Dudleyville, Myrtle recalls). Myrtle and John proved up on a homestead and lived there six or seven years before moving to Douglas.

Waldo Bolln had a store and gave the homesteaders credit. They gave him beans, potatoes, etc. on their bill at the store. The mail carriers would take in their cream for the homesteaders and then would bring back the empties. The John Bakers raised a family of seven children in Converse County.

Myrtle's mother, Mary Burk, had an illness while on the homestead that almost took her life. Young Paul had a dog that liked to chase jack rabbits. One time the dog had been wallering around a dead jack rabbit. Paul asked his mother to shear the dog's long hair for the summer and in doing so, Mary cut her finger. She got a bad infection in one arm and a very high fever. It was the dreaded disease, tularemia, or rabbit fever. Myrtle called Dr. Shaffer and he told them to get her to town as soon as possible. She was in serious condition for quite awhile and had to stay at Myrtle's in Douglas several days before she was able to go back to the homestead.

Tom and Mary Burk stayed on the homestead about 22 years. They finally moved into Douglas and made their home in Brownfield Addition about 1940. They lived there next to Faun and Lyle Cole. Mary, though she had left the homestead, still made all her own clothes and sun bonnets. She also had a nice garden.

Tom Burk died in 1953 of cancer of the liver.

Mary Burk was staying with Mrs. Jamison, when at the age of 72 years, she broke her hip. She overcame this injury, however, and lived on 12 more years. She died at the age of 84 in the Douglas hospital. She is survived by her daughter, Myrtle, and son, Paul, of Douglas and daughter, Mary, of Omaha, and numerous grandchildren, great-grandchildren and friends. I am proud to have known these pioneers who had great faith and courage and contributed greatly to our Converse County heritage.

Burke, Chester and Laura

Chester Burke was born in Maxwell, Nebraska in 1907. He moved to Chadron, Nebraska in the early twenties.

I, Laura Burke, was born in Hemingford, Nebraska in 1910.

We were married in 1928. We worked on a ranch for the following two years during which time our son, Loran, was born.

In 1930 we moved to Wyoming with my folks, the Mike Tschachers. We farmed with them for a time. Due to the extremely dry years we gave up farming. Chet worked on construction crews and did work on ranches in the Manville area until 1936 when he went to work for the Ohio and Argo Oil Companies in Lance Creek.

We had three more children: Bob, Naomi and Sandra.

In 1942 we purchased and moved to the Gaylord place in Orin which was to be our home for the next 32 years.

Chet and Bob worked in the B and H Mines north of Douglas for a time. Later Chet worked for Kansas Nebraska Gas Co. at their small auxiliary plant at Orin. Bob died in 1974.

In the spring of 1976, Chet was changing a tire on our pontoon boat when a freak gust of wind blew the boat off the jack. The boat fell on him, crushing him.

I live in Douglas, Wyoming, having moved here in 1985.

Burks, John and Ida Family

John Richard Burks, better known as "Dick" came to Wyoming in 1907 from Rockville, Indiana where he was born December 19, 1880.

He heard of homestead land available, and after looking around, he settled in the Brenning Basin area close to the Natural Bridge. He found employment on the Hamilton ranch.

He married Ida Slichter, daughter of John and Sara Slichter, born December 9, 1879. She lived in the Inez area. They continued leasing the ranch although it had changed ownership.

Three children were born; Beatrice, who married Lawrence Philbrick, Richard, born on June 13, 1917, married Ruby Vitek and one child, Sarah, died in infancy.

In the year 1926 they moved to the Slichter ranch at Inez. Dick died September 12, 1957, Ida died January 23, 1947.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Burks are now living on the ranch. They have two daughters, Shirley Baker and Cindy Reynolds.

Lawrence and Beatrice Philbrick live south of Douglas. They have two sons, Larry and Jim.

Burson, Albert and Lizzie

Albert and Lizzie Burson came to Wyoming in 1895 by team and wagon. Albert brought 20 head of horses for pulling freight wagons. Two of their children made the trip with them from Indiana. Albert freighted supplies to Fetterman, Ogalalla and LaPrele Dam when it was being built. He played the fiddle for many dances at the old Jenne place and many of the hay barns in the LaPrele community. They settled on the old Brenning place on LaPrele Creek. Their children went to school with the O'Briens, Schlosses, Powells and Howards at the Peyton School House. Johnny Peterson was their teacher. In 1910, they moved over on Bedtick on one of the Gedney places. In 1914, they moved back to Casper and lived there until their deaths.

Minnie — 1938 (married Harry Ward)

Guy C. — 1918

Dortha M. — 1896-1983 (married Franklin Earl Wright)

Cady, Harry E. and Mary

Harry E. Cady and his wife, Mary, came from Bayard, Nebraska in 1915 to homestead about four miles southwest of Shawnee, Wyoming. They were the parents of four children, Floyd, Lyola, Curtis and Beulah.

Harry and his son, Floyd, had driven a wagon loaded with household goods to Wyoming to the homestead site, trailing their milk cows and extra horses. Mrs. Cady with her two younger children, Lyola and Curtis, arrived by train some time later. Harry had set up a tent for them to live in until a house could be built. The youngest daughter, Beulah, was evidently born in Wyoming.

In 1920, Lyola married Roy Dooley, a bachelor living in the neighborhood. Floyd was married to Gladys Marburger in 1922; Curtis was married to Pearl Richardson in 1927, and the youngest child, Beulah was married to Orville Spaulding.

Floyd Cady and Orville Spaulding operated a garage and auto repair shop in Shawnee during 1920-21.

In 1924, Harry and Mary Cady moved to Careyhurst to work for Senator Carey.

Though there was no date of death for Harry Cady, his wife Mary died on February 15, 1933.

Cakebread, Walter and Harriet

My father, Walter Williamson Cakebread, was born January 10, 1877 in Sutton Surrey, England. He came to Ft. Collins, Colorado at the age of 17 to live with his brother, Charlie, who was a bookkeeper at the courthouse. June 6, 1900 he married Harriet Jennie Garrett. Her family were pioneer ranchers north of Ft. Collins. Her ancestors had come west through Michigan, Ohio, North Carolina and Iowa. Family names were Dean, Ellis, Gunn, Price and Puckett to name a few.

In 1905, my parents homesteaded 90 acres two miles north of Morrill, Nebraska in Scottsbluff County in an area known as the Dutch Flats where I, Laura Cakebread, was born June 18, 1908, and my brother, Charles William Cakebread, was born February 26, 1914.

During the summer of 1916, we visited Mother's cousins Mr. and Mrs. Hardin Puckett at Orin, Wyoming. Mother grew up on a ranch so she began talking about buying a ranch. Dad had already played a big part in Wyoming development. He was a carpenter by trade and would be gone from Sunday night until the following Friday night building homes and stores at Lingle and Torrington, Wyoming, while mother and we children lived on the homestead.

In the fall of 1917, my father bought the Keon F. Hart ranch at Orin, 320 acres on the Platte River. Mr. Hart had been a corporal in Company D-4 Infantry at Ft. Laramie, Wyoming in the late 1870's to early 1880's. I believe his wife was a laundress. Don't know when they settled on the ranch, but he had a territorial water right for irrigation. Mrs. Hart had just died so Mr. Hart moved to Douglas to live with his old friends, Pat and Margaret Burns, also pioneers and a dear old couple.

We moved to our new home in February 1918. Father came with the household furniture, farm machinery and livestock on the train. Friends brought my mother, brother and me by automobile. The roads from Ft. Laramie to Glendo were only trails. You had to use your own judgment in which one to follow. We crossed the river at McKinley at the Platte Valley Ranch, through the fields and across the west face of Shawnee Hill, then crossed the creek along the north side of the railroad grade to Orin.

Our house had three large rooms, a large pantry and walk-in storage closet. Outside the kitchen door was a "dug well" walled with stones from the river. We drew water with buckets suspended from a rope through a pulley. The horse barn was log, with stalls for eight horses. There was a large pole corral with a shed on the north side, open to the south and another shed we milked the cows in. A two room granary, a one room bunkhouse and two cellars, one walled with railroad ties and one with river rock. We brought our best Holstein milk cows, so Orin Junction had its first and only dairy. We delivered dairy products around town. Mother churned and made butter to sell; many times it was my job to deliver it to the hotel. We shipped cream to a creamery at Ft. Collins. The cream cans were put on the 10 p.m. train to Denver and arrived in Ft. Collins the next morning; the following morning they were back in Orin on the 5 a.m. train to Casper. Father soon built a new windmill, water tank, a 24 station milking barn, and milk room and installed a milking machine, powered by a very unreliable gas engine. Often we finished the milking by hand.

At this time, 1918, there was good fishing in the river as this was before wastes from the oil refineries killed the fish. Harry and Cora Churchill ran a hotel at Orin. Mrs. Churchill had a reputation as a very good cook. People used to come down from Douglas on a morning train, have dinner at the hotel and spend time waiting for the late afternoon train, fishing or relaxing along the river.

Max Russell and his wife ran the general store and the post office was in one corner of the store. You could buy anything you needed; if it wasn't in stock, Mr. Russell would order it for you. "The Store" was a long building with a high ceiling. It had a trap door in the floor to enter a cellar where potatoes, apples, vinegar barrel, etc. were stored. On the east side were the living quarters. Three large rooms and a pump on the back porch. Just south of the store was a sheet iron covered warehouse with a double floor on strong pillars, then coal sheds and wagon scales and a one car garage. Next door was the pool hall (John Carlo proprietor) with living rooms beside it and back of it was the ice house. Large blocks of ice were cut on the river, hauled by wagon and packed in sawdust. That was where we bought ice to cool those old oak ice boxes in the kitchens, and for the ice cream freezers for school picnics and the Fourth of July.

The one room school house was up on the hill north of town. All eight grades were taught. Pupils had to cross the railroad tracks, so that often meant crawling under or climbing over the railroad cars to avoid a longer walk. That always made me feel uneasy, especially if there was a switch engine at work. We did have fun at school though. We had our organ, a small phonograph, swing, and a teeter totter board plus a fox and geese ring worn into the school yard dirt. One day during World War I, we looked out and saw an Indian dressed in full regalia walking back and forth on "our hill" making strange gestures. Very little studying was done until our teacher found out when she went to the hotel for lunch that he was a medicine man sent to accompany an Indian soldier's body back to the reservation in Nebraska.

The war was over and people began to move west. A new highway was being built from the east with teams, plows, graders and dirt scoops. Also a new highway bridge was built to cross the North Platte River just downstream from the railroad bridge. Now Gillespies, Nylens, Pollocks, Shaws and Wilsons could come to Orin without walking their ponies across the railroad bridge or fording the river at the old Jim Bridger Ferry site. The old ferry site was on the east end of our ranch. Father often explored the area for artifacts. Among things he found were old ox and mule shoes which he gave to the museum in Douglas along with Mr. Hart's army rifle. Orin began to grow.

The Chicago and Northwestern Railroad built a roundhouse for "helper engines." The Burlington Railroad built a new water tower and kept two engines fired up for extra power. The Northwestern brought dining and lunchroom cars to serve noon and supper passengers from their trains. Mr. and Mrs. Bates were the white managers. The cooks and waiters were colored (and lonely people, I realize now). They spoiled my brother and me; and they gave a party every year for all the children in town. Father sold dairy products to the kitchen so we were well acquainted with them.

Mr. and Mrs. Russell sold the store to Henry and Faye Hern. Extra crews were needed at the C&NW depot and for all railroad maintenance. People came to try their luck at homesteading. "Orin Realty" was organized and a town was laid out in streets and lots and new homes were built.

The little school house was for the sixth, seventh and eighth grades; primary grades were being taught in the "showroom" of the lumber yard. In the fall of 1920, we all moved into a nice two room school house with a coal furnace and a playroom in the basement. Then in 1923, the high school at Douglas was changed to the Converse County High School. A "bus" was sent to Orin to pick up high school students. The bus was a Dodge commercial wagon. We called it the "dog catcher wagon." It had wire mesh sides, covered with a black oil cloth curtain and the seats were 2x12 planks on supports and wired to the side of the truckbed. (You had to be careful how you sat or you would suffer a painful pinch.) Other areas of the county, where there were not enough pupils to bus, the pupils were boarded at homes in Douglas; some worked for their board and room.

We had no formal church at Orin, but Baptists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Catholics and Pentecostals gathered for Sunday School and preaching if a minister was available. One dear teacher and leader was "Uncle" Billie Osgood from Kansas. He homesteaded on Sand Creek north of Orin. He was building and planning a home for his sweetheart in Kansas. The foundation for their house was built when she died suddenly; he lived out his lonely life in a tiny shack. He was our Sunday School Superintendent. He had a good voice and led us singing hymns. My father was a religious man and never turned a "preacher" away that I can remember. One summer a former missionary from China stayed with us. His health was failing, but he often arose at first light and played classical music on the piano. He led our worship gatherings that summer and wore Chinese robes and told us stories about China.

I graduated from high school in May 1927 and was married on September 4, 1927 to Roy McLean Willey. He grew up near Fulton, Missouri and came west. We made our first home on the Ed Schneider ranch up the river from my girlhood home. Roy's brother, Searle Willey bought the ranch from Mr. Schneider and we farmed it until the house burned one January morning about 3 a.m.; we barely got out. We worked for Lem Carmin the next summer - 1929. Roy farmed and cared for the stock at the ranch, and I kept house for the children while Mr. and Mrs. Carmin were away with the rodeo stock doing shows in Wyoming, Nebraska and South Dakota.

My father died in December 1930 and we traded our equity in the ranch to Mr. Hern for the store at Orin. Right during the depression in 1935 we sold to a Mr. Rooney and moved to Iowa. In 1966 we retired to 60 acres near Granby, Missouri about 25 miles from Joplin. Roy passed away May 27, 1979. I am still living in the house we built. My brother and his wife, Lillian Mathis, live at Altaville, California near the old historical mining town, Angels Camp. Neither of us has natural children.

Cambell, Dr. Perry and Grace Family

My father, Dr. P. L. Cambell and his brother Albert came from Michigan in the early 1900's — perhaps about 1903. We came by train and settled on a ranch northeast of Glendo across the Platte River. My father opened his dental office in Douglas about 1904, in the building on Center Street now occupied by Curtin's Liquor. Many years later he moved his office upstairs over Dixon Hardware. He stayed there until he died in 1939. I believe that building is now the bakery.

My mother was Grace DeFendorf Cambell (born 1872).

I was born January 17, 1905 at the Glendo family ranch. My grandfather, Dr. DeFendorf, came from Michigan to deliver me. We later lived in the same building as my father's office on Center Street in Douglas. My sister, Alice, was born there on December 16, 1907.

My father and uncle sold the ranch in 1915 to Fred Waters. The property is now under water for the Glendo Dam.

My mother died in 1911 of pneumonia when I was six and Alice was three. For four years, we girls lived with Miss Carrie Robertson (first grade teacher) and her mother. My father sent Alice and me to Michigan each summer by train to live with his parents. We also spent some time with our maternal grandparents in another town. I remember my grandmother Cambell was a beautiful seamstress and each year we returned to Douglas with many lovely new dresses, etc. We were so proud of them.

Going back to memories of the ranch, there was no bridge on the river and many times when crossing it in a wagon, we would have to pull our feet up into the seat out of the water. My Uncle Bert and Aunt Bertha had a Master's Voice Victrola which we girls loved to go upstairs to play. It had a cylindrical record and wouldn't I love to have it today! Many wolves lived in the country around the ranch. We girls were scared many times at night when going to the outhouse before going to bed. Seemed as though they were howling right outside between us and the house.

After four years of living alone, my father married Mary Emma Arnold, a teacher. We lived on the corner where the First Wyoming Bank is now located. We girls attended North Grade School and when I was a Freshman, the South Grade School opened, so Alice finished grade school there. We both graduated from Douglas High. Alice went to Chadron, Nebraska to become a teacher. After finishing there she taught only a few months in a country school, when she came down with polio. This left her slightly crippled in one leg. I worked in the telephone office until I married Charles D. Read on December 5, 1923. We lived with his parents for four years on upper LaPrele.

In 1929 we bought the old Gilbert place 2½ miles northwest of Orpha on the road to Ross or better known as the Ogalalla Ranch owned by LeRoy Moore. Our two oldest children, James Lee and Alice Joanne, attended grade school in Orpha, which is a little town on the Burlington Railroad. We lived there until 1940 when we bought the 6-Mile Ranch west of Douglas from Howard Esmay and Urie (Dutch) Slonaker. This place included 3400 acres 40 miles southwest of Douglas in the LaBonte Canyon area, where we took our livestock in the summer. We had purchased a house in town from Sadie Messenger Delahoyd next to the Masonic Temple where the children and I stayed during the week, living most of the summer in the mountains. Harry Johnston's Real Estate office is now in or close to that location.

After graduating from high school in 1943, James Lee joined the Air Force, leaving in September 1943. He was overseas in the Pacific when Donna Iole was born in 1945. Upon being discharged from the service, he returned to the ranch and on November 20, 1946 married Barbara Brow. They live in Douglas, where he is County Treasurer and she works in an insurance office. They have three children and eight grandchildren.

Joanne married Merritt Hansen on December 28, 1946 in Douglas. They lived for a few years in a trailer house in our back yard. Joanne worked in the telephone office and Merritt did carpenter work. Later they moved into their own home which he had built. They separated later and on July 15, 1959 she married Don Trumper from Tucson, Arizona. He is the son of Vera Trumper of Douglas. Joanne had a son, Gary Lynn, by Merritt, who went to Tucson with her and Don. He is married and has two children and lives in Tucson. Joanne and Don have two boys and they still live in Tucson, also.

Our daughter, Barbara, died from carbon monoxide November 7, 1954.

We sold the 6-Mile Ranch in 1959 and moved to a farm three miles west of Wheatland. We purchased an additional farm one mile north of ours by Festo Lake.

Donna went through high school in Wheatland and on August 18, 1963 she married Ernest Douglas. They still live on the north place. They have a son, Ernie, 19 years old, and a daughter, Ashley Jill, six years old, having lost a son in 1976 at the age of eight. We lived on the farm until we sold it in 1969 and moved to town. We have eight grandchildren and eight great-grandchildren.

We left many friends in Douglas and it will always be

"my old home town". But we really like Wheatland and our many wonderful friends. On December 5, 1983 we celebrated being married 60 years. We've lived good and bad times, joyous and sad times, but all in all think the Lord meant well for us.

Campbell, Malcolm

"Malcom Campbell - 1888" is the first name on the sign currently hanging in the Converse County Sheriff's Office. Although misspelled (should read Malcolm), he was indeed appointed its first sheriff following Converse County's formation, May 21, 1888.

Born on a farm near London, Ontario, Canada in June of 1839, he was the oldest of 14 children. With 16 mouths to feed, Malcolm learned to take on the duties of manhood at an early age. The responsibilities he learned in youth contributed greatly to his good character which served him well throughout a very robust life.

At age 25 the entire Campbell family moved to the United States, settling near Dewitt, Iowa. The following spring Malcolm ventured into the freight business, using Beatrice, Nebraska as his base of operations. In June of 1865 his father joined him, contracting to haul grain to a ranch, 150 miles distance on the Little Blue River. After delivering the freight they went on a buffalo hunt. It ended in near tragedy. Malcolm's dad, while attempting to pull his gun from the wagon, muzzle first, caught the hammer on a rope, causing the gun to discharge. It shattered his left arm near the shoulder. Splints of sagebrush were applied and tightly bound to stop the bleeding. A bed was hastily fashioned and the jolting wagon trip began. The closest doctor was at Fort Kearney, over 100 miles away. Malcolm rode ahead to summon medical help. The doctor arrived four days later, but it was too late to save the arm. It was now terribly swollen and gangrene had set in. It had to be amputated. Such were the grim realities of frontier life.

In the spring of 1866 Malcolm hired out as a bull whacker, hauling supplies to Fort Kearney. It was during this time he met Alvah Ayres (who eventually located near Natural Bridge). He became a valued friend. Campbell hired out to Ayres, cutting and hauling railroad ties to Fort McPherson for use in constructing the Union Pacific Railroad.

The Grand Duke Alexis of Russia was at Fort McPherson at that time as a guest of General Sherman. In keeping with the occasion, a magnificent buffalo hunt was planned in his honor with the flamboyant William F. Cody acting as a guide. It was during this hunt that Cody won his nickname as "Buffalo Bill," the greatest of all the buffalo hunters. Campbell was pleased to make his acquaintance.

Campbell next hired out directly to the Union Pacific Railroad. Riding a construction train to the "...end of the steels," he and a companion walked the remaining 15 miles into a bawdy tent town which had recently named itself "Cheyenne." There Malcolm said, "...saloons were everywhere...hurdy-gurdies could be heard in any block at any time of the day or night...idlers sauntered from gambling table to dance-hall..." On a more positive vein he noted that "water wells were being dug at four corners of what was to be a business block...scaffolding of new buildings were being erected to the tune of many hammers, the lumber being hauled all the way from Denver."

"Tie cutting" for the U.P. next took Campbell to Fort Halleck (at the foot of Elk Mountain). His contract filled, in October of '68 he returned to Cheyenne where he was surprised to find his brother, John. The two of them hired out with a freighting outfit (with seven six-yoke teams of oxen) bound for Fort Defiance, Arizona. On the return trip, Malcolm took a job as a bull whacker on a wagon-train bound for Cheyenne. Arriving there he met John "Portuguese" Phillips, hero of the Fetterman massacre. Phillips, having a government hay contract at Fort Laramie and needing a foreman, hired Malcolm to take charge of the hay cutters. One night, while going to the hay meadows, all their horses were stolen. They didn't know if the thieves were whites or Indians. Malcolm, riding a mule bareback through the darkness, reported the theft in Cheyenne the next morning and was ably assisted by the military, but could recover only two of the horses. Phillips had to replace the stolen horses, but the haying operation was otherwise a success, the hay bringing $70.00 per ton.

Campbell's first visit to what would later be Converse County came in the spring of 1872. He bought four yoke of "work cattle" from John Hunton and took them to Fort Fetterman where Hunton had a contract to supply firewood for the camp. That winter he and several other men worked on Horseshoe Creek (south and west of Glendo) cutting trees for firewood under military contract.

Erection of a log cabin was proceeding slowly as the men worked on it only in their spare time. A mountain lion came to investigate. The cabin, having no doors or windows yet, made easy access so the lion came inside and its occupants promptly exited through whatever opening they could find.

When spring returned, Campbell hauled the winter's wood supply back to Fort Fetterman, expecting to trade some of it for supplies. Unfortunately the soldiers were on very short rations, their supplies failing to arrive from Fort Laramie. Campbell decided he would just have to make do.

He was now getting better known around the fort and for the first time was able to secure a government contract on his own. It specified that he supply charcoal for the fort. The military preferred it for several reasons; It gave off more heat, was cleaner burning and had less bulk. Campbell made it in this way; Large logs were stacked several layers high. Then dirt was layered over the pile and adobe was spread over that to seal off all air except for one small hole at the bottom. Through this opening pitch pine knots were used to start a fire which caused the logs to smolder slowly for several weeks. This process transformed the wood to charcoal.

While Campbell was hauling a load of firewood to the fort one of his hired hands was killed by Indians. He was found with an arrow in his back just below the shoulder blade and he had been scalped. The frontier was still fraught with many dangers.

Next Campbell located on Boxelder Creek (east of Glenrock), building a 12 x 16 foot adobe house. This later became the property of John Hunton and eventually was acquired by J. M. Carey and Brother, becoming headquarters for the famous "S.O." Ranch. Later the ranch buildings took on prominence as the home of R. Davis Carey and became known as "Careyhurst."

In Bob David's book, "Malcolm Campbell, Sheriff" it tells of Portuguese Phillips bringing in 1,100 head of cattle from Oregon the summer of 1878. Campbell was given the job of moving the stock from the Sweetwater to the head of the Cheyenne, supposedly the first such trail drive over that particular route. He hired out that fall to F. M. Phillips who had a beef contract at Fort Fetterman. The slaughter house was on LaPrele Creek where Mart Madsen's place stood later on. While bringing in 80 head of beef to butcher, eleven of them were stolen. Malcolm took to their trail and with the aid of his St. Bernard dog, "I overtook the cattle at where John Moran's ranch was located later and drove them back."

That fall, while herding stock for Colin Hunter on Skull Creek, George Powell rushed into camp to report that Indians had stolen and killed two work cattle near his camp. They all grabbed rifles and went after them. Creeping up on what they thought were the Indian culprits they found Crook's entire army. Although some of the soldiers were probably responsible for the loss, retribution was given up as a lost cause.

On December 22, 1879 Campbell married Priscilla Noble at the old Campbell farm home in Endicott, Nebraska. They moved to Fort Fetterman which was still a military post but was abandoned in 1882. It thereafter became the hub of activity for the cattle business which was growing astronomically. In '83, the same year the Major Frank Wolcott took out water rights to irrigate 500 acres on Deer Creek, perhaps the biggest round-up ever undertaken took place on Crazy Woman Creek. 400 cowboys using 1400 horses with chuck wagons and equipment strung out for miles made up the operation. The day of the "open range" had about reached its zenith, although Campbell said the year of '84 another 825,000 head of cattle were thrown onto the open ranges of Wyoming.

Malcolm Campbell was at this time serving as deputy sheriff for H. K. Boswell of Albany County. It must be remembered that ever since Wyoming became a territory in 1869, the western portion of what is now Converse County was then Albany County with its county seat at Laramie City. As a result, the weight of being deputy was tremendous, having full responsibility for keeping law and order for everything north of the Laramie Mountain range. He later served under Lew Miller and three times thereafter was made the Constable of Albany County. Then, with the formation of Converse County as mentioned earlier, he was appointed its first sheriff. However, when election votes were counted that fall, Malcolm drew 552 votes to John T. Williams' 591, with Williams being named as sheriff. Campbell sued, claiming that Williams was not a resident of Converse County but Campbell lost.

Undoubtedly his most publicized accomplishment was the capture of Alferd Packer (generally misspelled "Alfred"). Briefly, Packer along with five other prospectors, became trapped in deep snow in the high country of the Colorado Rockies. Repeated attempts to break trail through the mountain pass failed. They ran out of food and reached a state of near starvation. In the early spring Packer reached civilization, but with no trace of his companions. He gave a confusing and not very convincing story about their whereabouts, causing everyone to become suspicious. Search parties were sent out and eventually the five were found, dead. It was evident they had been partially eaten. Circumstantial evidence made it appear likely that Packer had turned cannibal. A warrant was issued on August 22, 1874 at San Juan City, Colorado for Packer's arrest. He had already been placed in a make-shift jail (frontier didn't truck with too much legality), but before papers could be served, Packer made his escape. His whereabouts remained a mystery for another nine years.

Selling supplies at Fort Fetterman in late January of 1883 was a man named Jean "Frenchy" Cabazon. He had been a prospector associated with Packer prior to the cannibalism episode. Now a crusty stranger approached Cabazon wanting blasting supplies. The man called himself John Schwartze. Cabazon noticed portions of two fingers of his left hand were missing and some of his front teeth had been crudely replaced. "Frenchy" recognized Packer at once, but kept his findings secret until after Packer was gone. He then notified Deputy Sheriff Campbell who wrote his superiors in Laramie City, requesting instructions. Investigations by Colorado authorities clearly indicated the man Cabazon had identified was indeed Alferd Packer. A telegram reached Campbell, "Arrest Packer, alias John Swartz, at once and take no chances." Campbell set out in his buckboard with his brother for Crazy Horse's cabin on Wagonhound where he felt Packer was hiding. Taking him by surprise, the arrest was made without incident as Packer was for once, not wearing his guns.

After returning to Fort Fetterman, Campbell had to wait from Friday until Monday when the next stage left for Laramie City. The snow had drifted "15 feet deep" in places. The first night they made Point of Rocks in Downey Park where the stage stopped for the night. Malcolm "cat-napped", keeping a wary eye on his prisoner. The following day they reached Rock Creek on the U.P. line, but it was already after dark and too late to catch a train. They got a hotel room and on Wednesday took the train for Laramie City. There Sheriff Miller boarded the train accompanying Campbell and his prisoner to Cheyenne. Packer was then turned over to Sheriff Clair Smith of Hinsdale County, Colorado.

Author Bob David "Malcolm Campbell, Sheriff" writing as though the wording is Campbell's, gives the contents of the following telegram; "You are respectfully invited to attend the execution of Alferd Packer at Lake City Colorado on the 19th day of May, A.D., 1883. Signed, Claire Smith, Sheriff." From that point on nothing more is written about Alferd Packer in the entire book, leading readers to believe he was hung on the date indicated. Not so!

In fact Alferd Packer was never hung. Two problems made it illegal to take Packer's life. Although found guilty of the crime, the act had been committed on an Indian Reservation, therefore not coming under white man's jurisdiction. Secondly, Colorado had passed new legislation which had passed into law without containing a provision allowing capital punishment. As a result, Packer was sentenced to prison, where despite repeated appeals, he remained until late in years. Finally he was pardoned but only after his health had failed. He died, however, a free man.

Campbell, through the years, continued in law enforcement, serving for several years as Chief of Police of Douglas. He later moved to Casper (1920) where he acted as a watchman for an oil company. He continued working until well into his 80s. He passed away July 20, 1932 leaving behind his widow, Priscilla, two sons, Donald of Midwest and Malcolm S. of Casper and a daughter, Mrs. Kate Allen of the state of Washington; a brother, Ben, of Douglas and several grandchildren. At the time of his passing he was the oldest Democrat, oldest peace officer and oldest Odd Fellow in the state. A real pioneer!

Cannon, Bill and Harry

William "Bill" Acquilla Cannon was the first of the two Cannon brothers to come to Wyoming. He came in the early 1920s finding work on the Charles J. Saul ranch on LaBonte Creek. Harry, the youngest brother, followed Bill's footsteps on June 15, 1926.

Bill, "Whitey", the eldest son of Robert and Lilly Josephine Holloway Cannon was born in 1898 in Ball Camp, Tennessee. Harry, the youngest of six children was born in Arkansas City, Kansas on January 27, 1909. The Cannon family had also lived in Illinois sometime between Tennessee and Kansas.

Shortly after Harry's birth, the father deserted the family, never to be heard of again. Three years later, the hard working mother died as the result of an operation. This left the children to fend for themselves. The only sister of the brothers tried to keep the family together for three years. At that time the brothers and sister went their own ways.

Harry stayed in Kansas, attending school there through his junior year in high school. At the urging of his brother, Bill, he came to Wyoming. Finding work on the Saul Ranch, he was given the job of milking cows. It was one of the hardest jobs he ever had to do.

Bill Cannon homestead 1930.

Wanting to finish high school, Harry was found a place to stay at the E. B. Combs ranch northwest of Douglas by Saul. He has many memories of his stay with the Combs and his senior year in school.

After his graduation in 1927, Harry worked with Bill on the Saul, Prager and Pexton ranches in the LaBonte-Esterbrook area. He joined the navy in 1928 and served for four years then entered the Postal Service where he was employed until his recent retirement.

Ruby Ann Ross of Modesto, California married Harry on May 15, 1937.

Bill married Helen Eveline Stafford, daughter of a one-time Albany County Sheriff, on May 28, 1928 in Douglas. They had two sons, Rolan and Harvey. Helen was a school teacher at the Spracklen School.

Later Bill and Helen were to prove up on their homestead in Morrison Valley on the Charles Pexton ranch. Shortly after, Bill was separated from his family and moved to Nevada where he worked on ranches and ran a bar. He died on September 25, 1967 in Bishop, California.

Card, Harry and Edith

On February 16, 1861 a set of twins was born to Thomas Card and Harriet Burr Card of Toledo, Ohio. The twins, a boy and a girl, were named Harry Barton and Ida Amelia, and were the youngest of five children in the Card family. Harriet Burr was a member of the noted Burr family which included Aaron Burr, conspicuous in American history.

Harry acquired his education in the public schools of Toledo, but owing to ill-health, he left school in the spring of 1878 to come to the Wyoming Territory. He located in the city of Cheyenne, accepting a position with the Union Cattle Company. He remained in Cheyenne until 1886, when he moved to the vicinity of Lost Creek in what is now eastern Converse County. There he was engaged in raising horses and cattle.

In 1892, Mr. Card disposed of his interests in the Lost Springs area and moved to Manville. He organized the Card Sheep Company in 1900, for which he acted as vice president and manager. He made Manville his headquarters, and his home, and was to remain there until the mid 1940's.

Harry was married in 1888 to Edith McLaughlin, a native of Kansas, Edith was born in 1869 in Marshall County. She was the daughter of Charles J. and Julia Ann McLaughlin, and the eldest of a family of 10 children. The McLaughlins came to Wyoming in June of 1885 as part of an emigrant train of covered wagons. The family, which had previously migrated from Kansas into Iowa, came to Wyoming seeking a homestead site. Their first camp was near the Silver Cliff Mine, adjacent to the present city of Lusk.

Soon, the family moved on to within a short distance from the present day location of the city of Glenrock, where they remained the entire summer of 1885. The following spring, they finally settled on a claim on Cottonwood Creek near the old Keeline "Hogeye" Ranch. It was there that Edith May became acquainted with Harry "Rosy" Card.

After their marriage, Harry and Edith lived on the Lost Springs Ranch for a period of six years before they moved into Manville.

There were four children born to the Cards. The son, Nathaniel Forrest, was born at Lost Springs in 1890; he married Leone Cook of Illinois in 1914, and was the father of two children, Lucile and Forrest.

Iva May was born at Orin Junction in 1892, was married to John Cosby of Harrison, Nebraska, and is the mother of four children, Evelyn, Richard, Harry and John.

Julia Almira was born at Manville in 1894. She was married in 1915 to Leonard Tebbs. Their children are Edith Belle, Ruth and Leonard.

The fourth child, Alma Estelle, was born at Manville in 1900. She was married to Lon T. Tebbs, brother of Leonard Tebbs, in 1921, and is the mother of two children, Hillman Card and Robert Barton.

The chain of events in the Card family history becomes vague in the early 1900s. The following account, which is certain to be inaccurate in some respects, is compiled from the shadowy recollections of persons who were born and raised and still live in the Manville, Lusk, Jireh, and Lost Springs communities. Exact dates and sequences of happenings were not available.

Harry Card had come to Wyoming when there was open range. He had operated his livestock business on this open grassland, and was accustomed to using vast amounts of free land. Wyoming was undergoing a great change. Fences were being built, claims homesteaded, water wells were being drilled, and the old customs of controlling the land by controlling the watering places was to be no more. The transition from the old to the new method of cattle and sheep management was very difficult for the stockmen, and in some cases, totally unacceptable, but if one were to survive, then he must adapt to the changes, and revise his operation.

Besides his livestock business, Mr. Card had an interest in the Manville Bank. His associates were believed to be A. A. Spaugh, Gus Johnson, Art Dieleman, and a man by the name of Burkett. The bank was established in 1910. Evidently, poor management practices, or lack of any management, together with making too many ill-advised loans caused the bank's failure about the year of 1922.

Ill fortune befell Mr. Card in the spring of 1912. He had purchased a large herd of Texas cattle which were delivered to Orin Junction. He was on the trail with the herd, moving them to his home range near Manville when a raging blizzard struck. Almost all of the animals died in the storm, or shortly afterward. The estimated loss was close to 3500 head.

Times were hard, and money was scarce. As a means of income, men and boys of the area, including John Cosby, son-in-law of the Cards, gathered the whitening bones of the animals. The bones sold for $6.00 per ton. As late as 1920, men with teams and wagons were still to be seen on the prairies engaged in "bone-picking".

For several reasons by the year of 1934, the extensive land and livestock business which had been that of Mr.

Card, was no longer in existence. From 2000 acres of deeded land, Mr. Card salvaged only 160 acres upon which his home was built. The Cards remained in Manville for several years, during which time, Mr. Card broke his hip, and was cared for by a practical nurse living in the area.

Ultimately, the Cards moved to Cheyenne to make their home near their daughter, Alma Tebbs. Mr. and Mrs. Card died in Cheyenne and are buried there.

Edith May Card is remembered as a petite lady, under five feet in height. She was neatly dressed, and always wore a brooch attached to a black velvet ribbon which encircled her throat. She drove a large, black Graham-Paige automobile complete with side curtains. The car was equipped with jump-seats, and would accommodate seven to nine persons. It even boasted crystal vases which Mrs. Card would fill with flowers from her garden. Edith was instrumental in the founding and maintenance of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Manville, as well as being a member of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and of the Mariposa Chapter of the Order of the Eastern Star.

Harry Barton Card is remembered as a slightly built, sandy-haired individual, a typical stockman of that era. He was energetic, and quite vociferous. He, too, was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Manville; he was a member of the Order of Modern Woodmen of America, and of the Woodmen of the World.

Although in the latter years of their lives, the Cards were not as affluent as they had been previously, certainly they enriched the lives of the residents of the communities in which they lived.

Carlisle, Charles S. and Sylvia

Charles Scott Carlisle was born March 17, 1876, in Butler County, Nebraska, where he was raised on a farm. On October 3, 1900 he married Sylvia Irene Applegate, born June 16, 1884, who was raised on a neighboring farm. Charles worked as a blacksmith until he and a friend (remembered only as Mr. Folsom) came to Douglas, Wyoming in 1916 to search for a homestead. Charles left his wife and three children, Walter, born September 17, 1902, Eva, born June 10, 1906 and Dale, born June 2, 1910, with Sylvia's family in David City, Nebraska.

Charles and his friend filed on homesteads 30 miles northwest of Douglas on Duck Creek and soon after that Charles sent for his family. They had a long hot trip to Douglas on the train and the next day another long hot trip in an open touring car over rough dirt roads to the homestead site. Their home for several weeks was two tents while Charles was building what we now commonly call a "homestead shack". After he got his family settled in their new little home on the prairie, Charles went into town and worked as a mechanic at the Ford Garage. He drove out to the homestead on weekends as often as possible to take provisions to his family and news of the "rest of the world" that seemed so far away.

Sylvia and their three children tried to entertain themselves out on the hot, dry prairie. They went for many walks, exploring the country around them and were always on the watch for snakes, which were plentiful. They carried a sharp hoe and big sticks and killed many rattlesnakes. Walter would grab the bull snakes by the tail and whirl them around his head and fling them as far as he could.

Duck Creek had little water, but the kids managed to scoop out a place and build a small dam so they had a wading pool. They spent many hours playing there.

There was an old abandoned oil well nearby, which provided a play ground of sorts, to pass away the time until a man called "Dutch Ernie" came out to make arrangements for a crew to dismantle the oil well and for Sylvia to cook for them. He paid her quite well and furnished all the food.

Walter and Dale helped with the tearing down of the well and had quite a learning experience. One day when they were working around the well, a man named Fred yelled from the top of the tower, asking if they could see his eye anywhere down there. Everyone was shocked and speechless until they learned that the man had a glass eye.

During the three years the family spent on the homestead, there were many cattle drives and round-ups, and the cow hands would sometimes come by and leave flour and meat in return for a home cooked meal. The brandings were events to look forward to. All the neighbors for miles around would gather together to sort out and brand their own calves.

It was during these times that neighbors became better acquainted and in many cases, became lifelong friends.

Charles and Sylvia had another daughter, Maxine, born September 2, 1925.

In 1927, Charles opened a shoe repair shop. He was affectionately known as "Pop" Carlisle to all his friends and owned and operated the City Shoe Shop until his death in 1953.

Sylvia lived in the family home at 428 North Fifth Street until her health failed her. She passed away in 1975, at the age of 90.

Walter, the oldest son, was gravely injured in an industrial accident in New Jersey and died June 14, 1926.

Eva married J. Elmer Robinson in 1927 and they had two children, Elizabeth and Richard.

Dale married Dorothy Birchard in 1935 and they had five children; Rosemary, Bonnie, Frank, Toni and Jennie.

Maxine married Rodney Sundquist in 1943 and they have one son, David.

Carlton, Edwin O. and Mattie

Orris Carlton was born in Indiana in 1853. His parents owned a small farm in that state, where Orris grew to adulthood. He was married to Elain Weams who was born and raised in the same community, and to this union three children, Nellie, Edwin Orris and Mable, were born.

Orris was a farmer by occupation, raising vegetables and corn. In addition he raised pigs, some beef cattle and milked a number of cows. It was Orris' dream to go west to take up a homestead. He longed to join the wagon trains which were leaving, but circumstances always seemed to prevent his going.

Finally, Orris did move his family as far west as Tekamah, Nebraska. His wife, Elain, and his eldest daughter, Nellie, died after the family arrived in Nebraska. Later, he married for a second time, becoming the father of three more children, Erma, Berniece and Dave. Orris then realized his lifelong dream, taking a homestead on the Laramie Plains in Wyoming, near Marshall. To support his family while proving up, he was employed at various sheep companies. After his children were grown, he continued to live on his homestead until the time of his death. He is buried in Laramie.

Edwin Orris Carlton was born in 1898 in Indiana. He attended school there until he moved with his family to Nebraska, where he completed his education. When he was old enough, he filed on a homestead on the Laramie Plains.

Edwin was married to Mattie Marie Jackson, the daughter of Andrew and Cora Jackson. Mattie was born in 1898 at the family ranch on LaPrele Creek in Converse County, Wyoming.

Ed and Mattie began their married life in a two-room log cabin on the homestead. Other buildings on the claim included a chicken house and a barn with a corral. Some distance from the house was a slab building which was erected over a large spring. This building was fitted with shelves along the walls for storing foodstuffs. A large box with a water-tight lid was placed directly in the spring to hold pails of milk and cream. With the exception of an iron bedstead and the four-plated cookstove, all the furnishings in the cabin were homemade.

Willa Bell, the Carlton's oldest child was born in the cabin on the Plains. Since Ed was forced to work out to support his family, Mattie and her baby were alone much of the time. The summers were lovely, and the winters were cruel, bringing terrible blizzards with intense cold. Weather on the Plains was very undependable. A drop of fifteen or twenty degrees in temperature was not uncommon. There was the ever present danger of frost-bite or freezing with the victim being unaware that he was rapidly getting colder. Travel in winters was by sleigh. The frosty air carried the sound of the sleighbells for long distances. This sound was sometimes the only indication to Mattie that there were other folks living on the Plains in winter.

Finally, life alone on the homestead became almost unbearable for Mattie. The winters were so long and lonesome, and the summers brought with them the danger of being molested by wandering outlaws or the Mexican sheepherders who came with their employer's flocks to the Plains for summer range. It was for these reasons that Ed sold the homestead three years after he and Mattie set up housekeeping there.

The Carlons rented the Unland ranch located six miles west of Douglas, very close to the highway connecting Douglas with Casper. This location proved to be even more frightening for Mattie than her lonely home in the mountains. To be sure, the weather was better, but wandering bands of Gypsies and many tramps and beggars came by her door. She was constantly uneasy. If she gave the tramps and beggars food, there were larger numbers at her door on the following day.

While the Carlons made the Unland ranch their home, four more children were born to them, Thomas, Faye, Iona and Edwin Orris. Edwin died shortly after birth.

One summer afternoon during haying season, several wagons were seen coming over "water tank" hill to the east of the Carlton home. They were not the common sort of wagons used by the farmers in the area, but instead were tiny buggies, each drawn by four Shetland ponies. They passed the Carlton home, stopping to camp at a small stream further on to rest and water the ponies.

The Carlons had just finished their noon meal. The men who were helping with the haying were resting before returning to work. Thomas, who was about three years old was playing while his mother washed up the dinner dishes.

Mattie, finishing her work, went out to watch the Gypsies. They were a colorful sight. The leader wore a tight fitting shirt embroidered with yellow flowers atop his lavender trousers. Around his neck he wore a white scarf. The shirt and trousers were embellished with gold braid. The women wore full skirts, brightly colored, vivid blouses, and flowers and ribbons in their hair.

The band rested by the stream for perhaps an hour, hitched their ponies and resumed their journey.

The haying crew was preparing to go back to the field when Mattie noticed that Thomas had disappeared. She hunted feverishly for him and when she could not locate him she called for Ed to help her. When Tom was not to be found, Mattie was sure that the Gypsy band had abducted him. Ed was preparing to saddle a horse to ride to Douglas for the sheriff when the oldest girl, Willa, came running to tell them that she had found her brother asleep in a closet where he had taken his toys to play.

At that time, there was an alfalfa mill in Douglas. Along with others in the area, Ed raised alfalfa hay which he sold to the mill. There it was ground into meal and resold to dairymen near Douglas, such as Joe Alexander and Charles Huffman.

After some years, Ed moved his family to a farm about ten miles west of Douglas called the Gus "Humpy" Johnson place. It was rather small, so when Ed had an opportunity, he moved to a nearby farm, the Anderson place. There was more irrigated meadow and farm land there, as well as more pasture land.

Later the Carlons moved to the Zimmerman place, located about two miles west of Douglas. There they had better land and a large modern home in which to live. While they lived there World War II began. The government purchased land directly across the road from the Carlon home upon which to build an internment camp for prisoners of war. Since most of the young men had been called to war, it was the custom for the local farmers to hire prisoners from the camp to help during the harvest season. Ed hired several to shock grain. The prisoners came, accompanied by American soldiers acting as guards and worked very well. It seemed to the Carlons, however, that the camp did not furnish enough lunch for working men, and so the womenfolk prepared extra food which they fed to the prisoners. Since they were not allowed to enter the house, Mattie put a table on the back porch where the prisoners ate their noon meal.

Ed Carlon passed away September 5, 1953 following a heart attack. He is buried in the Douglas cemetery. After his death, Mattie moved into Douglas where she lived with her youngest daughter, Kathryn, until Kathryn finished her schooling. Then Mattie moved to Sheridan to live near her cousin, Alice Smith, a widow. Mattie found work in restaurants as well as cooking for large ranches in both Montana and Wyoming. When she was forced to retire due to her rheumatoid arthritis, she made her home in Sheridan.

Willa was married to Jesse Metcalf and became the mother of five children, Stephanie, Ann, Bud, Barbara and Janice. After her divorce from Jesse, she made her home in Shoshoni, Wyoming.

Faye was married to Orland Peterson, the only son of Clifford J. Peterson. They made their home on Boxelder Creek for nine years, later moving to Hagerman, Idaho. They are the parents of two children, Darrel and Susie. Faye and Orland divorced after they moved to Idaho. Faye returned to Wyoming six years later, and was married for the second time to John J. Joslyn. She and John make their home in Sheridan.

Iona married Harold Stinson and is the mother of four children, Harold Edwin, who died at the age of two, Daniel, Jo Ann and Rose Mary. They reside in Shoshoni.

The youngest daughter, Kathryn, married Evert Bourquin. They are the parents of three children, Cynthia, Paul and Bruce. They make their home in Glenrock, Wyoming.

Thomas, who joined the Navy in World War II, returned home to work as a carpenter for Petro Construction Company. Tom was also a talented musician, playing both the Dobro and the Hawaiian guitar. He was married to Phyllis Badger and to this union four children, Christina, Tommy, Kathleen and Phyllis, were born. Later he divorced Phyllis and married Patricia Schillings. Patricia and Tom had one son, Zane. Tom passed away on July 22, 1982 as a result of a heart attack and is buried in Gillette, Wyoming.

Carlson, Oscar and Hanna Family

Oscar Victor Carlson (nee Oskar Victor Karlson) was born September 16, 1874, in Smoland County of Sweden. We have no knowledge of his parents' names.

He migrated to the U.S. in 1891, earning his passage over by working on a freighter. His first stop was in Minnesota where he found work in the lumber camps there. Later he wandered on out to Colorado, finding work in the woods of the Cripple Creek area. His natural talents as a carpenter explains his love for woods and working with lumber.

In 1900, he sent his sister, Hilma, the money to come over to the U. S. She went directly to Omaha and started looking for Oscar, finally locating him in Cripple Creek. He then joined her in Omaha and found work in a planing mill owned by Gustav Alf Sandell.

It wasn't long until he met Hanna Johnson and they were married in Omaha on June 10, 1905. Hanna had come to this country in 1900 with her brother. They went straight to Omaha and Hanna was able to find work in the home of Irving Baxter, a lawyer in Omaha.

In 1909, Mr. Sandell heard about the new irrigation dam and reservoir that was being constructed on LaPrele Creek to furnish irrigation water for this area. This sounded great to him so he had Oscar cut out lumber for a house, take it to Wyoming and file on a homestead for him. After this was accomplished, he sent for Hanna the following spring (1910). It was quite a shock for her, coming out here where there were no other settlers. Oscar was the first settler in this part of the country. All was prairie and sagebrush. For one coming from Sweden to Omaha, then to Wyoming, it had to be the end of the earth for sure. It didn't last long after she was settled, however. Other Swedish settlers started arriving and soon a community sprung up almost overnight. Most of the settlers seemed to come from Omaha and Iowa. So Hanna soon started her Swedish cooking at which she was a master and forgot about being stranded in a forgotten land.

It wasn't long before Oscar decided to homestead for himself, so he filed on some land three miles east of the Sandell place. It wasn't long before the land joining the Sandell place was relinquished and Oscar quickly relinquished his claim and filed on it. He started clearing the land and the part he wanted for crop land he plowed by hand behind a horse drawn walking plow. Modern machinery was yet to be invented so the early settlers had to do everything the hard way. Also, he must start building another house and some farm buildings-also the hard way, by hand. The lumber he used was hauled from a sawmill in the Cold Springs area.

On October 30, 1910, a son, Irving Oscar, was born.

They were still on the Sandell place, but Oscar had started building their own house. When he had completed two rooms, a kitchen and bedroom, they moved in and continued to finish it during off seasons from farm work. It took two years before the irrigation ditches reached his land, so that meant two years of crop failure because of lack of water.

On September 20, 1913, they were happy parents of a baby girl, Martha Henrietta. As time went by, Oscar continued to build and farm. He finished the house in 1918 and the barn in 1922. Also, his children had reached school age and there was no school house. Irving was a year late starting, but they then started in a tarpaper shack on the Wheelock place a mile east of home, and Oscar started building a school house a half mile south of him up on the hill. It was called the "White Pigeon", School District No. 6. It remained as such until 1927, when it was moved about three miles south on the Natural Bridge road to a piece of land donated by Enoch and Erick Carlson. It was then renamed "Pleasant Valley" and remained so until the 1970s when it was abandoned and the children were bused to Douglas. Oscar served on the school board for many years.

The community grew fast and there was lots of socializing going on. Whist parties were started. Sometimes they would play until morning. Birthdays were celebrated, anniversary parties were given. LaPrele Homemakers Club was formed in June of 1924. Dances were held where they could find some space. When Oscar finished his barn, a dance was held there. There was always a fiddler or two around handy in those days. Listening to the stories they would tell one could tell they had a grand old time. Oscar was lovingly called "King of the Swedes."

Irving married Margaret Fackler, daughter of Dan and Augusta Fackler. Martha married Leo Thompson.

By 1935, Oscar began a long seige of rheumatoid arthritis that lasted for many years. He continued to keep active doing some irrigating and riding some of the farm machinery. His son was taking over the ranch work by this time.

He passed away on April 6, 1949 at his ranch home. Funeral services were held at the Congregational Church. Internment was at Douglas Park Cemetery. Hanna died April 11, 1959.

We dedicate this biographical account of our father to the Wyoming Pioneer Association in loving memory of our parents, Mr and Mrs. Oscar Carlson.

Carmin, Lem and Pauline Family

Lem Carmin, who lost his parents early in life, came to Converse County, Wyoming in 1906 from Mathew, Indiana. He worked as a "roundup" cowboy for LeRoy Moore and later as a hand for Jim Shaw, who ran his cattle in the country north of Orin. He also worked for Dr. Wilson of McKinley and Tom Black. Dad became interested in this western cowboy life and loved the area around Orin. After a few years of "cowboying" he homesteaded a couple of miles west of Orin, where he and his wife, Pauline, built a home and started ranching on their own.

Olive Pauline Eastman Carmin (B. September 11, 1889) came to Converse County, Wyoming with her parents, Fredrick and Ellen Eastman, from Bloomington, Illinois in 1908. She was teaching school near the Shaw ranch at Orin when she met and married Lem (B. September 22, 1887).

After moving onto their homestead, they built a modest home, barn, ice house, chicken house and corrals. Dad and mother's brother, William Eastman, became interested in rodeo and began gathering stock for producing rodeos in the immediate area. Dad continued in the rodeo business and became one of the most prominent rodeo producers in the area, furnishing stock for rodeos in Wyoming, Nebraska and South Dakota. He owned many famous bucking horses, including "Made in Germany", "Sweet Mama", "Buster Brown" and "Tick Fever". During the early days that Dad was producing rodeos, Mother became one of the outstanding relay racers in the area. How she found the time to do this and also be a loving, devoted mother would have to be a story in itself.

Lem and Pauline raised four children during the "depression" years. Joe, the oldest, now resides with his wife, Ida May Ayres Carmin, in Douglas. George and his wife, Ruby, are living on the original ranch at Orin in a semi-retired state. A daughter, Phyllis Lyons resides in Joe and Phyllis Carmin in foreground getting ready to board Orin school bus driven by Charles Hyatt.

Lake Montezuma, Arizona. The youngest daughter, Dorothy, now deceased, lived and reared her children in California.

Our parents told us many interesting stories regarding Dad's early cowpunching days and rodeo producing activities as well as many tales of their life in Converse County. Probably one of the most interesting to us, was when Mother had to ride twelve miles on horseback from her parents home in the south Douglas area and ford the treacherous Platte River twice on each of her weekly trips to teach at the Shaw School at Orin.

After being injured by a brahma bull in 1949, Dad sold his rodeo stock and moved to Texas where he passed away in 1972. Mother, who is now 94 years old, makes her home in Poway, California.

Carothers, Matthew and Blanche

Matthew Dales Carothers was born in Kimbolton, Ohio on May 17, 1867, the son of Samuel and Eliza Kewan Carothers.

Coming to Wyoming at the age of 16 in 1883, Matt found work with the Douglas-Willan, Sartoris Horse Ranch with headquarters on the Laramie Plains and a ranch on the North Platte River below the confluence of LaBonte Creek and the Platte River. Matt also was a cowboy for the Leman, Cross and Kennedy ranches. He was also told that the western climate would be good for his asthma.

Matt was soon to settle permanently on a homestead on upper Wagonhound Creek close to his brother, William J. Carothers. An uncle, Matt Kewan, had also come to the area and worked for Willan-Sartoris.

By December 31, 1895, Matt had met and married Blanche George, daughter of Fred and Mary Ellen George. They were married at the home of her parents on

LaBonte Creek.

The Carothers made their home on Matt's place on Wagonhound while Matt continued to work for ranches in the nearby area. Blanche became well known for her caring of sick friends and neighbors.

In 1906 they sold their place to Matt's sister-in-law, Martha Carothers, and purchased the old horse headquarters of the Guthrie Company on Wagonhound Creek from Edgar Gibson.

On January 15, 1909 a son, George William, was born. That same year Percy and Eli Peterson finished building the two-story house that was to be home to the family for many years. The house burned down in the late 1970s.

Arthur E. "Bud" was born on July 6, 1913. He married Dorothy Janet Stone on March 26, 1939. They were the parents of four children: Eleanor, Matthew "Tuffy", Sandra and Michael. Bud died on November 4, 1972.

Margaret Eliza was born February 5, 1914. She married Dale Anderson on November 9, 1936. Their two sons are Leroy and Jim. Leroy is married to Donna Bloem and Jim is married to Pamela Pickinpaugh.

Matthew Douglas "Doug" was born on April 19, 1924. He married Geralene Peebles. They have one son, Matthew. Doug later married Henrietta Harlow.

George married Maxine Stone on May 28, 1939. Maxine was a school teacher who hailed from Mitchell, Nebraska and came to Wyoming to teach school near her aunt, Ruth Furman Whitaker. Upon Matt's death on December 12, 1938, George and his brother, Bud, continued to operate the ranch until 1965. At that time George and Maxine bought Bud's interest and ran the ranch until 1973 when they sold it to Eugene and Esther Wollen and moved to Douglas. Maxine passed away on September 8, 1980.

Blanche died on March 3, 1959.

Carothers, William and Martha

William J. (Billy) Carothers was born May 31, 1860 in Ohio, son of Samuel and Eliza Carothers, being the second one of a family of eight children. Matt Carothers, Billy's brother, came to Wyoming to work on the Douglas-Willan Horse Ranch for his uncle, Matt Kewan. The ranch was located where the Mike Werner Ranch is now. Billy Carothers came out to visit his brother and worked on this horse ranch a while, then took a homestead on Wagonhound where the Wilson place is now.

Martha M. (Tillie) Westwick was born September 3, 1866 in Galena, Illinois, daughter of James B. Westwick of England and Eliza Atwell of Ireland. Tillie's parents, together with Tillie and two younger daughters, Eleanor and Harriet and two older sons, George and John and their wives Nell and Emma, moved to Wyoming in 1884.

The nearest settlements were Fort Fetterman to the north and Rock Creek (now Rock River) on the Union Pacific Railroad route to the south. They received some of the earliest land grants issued in this area. Tillie talks in her diary of going to Rock Creek once or twice a year for mail and provisions.

George and Nell's oldest son, Robert Westwick, was the first white child born on LaBonte in 1884.

Martha Westwick met the young Billy Carothers and they were married March 7, 1886 and she went to live on his homestead. Their only child, a son, Samuel Westwick Carothers was born in a little log cabin on the ranch, February 15, 1892.

Sam Carother's father, Billy, died when still a young man of 40 years of age on October 17, 1900. Billy was driving in the milk cow when his horse stumbled, throwing him up against the saddlehorn and rupturing his intestines. Dr. Wittke of Douglas was called, but could do nothing, only make him as comfortable as possible until he died four days later. He was buried in Douglas with the Episcopal minister officiating.

Billy left his widow Tillie and his eight year old son

Sam. Tillie took over the ranch and ran it by herself with the help of young Sam. Tillie also raised two other children (her brother's boy, whose mother and father had died - William Westwick who was twelve years old, and also William or Bill Owens, age nine, who needed a home.

Young Sam, together with the two foster children, William Westwick and Bill Owens, and their mother, Tillie had to work real hard to keep the ranch going. They did the irrigating, put up hay, took care of the cattle, etc.

Sam rode horseback about seven miles down the creek to school. Tillie hired a teacher to stay at the ranch during the summertime because school only ran about six months a year, as many days it was too stormy in the winter time. Tillie was very anxious for Sam to have the best education possible. He went up to the eighth grade at Wagonhound School, then he and his mother moved into town so he could finish his education. Sam was a good boy who did all he could to help run the ranch, which was quite a job without his father.

Ferne Sadler, Sam's future wife, was born in Litchfield, Nebraska on November 18, 1905. The daughter of L. E. and Izora Bell Engleman Sadler, the youngest of seven children. Her father and older brothers, Rollie and Harvey, came out to Wyoming in 1917 to file on homesteads in the Dull Center Community, north of Douglas.

Ferne's father, Louis, and brothers, Rollie and Harvey, came out and worked on the homestead in the summer and would return to Litchfield in the winter. Finally, when they had cabins and other buildings built on the homestead, they brought Ferne's mother, Izora, and Ferne back with them to the homestead. Ferne recalls the ride out here in an old chain drive pickup in May of 1922. It rained and rained she remembers, and they spent the night at a campground on the North Platte River. They spent the next night at the Cook ranch and had to fill barrels with water to haul to the homestead because no well was drilled yet. They had the truck fixed up sort of like a camper with a table that folded down and some folding chairs, etc. so they were quite comfortable in spite of everything. They moved out to the homestead which was 72 miles out north and east. They had a one room cabin to begin with, but later added a nice room for their living room. They had an old wood burning stove and a kerosene oven in which her mother turned out some of the best bread and cinnamon rolls in the country. Most of the neighbors always said they would rather have one of Izora's rolls than a piece of angel food cake. Ferne says they had lots of fun in spite of the hard work. She remembers in particular that her family would always get all dressed up on Sundays even though they were many miles from church and hold their church service at home by radio. A few years later there were church services at the school house and they never missed attending.

Ferne attended high school in Douglas and met Sam Carothers there, but she had no opportunity to really get acquainted with him. Then she was a substitute teacher at the Shaw ranch and met some of the other teachers there. At a dance at the Bill Hart Ranch she was dared by the other teachers to ask the young good looking Sam Carothers to dance. When ladies choice came around, she took the dare and asked him, and that was the beginning of their romance. Later she taught at the Dull Center

Harold Carothers

School and they began to go steady. They were married March 17, 1926 in Denver by a minister there. Her sister, Mary lived there and Sam's mother and some of the family attended.

She then moved out to Sam's ranch about fifteen miles southwest of Douglas. Their son, Harold "Had" Carothers was born October 8, 1927 in the old Douglas hospital.

Then hard times came when Sam was struck down with cancer. He spent seven months in a hospital in California and died April 16, 1955.

Ferne stayed on the ranch a while, but when her son Harold married Josephine Jones in June 1955, Ferne moved into town to live with her mother and work in a store. Ferne married Gene L. Payne, Sr., September 18, 1957 and has lived in this community since then. Harold was also afflicted with cancer and died September 13, 1982. He left his wife, Jan Jourgensen Carothers and his adopted children, Kelly Marie, Laurie Ann and Charles (Chuckie) Carothers as well as his mother and stepfather, Ferne and Gene L. Payne and family and many friends to mourn his passing.

Then on January 25, 1984, Gene L. Payne, Sr. died after a happy married life of 26 years.

Ferne has a very cheerful outlook on life and a lot of sparkle and love of fun. She chose to remember the good time and to forget the bad.

Recently, Ferne suffered a broken hip. She fell in the basement and had to painfully crawl up the steps to phone for help. She is home now and using a walker. Another example of an indomitable spirit that has seen her through her eighty years of life.

Carragher, James and Margaret

James Carragher was born on June 12, 1854, in Livingston County, New York, the son of John and Catherine (Carney) Carragher, both natives of Ireland.

His father, John, was a mason by trade and followed that occupation in Livingston County for many years until 1861, when he enlisted in Company G, Eighth New York Cavalry and was sent to fight in the front line of the Civil War. He was captured at the Battle of Wilderness and was a prisoner of war in Libbey Prison, where he died in 1864. James' mother remained in her home in Caledonia, New York, where James spent his youth, dreaming of the time when fortune would be his.

Determined to seek his fortune in the West, James quit farming in 1879, and traveled to Omaha, Nebraska, where he worked for the Union Pacific as a machinist. In 1880, he moved on to Gunnison County in Colorado, where he prospected and mined with varied success for about four years. He then abandoned the business of mining and lived and worked in Denver, Colorado, and the territory of Idaho, as a stone mason. Still seeking his fortune, he moved on to Cheyenne, and later to Albany County. Finally in 1888, he homesteaded on Bear Creek, about fifty miles south of Douglas.

On November 17, 1899, at Cheyenne, James Carragher married Margaret Abney, who was born in Wyoming, the daughter of Jackson and Margaret (Moody) Abney. Margaret's father, Jackson, was born in Kentucky and her mother was born in Ohio. Jackson Abney was engaged in freighting from the Missouri River to points west, before the advent of the railroad. He later located a ranch near Cheyenne, where he raised cattle for many years and was one of the earliest pioneers of the territory.

James and Margaret Carragher sold their ranch on Bear Creek in 1900, at a good profit, and bought a ranch on Trail Creek, a tributary of Horseshoe Creek.

James died in 1904, Margaret in 1912. They are buried in Douglas.

Otto H. Bolln bought the Carragher ranch on November 20, 1913 by a sheriff's deed.

Carson, Harold and Pansy Family

One bright June day in 1923, my husband, Harold, my mother, Mrs. Rose Stevens and I, Pansy, left Broadwater, Nebraska in a covered wagon drawn by a good team of horses for our homesteads 62 miles northwest of Douglas. We brought along four other horses, a milk cow, some chickens and a white kitten.

On our last day out, we stopped for lunch on Box Creek near the Fiddleback Ranch. We used our pliers for some repair job. Later and several miles farther down the road, we discovered we didn't have the pliers. Weeks later we went back and there were our pliers under the big tree, right where we had used them.

We stayed with my brother, James Stevens and wife, Alma for a while until we purchased a homestead shanty and shed from a Mr. Dilday. We moved these buildings on wagons to our homesteads and lived in this little house for years. Two of our three children, Dale and Arlone were born in this house on the homestead. Our middle child, Vivian, was born in the hospital in Douglas.

About two years after getting settled on the homestead, I taught the North Point School for one term. I rode horseback to the school for three miles in good weather. During the winter months I lived in a sheep wagon near the school. There were several pupils and I taught most of the grades from one to eight.

Moving to Wyoming — 1924 Harold Carson and Rose Stevens

We started in the sheep business by getting bum lambs from the big ranches. We sometimes had to get up several times during the night to feed the little bums. We traded wether lambs for ewe lambs to increase our flock. We milked cows, sold cream, raised chickens and sold eggs. That was our income for several years. We raised our vegetables and hogs.

We didn't have a water well for some time and had to haul water in barrels. We got some of our water from Bear Creek. My mother thought creek water would be soft, so one day she washed clothes in the creek water and discovered that the water was "so hard that one couldn't chop it with an ax."

One day, Harold started setting out trees. I said, "Why are you planting trees? I'm not going to live here until they get tall and of some use." We are still here after sixty years.

We sometimes fried meat, put it in a stone jar and covered it with hot, melted lard. If kept in a cool place, it would keep for weeks.

We lived about ten miles from Bear Creek Store, which was owned and operated by Mr. Ed Manning. We went there for our mail and groceries. We also enjoyed going there to meet and visit with neighbors. We had quite a few neighbors until about 1936 when the government bought the land and the people left the area. When we had neighbors, we had dances, Sunday school, card parties, school entertainments and picnics.

Our school was about three miles from our home. Dale rode to school on his shetland pony until Arlone was ready for school. Then they used a larger horse and Vivian rode behind Dale. During Vivian's first week of school, an unusual thing happened. The first part of the week was nice weather, but on Friday afternoon the snow and cold hit. Harold was away on business and Arlone and I were home alone. Dale finally came home alone, having left Vivian at the neighbors. I rode the horse back and got her. That was unusual weather for early September. Blizzards don't usually hit that early in the fall.

One summer, we had rattlesnakes on the hill just east of the house. We killed 136. The men would drive around in the pickup and when they saw a snake they would either shoot it or jump out and kill it with the shovel.

One day in July, 1973, our grandson, Rusty Hild and his grandfather were riding for cattle. A bolt of lightning came down out of an almost clear sky and killed Rusty and his horse instantly. That was very sad for all of us. Rusty had spent every summer at the ranch for several years and had planned to be a Wyoming rancher and veterinarian.

In closing, I think I should tell a little more about our children; Dale was born July 17, 1927. He married Mary DeCock and he is still on the ranch helping operate it.

Vivian was born April 1, 1930. She married Harold Arms who passed away in June 1973 with a heart attack. Vivian lives in Tennessee.

Arlone was born July 22, 1933. She married Raymond Hild. They live in Colorado. They had two sons, Raymond Dale (Rusty) Hild and Gregory Phillip.

Greg married Alison Henderson and they have a daughter, Kira Alexandra, born November 26, 1983.

Case, Samuel and Marilla Family

The lineage of the Case family in America goes back as far as the Mayflower, but the beginnings in Wyoming began with Emily Jerusha Case Churchill, born July 25, 1854 to Samuel Case and Marilla Edwards.

Emily Churchill came to Orin, Wyoming in 1886 after the disappearance of her husband Dan Henry Churchill. She brought with her, her two children Amy R. age 13 and Harry D. age 11. She married George Howe September 2, 1890 and about this same time her father Samuel moved in with her after the death of her mother Marilla. Samuel lived with the Howe family until his death ten years later on March 5, 1901. He was buried in the Douglas cemetery.

Several of Emily's nieces and nephews followed in her footsteps and also moved to Wyoming. They were children of her brother, William Wesson Case and his wife, Ida Hutchins.

The first niece to come was Emma Louise Case who settled in Lusk, Wyoming and married Harry H. Crater on Dec. 1, 1885 at Douglas, Wyoming.

Then Emma's brother Samuel Herbert Case moved to Manville, Wyoming and married Winifred M. Allen on November 4, 1903 in Manville.

The second brother to move into the area was Clarence Walter and his wife Mary Eva Cramer Case. The following story was written by their son Frank Alvin Case, Sr. who is at the time of this writing, December of 1984, living in Salem, Oregon.

Clarence Walter Case, the second son of William Wesson Case and Ida Hutchins Churchill (sister to Emily Jerusha Case husband Dan Henry Churchill) was born in Chicago, Illinois May 6, 1876. He had six sisters and two brothers. He married Mary Eva Cramer, when she was only seventeen on March 16, 1900 in Aurora, Illinois. Mary Eva was the eldest child of Johann Matthais Cramer and Margretha Differing and was born in Kronenberg, Germany Dec. 25, 1882. When she was less than one year old the family left Germany and moved to Chicago, Illinois. During the period from 1883 to 1898 six more children were born to Johann Matthais and his wife.

Clarence Walter Case and his wife Mary Eva had six children, Clara Eva was born July 28, 1901 in Aurora, Illinois; John Wesson was born Dec. 13, 1903 in Geneva, Illinois and George Harry was born in Grandin, Missouri September 4, 1905; and when George was only five days old, his parents with the other two children left Grandin, Missouri in a buck-board wagon and four horses to come to Wyoming.

When they came to the Missouri river, there were no bridges across the river and in trying to cross they lost their wagon and belongings in the swift current. After obtaining another wagon and some supplies, they continued on to Lusk, Wyoming, where they stayed with Clarence's brother and sister a short time. Then they proceeded west looking at land. When they arrived in Lost Springs, they saw a piece of land that they liked, just one mile west of the main street of Lost Springs. But they had heard about Douglas, so they went on to look at Douglas, where they rented a house and settled down for a couple of years. Father (Clarence) worked on farms and did carpenter work.

On March 29, 1907 a son Charles L. was born. During the time they were in Douglas, Father applied under the Homestead Act for the parcel of land that they had looked at while stopping in Lost Springs. It contained a little over 313 acres. Later they applied for an additional 40 acres adjoining the first request.

Father proceeded to drill for water and built a wind-mill, then he cut some of the trees on the back of the property to build a home out of the logs. As soon as the outer wall, roof and plan floor were completed he moved the family from Douglas to Lost Springs. The home was built all by hand tools. No power tools, no electricity. The beds were all bunk beds, except the bed in the living room. He also had to build a lean-to on the back of the house to accommodate the growing family.

While building his home and farming he did carpenter work on some of the buildings that were built on the main street of Lost Springs. His work day was always from sunrise to sunset.

On February 2, 1910 my sister Elsie Mae was born in Lost Springs. Then on October 15, 1911 I, Frank Alvin Case, was born in Lost Springs. On that date Lost Springs had one of the worst blizzards they had ever had. Mother's doctors, Bodine and Cantril, whose offices were in Douglas were unable to come to Lost Springs because of the blizzard. A neighbor helped deliver me.

On July 31, 1911 Lost Springs became the third city incorporated in Converse County. When the land for Lost Springs was dedicated there were not enough electors (the number needed was 30) to incorporate the town, so they included the ranches that were in a given radius of Lost Springs to get the number of electors needed for incorporation. During the period from incorporating to 1916 the town grew to about 250 inhabitants.

On December 15, 1915 our dear father, Clarence Walter Case (only 39 years old), died of pneumonia at the hospital in Douglas.

At that time our mother was nearly 33 years old and she was left with six children and no income. Clara Eva was 14 years old. John was 12 years old, George was 10, Charles 8, Elsie 5, and I, Frank, 4 years old.

As was the custom in those days our neighbors, friends and relatives came to Mother's rescue. A friend of our mother and father in Douglas, asked Mother to let sister Clara come and live with them in Douglas where she could help take care of their small children. Brother John went to work as a section hand on the railroad, earning his board and room with small pay. Earl Fogarty who owned the general merchandise store in Lost Springs hired brother George to help in the store doing odd jobs to earn his board and room and still go to school.

That left only three children at home. Brother Charles was given a part time job by Ollie Cannon, who lived up the road from our home. His pay was small but never the less helped buy food. Charles, Elsie and I went to school which gave Mother a chance to earn a little money doing odd jobs. Two of Mother's brothers, Uncle Matt and Uncle Jerry Cramer came out to Lost Springs from Chicago to visit and see what they could do to help out. While they were there they put siding over the logs to do a better job of keeping out the cold air in the winter time.

On May 14, 1919, three years after father died, my mother married Lemuel Elijah Pierce, who was related to our neighbor Sadie Fenton, who lived on the farm east of ours. Lemuel's wife, Margaret, had died in the big flu epidemic of 1918. He had three sons, Lewis J., Jacob (Jake) Lewis, and Gerald LaVern. Lewis Jacob was 21 and served in the U.S. Navy during World War I and had six trips from the U.S. to the war zone with supplies.

With the addition of these three boys it made us a family of nine children (five at home and four living elsewhere). During the summer of 1919 we all moved to Dwyer, Wyoming where our stepfather had homesteaded. But Mother did not like the house, so in a few months we moved back to Lost Springs. Soon after Mother was offered a large sum for the property in Lost Springs. Actually she was paid $2.00 an acre for the land (an unheard price in those days). The buyers name was Marquette.

We then moved to Lander, Wyoming and bought a large two story home on Canyon Street. It had a small building on the back of the property, which provided sleeping quarters for the older boys. George Case arrived from Lost Springs a few weeks later, but only stayed at home for a couple of weeks before going to work for the J. D. Wallace family in Lander. Sister Clara Eva had moved to Laramie, Wyoming to work for our Aunt Emma Crater in her boarding house near the University of Wyoming and also go to school. On July 2, 1920 she married William Thomas Cooper.

During our stay in Lander, Charles L. Case and Jake L. Pierce went to work helping to build a dam on the Wind River about 30 miles north of Lander. My stepfather worked for Scott Chevrolet Company as an auto mechanic and helped build an airplane with ski wheels that was used to carry cargo and the U.S. mail from Lander to South Pass, a town of about four or five families, who were isolated five or six months in the winter time because of snow. Also my stepfather conceived an idea of how to build a home from concrete slabs poured on the ground, then lifted into place for the interior and exterior walls leaving a three inch air space between the two walls. His idea was to patent this method.

At Easter time in 1923, my stepfather and I went to Evansville, Wyoming, where he went to work for the White Eagle Refinery. He bought a piece of land directly across the railroad tracks from the new school building (this school building is now the city hall). We proceeded to build a new kind of home. When we had the walls up, the floor laid, the roof on, and the studs up for the interior rooms, Mother and my sister Elsie moved from Lander to Evansville.

In Sept. 1923 my sister Elsie enrolled as a freshman at Casper High School and I attended Evansville School as an eighth grader. While living in Evansville, Dad Pierce bought a cabinet shop in Casper in 1924. I worked in the shop with him in the summer of 1924. That experience was very valuable to me throughout my life.

In September 1924 I entered Casper High School and my brother Charles and stepbrother Jake, who Mother had left in Lander when she moved to Evansville, moved to Portland, Oregon. Charles went to work for our Aunt Emma Case Burnett at her boarding house.

Business in the cabinet shop went bad that winter so Dad Pierce sold the shop, but he could not find any other work in Evansville or Casper and when he was offered a job by a brother in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, we packed up and took the train to Milwaukee, Wisconsin. From here I moved to a number of different places, but never came back to Wyoming to stay. Only my brother George remained in Lander and he still resides there. Most of the rest of the family removed themselves to places near Portland. Mother and Dad Pierce both are buried there and out of the nine children only George Case and myself Frank Case are still living.

Castle, Earl and Rosa

Earl Castle was born in Hermosa, South Dakota on July 30, 1894. He came to Wyoming just before the first World War, working in the vicinity of Torrington. After the war began, he joined the army, serving with the 91st Pine Tree Division from Wyoming. After his discharge from the service, he worked on farms near Mitchell, Nebraska. It was at a public auction there that he met Rosa R. Baughman. They were married on August 11, 1920.

Rosa Baughman was born on January 21, 1903 in Paris, Indiana. Her family had moved to Mitchell, Nebraska in 1915 where her father was employed at various jobs, among them being the sugar factory.

In 1923, Earl was given 640 acres of homestead land in Converse County located 42 miles northeast of Douglas, and the family moved to Wyoming to prove up. By this time, the Castles were the parents of two daughters, Della, born in 1921 and Bonnie Lucille, born in 1923. Their home on Lightning Creek was a two room building made from cottonwood logs. The Castles lived there for five years, and at the end of that time, they sold their land to Fred Williams for $900.00.

Earl helped with the construction of the bridge which was being built across the Platte River. He owned a Model T car which afforded him transportation to and from Douglas to the homestead.

L. to R.: Rosa, Lucille, Earl and Della Castle 1923.

On one occasion, Earl was unable to return home in a severe winter storm and Rosa, with her two small children, was alone in the homestead house. There was no food at all. In a desperate search for food, she was finally able to kill a rabbit in a hollow cottonwood log. After the rabbit went in one end, the log was plugged up and she was able to corner the rabbit. Thus the small family survived until Earl could return with food.

In 1927 Earl found employment with Charles Saul and continued to work for him until 1945. Then he was employed as a fireman at the Prisoner of War Camp at Douglas for four years. In 1949 he worked a year as custodian at the Douglas High School after which he returned to the Saul Ranch to work until 1966. For the next four years he was employed as a caretaker at the Natural Bridge Park, retiring in 1970.

Earl and Rosa bought a home in Douglas on North Third Street and lived there together until Earl's death in 1979 after which Rosa kept her home and resides there today. Earl is buried in the Douglas cemetery.

In addition to their two elder daughters, the Castles were the parents of six other children; Betty Jane, Eileen Vivian, Earl Dean, Donald J., Kathy D., and Luann E. They have 24 grandchildren and 21 great grandchildren.

Chambers, James Oliver and Laura

James Oliver Chambers, "Ollie" as everyone knew him, was born July 15, 1863, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Urie Chambers, on a farm near Mechanicsburg, Penn. When about 15 or 16 he went to Kansas where his brother had located.

A short time later he moved to Ogallala, Nebraska where he was employed on Dick Bean's Keystone ranch. Mr. Bean was unable to read or write so he hired Ollie, although still a teenager, to keep the books on the thousands of cattle that ran on the Keystone.

J. O. "Ollie" Chambers and George Pike.

He came to Douglas for a visit in 1886; two years later he moved to Converse County to stay. He became foreman of the Ogalalla Ranch of Irvine and Associates, a job he was to hold for 13 years.

He went into partnership with George Metcalf, taking over the land where the Double Box brand was run. Later he purchased the Metcalf interest, purchasing and leasing lands to continue in the sheep and cattle business.

Shortly after the turn of the century, Ollie and his brother-in-law, Clarence A. Slonaker, became partners in a transfer business.

On Dec. 16, 1919 he married Laura Gertrude Moffett at Bloomington, Nebraska. A daughter, Christine was born to them.

Mrs. Chambers served as Converse County Librarian from 1935 to 1966 and according to one account 34,808 books were added to the library during her tenure.

Ollie died in Nov. 1948 in Douglas and Laura on May 4, 1978 in San Diego, California.

Chamberlin, Albert D. and Jennie

Albert D. Chamberlin, one of a family of three children, was born in Dalton, Massachusetts in 1851. He was the son of Albert S. and Martha Mitchell Chamberlin, both of whom had been born and raised in Dalton. Albert's father was a successful businessman, owning and operating a paper manufacturing business in Dalton. The Chamberlin history can be traced back in

Albert D. Chamberlin

Jennie McReynolds Chamberlin, Second Postmaster - 1888

New England to the infant days of the Massachusetts colony. Members of its various generations were connected with affairs of state and operations in the Indian and Revolutionary Wars. The house in which our subject was born was erected by an ancestor in 1797, and has been occupied by some of the Chamberlin family from that time on.

Albert received his education in the public schools in Dalton, later teaching for a time in the elementary grades. He attended the Academy of Massachusetts, and was a student at a Methodist school located in Jamesville, New York after studying at the Academy.

When he had acquired the education he desired, he entered the paper business, working with his father until the Civil War began. The young man then enlisted in the United States Navy, serving through the entire war as a sailor aboard vessels searching for blockade runners along the coast. He was honorably discharged in 1865.

From the time of his discharge until 1881, he was engaged in the manufacture of paper at Westhampton, Massachusetts where he owned and operated a mill. In 1881, he came to Wyoming, locating at Cheyenne and becoming interested in the livestock business. He was in partnership with A. R. Converse and Silas Doty. Together they formed the firm of Chamberlin, Doty and Co. Albert acted as manager of the company's operations until 1886 when he moved to Douglas.

Albert opened a lumber yard in the area before the town of Douglas had actually been established. Besides the lumber business, he was also engaged in unproductive coal and gold mining. He was associated with DeForest Richards in the coal fields at Inez. In this venture, Albert lost all his savings and withdrew from the mining business. Albert was then engaged in a sheep raising business for the next 17 years.

In 1889, Albert was married to Jennie McReynolds of Nebraska. Jennie, the youngest of a family of eight children, was born in 1865 at Peru, Nebraska. She received her education there, after which she taught school for a time. She came to Douglas in 1886 with her brother, James. James had been appointed to act as the first postmaster of Douglas. In 1887, Jennie succeeded her brother in that position, becoming the first postmistress of the town. Jennie and Albert had no children.

Albert was appointed registrar of the United States Land Office which was located in Douglas. He served in this position from 1895 until 1904. During this time, Jennie was also associated with the land office.

After her husband's death in 1920, Jennie operated their sheep business with the help of Albert Sims. Later on, however, she sold her sheep and invested in cattle. Besides the land which she and her husband had owned in the Downey Park area, on upper LaPrele, and west of Douglas, Jennie bought land north and east of the town.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Chamberlin were active in the community, and contributed a great deal to its growth. A. D. served one term in the State Senate, having been elected in 1890. He was prominent in Freemasonry, completing thirty-five years as a member and attaining the Knight's Templar degree, as well as the thirty-second degree of the Scottish Rite.

Jennie was a charter member of the Woodbine Chapter of the Eastern Star. She was a shrewd businesswoman, and successful in the livestock business although she was widowed. She operated her business from her home in Douglas until her death in 1949.

Charles, Lee Gaines and Emma

My grandfather (Lee Gaines Charles), grandmother (Emma Snyder Charles), and my father (Edison L. Charles), moved to Douglas around 1916.

From my father's recollections, my grandfather was responsible for the construction of four or so small frame houses in the "Charles Addition" of Douglas in the early 1900s. He also remembers four remaining vacant lots being sold to a local saddlery owner for use as sheep grazing land. My father even remembers burying a broken watch in one of those back yards rather than having it found out by his parents. He has a picture taken some 20 years ago showing at least one of those original houses.

During his stay in Douglas, my father remembers several personal events such as entering first grade in Douglas schools around 1919. He vividly recalls being taken to school by his dad and then quickly departing as soon as he was out of sight. He also recalls some sort of big fair in Douglas around that time which was memorable by virtue of a large chocolate bar that he ate all the way home. In first grade my father met a girl named "Hope"; he was so fond of her that he took my grandmother's opal ring from her dresser to give Hope.

In addition to his house building activities in Douglas, my grandfather was a hardware and lumber salesman in the area. Apparently, around 1916, he purchased at least 320 acres about one mile northeast of Orin Junction. At this time the family still receives payment for a lease on the one-half of the land in which he retained oil and mineral rights. The purchaser of the land is not known. After some years in Douglas my father and his parents moved to Casper.

My brother John G. and I visited Douglas with our parents about 20 years ago and succeeded in locating the "Charles Addition". I distinctly remember the wide open spaces and long empty stretches of highway. Although too young to drive legally, my dad let me drive on the highway south out of Douglas. He slouched down to make me appear larger while my mother nearly had a fit in the back seat.

My father hasn't returned to Douglas since except for a side trip or two while in the Denver area. My brother and I visited in 1979, solely to verify property status in Orin Junction and Casper. My brother did drive through Douglas on business a few years ago only to receive a traffic ticket. He appealed the violation on the grounds that the "Charles Addition" made him something of a celebrity and therefore immune. I understand the appeal was denied after much good laughter in the courthouse.

Lee Gaines died in 1932 and Emma in 1966.

In 1984, my father was 70 years old. He always speaks fondly of the good times and good life he enjoyed in the western part of the United States.

Church Family

A small portion of the Church Family history while they lived near Esterbrook in the 1880s is related by Guy Newell Sr. in his diary.

"Another family among the tie hacks was a man by the name of Church. He moved in with his wife and three beautiful daughters. Well the boys all went hog-wild, there were about seven boys to each girl and the boys all wanted to go with Evelyn, she was beautiful. To go to the Church place on a Sunday was like looking at the Dodger Headquarters. The old man was very congenial and he always had a joke on some of the boys.

"The Churchs ran a boarding house and had a large dining room. They also had a good many dances. On one occasion one of the boys drove a nice driving team and buggy. The night of the dance he came driving up with his nice team and put them in the Company Barn. George Berry was his name and was one of Evelyn's suitors. During the night old man Church went out and took the hind wheels off the buggy and put them on the front and put the front wheels on the back. Next morning when Berry went to go home he hitched up his horses to the buggy and climbed into the buggy seat beside his girl, whom he was going to take out for a ride. With his eyes on the girl he never noticed the wheels. The old man was watching and he finally said, 'By Gum! Berry, that is a funny looking buggy. I never seen one like that.' Oh boy was Berry's face red.

"Evelyn was a tall girl and she had the longest hair I have ever seen. She was six feet tall and when she let her hair down and was standing up, the hair would touch the floor. She could play the organ and sing. Her sisters were just as good. They sure could furnish good entertainment."

Churchill, Harry and Family

Harry Churchill was born January 1, 1875 in Chicago, Illinois, the son of Emily J. Churchill. Harry's sister, Amy, suffered ill health. It was thought that she was developing tuberculosis, and since a higher, drier climate might prove beneficial to her, Emily brought her two children to Wyoming in 1886.

The Churchills lived at the Henry Hughes ranch in Platte County for a short time, and then moved to Orin, Wyoming. Harry's mother eventually married George Howe who owned property along the Platte River.

Harry entered into business for himself, owning and operating the Orin Hotel. He was married to Cora Hughes on December 7, 1906. Cora, who was born June 24, 1883, was a native of Colby, Kansas. To this union, four children were born; Emily (b. 1907, d. 1976), Mariatt John Harvey (b. 1909, d. 1941), Sylvia (b. 1913) and Elizabeth (b. 1914).

Harry and Cora Churchill separated when the children were still young. Therefore, Harry and his oldest daughter, Emily, raised the family. They raised a huge garden, cows and hogs, and kept several horses. Harry's step-father, George Howe, had an ice house close to the river. Harry put up ice there in winter, and peddled it to the townspeople during the summer.

Congenial and friendly, Mr. Churchill was willing to help his fellow man in almost any way he could. On one occasion, a train load of Mexican cattle was shipped into Orin. It was customary for ranchers to buy cattle from Texas or Mexico, ship them to Orin, and then trail them to the open range. Most of the cattle arrived in very poor flesh. This load of cattle encountered bad weather on their trip to Wyoming and by the time they reached Orin, most of them had died in the cars. It fell to Harry Churchill to get the carcasses out of the cars and dispose of them. He accomplished the first task with a great deal of difficulty, and then he was faced with burying them. He enlisted some help from the townspeople, and with teams of horses, they plowed ground and removed the dirt with slips to make a large hole. Once the carcasses had been dragged into the hole, they covered them up with dirt.

Harvey, Harry's son, was duck hunting on the river with Buster Pollock. The boy was accidentally shot and for a time, it seemed that he would not survive but he finally recovered. It was to affect him for the remainder of his life, however, and he died a young man at the age of 32.

The Churchill children received their elementary education in Orin, later attending the high school in Douglas. In 1930, Harry moved his family to Douglas where he was employed by the Douglas Wool Warehouse. He was married to Elsie Snyder on September 26, 1939. After her death in 1943, Harry made his home with his daughter, Sylvia Ridgeway. He died on December 6, 1957 and is buried in the Douglas cemetery. Harry's first wife, Cora, died in Douglas in 1964.

Clausen, Hans Peter and Nellie

Hans Peter Clausen was one of the early homesteaders in Converse County. He was born in Denmark. There he learned the butcher trade working with his father. He came to the United States in 1908. He worked on the Milwaukee Railroad for a time before he moved on west to Osceola, Nebraska. In Osceola, he entered the butchering business and became a naturalized citizen.

In 1914 he enlisted in the 114th Infantry and served on the Mexican Border. He received his discharge at the end of the war and returned to Osceola and continued in the butchering business.

In 1918 he came to Douglas and took up a homestead about 17 miles north of Douglas in the Lightning Creek area. During the early days on his homestead he worked at several outside jobs. He worked in the Big Muddy Oil Fields near Glenrock when it was covered with wooden derricks on the wells. He worked for Casper Packing Company as a butcher when it was first starting. He also worked for Arnold's Meat Market in Douglas at different times.

On January 9, 1919, Hans married Nellie Matilda Anderson. She was born November 9, 1891. She came to Douglas from Stromsburg, a Swedish settlement in eastern Nebraska and took up a homestead near Hans. Her brother, Frank Anderson, came from Stromsburg also and took up a homestead a few miles farther north.

Nellie walked several miles to get her mail through a lot of cattle because it was all open range. She used to tell about one day she was walking after her mail and the whole herd of cattle surrounded her. She didn't know what to do for a little bit, but soon thought of the umbrella she carried. She put it out in front of her and started opening and closing it and running at the cattle. It worked. They turned and left at full speed.

Seven children were born to this union: Francis of Douglas (born June 27, 1920), Clara, deceased (born

December 5, 1921), James, south of Douglas (born July 8, 1923), Esther Schnoor of Casper (born March 22, 1925), Newton of Riverton (born November 17, 1927), Marie Jones of Beucyrus, Missouri (born June 29, 1929); and Arthur of The Dalles, Oregon (born May 3, 1935).

Pete, as he was known to his many friends and neighbors, was a respected and well liked member of his community. He was always willing to help anybody that needed a helping hand.

Hans (Pete) and Nellie spent their years together on his homestead to which they added her homestead and several homesteads they purchased from others that had proved up on them, lived on them sometimes for several years, sold out and moved on.

Hans died October 31, 1943. Nellie died June 16, 1967. They are both buried in the Douglas Cemetery.

Clay, Charles and Agnes

Charles Edward Clay was born in Bedford County, Virginia November 18, 1838 on his father's plantation near Lynchburg. His father, Paulus Aurelius Clay, was the son of Charles Clay, an Episcopal minister and close friend of Thomas Jefferson, also first cousin of Henry Clay. His mother was Mary Louise Watkins.

Charles had three sisters, Margaret, Sallie (b. 1850 in Virginia, d. in Wyoming) and Nannie Elizabeth (b. January 20, 1847 in Virginia, d. 1938 in Cheyenne, Wyoming), and one brother William Landon (b. March 28, 1855 in Virginia and d. April 17, 1939 in Cheyenne, Wyoming).

When Virginia seceded from the Union the family moved to Richmond. His mother died when William was a small child. Both William and Nannie were raised by a black mammy governess.

Charles was educated at William and Mary College in Williamsburg, Virginia. Charles' father was a close friend of Robert E. Lee. Charles fought in the Civil War and was a Captain in the 2nd Virginia Cavalry, serving under General Fitzhugh Lee. Both Nannie and Charles witnessed Lee's surrender at Appomattox Courthouse. Nannie's view was from the branches of a cherry tree.

Charles left Virginia after the Civil War and moved to Wyoming, at that time a part of the Dakota Territory. He worked for W. G. Bullock, a friend of his father from Virginia, as a freighter. Later Charles "Charley" Clay owned one of the two biggest ox team freight hauling outfits in the territory. Freighting between Fort Laramie, Cheyenne, Red Cloud Agency and Fort Robinson, Nebraska. "Bullwhackers" moved merchandise between the wide open spaces of the 1870s transporting 150,000 pounds on each average trip, using both single wagon and double-hookups. Five yokes of oxen were used on a single wagon, six yokes when two wagons were hitched together. Where the ground was soft or an abundance of sand the driver often had to make a new trail, a trip generally taking thirty to forty days. Once while freighting to Red Cloud Agency with 50,000 pounds of sugar across the North Platte River when it was at flood stage, everything got wet except the sugar which was in barrels "but they didn't pry into its condition when it was delivered."

Charley married firstly, a Sioux Indian, Lulu, sometime after 1865. They were parents of four children, Hattie, Susie, Emma and Johnnie. Lulu died before 1873 and was buried at the Sioux Agency in South Dakota.

Charley's sister Nannie and his father Paulus arrived from Virginia on September 6, 1873. Nannie was to take care of Charley's children. They were greeted by a sand storm upon arriving in Cheyenne. Charley had a house on 21st Street for them. There were 12 trees in Cheyenne at that time; and when Charley freighted to Cheyenne he corraled his wagons where the city park is now. Nannie and Charley planted the first trees east of the Priest's home on 21st Street.

After Charley married in 1876, Nannie became a seamstress. On January 26, 1881, she married John Raven Steele of England. He worked for the Swan Land & Cattle Co. Later they owned their own spread. John died in 1891. Nannie nursed Tom Horn when he had Cuban fever. She knew and was a neighbor of William Booker, John and Tom Hunton, Hi Kelly and many others. After selling her ranch she moved to Cheyenne.

William "Bill" joined his family in Wyoming in 1875 and worked for his brother Charley freighting. In 1878 he entered the stock business at Chimney Rock below Chugwater. Paulus returned to Virginia in 1877 where he died in 1880.

Charles married secondly, Miss Mary Agnes Abney, daughter of John Abney of Cheyenne on October 19, 1876 at the home of Jackson Abney, her brother in Cheyenne. Chas. F. Miller and Nannie E. Clay were witnesses, J. Y. Cowhick, Presbyterian minister married them. They lived in Cheyenne for a number of years where three daughters were born to them. Mae (1877-1880), Maude (b. Sept. 27, 1880, m. E. M. Lovell Sept. 4, 1907, Kelso, Washington, d. May 13, 1967 Grants Pass, Oregon), Beth (b. July 23, 1883, m. W. J. Moore August 15, 1899, Elma, Washington, d. April 12, 1976 Ashland, Oregon). The Clays moved to Rock Creek in 1883 where Charley had a store. A son, Charles E. Clay, Jr., was born (Sept. 2, 1885, m. Veda Byles Oct. 30, 1906, Elma, Washington, d. May 1, 1953 Inglewood, California).

Charles Clay, Justice of the Peace - 1886

Charles Clay was a tall man of slender build, had auburn hair and blue eyes. Mary Agnes was small and had brown hair and grey eyes and was of a determined nature.

On their way to their ranch Mr. Bryant Brooks (later governor of Wyoming) brought his wife by train as far as Rock Creek. There was no hotel there — but Charley invited them to stay. Clay met them and explained his wife had gone to a dance (according to Maude Clay her mother would rather dance than anything in the world). Charley took the Brooks to the Clays' living quarters over the merchandise store. Agnes, wearing a long white "Mother Hubbard" dress and a man's black hat, came to extend a welcome and invited them to the dance. Mrs. Brooks declined, and Agnes Clay nonchalantly told them to "make yourselves at home" and returned to the dance.

The store was sold to William Taylor in 1886 preparatory to moving to the new town of Douglas. His merchandise was packed for shipment when a fire broke out, which resulted in a total loss. An item in the Douglas Budget of June 9, 1886 "C. E. Clay's loss thru a recent blaze at Rock Creek was $12,000. last week." On November 5, 1887 Laramie Weekly Sentinel this item is listed, "The most novel and interesting case in court this week was the suit of Chas. Clay against William Taylor of Rock Creek. Mr. Clay charged Mr. Taylor with having slandered him by accusing him of setting fire to his store. The jury found Mr. Taylor guilty and gave a verdict in favor of Mr. Clay for $1,000. damages. It was a novel suit, for this country, and attracted considerable attention. Here-to-fore it has always been supposed a man or a woman could say what they pleased about their neighbors, but it appears there is a new law against it and it may be well for the public to know the fact and govern themselves according." It is thought $12,000 was a typographical error.

One week before the disastrous fire, Charley Clay had donated and shipped his private library to the Board of Regents of the Wyoming University. "The collection consists of several hundred very choice and valuable historical and classical scientific papers. Some being old and very rare, and being in the family for more than a century and some of which are 246 years old." Laramie Weekly Sentinel April 10, 1886. His name and deed were placed in the cornerstone of the University, Old Main Building.

In June 1886 Douglas wanted law and order. Petitions were circulated and signed. C. E. Clay was appointed resident justice of the peace and J. W. Overman as constable.

While serving as justice of the peace he was threatened by gambler friends of a dance hall bouncer he had sentenced to jail for beating a cowboy.

"You've got to suspend that jail sentence" said one "If you don't we'll tar and feather you and ride you out of town on a rail."

Clay, without answering, walked back of the bench and took out a pistol containing a double charge of powder and shot. The gun, he said, "will always be here to make that sentence good."

Another example of Justice in the West. A. Meyers was shot and killed on Tuesday, by an employee Jesse Richabaugh who gave himself up on Wednesday. Judge Clay empanelled a jury and held an examination, resulting in the discharge on the grounds of self-defense.

On July 28, 1886 Clay's large stock of groceries arrived by rail and he set up store in one-half of Wagner & Son's tent.

On September 19, 1886, the first school board elections were held, C. E. Clay was elected to serve as trustee and act as treasurer. The first school was held in a shack tent with Miss Cora Rice, teacher, with 45 pupils enrolled. Miss Rice contracted typhoid fever a few months later and died. Miss Maggie Brewster was hired to finish the school year.

When lots went on sale September 30, 1886, 242 were sold in the first four days. Owners conducted business upon the back of their lots until new buildings could be constructed. A number of wells were dug, hitching racks for horses put up, and folks went to nearby hills and dug out coal for fuel. The winter of 1886-1887 was extremely cold with deep snow most of the time.

November 1886 a meeting was held and funds pledged, with a committee formed to collect the necessary data to boost for the incorporation of Douglas. M. C. Barrow and Judge Clay were sent to visit Laramie and Cheyenne to gather the necessary information. In March 1887 the census listed 805 souls in Douglas. A mass meeting was held March 10th and it was decided to incorporate. The commissioners of Albany Co. voted favorably in September; and on October 3, 1887, city officials were elected. C. E. Clay becoming a councilman.

Decoration Day in May 1887 was the first public parade marshalled by R. S. Brown and Luke Usher; carrying the colors were 28 veterans and 10 little girls dressed in white. An elaborate program was held at the Slaughter Opera House. Two Confederate veterans, C. E. Clay and George Donnelly, occupied seats on the stage.

C. E. Clay was a very active member of the Ashlar Lodge U.S.A.F. & A.M. when it was organized in Douglas, appointed on the finance committee. He was also a member of the Knights of Pythias, and a honored member of the Eastern Star and Rathbone Sisters.

Because of the poor economy it was necessary for Charley Clay to close his large mercantile establishment in August of 1887. He retained his transportation contracts.

C. E. Clay served in the House of Representatives 1890-1891.

In the early part of 1891, the Clay family moved to Ocosta, Washington where they lived until 1898, moving then to Elma, Washington where he was the marshal.

Charley's wife Mary Agnes was born December 31, 1858 in St. Joseph, Missouri died in Elma on August 22, 1904.

In August of 1905 while attempting to arrest Sam Tremaine of Montesano, "who was filled up with 'bad whiskey' but as he resisted, Clay had to use force, knocking Sam down to get the 'nippers' upon him." After placing Sam in a cell, Clay stepped back to close the door when Tremaine kicked him "striking a truss he wore and inflicting what has since proved to be a fatal wound."

Marshal Clay died August 18, 1905, four days after the attack. Both C. E. Clay and his wife Agnes are buried in the Masonic Cemetery, Elma, Washington.

Clay, Walter and Margaret Family

William Clay's parents were born in Lincolnshire, England. His father was a farmer. William was born July 10, 1826 in Gedney, Lincolnshire. He had nine children. He left England in December 1852, landing in New York the following January. He then settled in Albion, New York for three years, moved on to Michigan where he lived for nine years, then to Iowa where he remained only a few years, until his wife died. In 1868, he and his family, along with 16 other families, went by wagon to Nebraska. They were known as the Iowa colony.

George Clay, son of William, was a successful farmer in Panama, Nebraska. He married and had two sons, Walter Ernest Clay and Wallace Clay. His wife died and he remarried, having five more children.

Walter Clay, son of George, was born March 16, 1897 in Panama, Nebraska. On October 5, 1897 he married Margaret Schellinger. He farmed and also worked on the railroad. On April 28, 1900, a daughter was born, Fern Lila Blanche Clay. In 1914, Walter decided to take his family to Wyoming and take out a homestead, after hearing from his brother, Wallace Clay, who had come out about two years before. Marvin Schellinger, father of Margaret Schellinger Clay, and Wallace Clay's sister-in-law, Goldie Sorenson, age 16, loaded their things with the Clay's, in a covered wagon which was pulled by a team of mules.

Fern relates the following story of the trip:

"When we left Panama, we ate an early breakfast, washed the dishes and put them in the cupboard as though we'd be back soon. We took supplies, clothes, and enough dishes and cooking utensils. The first day out, a runaway horse came towards our mules scaring them, almost causing an accident. We made about 25 miles a day, although we never traveled on Sunday. That was the day for washing and baking bread, and also letting the mules rest.

"We took the southern route, leaving Panama through Crete, Hastings, Kearney, Gothenburg, North Platte, Ogallala, Lodgepole, Sidney, Kimball, Bushness, up to Harrisburg, Nebraska, then on to Huntley, Wyoming, Fort Laramie, Guernsey, Dwyer, McKinley, to Douglas. The people were very friendly along the way. They would bring us milk and sometimes a big treat was lemonade. We would stop and visit with those who were close to the road.

"In Lodgepole, the wind blew our wagon over, then one day we traveled all morning without seeing anyone. My dad had to hook the team up and move out of the road so cars could go by. We only saw one car on the entire trip.

"My dad got sick while we were at Sidney and a farmer, whose place was nearby, took him to the doctor. Goldie and I had a chance to play and go to school and visit. We played ball and had a good time for the four days we were there. We arrived in Orin Junction May 15, 1914, where Wallace Clay was living. He was working for the Burlington Railroad. We visited there a couple of days, then went on to Douglas.

"Walter worked building road under the railroads a short time, then worked on a ranch. Around August, he took out a homestead. We put up a tent, which I slept in, and Mom and Dad used the top of the wagon to sleep under, until they got our one-room house done. My granddad, Marvin Schellinger, also took out a homestead joining us. I started to school about two miles west of Irvine. I had to walk five miles to and from school. Miss Ada Newsom was my teacher."

"In 1915, Fern Clay met Fred Duran, who was born in Durana, Spain, May 30, 1888. He came to the United States in 1912, settling in Iowa. In 1914, he came to Casper, worked at the Roundhouse, and for the Standard Refinery. Two brothers, Justo and Thomas, were already in Casper. Justo worked around Casper and Thomas went to Salt Lake and worked in the mines, then back to Superior, Wyoming where he worked the mines there. In 1915 Fred took a homestead joining the Clays. On September 26, 1916 Fred and Fern were united in marriage. They built a one-room house, got their water from a spring which was about a quarter of a mile from the house. Fred built most of his furniture, and bought a new cooking range. Fred continued to work for Standard Refinery until 1917 when he quit and joined Fern on the homestead. He farmed and also worked for the Northwestern Railroad and other jobs, so they could improve on the homestead. He did this for about two years, then he just farmed and ranched. On June 29, 1918 a son was born, George Wayne Duran. In 1920 Fern went to work in Orin Junction at a restaurant for Ourgos leaving George with her mother "Maggie" Clay. She worked for about three months. In 1923, she cooked for the Northwestern Gravel Pit crew for about four months, near Irvine.

The neighbors were the John Lefflers, Bert Moss, John and Ed Schneider, Therman Days, George and Ed Jewell, Tom Christophers, who operated the River View Ranch, Inc., and Henry DeHaan. We traveled by horse and buggy, or horse and wagon. We used the wagon to go to town for supplies, and the buggy for smaller trips. We would go to our neighbors for dances, card playing, ball games, and picnicked by the North Platte River. We all took turns and had a lot of fun.

In 1924, we added two rooms to our one-room house.

On December 14, 1927, a daughter, Lettie Louise Duran, was born.

In 1928, Walter and Margaret Clay moved into Douglas and Fred Duran took their homestead.

Fred Duran died in 1945.

Fern is now living with her daughter, Lettie, in Fruita, Colorado.

Clayton, Ernest M. and Marie

Ernest Mayer Clayton and wife, Marie (Mayme) Hardee King Clayton with daughters Virginia and Edith, seven and five respectively, arrived in Douglas April 16, 1917 after leaving Denver, Colorado April 12th. According to our father's diary, it took three and one half days to get to Douglas from Denver. I, Virginia, remember sitting on an apple crate in the back of the Pierce Arrow truck. I don't remember how we spent the nights on the way to Douglas as there were no motels then. Possibly we camped or slept in the truck.

The first home I remember in Douglas was a small house in a large lot next to the Carey's, (the house Cecil Stark rebuilt) at the south end of Fifth Street. The William Winslows lived across the street.

Shortly after coming to Douglas, Mr. Clayton bought a homestead for himself and one for his mother, who came out from Pennsylvania to stay with us. The homestead was northeast of Douglas in Lowry's pasture (Fiddleback Ranch on Box Creek). As I recall, it was a rather dreary place and must have been mostly prairie as I remember watching the clouds cast cooling shadows on the ground and I would try to get into the shadow before it moved. There were also rattlesnakes, coyotes, gophers and antelope around. Our father built a small house for his family and one for his mother. A short time later our father started working in Midwest, or near there, and our mother said she would not stay out in that lonely and barren place alone with two small children. Soon the homestead was sold and we came back to town.

Shortly after John, our brother, was born on March 6, 1918, we moved downtown and lived behind our father's electrical shop on Center Street. Dr. Hylton and his family lived in the building next door to us. Dr. Hylton had his office in the building. There were so many beautiful big trees lining the streets. In the summer we would like to sit in the car under a big tree and watch what was going on along the street. Saturdays, we kids would go to the matinee and see the movies where the heroine was either on the railroad track with a train bearing down or she was clinging to a tree over the side of a cliff. My favorite was Ruth Roland with her beautiful long dark curls.

Our dad loved to go fishing and every weekend in the summer, rain or shine, we were camping in the mountains. One of our highlights was Lisle Pexton's ranch.

Aside from the electric shop, our father did photography. He built his own enlarging box and would enlarge prints from many of the snapshots of beautiful mountain scenes he had taken. Two I remember well were the Natural Bridge and the Medicine Bow Falls where we would go fishing. He taught our mother the finishing process and she did the picture work that came into the shop plus the work for the two drug stores, Goodrich's and Steffen's.

Any old timer in Douglas can tell you the Claytons had the meanest Airdale dog in town. All walkers preferred the other side of the street. And later, our mother had a Myna bird that whistled at all passersby.

About 1927, our father bought the Cummings house on South Fifth Street. We lived there for many years and our mother continued to live there after Mr. Clayton's death on May 7, 1958. It was home to our mother until her death on January 14, 1972.

There were four children; Virginia Reynolds Marmaduke of Denver, Edith Morton Knisely of Douglas, John lost at sea in World War II, and Mary Clough of Douglas.

Clayton, George P. and Jennie

George Clayton was born at Monroe, Wisconsin on July 19, 1854. He first saw Wyoming in 1882 while helping on a trail drive that drove 10,000 cattle from Walla Walla, Washington. Previous to that he had been Postmaster in Sidney, Nebraska before going to Washington.

On March 3, 1885 he was married to Jennie E. Sutcliffe. Jennie was born in Little Rock, Arkansas on January 19, 1868. She and her family came west in 1879 and settled in Fort Steele, Wyoming. In a short time the family moved on to Fort Laramie and in 1882 moved to Fort McKinney near Buffalo, Wyoming. It was here that Jennie met George.

By the end of 1885 they moved to Fort Fetterman where they resided for three years. In 1888 George and Jennie homesteaded in Batts Canyon southeast of Glenrock. Mrs. Blanche Duncan lives there now.

George and Jennie had five children; Vern, Plin, Earl, Irene and Velma. George died in Glenrock on November 4, 1936.

Earl S. Clayton was born on January 23, 1891 in Glenrock. He was married to Gertrude Lythgoe, daughter of Joseph and Jenne Lythgoe, on September 9, 1916. They had one son, Evert, who was born in 1917 and died in 1958.

Earl served as a deputy sheriff in Glenrock for four years and was a mail carrier for years on the Boxelder Route. He served as a Converse County Commissioner from 1937 to 1949. He was appointed County Assessor in 1949 and served in that capacity until his death on April 3, 1958. Gertrude, or "Gertie" as she was better known, died on May 7, 1984.

Clelland, L. W. and Olive

L. W. Clelland was born in Ohio on the 13th of December, 1847, son of William A. and Betsy (Ricketts) Clelland. His father was a cabinet maker by trade and in 1849 he left his Ohio home en route for Council Bluffs, Iowa, after which he was never heard from again. L. W.'s mother died when he was three months old.

On February 25, 1873 he was married to Olive Guthrie, daughter of Isaac F. and Rachel Guthrie. Olive was born on September 13, 1853 in Marion County, Ohio.

Coming to Wyoming in 1881, he settled on Wagonhound Creek, south of Douglas. Olive's brothers, Will and Silas Guthrie, had previously settled nearby on Wagonhound and West Fork LaBonte.

He was appointed deputy county clerk in 1891 when his brother-in-law was elected Converse County Clerk. The appointment was the start of his involvement in county government that was to be a part of his life until his death.

In 1902 he was chosen county treasurer and occupied that position for four years. In 1906 he was elected to the office of county clerk and served in that capacity for four years. In 1910 he was chosen to represent his district in the state legislature and in 1912 became the candidate of his party for the state senate but lost the election by a single vote. In 1916 he was once more elected county clerk and served until 1921.

Mr. Clelland purchased the old Fort Fetterman land site when it was sold in the 1890s. He operated a sheep ranch using the Fetterman site as his headquarters.

L. W. died on May 13, 1922; Olive on December 31, 1924.

Clough, Albert and Mayme Family

Albert Aaron Clough came to Douglas in 1896 at the age of 23. He had worked as a youngster on the Council Bluff Non-Pariel to learn the printing trade and also in Omaha at the Omaha World Herald. He entered the employ of Bill Barlow's Budget located in a frame building south of and adjacent to the present Bolln grocery store. He became foreman and later co-owner. In 1914, he and M. R. Collins sold The Budget to Thomas F. Doyle who came here with his family from Omaha. Mr. Doyle's first issue of The Budget was December 3, 1914. Following the death of Robert F. Potter, who established the Douglas Enterprise in 1907, Mr. Clough became one of the owners and active manager of The Enterprise. In 1922, he recruited Floyd W. "Bart" Bartling from the Casper Tribune to work as machinist-linotypist. Bart worked for 18 months at The Enterprise. The Enterprise grew to be recognized as one of the outstanding weekly publications in the state. Mr. Clough, better known as Bert to his friends, continued as publisher and active manager until his death.

On July 6, 1904, Bert and Mayme L. Jarchow were married in the Episcopal Church in Douglas. Mayme was the daughter of William and Mary Jarchow who came here from Iowa about 1899. Mr Jarchow was proprietor of the Sanitary Market. Mayme and her sister Josephine were members of the first graduating class from Douglas High School in 1902. Josephine married William Ernest Adams in April 1905.

The Cloughs and Collins had a mountain cabin a few miles southwest of Cold Springs. It was a 2-3 hour drive each way, depending on how many times one got stuck during mountain showers. On the way we always watched for the Bear rock.

The cabin site was an idyllic spot-rocks to climb and beside the cabin a sparkling stream crossed by two rustic foot bridges. On the creekbed, fool's gold glistened in the sunlight. They often invited friends to the cabin for weekends. Upon arrival, the women would start peeling, slicing and frying potatoes while the men set out for favorite spots to fish, confident of a good catch for supper.

Now the cabin is gone and a dirt road crosses the sparkling stream. The area is known as the Campbell Creek Campground.

Bert and Mayme had two sons; Frederick of Boulder, Colorado and Albert of Douglas. Bert died on November 14, 1936 at age 63, Mayme on May 14, 1980.

Cole, Elvin "Red" and Cora Family

Elvin "Red" Cole was born in Miller, Nebraska, November 14, 1903, son of Eugene and Hattie Morgan Cole. His father and mother came to Wyoming in 1917 to homestead on Spring Creek, south of Douglas in Converse County. Red was 14 years old at this time, about the middle of eleven children. His folks proved up on the homestead, and then Red's father moved to Glendo to run a blacksmith shop, which he continued running until 1945 when he retired. Eugene died in 1948 at the age of 85.

Cora Jane Lees was born at Cora, Wyoming, and was named Cora after the town where she was born. She was born November 28, 1910, daughter of Chet Elmer and Maude Dehorety Lees, and was the next to the youngest of seven children. Her father drove a freight wagon from the lumber camps around Pinedale to Rock Springs for several years. Then they moved to the ranch where Lone Tree Bible Ranch is located now. Her father died in 1924 of heart trouble.

Red Cole married Cora Lees in Douglas on August 18, 1925. They moved to the Hern place at Orin after they were married. They went to Nebraska for a short time to harvest beets and their eldest child, Lyle Dean was born there. When Lyle was only one month old they moved back to the ranch in Wyoming, near Orin.

Bernice and Betty were both born in Glendo at Red's folks' place with a doctor coming down from Douglas. Cora almost lost her life when Betty was born because the doctor had already gone back to Douglas when she started to hemorrhage. Through the nursing of her mother-in-law and her father-in-law elevating the bed with bricks, her life was spared.

Stanley, Norma, and Janice were born in Smith's Maternity Home in Douglas.

The highlight of the year in those days was going to the Wyoming State Fair. Everyone went and they would meet at the North Platte River for picnic lunch with their neighbors. They had rodeos in which everyone participated. They played musical chairs on horseback, and had wild cow milking, kid's pony races, lady's quarter mile horse races, potato races, stake races, and the bed roll races. Besides this, they had the events that we have today of calf roping, steer wrestling, bareback and saddle bronc riding.

Red and Cora and all the children participated in these events. They not only participated in state fair rodeos, but traveled for miles around to take part in rodeos. They would always have to get up real early and do all the chores and even have to make preparations for the animals at night time in case they had to stay overnight.

They never missed a rodeo, no matter what they had to go through to get there. They would pack a big lunch because sometimes it would have to be for supper too.

One of the Coles' special events was the wild horse race. They had a team that participated in this for many years. Red, or one of the boys would ride, one would mug (hold the horse's head while biting it's ear), and one held the rope. Some of the Cole boys are still taking part in the wild horse race in the Guernsey Old Timer's Rodeo.

The older boy, Lyle, competed in his first kid's pony race at the state fair in 1932 when he was seven years old, riding old Brownie.

They had quite some experiences through the years in the rodeos. One time, when Red and Van Irvine were in the wild cow milking at the state fair, Van roped the cow and Red was supposed to mug the cow for Van to milk it. However, somehow the rope broke, so Red grabbed hold of the cow's tail and held the cow that way until Van could mug it. Then Red grabbed the bottle from Van, milked the cow, and ran to the judge to win third place in the race. The crowd went wild about that one.

One time, years later, Stanley was riding in the wild horse race at the state fair. Stanley's horse was well on the way to winning the race when it turned around. It hit head-on with Donald Brow's horse. The collision killed both horses and put both men in the hospital, but they weren't badly hurt, fortunately. Stanley didn't want their team to draw out of the race so Lyle Cole got permission from the fair board to take Stanley's place riding. He got Walt Davies to mug for him and they won a first one day and a third the next.

Another time, when Lyle and Bernice were quite small, they didn't have the price of admission into the fairgrounds, so they decided to slip through a hole in the board fence. All went well until they came face to face with a Brahma bull that had gotten out of the arena. They made tracks getting out of there, you can bet, and fortunately made it out ok before the bull took them.

Red Cole and family ran sheep in the years 1941, 1942 and 1943. They had moved out to the Powell place west of town, and the kids rode horseback to the Pleasant Valley School. During a blizzard of April 1945, they lost a lot of sheep and were forced out of the sheep business and moved into town. They then moved to the place where they are living now, at #32 Irvine Road.

They contracted to bale hay then and baled hay for people all over the county. They had a hay baler that they had to block and tie the bales themselves. They had a matching team of black horses, Boots and Toots, that they used to sweep up the bales. Lyle's wife, Faun, learned how to harness the team and sweep the bales, while Lyle piled them without benefit of a farmhand, dragging them to the top of the stack. The rest of the family mowed the hay, raked it, and ran the baler.

Red's favorite horse was old Sox, who lived to the ripe old age of 21. In the forties, when Sox was 14 years old, Red entered the endurance horse race from Gillette to Douglas. Stanley rode in the race, at the age of 13, one of the youngest ones to enter. The race took place on June 12, 1947 and there were six inches of snow in Douglas that day. Red completed the race on old Sox, and Sox lived on for seven more years so guess it didn't hurt him any. Sox was a priceless horse because he was used for rodeoing and roping as well as a cow pony and also was a really good, gentle kid's pony. He was one of those rare horses that could do almost anything.

In August 1952, Norma and Stanley represented Wyoming in the National High School Rodeo in Augusta, Montana. That was in the years before Wyoming had a state high school rodeo. So they qualified to go to Nationals in a state high school rodeo in Nebraska. Norma competed in barrel racing, pole bending as well as competing in the queen contest using one of their favorite horses, Scarlet. Norma did not win as queen, but was voted on by her fellow contestants to receive the clock trophy for sportsmanship. Stanley competed in roping events and also the boy's cow cutting contest. Norma and Stanley were among the first contestants to compete in the State and National High School Rodeos from Wyoming.

In 1977, Red Cole was honored at the Wyoming State High School Rodeo in Buffalo for being a long-time rodeo supporter of the state high school rodeo and for having seven grandchildren performing in the state rodeo at one time. This was a state record. Those grandchildren taking part in the rodeo that year were; David Cole, Dixie Huxtable, Janet Steckley, Glenn Cole, Ronald (Strawberry) Cole, Donita Steckley and Jimmy Huxtable. Ronda Sedgewick, rodeo organist and writer, wrote an article about Red Cole and his rodeo family for the national rodeo paper as well as the local papers.

In 1977, Janet Steckley represented Wyoming as Miss Rodeo Wyoming in the Miss Rodeo American Pageant in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma.

Red and Cora Cole raised all six of their children here in Converse County and they still live here except for Stanley and Linda Cole who have the Cole Lumber and Construction Co. in Wheatland.

Cora Cole still resides in her home on Irvine Road, south of Douglas. She and her son, Lyle, run cattle south of Douglas on a ranch on Irvine Road. She also has Cole's Trailer Court, south of town on Irvine Road. Red Cole died on October 18, 1979 following a short illness. Cora will often be found at rodeos and other sporting events that her children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren are participating in. She also bowls on two teams. Of course, she misses Red a lot, but she is carrying on all the activities they enjoyed doing together.

We are proud of this family and the contribution they made to Converse County and especially to the sport of rodeo in this state.

Faun D. Cole
as told by Cora Jane Cole

Collins, M. R. "Ral", Florence and Anna

McDonald Ravelin Collins was born in DeSota, Iowa, Nov. 9, 1868, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Collins. His mother died when he was a small child. For eight years the family lived in Iowa and then moved to Aurora, Illinois, where they made their home for seven years and where Collins received his first education.

The next move was a response to the call of the West and the family went from Illinois to North Loup, Nebraska, living there for about a year. In 1886, Ral, as he was popularly called, and his father went to Lusk where Ral started his long and successful business career.

He worked for his uncle, Dennis Collins, in the old Lusk Hotel for a time and then joined Nat Baker in the mercantile business. Soon, he bought the store, changing the name from Baker-Collins to Collins Mercantile Company and then after several months, Harry Snyder bought an interest and the name was changed again to Collins-Snyder. After this venture, Ral held a position as cashier of the Lusk Bank.

While living in Lusk, he was married to Miss Florence Adele Jenks of that town. One child, Florence, was born to them. Mrs. Collins died when their daughter was one year old.

Collins was on the board of county commissioners in Converse County when the present counties of Niobrara and Converse were a single unit, known as Converse County.

He moved to Douglas in 1905, becoming manager of the Douglas Mercantile Co. and later was associated with the First National Bank of Douglas for a short time. He also held an interest in the George Bolln Co., with Waldo Bolln, George Bolln and Wilkie Collins, his brother.

In 1907 he organized the Douglas National Bank and was elected it's first president, capably filling that position until his untimely death.

He served the town of Douglas as a mayor and was a president of the Wyoming Banker's Association at one time. He was secretary of the first Wyoming State Fair and the first secretary of the Good Roads Club, one of the first town clubs. Besides taking an active part in these organizations, he served on the school board of the Converse County High School and on that of District 17.

He was always a staunch booster and benefactor in building and improving roads in the community. One of his chief accomplishments was assisting in the establishment and routing of the Yellowstone Highway for publication in the Blue Book, a guide book of the old days which was probably the most authentic information for tourists at that time.

Largely through his efforts the Fort Fetterman U.S. wood reserve on Boxelder Creek was deeded to Converse County by the government for park purposes.

On July 31, 1916, he was married to Mrs. Anna Potter, the widow of Robert Francis Potter, and became the instant father of five young children. He was a devoted husband and very good father to the Potter children.

Ral loved to fish and for many years, he shared a lease with Bert Clough, on the old house at the deserted lumber mill above Cold Springs. The two families spent most of the summer weekends in the old cabin in the mountains where they all fished and sometimes hunted prairie chickens and generally had a wonderful time in the outdoors.

In the spring, as soon as the snow was gone from the roads, the Collins and Clough families, with their friends, drove up to Cold Springs for a stay in the house there for the weekend. Many times the cars would get stuck in the soggy place on the unsurfaced road and the men would have to corduroy the place with boughs and small limbs from the trees to pull the cars out and onward. It was a difficult trip a lot of times but after reaching their destination all the passengers felt it was worth the effort.

Ral's daughter, Florence, was married to John Peterson in Douglas and they had two children there before moving to California to live.

In February 1935 Ral was working in his front yard when he fell and broke his hip. He suffered from that for ten days and could not recover. He died on Feb. 13. He was buried with Masonic rites from the Masonic Temple and the whole community mourned his passing. It was a great loss to everyone and he left a lasting impression on the community.

Combs, E. B. and Nellie Family

E. B. Combs, or "Elzie" as he was affectionately called by his family, was born in Magon, Illinois, November 17, 1862. His family moved to Tecumseh, Nebraska, when he was about 15 years old and lived in that area until the spring of 1882 when he moved to Laramie, Wyoming where his sister and brother-in-law, Minnie F. Barrow and Merris C. Barrow were living. (Minnie and Berris Barrow later moved to the Douglas area and started "The Douglas Budget" and wrote and published some books under the pen name of "Bill Barlow" who was known as the Sagebrush Philosopher.) While still living in Laramie, Minnie and Merris decided it was time for her brother to take a wife and so through encouragement and correspondence with Merris' sister, Nellie M. Barrow, she and E. B. Combs were married November 16, 1887 in Tecumseh, the day before his 25th birthday. His bride was 18. Her father and Merris' father was Reverend Robert C. Barrow, pastor of the First Christian Church in Tecumseh.

E. B. Combs continued to live in Tecumseh until the spring of 1896. Being of a restless nature, and by then having three sons; Guy-born September 12, 1888, LeRoy-born July 20, 1890, Gene-born April 10, 1892, and one daughter, Helen-born September 19, 1894, he decided to move the family west to a "better life" and came to Douglas. The Barrows helped their getting acquainted and settled on the Fetterman Flats northwest of Douglas about five miles.

The family stayed with relatives and E. B. and his boys started work on a dwelling for the family on the land he purchased adjacent to the Morton Ranch. Having a team of horses and a milk cow, what more could you hope to have! Grubbing out a living in the new area was really a challenge with a diet of rabbits, potatoes, and very little deer and antelope. They managed to survive with a great amount of hard work, including hiring out his team and $35.00 Montgomery Ward wagon, hauling goods for neighbors and acquiring some orphaned lambs and calves and trading or bartering for a few chickens. Better fortune came his way around the turn of the century and they formed a corporation known as "E. B. Combs and Sons". He was the first sheepman to introduce Oxford sheep to this part of the country when he saw an ad in a publication that a breeder in Oregon was selling his entire band of sheep and he purchased them for $5.00 per head straight run of yearlings to square-mouth ewes. Delivery took most of the summer and he took possession in Downey Park having built a set of sheep pens near what is known as Point of Rocks. He purchased some 1200 head and got his stud rams from a breeder in Nebraska and had those shipped by railroad for a price of $20.00 per head. Oxford sheep are coarse-wooled sheep but were known at that time to have more twin lambs than other breeds.

Investing in more land in the mountain area, and his boys now old enough to take up homesteads, their operation began to grow. Gene and Roy later took up homesteads north of Douglas on Soldier Creek and since they were still all in the family corporation they summered in Downey Park and the Cold Springs area and wintered at the main ranch on the Fetterman Flats and on the boys places north of Douglas.

Tragedy seemed to follow good fortune and in the summer of 1902, the oldest son, Guy, was hunting with a sheepherder of the corporation by the name of Ward. The story was told that the two were hunting rabbits and Guy accidentally fell while climbing up a rocky draw and his gun discharged, shooting him in the temple and he died almost instantly. He was not quite 13 and it must have been a tragic trip for his father to bring his oldest boy to town with a team and wagon, stopping at streams along the way to moisten his scarf to put on the boys face to keep it from discoloring. Not too long after the accident, the herder was said to have left the Douglas area and was never heard from again. E. B. was known to place bullets in the chamber of the 22 rifle and jam it on the ground or other hard surface to see if he could get it to discharge. It would never discharge, leaving some doubt as to whether it had been an accident or not. All in all, it was a difficult trip for a parent to make of thirty miles or more.

Cattlemen disliked having sheepmen crossing or even coming close to their lands in this country in the early 1900s. E. B. Combs had a sheepwagon burned completely to the ground, the herder beaten severely and his life threatened, the dogs killed and the sheep scattered over a wide area, killing some outright and wounding others so they were extremely difficult to gather again. E. B. was determined that the sheepmen and cattlemen could get along together. Rumor had it in the area that a herder for a Casper sheep outfit was killed and his body never found on the Cold Springs area.

When World War I was declared, Gene enlisted in the Army and took his basic training at Camp Lee, Virginia, and was then shipped to France and was there until the war was over. During World War I it was usual, especially in farm and ranch families, to draft only one son for military service. Roy, being the oldest, stayed on the ranch with his father to continue the operation of raising the sheep. After Gene's discharge from the Army in 1920, he decided to raise commercial cattle along with sheep. He married Colista Bicknell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lester Bicknell - Mrs. Bicknell being the former Myrtle Doyle of Minnesota. Gene was an active partner of E. B. Combs and Sons until 1929 when he sold his interest in the corporation and branched out on his own. Gene was active in civic affairs and the American Legion, and helped with the production of the Wyoming State Fair for a good many years. He was badly injured by a bull during the State Fair Rodeo one year and sustained injuries from which he never completely recovered. He died April 7, 1954.

Gene and Colista Combs had one son, Raymor James Combs, born June 13, 1927. He was born in Douglas and educated in the Douglas schools. He grew up in the ranching business as his ancestors before him. He joined the Army in the 1940s and was stationed in Alaska along the Aleutian Islands until he was discharged. He returned to the ranch and went into the ranching business with his father. In the late 1940s he worked as a brand inspector for the State of Wyoming and worked the shipping markets at Ogden, Idaho Falls, Denver and Omaha. While working for the Omaha market he met and was later married to the former Lucille Kelly on September 13, 1950. They moved to Casper where he was handling the brand inspection at Casper, Lusk and Wheatland. In the later part of 1951, Raymor and Lucille moved to the ranch north of Douglas. Raymor and Lucille had two daughters, Kathleen Ann and Bridget Michaela. Raymor took an active interest in community affairs, American Legion, Kiwanis, Farm Bureau and the Wyoming Young Republicans and was chosen as Outstanding Young Rancher of the Year for 1960 by the Wyoming Junior Chamber of Commerce. Raymor died as a result of injuries in an automobile accident on May 10, 1961, while returning from a business trip with his family to Cheyenne.

Roy remained single for many years before starting a family. He inherited the mountain property from his father and acquired additional land as it became available. He ran commercial Hereford cattle and Rambouillet sheep; summering his livestock on the mountain meadows and wintering on the local range worked well for his operation. At the age of 45 he married Mary Muriel Gitthens in Boulder, Colorado on June 27, 1935, daughter of Mary Frances Koontz Gitthens and Frank Jeremiah Gitthens. There being a lack of herders during World War II, Roy crossfenced most of his land with woven wire fences as did most of the sheep people.

Roy was a one-man public relations team in promoting his county and state. Wherever he traveled as President and Vice-President of the Douglas Chamber of Commerce, he promoted his area. He was President of the Wyoming State Board of Agriculture for twelve years and a member of the board for 15 years. He was Superintendent of the Sheep Department for the State Fair for 22 years. Roy passed away December 23, 1963 while working on a sheep corral with his son. His wife, Muriel, died December 18, 1969.

Muriel and Roy had two children, Mary Helen and LeRoy Nelson, Jr. Mary resides in Sheridan and is married to David Hanlin, District Maintenance Engineer for the Wyoming Highway Department. Mary Helen was born March 20, 1938 in Douglas. Mary and Dave Hanlin were married on August 16, 1961 and have two children, Steven Joseph and Lisa Ann. LeRoy Nelson, better known to everyone as "Lee", was born in Douglas April 22, 1941. He married the former Patricia Ann O'Brien of Chicago, Illinois on January 19, 1964, and resides in Douglas. He was educated in the Douglas schools. He continued in the ranching business until the spring of 1975 when the predator problem and the need of finding winter range contributed to his leasing the ranch and not continuing in the business of his father and grandfather. He was asked to take over the job as Superintendent of the Sheep Department for the State Fair in 1962 as one of his side activities. He has been active in Boy Scouts most of his life, achieving his Eagle Badge regardless of the fact that he was born with part of his kneecap missing. He helps as Santa Claus around Christmas time making visits all over the city and county. They have two children; Mary Frances, born October 16, 1964 and John LeRoy, born July 7, 1968.

Helen Marie Combs was born in Tecumseh, Nebraska on September 19, 1894. She attended Douglas schools and the University of Wyoming. She was married to George Warner of Crawford, Nebraska on November 1, 1923. He worked at the power plant at Natural Bridge for a good many years and as an automobile mechanic for LeBar Motor Company for at least ten years and later had a repair shop of his own. Helen and George had one son, Robert Combs Warner, born May 22, 1925. Robert received his education in Douglas and the University of Wyoming. He joined the Merchant Marines after high school and later went into ranching with his father, running sheep and some cattle. Robert married Georgia Brown of Wisner, Louisiana, December 29, 1950. He stayed in the ranching business until the spring of 1962 at which time he moved to Laramie where he still resides and is with the journalism department of the University. Through his efforts, the library at the University has received several paintings by Alfred Jacob Miller. In addition, Robert has written a book regarding this artist known as "The Fort Laramie of Alfred Jacob Miller." His hobby has been photography at which he has been notably successful.

Conner, "Tex" and Maud

Harney T. "Tex" Conner was born on August 17, 1896 in Silver, Texas, the son of Silas M. and Ursula Norfleet Conner.

Coming to Wyoming in 1917, he homesteaded on the head of Deer Creek south of Glenrock.

Tex married Maud S. Hiser, daughter of Elias and Mary Hiser, on November 22, 1922. They are the parents of four children; Alva, Harney A., John W. and Roy J.

He worked for various ranches in the area, among them were the Diamond Dot Ranch owned by C. D. Zimmerman and the Thompson Brothers north of Lance Creek in Niobrara County.

Tex and Maud reside in Glenrock at the time of this writing.

Converse, Amasa R.

Amasa R. Converse, for whom Converse County was named, was born at Hinsdale, Massachusetts on March 26, 1842. At the age of 23 he moved to Omaha, Nebraska where he owned and operated a china and glassware business. Henry Wagner, who had a place of business next door, recalled how A. R. dropped by his shop and suggested: "Wagner, let us pack up and go to Cheyenne." And they both did.

When Converse reached Cheyenne, he found little more than a tent town sprawled along the banks of Crow Creek. It would be a while yet before the tracks of the Union Pacific Railroad would reach town (November 13, 1867), and he was anxious to get a head start on the competition. Spotting an adobe building already built at the corner of 16th and Hills Streets (now Capitol Ave.), he bought it (located where the Inter Ocean Hotel would later stand - now the site of the Plains Hotel). There he opened a furniture and crockery store to await the arrival of the U.P. tracks, crews and the boom town conditions which would follow.

In May of 1868, Converse fell ill. At Amasa's urging, Frances E. Warren, formerly from his hometown of Hinesdale (residing at that moment in Des Moines, Iowa), moved to Cheyenne where Amasa hired him as a clerk for $125 per month. The following year he and Warren went into partnership under the firm name of "Converse & Warren." Then in 1871, Converse organized the First National Bank of Cheyenne, becoming its first president, a position he held until his death. He and Warren were also in the sheep business together for a period of time.

By now, the railroad construction gangs were long gone and the economy was hurting. What had been a community of some 5,000 people had dwindled to less than 1,000. On May 17, 1871, Converse wrote the U.S. Comptroller of the Currency in behalf of the bank stating: "We are at present in very bad condition." And speaking of the "real estate and currency held as security" he said, "They are not of much value if forced to an immediate sale." Being a pioneer businessman did not guarantee instant success.

But then there was the potential of the livestock business. Why not take advantage of the millions of acres of free Wyoming grass? Converse saw the possibilities clearly. In 1872 he joined forces with 15 Wyoming stockmen. They met with the Colorado Stock Growers Association to formulate plans. What emerged resulted in the formation of the Laramie County Stock Growers Association the following year.

Several investors were already trailing large herds of cattle into Wyoming from both Texas and Oregon. Some were bringing them in by rail from the midwest. The time had come to act.

In 1875 he organized the National Cattle Company, running his herds along the Chugwater. He even found time to become involved in politics. Being a strong supporter of the Republican Party, he was appointed Territorial Treasurer of Wyoming in 1875 and again in 1877. During his second appointment, he joined the Wyoming Stock Growers Association. And while at it, joined the ranks of the select group privileged to build a home on "Cattlemen's Row." A strong supporter of the Cheyenne's First Presbyterian Church, Amasa, along with A. H. Swan and George Searight, contributed $3,500 each.

Expanding his operations northward in 1880, he formed the million dollar Converse Cattle Company with himself as president and William C. Irvine as vice-president. The company two years later bought the V5 and U Bar L outfits, which ranged their cattle on Lance Creek and also acquired the U L A from John Kendrick and partner. (At this time his livestock interests covered a portion of the original Converse County.)

Continuing to expand, his herds soon numbered upwards of 30,000 head, registered under 28 separate brands.

Then tragedy struck. While on a business trip to New York City (1885), Converse fell ill. Paralysis set in and for two agonizing months his wife "watched over him with unceasing care." ("Democratic Leader" Cheyenne, June 10, 1885) Then on June 9th, the very day Truman Hicks, his trusted secretary and bank teller arrived from Cheyenne, A. R. Converse passed away.

Exhausted from the ordeal, his grief stricken widow collapsed and was confined to bed. Mr. Hicks took charge, shipping the body to Three Rivers, Michigan where Amasa was buried June 12, 1885. All the Cheyenne newspapers carried some form of resolution or memorial. One carried "In Memoriam" the full content of "A Service Dedicated in the Memory of A.R. Converse."

Mrs. Converse's health restored, she returned to Wyoming where in 1886 she registered unabashedly in the Cheyenne directory as "Capitalist." Soon she and Truman Hicks were married. In due course of time, Hicks became president of the bank Converse had once headed.

Although never residing in what is now Converse County, Mr. Converse did have large ranch holdings within the county as it was originally formed by the territorial government. During the county's formation, his name was presented in memorial by A. A. Spaugh to the Tenth Wyoming Legislative Assembly and was duly adopted May 21, 1888. Although he passed away while barely 43 years of age, Converse's name will live on as part of Wyoming's heritage.

Cook, Archibald and Florence H. Cook, Tom and Nellie

Archibald David and Tom Cook were born in Scotland to John and Margaret Johnstone Cook. Tom on January 19, 1861 and A. D. on October 31, 1862. John, a coal miner, brought his family to America in 1868. They settled in Mildred, Pennsylvania. The boys heeded the admonition to "go west young man go west" when their father was hurt in a mining accident.

A. D. married Florence H. Hartman on August 19, 1880. Florence was born at Van Buren, Ohio. She came, at the age of four, to Boone County, Iowa in 1864 with her parents, Amos William and Eleanor Trout Hartman. There she received her education and taught at Moingonia, Iowa. Archie was busy working for a general store in Moingonia but when the Black Hills gold strike occurred he took part in the excitement, making the trip by way of the old stage route from Sidney, Nebraska. Two years later he returned to Iowa to enter the employ of the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley R.R. prospecting for coal in Iowa and further west at a salary of $100.00 a month.

I am going to let my grandmother, Florence H. Hartman Cook, tell their story of early day Converse County which was published in the Douglas Enterprise, Tuesday, June 23, 1936.

"A new coal mine was opened on Shawnee Creek, three miles from the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley R.R. Archie and Tom Cook signed a contract with the company to drive entry. Tom was there before us, as a log cabin had to be built for us by the company. It was small and poorly built, mud being used instead of plaster. Near dusk we saw our first herd of antelope from the train windows, hundreds of them. We thought the hill was moving. It was October 30, 1886, when we arrived at Shawnee Station with our small children, Arthur and Ethel, and a few boxes of household goods. We were taken to camp in a lumber wagon, sitting on our trunks. The camp consisted of a company store, selling only staple groceries and camp supplies, a bunkhouse for the single men, a boarding house and six cabins for the families who were all from our hometown in Boone County, Iowa.

"At the boarding house we ate our first 'Wyoming potatoes,' dumplings and 'slumgulleon.' During our stay of eighteen months we enjoyed eating fresh antelope and deer, hunting them from a lumber wagon, jolting over sagebrush and gullies. The sunshine was so bright and warm that we did not realize until later that it was Wyoming's coldest winter, although the range cattle died by the hundreds around our camp.

"During the blizzards we had to hang our surplus carpets and blankets on the walls to keep out the snow. During one of the worst storms a passenger train was snowed in near Shawnee for about a week. The crew managed to get through to us for aid and it taxed the larders of the camp to feed them. We cooked meat and made biscuits for hours each day. We supposed it was western hospitality we were giving and it was like finding money, when months later, the railroad company paid us ten cents for every biscuit sandwich.

"During the winter Tom met my sister, Nellie, at Chadron, Nebraska, and were married on December 18, 1886. The men were all at work but the women and children greeted them in true western style as they arrived. There was a shortage of dishpans afterwards, due to the children's enthusiasm with the drum sticks. We had no school nor church, but neither were there saloons nor gambling houses.

"For recreation we roamed the hills and chalk buttes, being interested in the rock formations, pine trees and shrubs, so different from our Iowa rolling prairies. The wild flowers, too, were a joy to us.

"In the evenings the families visited together playing Pedro and High Five by kerosene lamps. The men must have been more amused than interested in the games as most of their wives had never seen a deck of cards before and could not understand why a one-spot counted more than a two-spot.

"Douglas was already on the map, and was our trading place. If any of us were ill, Dr. Barber was called from Douglas. After the doctor would hold a clinic for the whole camp, pulling teeth, prescribing for minor ails, he was paid his regular office fees.

"Early in the spring Archie and Tom built us each a better cabin, peeling the logs, using plaster, dirt roof and good flooring. Housekeeping was easier.

"There were rumors of an Indian uprising. The men made light of it, but we were still tenderfeet so we moved the children's trundle bed into the corner behind our bed, and kept the axe beside the pillows.

"The mine closed for the summer, and both the Cook families camped at Irvine while Archie and Tom worked for the section boss, Fred Hildebrand, Sr. Irvine was a tie camp then, and Alex Cunningham was running a store there for C. H. King of Douglas.

"Our keenest remembrance of our stay there was the hot sun, the swarms of rattlesnakes, and assisting at the birth of Carl Hildebrand without a doctor's supervision. Carl, when grown up, became a noted bronco buster at our state fairs and at other rodeo gatherings.

"At Shawnee camp that winter we wanted to celebrate Christmas with a community tree. Trees had never been so easy to get, but trimmings? Neither Lusk nor Douglas had trimmings for sale, not even popcorn, cranberries, candles, not even oranges and apples, not even toys left when we tried to buy. So we contented ourselves with hanging up stockings filled with cookies.

"We had not yet learned of the pioneer's best book, Montgomery Ward's catalogue. The Douglas stores had nothing finer than cambric in white goods and Nellie and Florence ripped up their fine white dresses for material and lace for baby dresses for her first child.

"The mine closed for good in January 1888, and we left our homes and four of the families moved to Douglas, the two Cooks, Tom McPherson, and Jim Peyton. They, or their descendants still live there.

"Archie worked on the streets until he was employed in a meat market owned by Floyd Lockwood, who was from our old home in Iowa. We were happy to attend church and Sunday School again, and to send Arthur to school. His first teacher was Attorney William F. Mecum. Two years later Miss Mary Cooper was Ethel's first grade teacher. Our water, for all purposes, was hauled from the Platte River and cost us 35 cents a barrel. We became experts in saving water. We had no ice for a few years. Except for the abundant game and the wild small fruits, the living expenses were high, as there were no gardens.

"We remember only one tree, a cottonwood beside a well on Second Street. A few doors north Mr. Oliverreau had a few shrubs and flowers in his back yard. His daughter, Mrs. Harry Pollard, and children, are still living in Douglas (1936). We had no green grass, but our streets all sparkled with bits of broken bottles from the 13 saloons we were reported to have had at that time. It is not probable that our good citizens needed all these liquid refreshments, even with only unfiltered river water to drink, but our cattle country was full of cowboys who made frequent visits to town.

"Our marshal, John W. Overman, used to appoint special officers at such times to help him. Archie was helping him arrest a man one night. They were chasing him through a vacant lot and to frighten him Overman fired near his feet just as he ran into a clothes line. His fall knocked him unconscious for a minute and the marshal thought he had killed him with his shot. He was so shaken that the crowd joked about it for years.

"Both Archie and Tom had always played in a band and soon hunted up the old players and any new ones they could find in town and organized a band with Archie as leader. The players enjoyed their meetings and so did their families. All the children learned to dance there, and many boys, in their early teens, joined the band, and learned to love music.

"July 4, 1889, we were invited to a country picnic at the Natural Bridge given by the ranchers on Lower LaPrele Creek and it was our first view of Wyoming ranches. In the evening we ate supper at the George Powell Ranch, where he already was trying out fruit trees for an orchard. That night we attended a country dance at Captain and Mrs. O'Brien's. People came from miles around. The beds were covered with sleeping babies, just as Owen Wister described it in 'The Virginian.' Even the pretty school marm was there and those O'Brien boys could call the changes in the square dances more musically than we hear them called now on our radios.

"That day we met people who later retired, moved to town and were our neighbors and friends. There were no fences in the early days and the herds of range cattle driven past the town to the shipping pens were a menace to our small children.

"When Wyoming gave her women the franchise, Nellie and Florence voted but felt we had no knowledge of the issues nor did we know the candidates. A few years later when Archie was on the county ticket seven times in succession and then on the state ticket twice, we lost all our scruples and voted the Republican ticket straight every time. Bread and butter for the children seemed more important than conscience. We never locked our doors when we went hunting or fishing for a few days, nor did we ever find a ranch home locked when the family was absent. Our husbands were always playing in the band during those meetings. Our last three children, Douglas C., Beatrice, and Nell, were born in Douglas, as were Tom and Nellie's three girls, Florence, Donna and Eleanor. When Archie's work for the government compelled us to leave Douglas in 1922, we moved away parting from our family and friends with sincere regret.

"We are thankful for the 30 years we lived there and glad that three of our children, Tud Cook, Mrs. Ben J. Steffen, and Mrs. William J. Smith, and their children are still a part of that community. When we hear the song, 'The Hills of Home,' to us it always means Douglas, Wyoming."

Some of the members of that band she mentioned were Esmays, Cooks, Rices, Anthens, Steffens, Rouses, Ruhls, Schmidts. Harry Ruhl lived in Lost Springs for many years.

Florence always loved the Laramie Peak area, and her dying request that her ashes be strewn among the wild flowers in the mountains south of Douglas where she had spent so many happy days on early-day camping trips was respected. On March 17, 1942, Archie joined her in death and his ashes, too, were brought to the mountain meadows.

Tom built his own home on North Third Street in Douglas with brick made in the kilns of Mr. Peters where he lived out his life. He was known for his work in the famous Florence Hardware sheepwagons, and was also a deputy sheriff for Sheriff Campbell during the Johnson County War. Many houses in Douglas were built by Tom Cook. Tom and Nellie's children were: Florence H., Donna (Chapin) and Eleanor (Jamieson). His beloved Nellie left him on April 17, 1917. On June 11, 1919 he married Ada B. Brown, daughter of Walter and Dora Bennett Brown. Ada was an early day teacher in the Douglas schools. Ada died August 25, 1947. Tom died on September 8, 1950.

Cook, Louis and Katherine Family

Lou Cook, Sr., Wyoming pioneer rancher, came to Wyoming from Des Moines, Iowa in 1891. He worked for his uncle Jake Mill on his ranch near Lusk, Wyoming. He witnessed the Lightning Creek Indian fight in 1903. After working a few years, he homesteaded on Cow Creek and started the C Ranch.

In 1909, Lou married Katherine Crum in Sioux City, Iowa. I recall my parents said they travelled for years by buckboard to the ranch. Back in those days there were no cars and everything had to be trailed or freighted by wagon. They also had a home in Douglas. Four children were born: Louis C. Jr., Feb. 21, 1912; Frank Thomas (Tom), Jan. 2, 1914; Ralph D. (Kelly), Mar. 14, 1916; and Catherine J., June 24, 1918.

Lou Cook raised sheep and cattle, the C Ranch was one of the largest ranches in the county. The sheepherders all had their sheepwagons, horse, and sheep dog, usually a band of sheep was 2500 head. All of Lou Cooks' herders had full supplies at all times. At one time Lou Cook bought four head of elk and, by wagon, brought them to the ranch to start herds — well the first morning they jumped the high corrals and were long gone!

Katherine Cook was an active member of the Eastern Star, Woodbine Chapter, served as Worthy Matron and was a devout member of the Methodist Church. Mr. Cook belonged to the Masons.

Lou Cook was a true pioneer and worked hard to do his part for the Wyoming State Fair each year. He trailed horses in from the ranch each year to ride at the fair. The Cook home in Douglas had a barn and corrals, many a young man was treated to ride a pony. Lou Cook was a very generous man, and the kids loved him. When his boys were in grade and high school they were all very active in all sports, Lou always attended every sport whenever possible when he was in town. Kelly played football at the Wyoming University. Catherine was Miss Converse County in the '30s.

Louis Jr. served in the U.S. Navy during World War II. After the war lived in Vancouver, Wash. — he was a successful real estate broker, married Elaine Booke of Provo, Utah and they had two children, Louis Craig and Danise Kimberly. Louis passed away July 15, 1953 of a heart attack.

Frank Thomas (Tom) served in the U.S. Army (Signal Corp.) during World War II. After the war returned to Douglas where he worked for Coast to Coast, then Bolln's Grocery. Tom passed away because of cancer July 3, 1971.

Ralph D. (Kelly), served in the U.S. Army (Intelligence Div.) serving overseas in Europe. Kelly married Elizabeth Feraud of Worland, Wyoming, they had one daughter, Jo Ellen, also three grandchildren. After the war Kelly settled in Worland, Wyo. where he owned Kelly's Bar. Kelly passed away Sept. 9, 1982.

Catherine J., married Harold McColl, they lived in Douglas, Wyo. Harold served in the U.S. Army (Infantry) during World War II. After the war they returned to Douglas. Harold was a Mason and Catherine was an Eastern Star, she was Worthy Matron of Woodbine Chapter in 1953. In 1954 they moved to California. Harold had a severe stroke Nov. 15, 1964, was in the hospital two years, now is home - gets around with brace and cane. Catherine started to work at the Los Angeles Times newspaper in 1956. She had a very fine career in Classified Advertising, she took many top prizes on her sales desk, trips to Brazil, Mexico, Japan, New York, Bahia fishing and many more. In 1971 Catherine went into management and supervised several big divisions. She retired from the Los Angeles Times June 24, 1983. She was honored on her retirement at a party with 200 in attendance. They have their home in LaMirada, California. Catherine is the only one of the original Cook family living.

Lou Cook passed away May 17, 1948 of a heart attack. Katherine Cook passed away May 11, 1978. Mrs. Cook lived in the family home in Douglas over 65 years, everyone was always welcome at the Cook home. When Katherine Cook passed away she was the oldest member of the Methodist Church and a 50-year member of Woodbine Chapter, Eastern Star. Mr. and Mrs. Cook were loved by everyone.

Cooper, Andrew and Esther Family

Andrew Cooper was born in Massachusetts in 1831, the son of Charles and Mehitable White Cooper. Andrew was a barrel maker and carpenter being skilled in wood working.

He married Esther Andrews in 1854. Esther was born in 1832 at Bethel, Maine. They had one son, Lyman, and three daughters, Nellie, Mary and Maude.

The Coopers moved to Iowa in 1864, remaining there until coming to Wyoming in the early 1880's.

Lyman, born in 1854, was the first of the family to come to Wyoming. In 1878 he came to Cheyenne and three years later moved to Fort Fetterman. He settled in the Esterbrook area in 1882. He had a homestead on Mary Cooper Creek and on LaBonte Creek below the mouth of Owl Creek. The buildings were situated where Dick Pexton lives now.

Andrew brought the rest of his family to Wyoming, settling near where Lyman was located in the Esterbrook area. He homesteaded immediately south of what is now Esterbrook and close to what is now called the Mary Cooper Spring. The village of Esterbrook was to be named after Esther. Also, Mary Cooper Creek was named after Mary.

Andrew and Lyman were instrumental in starting the Esterbrook Copper mine. Lyman was quoted in the April 15, 1903 issue of Bill Barlow's Budget, "Lyman Cooper was showing samples of ore from the Esterbrook shaft, which was almost pure copper. Mr. Cooper says the vein now shows four feet in width at the bottom of the shaft."

Andrew also ran cattle and hewed ties by hand for the new railroad coming into the Fort Fetterman country.

Andrew and Esther moved to a log cabin on Lyman's ranch on Wagonhound Creek soon after the turn of the century and in 1913 they moved to the home of their daughter and her husband, Nellie and Jim Willox on West Fork LaBonte Creek.

Esther died on March 19, 1916; Andrew on March 23, 1920.

Andrew's father, Charles, was evidently in the Springhill area also as an article in a Laramie paper in 1908 stated, "Springhill, May 24, 1908, We are very sorry to chronicle that Mr. Charles Cooper died recently at Springhill. His remains were taken to Iowa."

Lyman married Jennie Newell, daughter of George and Adelia Newell, on April 13, 1892 at the home of Col. and Mrs. E.H. Kimball in Douglas. A son, Ray, was born in 1892 to Lyman and his wife. Lyman and Jennie were later divorced with Lyman later marrying Clara. He became associated with his brother-in-law, James Willox, in the cattle business and formed a partnership, Cooper-Willox Company. They operated a ranch on LaBonte Creek first before moving over to Wagonhound Creek and West Fork LaBonte Creek.

Lyman served Converse County as its representative to the Wyoming State Legislature for eight years in the early 1900's and served as Speaker of the House in his last term. He died on June 5, 1913.

Lyman's son, Ray, married Ethel Morton, daughter of Alexander and Jennie Morton, on December 31, 1912. They had one son, LeRoy. After Ethel's death, Ray married Freda Dustman Newell. They lived on Ray's mother's ranch on Mary Cooper Creek until its sale to Jim Moran in 1954. They then moved to LaPorte, Colorado. LeRoy is married to the former Carol Taylor and lives in Douglas.

Mary Cooper became a teacher and taught at several of the early time schools throughout Albany and Converse County before her marriage to Jim Brockway. A letter from Mary to Mrs. George Cross, Sr. was recently found. Excerpts from it are as follows:

"Inez, Wyoming, September 28, 1892. I am going to board the first month here and after that when Maude comes I am going to rent a house. I have such a nice place to board at Mr. Slichters. They live near the railroad just opposite to where the track branches to go out to the mines, which are about three-quarters of a mile from them. The school house is not quite half way between, being nearer to Mr. Slichters. The school house is quite a fine tidy little frame building painted and plastered and seats for 30. There is a $55 Anatomical Chart (Chart on Physiology), a set of roller maps and a larger globe.

"I am going to try and have an organ in the school house now. I think I will have about 30 pupils when they all come this winter.

"I didn't know but what some of the miners' children would be rather unruly in school but they are all very good children so far and only lack soap and water."

"There are about a dozen houses in Inez besides the works to the mines. The house I am to rent is Mrs. Chamberlin's (they are at a mining camp beyond Casper.) It is up on a hill a little distance from the camp or 'town'. I am glad that it is, although the miners are very quiet except on pay days when they get pretty jolly over their whiskey."

Maude married Alex Brockway, a brother of Mary's husband.

Copenhaver, Milton and Sadie Family

Milton Copenhaver was born on September 20, 1871 in Spavia, Illinois. His parents were Taylor O. and Mary E. Ethire Copenhaver. Milton married Sadie A. LeFever, daughter of Jackson LeFever, on December 20, 1892. Milton and Sadie arrived in Douglas on June 12, 1918. Their son, Everett, and daughters Alma, Hazel and Pearl, accompanied them. The Copenhavers bought a place five miles north of Douglas where they engaged in a small cattle ranching operation for several years. Sadie died September 9, 1936 in Douglas. On October 5, 1940 Milton married Mabel Smith. Milton died December 8, 1942.

Earl J. Copenhaver, oldest child of Milton and Sadie Copenhaver, was born September 27, 1894 at Pawnee City, Nebraska. He was reared and educated there and was the first of his family to come to Converse County. He came on an emigrant rail car in 1916 to seek one of the many ranching jobs available. While working on ranches, additional land was opened for homesteading and he filed in the Dry Creek area and completed "proving up" the homestead while working on a nearby ranch.

"Cope" returned to Pawnee City to marry Florence Martin, also born there on December 6, 1897. They were married on March 27, 1918 and came directly to his homestead, this time by automobile. They lived there the next eight years. Earl and Florence had three children: Arrah Lucille, born May 28, 1919; John Milton, born July 28, 1923; and Rhoda Jean, born April 10, 1926.

They moved into Douglas in 1925 where Earl was employed at various jobs; until he opened the first service station in Douglas. This station was The Texaco, located at the corner of Center and 4th Streets, the present site of the First National Bank. He spent the next 19 years operating service stations, bulk gas operations and car dealerships. In 1945 he sold his last Douglas business, "Cope's Sinclair," located at the present Gambles store site. At this time Earl and Florence moved to Norco, Calif. and spent the next 15 years there in real estate business, until he was appointed Postmaster in 1960. On his retirement, they moved back to Douglas in 1970 to be nearer their children.

In the late 1930's and early 40's, Earl served two four-year terms on the City Council and many years on the Volunteer Fire Department. Both he and Florence spent many years helping with the Legion ball teams and were active in other civic affairs. They were both very active in the I.O.O.F., Earl being Grand Patriarch in 1937-38 and Florence, State President of the Rebekah Assembly in 1940-41.

On July 10, 1974, Florence passed away at Douglas, after a lengthy illness. Earl sold their home and moved to the LaBonte Hotel and on Sept. 27, 1976, his 82nd birthday, he and Olga Rupe Downs were married. Olga came to Wyoming in 1939. She was a nurse at the Casper Hospital, until coming to Douglas in 1942 as administrator of the Douglas Hospital. In 1945 she married John Downs of Douglas, but continued nursing until her retirement in 1962. She is presently living in Douglas. Earl passed away suddenly on December 14, 1983, being active in the Senior Citizens organization until the time of his death.

Earl and Florence's daughter, Arrah, was married to Forrest Spoeneman on Nov. 25, 1936. To this union were born two boys, Kenneth Wayne on Sept. 7, 1937 and Earl Joe on Aug. 30, 1938, both born in Douglas. Their father died in California July 23, 1950. Arrah worked in banks in Casper, California and Douglas for many years. In November of 1971 she was united in marriage to Nile Hardy of Douglas, and lived here until her sudden death on Feb. 12, 1975. Her son, Kenneth, has worked for various airlines since graduating from business school and is now living in Eugene, Oregon. Earl Joe is drilling superintendent for test holes at the atomic test site north of Las Vegas. He has two sons, Rodney Scott and Heath Alan.

John Copenhaver graduated from the Wyoming University and taught one year in Greybull, before taking the position of Plant Manager for Magcobar in Greybull. He was with Magcobar until his death, having had plants in Greybull, Iran, Canada and Louisiana. He was married to Carolyn Lee of Rock Springs on Sept. 5, 1949. They had three children: Forrest John, born Nov. 11, 1950; and Jack Allen, born Jan. 5, 1954. Both boys were born in Greybull and their daughter, Deidra Ann, July 11, 1959 was born in Camrose, Canada. Carolyn died after a brief illness on June 10, 1976 and John passed away suddenly of a massive heart attack on Nov. 23, 1977. Their son, Forrest "Frosty" is with Magcobar Inc. and is living in Lake Charles, Louisiana. Frosty and his wife, Nancy, have four children, Bradly, Kristin, Tessa and Justin. Jack is self-employed at Copper Mountain Co. and Deidra "Dede" is living in Burlington, Wyoming with her husband, Monty Wardell and three children, Jeremy, Jason and Jennifer. Monty is a mason worker and is in construction with his father.

Earl and Florence's second daughter, Rhoda, graduated from Douglas schools and worked in Washington, D.C. and Denver in secretarial work. On June 21, 1948 she married Eddie Moore, son of Leroy and Helen Slonaker Moore, in Douglas, and they lived on the Ogalalla Ranch, 65 miles north of Douglas, until their older daughter started junior high school, at which time, they moved into town, and commuted to the ranch. Eddie became active in several fields; State President of the Wyoming Wool Growers Assn., Wyoming Highway Commission for six years, chairman of this for two years. In 1975 he was elected to the Wyoming Senate and at present is President of the Wyoming Senate.

They have five children, all born in Douglas: Rebecca "Becky" Lynn, born Aug. 26, 1949; Victoria Marie "Vicki" on Oct. 1, 1951; and triplet sons, Frank, Vern, Parker on Mar. 4, 1953. All five children graduated from Douglas schools. Becky and her husband, Dennis Costantino, live in Rock Springs, Wyoming where they have a clothing business. They have two children, Victoria "Vicki" Lee and Anthony "Tony" Edward. Vicki Moore married Steven Good of Douglas and they have two children, Ryan Moore and Lacey Moore. Vicki taught school in Douglas for five years and Steve is in the fixed base operation at the Douglas Airport with his father. Frank Neal Moore married Elaine Werner, daughter of John and Barbara Werner. They live on the Spearhead Ranch, north of Douglas, with their three sons, Frank Todd, Keith Michael, and David Edward. Vern and Nancy Goodrich, daughter of Henry and Shirley Goodrich, were married in Douglas and make their home on the Ogalalla Ranch with their three children, Jennifer Leigh, and twins, Bret Henry and Kati Rene. Parker James married Karen Gillhouse, of Denver, in 1974 and they are ranching in New Mexico, with three children, Jesse Kendall, and twins Ross Jackson and Sarah Janelle.

Alma Mary Copenhaver was born May 23, 1896 at Keota, Iowa. She was raised in Pawnee City, Nebr. and taught school there before moving to Douglas with her parents in 1918. She taught school near her parents' ranch, north of Douglas, and again in the Dry Creek School. She taught both of her sisters, Hazel and Pearl. Alma married James Madison Stevens at Douglas on June 2, 1920. Alma and Jim had a homestead in the Verse area, north of Douglas, and owned and operated the Verse Store on Highway 59 for many years, before they sold their interests and moved to a farm west of Douglas. Alma also served as Postmaster of Verse for many years. Jim passed away March 30, 1982 and Alma is now residing at Michael Manor in Douglas.

Everett Copenhaver was born April 22, 1898 in Keota, Iowa. He only stayed in this area a couple of weeks and returned to Nebraska to teach school for two years and attended the University of Nebraska studying accounting. He married Myrtle Dickinson, of Pawnee City, Jan. 16, 1921 and they then moved to Douglas. Everett had filed a homestead cornering the one Earl had, but he worked as agent for the American Express Railway. He and Myrtle never actually lived on their homestead. He has told the story that the law said you must live on a filed homestead a certain amount of time, so periodically, they would make the trip out and drag a log from the house to the outhouse, to keep the weeds down and the snow packed; making it look as if someone were living there.

Everett and Myrtle had two children, born in Douglas, Ross D. on Mar. 4, 1924, and Constance "Connie" Irene on Oct. 12, 1926. Myrtle died at the age of 29, in childbirth, as did the infant on Oct. 24, 1928. Everett married Ethel Newcomb Feb. 9, 1930 in Casper. Ethel was born in Sheridan on Sept. 16, 1899. She had one daughter, Evelyn Grace, who went to school in Douglas and is now residing in California.

He represented Converse County for four years in the State Legislature and was Chief Clerk for the 27th and 28th State Legislatures. In 1943 Everett and Ethel moved to Cheyenne for his appointment as Deputy Secretary of State, serving in that capacity for two years, then was Assistant State Examiner for two years. In 1946, he was elected State Auditor and again in 1950. In 1954 he was elected Secretary of State. He was elected State Treasurer in 1962 and is the first person in the history of the state to have been elected to three of the five elective offices, having served eight years as Auditor, four as Secretary of State and four as Treasurer. After thirty years in the State Government, he retired in 1973 from the office of Auditor. His wife, Ethel, had died in Cheyenne on July 2, 1969. He had married Mildred Jesmer in Baggs, Wyoming on Nov. 26, 1971 and after his retirement, they moved to Powell, Wyoming to be near their children — Everett's son, Ross, and his wife, Kay, who is Mildred's daughter.

Ross Copenhaver is an attorney in Powell, Wyoming. Ross and Kay Jesmer were married at Baggs Sept. 14, 1948. They have three sons, Ronald Dee, born in Laramie and is living there at the present time. Ron is an attorney and he and his wife, Carmia, have one daughter, Melissa. Mark Dean was born in Powell and lives there with his wife, Ann Hansen. They live on a farm with their two children, Zachery Dee and Sarah Ann. Ross and Kay's third son, Tracy, is also an attorney and is associated with his father's law firm in Powell. He is married to Teresa Thomas and they have two children, Ryan James and Alisa Katherine.

Everett and Myrtle's daughter, Connie, graduated from nursing school and for many years was active in this profession. Connie married John Peetz, Jr. of Sidney, Nebr. on Nov. 26, 1947 in Denver. They have three sons and three daughters. John has his own law firm in Sidney and has been joined by two of his sons and one daughter-in-law.

Connie and John's daughter, Cynthia Marie, married Larry Taylor of Henderson, No. Car. in Wurzburg, Germany where Cindy was teaching and Larry serving in the armed service. They have one daughter, Margaret, "Maggie", born in Seoul, Korea, and at the present time this family lives in Belgium. John Peetz III, is an attorney with his father. Michael is married to Shelley Hanson of Elsie, Nebr. He is a surgeon and she is an anesthesiologist, both practicing in Greeley, Colo. They have two children, Elizabeth Ann and Joseph Michael. Rhonda Jo is a pharmacist and married to Michael Pepper of Edina, Minn. They live in Lincoln, Nebr. with their two children, Patrick "Packy" and Jessica Kay. Connie and John's third daughter, Judy Lynn, is a registered nurse and married to Bruce Harms, M.D. of Deschler, Nebr. They have two children, Andrew John and Monica Lynn and live in Madison, Wis. Jeffrey Thomas Peetz married Sarah Gerhart of Newman Grove, Nebr. Jeff and Sarah are both attorneys and in the firm with his father in Sidney.

Hazel Susannah Copenhaver was born in Lewiston, Nebr. Dec. 14, 1903. She married Robert Ramsey in Douglas Sept. 14, 1921, after graduating in Douglas. They moved to Butler, Tenn. for a short while and returned to Douglas, where Bob was employed at a lumber company here. They had five children: Betty Jane, born June 12, 1922 at Butler, Tenn.; Virginia Lee, born in Douglas, June 23, 1924; Robert, Jr., January 1, 1927; Mary Ann, born April 25, 1932 and James Milton, born on Feb. 2, 1926, all three in Douglas. Robert Jr. died in Douglas April 23, 1933. Hazel and Bob moved back to Tennessee around 1940. Bob died there in April 1962 and the rest of the family all live in the Hampton, Tenn. area.

Pearl Marie Copenhaver was born in Pawnee City, Nebr. Aug. 29, 1910. She married Harvey Preston Allen in Casper on April 22, 1933. Harvey worked for Russell Trucking in Douglas several years and was Postmaster of the Douglas Post Office for two years, before moving to Laramie where he was employed by the U. P. Railroad from 1943 to 1948. At that time the family moved to Eugene, Ore. where he worked for the Southern Pacific Railroad. Pearl taught school two years, north of Douglas, at the Graves School, two years at Hildebrand School, west of Douglas, and one year at Shawnee before she was married. Pearl and Harvey had four children, all born in Douglas. Peggy Arlene, on Mar. 3, 1934; Dorothy Jean, Dec. 12, 1935; Harvey Jr., Dec. 4, 1937; and James on June 26, 1941. James was killed in a hunting accident Oct. 15, 1955 near Eugene.

Cowell, Elmer and Ethel

I, Elmer, was born on July 28, 1902 at Grand Island, Nebraska, the son of William and Henrietta Cowell.

Mother became a telegrapher to support the family when Dad became ill. The family lived in towns throughout the west before coming to Converse County to homestead in 1917. Dad died in 1918.

I came to Douglas on January 20, 1920, at the age of 18, as cashier for the CB&Q (Burlington) Depot. There were no trucks and all freight came in each morning in eight cars from Denver and Omaha.

I worked there two years and was transferred to Casper where they were very busy with the development of the Salt Creek oil fields. The railroad and freight office was swamped with work. I stayed there only two years, returning to Douglas; I started driving the laundry wagon for George Ashland, the Douglas Steam Laundry, and stayed there six years. While working there, I met and married Ethel Brighton Schmidt. She became chief operator at the telephone office and worked there several years.

My mother and Harry Merwin were living on the homestead which was composed of four sections, homesteaded by relatives in the family: Henrietta Cowell, Henry Schlichting, Herman Schlichting and Harry J. Merwin. Harry Merwin and my Mother were married in 1951. She died on May 30, 1957.

Dusting for Mormon Crickets south of Glenrock 1935.

In the beginning, we all formed a partnership and began buying a few cattle and milk cows. Ethel's and my homestead was about eight miles north, just below Duck Creek. We built a house and proved up on it and then, about 1924, sold it to Joe Reynolds as it was surrounded by his pasture.

My working in town enabled us to pay expenses as we went along and to improve our buildings. In 1930, I went to the ranch and we bought a tractor and machinery to farm about 450 acres of dry-land farming. We produced some feed and milked 15 to 20 cows; there were 500 laying hens and we also had four brood sows and raised hogs.

I bought the second Chevrolet truck ever sold in Converse County and we had a load of fat hogs—eleven head. I loaded them in the truck and started to Casper Packing Company. We burned out the rods about ten miles out from the packing house, so had to walk to a phone and call Nolan Chevrolet Company to come and get us. They arrived and pulled the truck to the packing company and unloaded the hogs ($3.65 per cwt.) and then went on to the Chevrolet garage. The next morning we went after it, but our check for the hogs wasn't big enough to cover the garage bill! We found a pawnshop and borrowed $75 on Ethel's wedding ring: interest $5 per month—note for six months only. It was several months before we could claim the ring.

We raised very little until 1935 which had a wet spring and then we were able to raise a lot of feed. In 1936, I went to a farmers' meeting in Douglas and they were trying to organize so that we could take part in government programs, such as subsidies available on wheat, corn and hogs. I was elected chairman and we organized; but since we had no county agent, the commissioners contacted Washington and learned that if the commissioners would maintain an office and hire a secretary, the government would furnish the literature and the county could have access to the programs even without a county agent.

Commissioner Leonard Shaw asked me if I would serve as Acting County Agent to get it organized and I agreed. I stayed ten years. A great many programs became available, for example the Range Program for building reservoirs - and others, too: Picket Pin Squirrels (gophers) in Box Elder Community - 1937, Mormon Crickets on LaBonte Creek and on Upper LaPrele and the Grasshopper Program for the LaPrele Community or anyone else with irrigated ground that had grasshoppers.

The Picket Pin Squirrels were very thick in the Box Elder Community and had holes dug in all irrigated meadows. The water, spread out to irrigate, went into the squirrel holes and seeped away so that no water got on our hay. The people up there came to see me and we organized a program under the Agricultural Adjustment Administration Program. The county financed the program and the ranchers signed up under AAA and met specifications. After compliance, the ranchers would get partly reimbursed for their expenses.

The program worked very well. I hired Earl Scott to be there and look after it. We used poison oats and the rancher and his sons would ride under the direction of a foreman; they would ride abreast just a few feet apart, each with an open sack of the oats and throw a handful around each hole. When one ranch was covered, the crew went to the next ranch and their riders helped with the spreading and riding. There was a great deal of cooperation and things went smoothly. It lasted until August when the squirrels hibernated; the next year you could see what a good job was done. We had spread several car loads of poison oats!

The Mormon Cricket Program started with a bang. They suddenly showed up on LaBonte and Upper LaPrele. They only come out every seven to nine years and certainly were a surprise to all. They stay in a band and head in one direction only. A band would cover 30 to 40 acres and may move half a mile or a mile then stop and eat. The ground would be bare when they moved on. They would seldom fly and they had a beezar on their rear ends, which when they would rear up and stick in the ground, would deposit up to 200 eggs each.

C. L. Cookins, State Entomologist, came in and helped us get going. We got arsenic by the barrel and diatomic earth by the carload. We used WPA men for labor (144 men which were restricted to a maximum of a 40-hour week). We furnished them with fresh coveralls each morning and when they came in at night, they took baths under the supervision of safety engineers to be sure their bodies were thoroughly covered with suds.

They wore masks and used hand-operated dusting blowers. When they arrived at a band of crickets, the men would form a long row abreast and walk and turn on the blowers and cover the crickets with arsenic dust. The crickets didn't eat the dust but when they walked in it, their feet got sore. They would lick their feet and get poisoned.

When ranchers on LaBonte and Upper LaPrele would locate bands of crickets, they would notify the scouts who put flags around the bands so that the spraying crew could find them. We haven't heard of any Mormon Crickets for many years.

The grasshoppers had been building up for several years; some even had been blown from South Dakota. We fixed a mixing plant and got in a carload of bran and a carload of 55-gallon containers of liquid arsenic. The LaPrele farmers patronized the program well and also anyone else that wanted to poison.

Effective poisoning is gauged by the temperature and the feeding habits of the grasshopper, so that when you spread the poison it won't dry up and blow away. The grasshoppers roost on the stem of the plants and in the morning, after the temperature gets up to 50°, they get down on the ground and feed until it gets to 80°. Then they get back up on the stems of the plant. Lots of homemade spreaders were made and they would scatter the bait very well. Most grain and alfalfa fields had a band around the edge where the hoppers had fed. After the spraying started, it stopped the damage.

Converse County had the largest percentage of participation in these programs in all of these Western States. Some of the others who contributed faithfully to the success of the AAA were Leona Bruce, Mavis Featherston and Carroll Ballard.

When I finished as Acting County Agent in 1946, I bought, on credit, 600 old ewes from Jack Morton and that started us on the road to more land and more sheep.

Carroll Mohr, who represented the Fiddleback Company and Mountain Home Company, was on our AAA Committee. He offered me a lease on 17 sections of land northwest of Glenrock for $600 per year for five years, which must be purchased at the end for $2.00 per acre. I took Jack Morton up and showed him the land and he said to go ahead and he would see me through.

That fall, I bought 1400 old ewes from Paul LeBar and trailed them to Cole Creek. Many small sheep owners around wanted to sell out; Pat Leach, Perry Dewitt and several others, so in just a few years, I had 40 sections of land. I was terribly in debt but that is a wonderful winter country for sheep and we began to pay off some of our debts.

About 1950, we started building fences to make pastures so we could turn the sheep loose. I bought 20 semi loads of Arkansas Cedar posts and we had our first post-hole digger, so we built 75 miles of fence. Sheep-tight woven wire around the buildings and corrals and #5 and #6 wire properly spaced with posts in pastures.

We let the sheepherders go and looked after the sheep with horses and pickups. The sheep do better, shear more wool and bring in a ten pound heavier lamb when they are turned loose and do as they please.

In 1939, we had adopted Mary when she was only a few hours old. This completely changed our lives and I bought a house on Fourth Street that Percy Peterson had built recently. His wife sold it to me for painting it for the down payment, and to pay her $30.80 a month plus the taxes; $4,000 purchase price.

We had some good years and finally bought some yearling cattle to summer in the Sand Hills. They did real well, so we continued to run more cattle both in Cole Creek and Hyland.

James Davies and family and Harry Picklesimer worked for me all through these years. Jim trained and sold Border Collie sheep dogs which we used exclusively with the sheep.

We used to buy hay and pile it up until we needed it and were hauling some from the Niels Rasmussen place on LaPrele Creek. Niels was bound he was going to sell me his place as he was old and had had a heart attack and wanted out. We bought all his second cutting and each day that we would come to load, he would cut his price another $5,000. As he came down, naturally it made it more attractive than ever.

Finally, I told him yes, if the bank would go with me. So, I went to town and Dale Hinman of the Converse County Bank approved the sale. We now had an irrigated place to look after. I intended it for Clarence (our son-in-law), if he and Mary took an interest in it; but they were too inexperienced.

The next spring I hired a farmer, Larry Heimsoth, who really did a magnificent job farming. He stayed eight years and we built up several feed lots and pens plus a lamb feeding yard. We had about 1000 cattle on feed, 3000 lambs, and about 700 calves up and down the creek. We raised 450 ton of alfalfa, lots of oats cut for green silage, and 50 acres of silage corn; about 14,000 tons per year. This was new for Wyoming and my guiding stars were Berry and Paul Lind of Eaton, Colorado who advised me whenever I was having trouble.

When Larry Heimsoth lost his wife and left, I hired Bernard Andrews of Big Horn Basin. He did a good job feeding and farming for another eight years - or until I sold it to Dick and Catherine Strock in 1972. Earlier, in 1964, I sold the Cole Creek Ranch and the Hyland Ranch to Bob and Ann Boner. They are still operating it.

Ethel was having trouble with the stairs in the Peterson house, so we traded with Frank Ellis who, with Archie Bruce, had built a nice stucco home at 726 South Sixth Street - all on one floor. We were very happy with it and after going back and forth to Arizona for several years, we sold it. After 1972, we stayed year-round in Arizona.

We lost our daughter to cancer in 1977, but she did leave two wonderful girls. We have seen them through school and college. Now they are married to very nice young men and have homes and careers of their own in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, and Eugene, Oregon.

Ethel passed away on November 2, 1983, at 83 years of age. We were married 59 years.

Elmer died June 8, 1984.

Cowger, John and Nettie Family

John Cowger was born February 27, 1878 in Monticello, Indiana, the son of George and Mary Cowger. He married Nettie Fowler in Lost Springs, Kansas on December 31, 1910. He died July 14, 1955.

Nettie Fowler Cowger was born July 6, 1889 to Daniel and Katherine Fowler in Lost Springs, Kansas. Children were Edwin, Jack and Velma (Reeves). Nettie died March 21, 1962.

John and Nettie Cowger arrived in Douglas on Halloween night in 1916, bringing with them household goods, thirty dollars cash and two small children; Edwin, four years and Velma, two years of age.

My grandfather, O. E. Fowler and his sons Gene, Lee and Dennis had come out and filed on homestead. When they returned to Lost Springs, Kansas to get their belongings and families, my parents decided to come to Wyoming with them.

They were lucky enough to corner the homesteads; Grandad's, Lee's and our place all met at a corner. This made it convenient to have a common well. Someone had faith because they dug a thirty foot well, by hand, and rocked up the well walls as they dug and struck very good water.

When we arrived at Douglas, housing was scarce and all of our families and the O'Leary family had to move into an old laundry building which we divided into apartments by hanging blankets.

The first winter, Dad did odd jobs around town, including working for Fred Cannon and the Douglas Electric Company. The next spring, he went to work for Morton's ranch doing their haying. My brother, Jack, was born in a tenant house there. During that summer Dad and my uncles finished a one room house on the homestead and Jack Morton moved us out there on a high wheeled freight wagon, in a rainstorm, using eight head of horses.

At first there were no schools and when I was ready for school, we moved to town for that winter. Dad worked for the Peters Brick Plant and later that winter he hauled coal for the Electric Company. I started to school at the North Grade School but the winter of 1917 and 1918 was so cold it froze the water pipes and we finished school in the old courthouse basement.

Through the early years, in the fall, Dad would go back to Kansas and operate a steam thrasher for the grain harvest, then work his way back through Nebraska harvesting corn. In the fall of 1926, when I was ready for high school, Dad came to town and bought the Johnstone Dray and Storage business and operated it for the next forty years.

During these years no one had any money, but we all ate well and enjoyed life.

Our Wyoming dry land would grow anything. The gardens produced without irrigation and fed us all year. My people strip farmed and raised very good grain crops. In 1926, our last year in the country, we raised thirty bushels of wheat per acre and received a dollar a bushel for it.

This is bringing back old memories of riding in a lumber wagon to the Vollman School House for all night dances. Neighbors who attended were; The Vollmans, Schlichtings, Hornbecks, Domsallas, Hornbuckles, Taylors, Numericks, Fishers and many more.

Our old place is now part of the Lee Fowler Ranch.

Craig, John and Ruth

Although it has been many years since Ruth Craig has been able to visit Wyoming, she still entertains her many grandchildren with tales of the time she and her husband, John Henry Craig, homesteaded land in Wyoming.

Ruth and John's great adventure began in the spring of 1920. Ruth remembers that it was on April 22, 1920, that a minister from the Carterville, Illinois Christian Church by the name of J. M. Slick encouraged a group of people from Carterville to go to Wyoming for the purpose of homesteading land. Mr. Slick was from Gillette, Wyoming. Eleven people from Carterville decided to become pioneers. Their names are as follows: Ray Miller, Ruth Lauder Volner, Dewey Volner, Harry Eaton, Carmen

J. H. Craig - 1920.

Ruth Craig - 1920.

Eaton, Ross Green, Otis Hall, John Barnes, Ruth Rowatt Craig, John Henry Craig, and Harry Trevaryan. Nine of the eleven went out together. Ruth, who was 20 years old, and John, 26, followed a week later.

Before going to Wyoming, Ruth and John traveled to Roseburg, Oregon, in search of land. However, they found that the land they were considering purchasing near Roseburg cost $8 an acre. Since their entire savings consisted of $50, they decided to join the group planning to homestead land in Wyoming. They made the trip by train arriving in Gillette on June 1, 1920.

All of the 11 people from Carterville planned to homestead land near or adjoining the John Paisley sheep ranch, which was about 50 miles from Gillette. All of the men in the group were veterans of World War I, which gave them an advantage in homesteading since they did not have to stay on the land as long as other citizens to qualify for ownership.

Each of the cabins, which the men built, consisted of one room measuring about 12' by 15'. The cabins were constructed from pine trees cut and dragged five miles to the location. Big logs were then cut, notched, and filled with adobe to make the walls. The roofs were made from smaller poles cut from the tops of the trees. Gunny sacks were laid on top of the poles, then gumbo was put on the top of the sacks. Sometimes beautiful cactuses bloomed in the gumbo atop the roofs. Each cabin contained only one three-foot square glass-less window. The floor was earth that had once been a cactus bed.

Pine logs were split to make beds for the houses. Wild grass was then thrown over the logs and the grass was covered with army blankets; feed sacks stuffed with grass were used as pillows. The Craigs put a wooden grocery box on top of a tree stump to use as a table. A flat-topped stove with an oven was the only piece of purchased furniture that they had. Fuel for the stove was knotty pine limbs. Ruth remembers that it was necessary to turn the limbs over carefully to be sure a rattlesnake was not hiding among the limbs. For drinking water, the Craigs were forced to use the same hole from which the wild animals drank. Ruth dipped water from the hole with a five-pound coffee can.

One day while Ruth was waiting for John and the other men to finish the cabins, she and another young woman heard that two young men would be passing the site where the men were working. The two young women decided to ask for a ride. The young men offered to let the women ride on a load of screen wire in the back of an open truck. It was a long, hard fifty-mile trip over dirt roads riding on top of the screen wire in the back of a truck. Ruth still remembers ruining her best dark blue, silk dress riding on those screens, but she says it was worth the trip to get to see her husband.

After Ruth was able to move into the cabin with John, she recalls seeing rattlesnakes, antelope, prairie dogs, prairie chickens, and coyotes, but she was most bothered by the field mice. She recalls that when she and John left the table, the mice would climb onto the table in search of food.

Probably the most frightening incident of the Craigs' homesteading days involved a rattlesnake. One day John stomped a rattlesnake to death. The nails coming through his worn shoes helped him kill the snake. Later those same nails accidentally made several cuts on the top of Ruth's foot. Since they were 25 miles from the nearest place that they could have gotten help, there was nothing to do but wait to see if Ruth died. They feared some poison might still have been left on the nails from the rattlesnake. It was a long, tension-filled wait for the young homesteaders.

Another vivid memory that Ruth still treasures is the day that a rancher delivered 30 letters from her anxious mother back in Illinois. She and John had not seen anyone for 27 days when a rancher arrived with a gunny sack full of letters and copies of "The Saturday Evening Post", which provided some welcome reading material. Just as Ruth started to dash out of the door to greet the newcomer, he yelled for her to stay inside. The rancher then got off his horse and killed a two-and-a-half-foot rattlesnake just outside the front door of the cabin.

Before Ruth and John borrowed a horse and wagon to use to go into Bill to buy groceries, they once had to live on nothing but canned tomatoes thickened with flour for eight days. After eight days, John was forced to begin walking to town for food. Fortunately, on the way he met a rancher bringing them food.

Still another fond memory that Ruth likes to relate to her children and grandchildren is how she got her graduation watch back after it was lost. She remembers that she and John took time out one day to take a long walk in the hills. When she returned to the cabin, she realized that she had left the watch, that her father had given her for her high school graduation, on top of one of the hills, but she had no idea which hill. Later a man came by their cabin and happened to mention that two men had found a watch. Ruth and John went to the men's cabin. After explaining that the watch was a gift from her father, the men returned the watch even though the young couple did not have any money to give the men as a reward.

In the following years, John built a storm cellar for the cabin and made improvements on the land. Although the other nine people from Illinois failed to complete the homestead requirements, John Craig became the owner of 640 acres of land. He received a patent for 480 acres in Converse County on February 4, 1930, and a patent for 160 acres in Campbell County on September 29, 1924.

Otis Hall, one of the group from Carterville, married a Wyoming girl and remained in Wyoming. The other people from Illinois returned home.

After homesteading land in Wyoming, Ruth and John returned to Carterville and then moved to Herrin, Illinois. They became the parents of five children: Carroll Eugene Craig, Margaret Ellen Craig Trotter, John Henry Craig, Jr., Paul William Craig, and David Rowatt Craig.

Many years have passed since the couple homesteaded land in Wyoming, John passed away in 1978, but Ruth still remembers her exciting adventure.

Cram, Erwin and Lorinda Family

Erwin M. Cram was born in Waukon, Iowa on April 20, 1858, the son of Willets W. and Mary Partland Cram. He married Lorinda Leatherman, daughter of Joseph and Elizabeth Moyer Leatherman, on April 19, 1885. Lorinda was born in Plainview, Minnesota on April 10, 1866.

Erwin and Lorinda had 14 children. They are:
Addie, b. January 22, 1886, m. George Marburger, d. 1967
Ralph W., b. June 22, 1887, d. July 14, 1963
Mary E., b. November 23, 1888, m. House and Funk
Roy E., b. September 26, 1890, d. October 7, 1903

Lynne E., b. January 29, 1903, d. June 22, 1974
Ruth G., b. February 4, 1905, m. Haley and Hope
Oscar J., b. August 20, 1907

The following story of the family's life in Wyoming is related by Ruth Cram Hope.

"We left Brocksburg, Nebraska on April 4, 1916 with two heavily loaded wagons. Mother, Father and I were in the first wagon and Harold, Lynne and Oscar were in the second wagon.

We only traveled about 15 miles a day on Highway 20, always having to camp where we had water for the horses and milk cow. Sometimes Mother had to boil the water for drinking. We never traveled on Sunday, that was the day mother baked bread and did the washing. We had a nine by twelve tent with a four hole camp stove with oven.

I think the highlight of the trip was being stranded on the Rosebud Indian Reservation in a blizzard. I don't remember the exact date we landed in Shawnee, as I remember it was nearly six weeks from the time we left.

My father filed on 160 acres of land one and one half miles west of Shawnee. We lived on the Horace Woodward place until the house was built.

My father was Justice of Peace in Converse County in 1923. He performed the marriage ceremony for two of his children, Harold to Veda Pickinpaugh and Ruth to Laurence Henley.

My three brothers, Ralph, Orlando and Carl, served in World War I, Orlando serving overseas in Germany. Carl died of the flu in 1918. Upon returning home, Ralph and Orlando filed on homesteads. Ralph filed north of Shawnee and Orlando north of Douglas in the Walker Creek area.

Our social activities consisted of dances which were usually held in the railroad section house or in someone's kitchen. They were held every two weeks. There were also box suppers to raise money for whatever the cause might be.

Of all our family, only one sister, Lola, chose to stay in Nebraska."

Erwin Cram died on March 8, 1937 and Lorinda on March 23, 1943.

Croco, Arthur and Hallie

Arthur Cecil Croco was born in Argos, Indiana, February 11, 1883. He graduated from high school there and studied engineering. As a young man he worked with his father on the farm. They had black walnut trees and a granite quarry. For adventure he came west while still a young man.

Arthur Croco met and married Hallie Susanna White of Knox, Indiana, June 7, 1907. She was a musician, playing piano and organ, and was a very good singer.

Hallie Croco was the daughter of Edith Anderson White. Edith homesteaded five and one half miles south of Lost Springs in 1909. She had a grandson she raised, George White, also her son Asher lived there. She later moved into Lost Springs and lived there for a number of years. In September, 1946 she moved to Casper. On December 10, 1946 she passed away at the age of 80.

With some other men from Indiana Arthur came west and filed on a homestead in April 1909, three and one half miles south of Lost Springs. He returned home to Indiana and after their first baby, Henry Asher, was born April 30, 1909, Arthur shipped their possessions west with a man named Pete Krause, in May 1909. Hallie and the baby came a few weeks later. By then, Arthur had a "house" built, covered with tar paper which was later replaced with wood siding.

Arthur's cousin Clyde C. Howell, homesteaded across the road; the Cannons a mile north; Ed Kamp, a mile west; and Grandma Edith White (who was well known) two and one half miles south. The area was called "Hoosier Avenue" and we children attended school one half mile south at the Hoosier Grade School. My first teacher was Susan Liebrick.

William Earl Croco, Arthur's brother, homesteaded adjoining Arthur's land. He worked as a sheepherder and cowboy and helped on his brother's farm. Returning to Argos, Indiana, he helped care for his mother and family. William was never married.

Times were very hard and Hallie left son Henry with her mother, Grandma White, to be taken care of, and taught school in the LaBonte area. Some of the Georges and Johnsons were her students. She boarded at the Johnsons. While there, she "mid-wifed" at the birth of Clarence Nunn. By the fall of 1912, she was expecting, so she had to give up teaching.

On March 19, 1913, twin girls arrived at the Croco home. Mrs. E. W. "Auntie" Cannon and Grandma White delivered the babies N. Edith and N. Ellen. When Dr. Christiansen arrived from Manville, we were four hours old, but he still charged for the delivery of two babies.

As babies, we shared a large oblong basket as our bed, and were dressed in white until we were nine months old. When the folks took us to town, the cowboys enjoyed giving us chocolate and licorice, we'd have more on the outside than in. Mother really got upset. One time, as she was going home in the buggy, a cowboy rode up and grabbed one of us while going up "Putt's Hill", just south of Lost Springs. Mother was terrified and crying by the time she topped the hill. The cowboy sure had a laugh teasing Mom.

The Crocos did their canning-lots of vegetables. Dad even found a way to hold melons until Thanksgiving. I can remember when we cleaned wheat and ground it for our cereal and stomped the dried beans out of the pods. Mother would pre-cook meat in roasts and fried steaks, put them in quart jars and water pack or pressure them. I have done this to take on our hunting trips.

April 28, 1917, another baby, Joseph Jean came to stay with us. The folks had a nice family now. We were a happy bunch of kids. Dad made a tricycle with wood wheels for Joe. We had picnics, no weiners, but always cookies and chocolate drinks. We went to the Prairie View Presbyterian Church. Frank Thomas was the first minister I remember. Dad and Mother would have us sit on our little red chairs around them, that is where we first learned of God and His Love. We kids thank God for Bible reading-believing parents.

On October 22, 1921, a little girl, Artha Lois was born. Dad called her his "Little Red Bird" in later years, for Mother had made her a red dress.

Our first sorrow came when our father, Arthur, died April 22, 1926. Mom was left with five children to feed and clothe. She never let us know we could quit school and we all graduated from high school in Douglas, Wyoming.

On May 6, 1927, a year and some weeks following the death of our father, little Artha was taken. Mother must have felt that the sky had fallen. I can still see her in the rocking chair by the window sewing the burial dress, with every stitch, a tear.

Hallie was very involved in the community and was called on to help lay out the dead, deliver babies and was the church pianist and organist as well as singing at church affairs. She was the state wide interviewer for the Historical Project of Converse County in 1936 & 1937. Hallie married James B. Libby of Cheyenne in 1938. They lived in Cheyenne until his death in 1950. Hallie then moved to Casper to be near her family and passed away in 1952.

Son, Henry Croco married Metta Mae Townsend of Orin Junction. He was a field engineer for Oil Well Supply in Casper and collected antique cars.

Daughter, Ellen married W. Oscar Hutchison of Douglas. His family had a ranch west of Douglas. Oscar worked for Marathon Oil. Ellen established her own business in Casper, the Kut-n-Kurl Beauty Shop.

Daughter, Edith married Sidney T. Humberson of Douglas. He worked for Pittsburgh Des Moines Steel in Casper. Edith at the age of 50, entered college, graduated and became a Licensed Practical Nurse. Edith worked at Memorial Hospital in Casper.

Frisbie T. Humberson worked for Chicago Northwestern and lived in a section house at Douglas from 1912 to 1915. He then homestead south of Douglas near what they called "Red Canyon". We believe it is now owned by the William "Bill" Nunn family.

Son, Joseph served in the army during World War II. After being discharged he went to work for the Union Pacific Railroad as an engineer. He married Josephine Burns of Iowa. Josephine passed away leaving Joe with an infant son. He then married Agnes Kathryn Collins of Iowa. Kay, as she was called by her family and friends, was a school teacher. She passed away in 1978. Joe is now married to Agnes Korkow of Denzig, North Dakota.

Cromwell, Luther and Nancie Family

Luther (Con) Cromwell and Nancie Cellan were married in Oklahoma about March 1904. I, Warren Cromwell, was born August 6, 1906, near Alva, Oklahoma. My brother, Gerald, was born November 25, 1908.

We moved to South Dakota in 1913, coming to Wyoming in April 1917. Dad homesteaded in Boxelder country in 1922. I was 16 at that time. The first two years we moved back to Casper for us boys to attend school. In the spring of 1923, as Dad was preparing to move back to the homestead, I suddenly got smarter than any high school teacher or books. So I resigned from all school activities and climbed aboard the wagon bound for Strawberry Canyon.

We cleared aspen trees from the land for hay meadows (still producing for the Grant Ranch). The post office was six miles away on Boxelder — the post mistress was Mrs. Hiser, who later became my mother-in-law. I had to ride around the mountain, or over it, to get the mail.

Luther Cromwell and bear.

We did not have a radio, telephone, or electricity. Mail was delivered at the county road on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. We looked forward to mail day. Many times we were disappointed when items ordered from Sears or Wards did not arrive.

The first dance I fiddled for was at the old GR Ranch. Lloyd Huxtable held the dance in honor of his buddy, Roy and Helen Smith, newlyweds. The GR buildings are just about gone now. About the only amusement we had was the country dances at the old school house, located where the Fred Grant dancehall is now.

I homesteaded 640 acres now owned by the Grants. On December 3, 1930, I married Louise Hiser. Louise was born in the old Hiser house on Boxelder Creek, which is still used as a residence. She was born September 4, 1912, the tenth child of eleven. She tells people the reason she married me was that she felt sorry for me and my dad, as we were doing our own cooking and housework. Glad she took pity on us.

During the homestead years, we cut wood, fence posts, and corral poles for nearby ranches. Also, we had trap lines as long as ten to fifteen miles to earn money. Sometimes I worked for ranchers — Hisers, Grants, and Willard (Cap) White, on what is now the Huxtable Ranch. Times were very tough in those days. We sold high butter fat cream for $1.50 for a five-gallon can. A car load of fat cows and three-year-old heifers netted us six hundred dollars in Omaha. We put the money into the Glenrock State Bank to buy winter supplies, and the government froze all bank deposits.

My brother did not stay on the homestead very long — the bright lights of the cities were more attractive.

Our first two babies were born in Glenrock: Dale on December 8, 1931, and Sadie on January 19, 1933. We lived in a small one-room cabin, which is still standing. In 1933 we moved to Natrona County, and our youngest daughter, Selma, was born in Casper on June 19, 1936. In 1937 we moved back to Converse County. We rented the Ernie Pou place, which we later purchased. We moved to Casper in 1945 and back to Glenrock in 1960.

Daughter Sadie now lives and works in Denver, and daughter Selma lives and works in Great Falls, Montana. Our son, Dale, lives in Glenrock and works at the Dave Johnston Power Plant.

I have tried my hand at ranching, oilfield work, firing locomotives, and power plant mechanic. I was the first maintenance man at the Dave Johnston Power Plant, near Glenrock. I have been retired 12 years, just fiddling around. Louise says she did not retire. There's still plenty house work. (Guess she is still sorry for me).

I am the only one left on my side of the family.

Crosley, Charles and Katie

Charles H. B. Crosley and Katie A. Crosley moved from Kansas to Wyoming in October 1917. With them were seven children: Dell, age 12; Ervie, age 12; Britt (Harry), age 8; Gladys, age 6; Ray, age 5; Willard, age 3; and Dorothy, age 7 months. They traveled in an Overland 75 touring car. The trip took a week and they camped out on the way. Since I (Gladys) was almost 7-years-old, I remember some about the trip, but not how they managed to stow all of us and all the needed equipment, clothing, food and such in that car. With a 7-month-old baby there had to be some means of doing laundry along the way. I remember on occasion, we would get hay from near-by hay stacks to use for sleeping on. There were no sleeping bags then.

It rained all of the last day of the trip. We couldn't cook out, and stopped for lunch in Chugwater, everything was closed, and all Dad could find was one pie, which didn't make much for anyone. We arrived in Lost Springs rather late, and went to a hotel. As I remember it was run by a Mrs. Crabb, and she soon had a good hot meal for all of us.

We moved into Brink's Bee Hive for the winter. The Buffingtons lived downstairs. I remember Dale and Dorothy especially. That family had come from Kansas, also, and I believe printed a newspaper.

Dad had been to Wyoming earlier and applied for the homestead. That winter our two-room "dwelling" was built with the help of Harry Parker, a Mr. Hess, and, no doubt, John Tipton.

Those of school age attended the Lost Springs School that winter. I had started second grade in Kansas, but was put back to first in Wyoming. Lillie Meinzer was my teacher.

In April of 1918 we moved to the homestead. It was a cold, snowy day. There must have been two wagons, one for household goods, and one for the family. The one we were in had sideboards on and straw was put in the bottom for warmth and comfort. A tarp, or maybe the camping tent was over the top to protect us from the weather. We made a stop at the Onyon Mine, then on to John Tipton's. He lived half a mile from our house. We had known him in Kansas. I don't know how he knew when we would arrive but he had a meal ready. I remember only the biscuits, they were the lightest I have ever eaten, and I never figured out how he made them.

Living in a two-room house out in what seemed like a wild country, was different to say the least, but Mom made it a home, and although life wasn't easy I don't ever remember feeling neglected, or that things should have been better.

I remember how the howling coyotes scared me and all the stories we heard about the "big grey wolf" and the panthers, though never saw any of the latter two.

Dad worked in town much of the time as mechanic and blacksmith. He would come home about every two weeks with a supply of groceries. He worked in Lost Springs, Manville and Shawnee, and years later had a shop back of the LaBonte Hotel in Douglas.

Mom held down the fort and coped with the problems of raising a family, she helped the boys in the field at times, and a couple of times took on the job of doctor. One time when there had been a bad snow storm and we were snowed in, Britt and Ervie were at the wood pile splitting wood, and somehow Ervie got hit in the head with the axe. He was really bleeding when he got to the house. Mom started trying to stop the blood, but it was a deep cut. She told Britt and me to look in a certain book on how to stop bleeding, and we found powdered rosin would do it; so we got the rosin out of Dad's violin case and powdered it, and it did work, then she put Ervie to bed in a dark room. The next day or two a neighbor, Claude Smith, came by with a team and wagon to see if we needed any supplies from town. Mom sent Ervie along so a doctor could look at the wound, and we were all so proud as he said Mom had done everything necessary except to stitch it, and it was healing well. Another time Ray fell off the shed and cut his leg very badly on a knot, but that time Dell had a car, of sorts, and he took him to town after Mom had done some first-aid. Such times and the times it would be so stormy and Dad couldn't get home with supplies must have been times of great worry for our parents.

We had hired men a couple of times those first years, to put in the fence and do such work the boys just weren't old or experienced enough to handle. One hired man was Henry Douglas who had a homestead 'over East' in the timber.

West 20 Mile School was built that first summer. There were five Crosleys to attend that fall. We walked three-quarters of a mile, which was not bad, when compared to the Hansons who walked three miles. I'm not sure if they were there that first year, but Robert Edwards and Howard Bear attended. There was a new teacher every year I attended there, and one year two teachers in one term. I remember Mrs. Harbor, Emma Bushy, Mrs. Harmon, Mrs. Parker, Ray White, and Zelta Wintermote, who instilled in her pupils the desire to want to learn. I feel that one room with eight grades gave us a good basic education.

There was never a producing well on the homestead, one was drilled, but no water, so from 1918 until 1941 all water had to be hauled in barrels, caught during rare rains, or snow was melted. No small task, when in the end there were twelve in the family. Our mom was big on washing, scrubbing and bathing, but we learned to do a lot with a small amount of water. To this day I am mindful of the amount of water I use for dishes or whatever. We were so grateful to be able to get 'soft' water from Bear's spring, but if in a hurry we would use the 'hard' water from the Valentine's well.

The "World War I" flu didn't pass us by. Dad was working in Shawnee and became ill. Not knowing what he had, he came home, and soon all the beds were full of sick people. I'm sure Mom and my oldest brother weren't exactly well, but they stayed up and cared for the rest of us. It was winter, and there was all that extra bedding to be washed on the board and dried in the house most of the time. What a task, and what a worry.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parker were a great help to us during our illness. I can remember he would cut wood and stack it by the door, and he, no doubt, hauled the water. She would trudge the mile through the snow from their place to ours every day or two to help care for us and give us 'treatments.' She was an osteopath, and although I, for one, dreaded the treatments, I'm sure they did us a lot of good.

Three children were born on the homestead. Jess in 1919, Agnes in 1921 and Thelma in 1923. Mrs. Parker was there to deliver the babies. Mrs. Conner was also there when Thelma was born. By that time I was old enough to just about be chief cook and bottle washer.

Sunday School in the area was first held at "The Old Stark Place" then later under Irwin C. Noyce, a Sunday School was organized at West Twenty Mile School. At one time there were about 100 members.

We all worked hard on the homestead, each one had chores to do, but we had a lot of fun times also. We played 'Hide and Seek,' 'Shadow Tag' by moonlight, and if there was enough of us we had baseball games of sorts.

Dad worked away from home a lot, especially those first years, but later he had a shop at the homestead and did blacksmith work there. He could make so many things with metal. I remember especially the fancy handles on stove pokers, and the metal flowers he used to fashion. Mom was as adept with a piece of material as Dad was with metal, she made a lot of our clothing. Dad liked to play the violin, maybe fiddle to some, but to us it was the violin. He would hear a tune only once and be able to play it. He played for country dances a good deal, and later Dell helped with the banjo and Ervie with the guitar. It was great in the evenings to listen to them play. I used to think it was so neat when Dad would be playing the violin, and it would be bedtime for kids and I would go to sleep while listening to the music.

We had 4-H clubs for awhile. I was in sewing with Lillie Meinzer as leader. My older brothers raised animals as I remember, and Ervie, especially, did judging. He got a trip to Sioux City, Iowa with a judging team.

The state fair was the big event of the year, maybe even bigger than Christmas. If one hadn't been to town any other time of the year, you could count on going to the fair. I well remember my first trip to the fair. Dad was working as patrolman down by the race tracks. Mom, with the help of Dell, was herding the rest of us around the exhibit halls. It was so great back then, so many wonderful exhibits of produce and livestock, chicken, etc. raised in the state. We were in the building with chickens and birds (it is no longer used). I became so interested in some exhibit and didn't notice all the rest had left. When I went out to join them, there stood an Indian in full dress of a Chief. We were still new enough to the area, and I had heard stories about Indians, so I was sure he was just waiting to scalp me, and I was sure he was eight feet tall. I didn't know where Mom and the rest were, but I figured I could sneak around and get to Dad. Just as I had my nerve keyed up to try, Dell came back to find me, and with him there the Indian didn't seem nearly so huge.

Quite often the whole neighborhood would get together, usually after Sunday School for a picnic, or we had ice cream socials, watermelon feeds, dances, or grown-ups and kids alike would play such games as "Last Couple Out". It was a good community in which to grow up.

I believe it was in 1924 Dad ran the first mail route north of Shawnee. I have no idea how many miles it covered, but it served the families on West 20 Mile and on over into the Walker Creek area, then back to Shawnee. It ran two days a week, and at times called for a lot of snow shoveling, and at other times was a lot of mud to contend with. The mail carrier, in those days, not only carried mail, but hauled cream, eggs, and groceries.

In 1924 Dell, Ervie, Britt, Howard Hanson and I started to Shawnee High School. We batched in a little house just south of the school building. Howard dropped out before the year was over, but often told of how he went through high school - in the front door and out the back door. The second year I worked for board and room at the Fred Logans, he was principal at the high school. Dell, Ervie, and Britt batched. The third year Britt, Curtis Hanson and I batched in what had been the printing office in Shawnee. The fall of 1927 Dad started driving the school bus on the north route, so we lived at home.

Living wasn't easy on the homestead, trying to make a living on a dry farm. Dad was by far a better blacksmith than farmer, and like so many if it didn't rain during the growing season, there wasn't much of a crop. We always seemed to have a good garden, every bit of water available went to the garden, such as wash water, and water from bathing. Mom canned a lot for winter use, and we made 'do'.

At first we had quite a lot of trouble with range cattle, before fences were in they would be right up around the house and scare us half to death. Later they would break through the fences and ruin a crop.

I'm sure anyone who lived in West Twenty Mile area during the years my parents were there will remember Mom's raised doughnuts. It would be great to come home from school and she would have fresh doughnuts for us. No one could ever make them quite like Mom did, not even her daughters. I'm sure many will also remember how Dad made a cannon, and would load it up about 4 a.m. each Fourth of July to be sure all the neighbors were awake to get chores done so we could get going on a big picnic.

As time went on and we grew up, we left home to work out and helped, money wise, as we could. Eventually we all married except for Ervie. Dell married Lorena Johnson. Britt went to Alaska in 1935 and later married Mary Kvafinkoff. I married Gerald Herrick, Ray married Josephine Showalter, Willard married Esther Knetch (sp?), Dorothy married Raymond Reese. Jess went to Alaska in 1939 where he met and married Patricia Cooper, Agnes married Vernon May and Thelma married Fay Titus. From these marriages Mom and Dad acquired 27 grandchildren.

In 1941 after all the family was raised and on their own, Mom and Dad sold the homestead to Willard Hoffman, who had earlier bought the John Tipton property. They dismantled the homestead dwelling, which then consisted of three rooms, and used what they could to help build a home in Douglas at 1018 South Jefferson Street. Dorothy now lives there.

For some years Dad worked at the Museum in Douglas, which he really enjoyed. He would dress the part in fringed leather pants and beaded and fringed coat. Many of his donated items are still at the Museum.

Death first came to the family when Ervie drowned in the Payette River at Payette, Idaho in 1934. In 1951 Ray died from injuries he received by being hit by a train at Orin Junction crossing. Mom died in Douglas in 1952, Dell died in Albany, Oregon in 1955 and Dad died in Douglas in 1963.

This is written to the best of my ability, as I really didn't live at the homestead much after 1924, just summers and about one other year. I lived in Washington State in 1932 to 1934, then back to Douglas, then left for good in 1941, so there has been much that has happened that I know nothing about.

Cross, George H. and Lea Family

George Harry Cross was born in Montreal, Canada in 1854. He was of Scotch ancestry. He was the son of Alexander Selkirk Cross and Julia Fisher Lunn Cross. He was educated in private elementary schools, Montreal High School, the Upper Canada College and Nicolet College. He spent four months touring Europe, and upon his return, he enrolled at McGill University. He did not attend the college, however, for upon hearing of the adventures of friends who had come back to Canada from the Colorado Territory, Fred St. Denis and William Keeler Roy. He decided to leave Montreal for St. Louis where they would outfit themselves for a trip west.

The three traveled via the Western Pacific Railroad from St. Louis to Riverbend, Colorado Territory. This was the headquarters for many large cattle outfits. The young men found lodging for $15.00 per month on the Dowling ranch located on the Big Sandy River. The Dowlings, being fellow Canadians, welcomed their countrymen, who made themselves useful in any way they could. The newcomers were fascinated hearing of the experiences of a Canadian named Dick Seaner, who was a buffalo runner. The Kansas Pacific Railroad paid the runners $500 a month to slaughter the animals so that they could bring their trains in on time. They were often delayed for hours waiting for stampeding herds to pass. The United States Government supplied the runners with free ammunition, and paid a bounty on every tail brought in.

In the spring of 1875, George worked for a time on the Spring Cow Hunt, but left when the hunt reached Fort Bent.

George did not find any suitable vacant land along the Arkansas River, so he returned to the Dowling ranch. Together with his two companions, Fred and Willie, he bought a team and wagon and some camping equipment. The three returned to Fort Bent where they each bought a herd of cattle. The price paid for steers was $9.00 and $7.00 for cows. Any small calves belonging to the cows were thrown in at no charge. The cattle were from Texas, long-horned and multi-colored.

They drove the cattle to northern Colorado. Enroute, they camped on Cherry Creek which is today in the heart of Denver. Forty miles north of the present city of Ft. Collins, they established a camp on Lone Pine Creek. There they built a cabin and a corral. They were obliged to corral their animals each night to protect them from the mountain lions which preyed on the stock. Sometimes the lions would jump into the corral and somehow manage to lift an animal over the fence, dragging her away to consume her.

It soon became obvious that the range around the camp which the three young men had named "Little Canada" was overstocked. There were many other cattlemen in the area. Some of them decided to take their cattle to LaBonte Creek, Wyoming Territory, in search of better grass, since in the present location, their cattle were not fattening properly. George, in the company of several others, namely Alex Wilson, Clint Graham, Bill Daley, Joe and Andy Sullivan and Charley Campbell, were preparing to move their herds north into Wyoming and into Indian country. Fred and Willie wanted nothing to do with the Indians, and at the last minute, George, too, decided against going. The other cattlemen left with their cattle for LaBonte Creek.

In the summer of 1876, Fred St. Denis and George drove to the LaBonte ranch to visit. They were told of many narrow escapes which the cattlemen had had with the Indians, and learned that Andy Sullivan had been killed in one such encounter.

Fort Fetterman was the nearest supply station. The LaBonte cattlemen often went there, and sometimes they drove beeves which they sold to feed the soldiers stationed there.

George rode with the LaBonte Creek boys to visit squawman "Speed" Stagner on LaPrele Creek that summer. "Speed" warned them to be very careful since the Indians were hunting buffalo near Red Canyon. George was charmed with the view of Red Canyon and remarked that he would like to own a ranch there.

In the fall, George and Fred St. Denis returned to "Little Canada". By the spring of 1877, the Indians were conquered and sent to live on reservations. Once again, cattlemen in northern Colorado planned to herd their cattle into Wyoming. This time, George gathered up his herd and accompanied them. Upon reaching LaBonte Creek, George cut out his cattle, deciding to remain at LaBonte. Soon afterwards, all the others had left except Alex Wilson. He and George Cross carried on together.

In March of 1878, George and Alex drove towards Laramie Peak for a load of logs. A raging blizzard caught them. Wilson or Indian Creek was named after Alex. They almost perished in the five day storm. They were unable to find their horses, so they decided to walk home. It was an agonizing ordeal due to the fact that the drifts of snow were 20' deep along the creeks. Cattle were later found dead in the tops of trees where, blinded by the raging blizzard, they had drifted. Later, Alex Wilson, who suffered from rheumatism, sold out to Bill Guthrie. George moved to Wagonhound Creek and formed a partnership with Jack Douglas-Willan. A few years later, Willan and Cross sold the Wagonhound holdings.

In 1883, George applied for his citizenship papers. Then he filed on a homestead which he named Braehead after his ancestral home in Scotland. He hired Peter George to build a three room log house on his claim. George traveled to Chicago that fall with a shipment of beef and from Chicago continued on to Montreal to visit his family. In January of 1884, he was married to Lea Marie LeVasseur, his childhood sweetheart. Lea was the daughter of Benjamin LeVasseur and Matilda Roy-Voisine LeVasseur. She had been born and raised in Cacouna, Quebec, Canada, and had received her common school education there. At the time of her marriage, she was studying to be a teacher.

The newlyweds traveled to Cheyenne and on to Rock Creek by train, where they boarded a Concord stage-coach to cross the Laramie Plains. The stage broke down at the Seven Mile Station. The coach was beyond repair, so they continued their journey in an open buckboard. Blizzard conditions continued throughout the entire trip, which took one week. The passengers almost froze to death. There were stage stations located along the route about every ten miles. At one such station, they were marooned for three days and nights while the blizzard

Upon reaching Braehead, George and Lea found that the carpenter who was to have the cabin completed by the time of their arrival, had decided to trap during the winter months. The roof of the cabin was unfinished, and as a result, the house was full of snow. They stayed with Peter George, the carpenter, until the weather improved and then returned to Cheyenne and remained there until April when Peter George wrote them that the cabin had been finally completed.

It was a lonely life for Lea Cross. George was gone all day building fences, grubbing sagebrush, picking rocks, tending the cattle or riding into Fetterman for supplies and mail. Lea was always glad to see the three friendly squaws who had been discarded by their white husbands come riding in from Spring Canyon where they lived. They wanted sugar, flour and coffee from Lea, but they were "company". Every few months, "Little Frenchie" (Jean Cazaubon) who was a peddler, would arrive, his wagon filled with things the isolated families needed.

In 1884, Lea gave birth to their first child, a daughter whom they named Maggie. Mrs. Arrowsmith, a homeopathic doctor and Mrs. Charley Rice attended the birth. Mrs. Rice traded a milk cow named Bell to Lea for Lea's wedding dress. The cow was old and toothless, but nonetheless necessary now that the Crosses had a child.

By this time, the troops had left Fort Fetterman. There was no longer a doctor available, so the stockmen organized the Fetterman Hospital Association. It was funded by 77 men, businessmen, stockmen and cowboys. The purpose of the organization was to employ a doctor for the citizens of the area. Dr. Amos W. Barber, formerly the army doctor at the fort, accepted the position, and became known as the "Cowboy Doctor". He used one room of the soldiers' barracks as his hospital. It gave the community a feeling of security to know that medical aid was available to them once more.

George H. Cross petitioned for a school for the children of the community. He donated an acre of land, as well as building another room on his own house so that the teacher would have a place to live. Mary Cooper was the first teacher when the school opened in January of 1887. The Beaver Post Office was originated that year. It was established in the kitchen of Charley Rice's home, and Charley was the first postmaster.

In 1887, a second daughter, Julia Irene, was born to George and Lea. Dr. Arrowsmith and Mrs. Rice once more attended Lea, but the birth was complicated. Finally, Dr. Barber was called. He was able to save the lives of both Lea and her baby.

The new county of Converse was organized in 1888, with Douglas as the county seat. George Cross, Edward David and Frank Wolcott were elected as County Commissioners. There were only 13 post offices in the entire county. It was rated as a fourth class county, having a debt of $120,000. The commissioners worked zealously. They let a contract to Brenning and McFarland to build a jail to house public offenders. The jail cost $4000, but was of sturdy construction, having walls 14" thick. Serving the public as commissioner marked the beginning of George Cross' political career.

The Cross family went to Canada in 1889 for a visit and, of course, to show off their two little daughters.

Tragically, both girls contracted diphtheria and died while the family was visiting there. The parents returned to Wyoming and to an empty house. George occupied himself with improving his land, and contracted to build a larger house. The lumber for the new dwelling came from Marshall's sawmill. He was nominated for State Senator on the Democratic ticket in 1894. He was opposed by Joe Kennedy running on the Republican ticket. Since they were very good friends, they did most of their campaigning together. When the election was over, and George Cross had been successful, Joe Kennedy remarked that "Cross beat me because he'd tell every woman with a baby that her baby was the prettiest in Converse County even though the child was ugly as a mud fence!"

Among the bills Cross introduced in the Third Legislature was one to create and establish a State Board of Health. He was re-elected to the Fourth Legislature during which he asked for appropriation for bounties on wolves and coyotes which were killing so many cattle. He sponsored a bill to prohibit public money from becoming a source of profit to the officer who is the custodian thereof.

When Mr. Cross returned home, he organized several Wolfers Clubs in the county. These clubs pursued and killed predatory animals. Many of Douglas' businessmen were going into the sheep business at that time. A sheep war broke out between cattlemen and sheepmen who were encroaching on their grazing land. George Cross went into the sheep business with George Goodwin and O. P. Witt with the stipulation that they couldn't graze on upper LaPrele. Witt trailed the sheep all over the country. One blizzard after another reduced the flocks and Mr. Cross was glad to sell out to the Sims brothers, who had recently come to Wyoming from Texas.

George Cross was re-elected to the Fifth State Legislature. In 1910, he was nominated to run for Governor, but he refused to accept the nomination. He served for the last time as Senator in the Eleventh session of the Legislature.

The LaBonte Hotel was built by Edward Taft David, Otto Bolln and George Cross. He also was appointed President of the State Fair and of the Wyoming Pioneer Association. He was instrumental in the organization of the Converse County Bank. Perhaps his greatest contribution to the community as far as the rural residents were concerned, was the organization of Shafner's Ranch Telephone Company. It was no longer necessary to race a horse to Douglas to get a doctor when illness struck or an accident occurred.

George H. Cross is quoted as saying, "With the help of my good wife, we struggled through Siberian blizzards, winter winds, lightning storms, spring floods, dry summers and rustlers. Meanwhile our family increased. We had five beautiful daughters and four sons including our twins, Robert and Sandy, and we filled our big house."

Julia Mary Cross, daughter of George and Lea, was appointed as a Receiver of Public Monies for the United States Land Office. The only woman to receive that honor, she served in Converse, Natrona, Niobrara and Fremont Counties, and the Salt Creek Oil fields, for four years. She received more than 18,000 homestead filings totalling over 12 million dollars.

Elsie Cross married Robert Hawley. Both were active in politics. They had one son, Robert.

Alzire Cross was never married. She was a teacher in several local schools, and active in various local organizations.

Alexander Selkirk "Sandy" Cross became the manager of Braehead Ranch, raising fine Shorthorn cattle. He was the father of four daughters.

Robert, twin brother of Alexander, died of influenza while serving in the armed forces during World War I.

William Hutchison Cross became the owner and manager of the Tomahawk Ranch in 1922. He was elected to the 21st and 22nd Sessions of the Wyoming House of Representatives, and to the Senate for Sessions 23 to 26, inclusively. He retired from politics, but in 1972 was persuaded to run for the House of Representatives and was successful. He and his wife, Barbara, have three sons. The eldest, William Alexander "Rory" Cross has been elected five times to the House of Representatives. The second son, Robert is a prominent veterinarian in Converse County, and Richard, the third son, now owns the historic Boot Ranch.

George Harry Cross, Junior was a member of the Board of County Commissioners for Converse County. He served for nine years. Most of the time he acted as Chairman of the Board. He and his wife had four children, three boys and one girl.

Elizabeth Maisie Cross married Edwin J. Ball of California. The couple had one son, George Cross Ball, who is a celebrated painter.

Emma Cross Morton, known as Criss Cross, was active in community projects. Her husband is deceased. She makes her home in California.

Lea Cross died on August 10, 1940, George H. Sr. died November 28, 1946. George H. Jr. died November 3, 1970. Sandy died November 20, 1969.

Avis T. (Curtin) Smith, Thermopolis, Wyoming

Margaret M. (Curtin) Mills, New Paris, Ohio

Paul R. Curtin, Douglas, Wyoming

Francis W. Curtin, Thermopolis, Wyoming

William Curtin migrated to Spalding, Nebraska in his early days with his parents who originally came from Ireland. They were engaged in farming and livestock in and around Spalding during his youth and early manhood. William "Bill" was a pretty fair baseball player in his younger years and played some semi-pro baseball.

Caroline C. Keenan and William Curtin were united in marriage at a ceremony at Omaha, Nebraska in 1903. The Catholic ceremony was performed by Father McGovern, later to become Bishop of the Wyoming Catholic Diocese in Cheyenne. To this union were born eight children, five boys and three girls.

Hard times and drought in Nebraska made William and Caroline Curtin migrate to Wyoming, where land was being opened to homesteading. This was in 1916. The Curtins took up homesteading east of Douglas near the Pine Ridge Flat Top country. They remained in Wyoming until their deaths.

In 1924 William and Caroline Curtin disposed of their homestead and moved west of Douglas on the old Peyton place. The place was under the LaPrele irrigation project. There they engaged in farming and livestock until the mid 30's. During this time they made many friends and good neighbors in that area which lasted throughout a lifetime. Caroline Curtin was one of the early members of the LaPrele Homemakers, which she continued throughout her life. Bill Curtin started auctioneering in Nebraska and continued on in Douglas. He cried many sales in and around Douglas, and with his Irish wit, got many a laugh during the course of a sale. In the period from approximately 1925 to 1939 all eight of the Curtin girls and boys were graduates of Converse County High School.

In 1936 the Curtins moved to Douglas until World War II broke out. With four sons in the service, Caroline and Bill bought a small farming acreage between Glenrock and Parkerton, where they lived until approximately 1947. They moved to Douglas, where he opened a second hand store and operated it until his retirement.

William Curtin passed away in 1968 at the age of 88. He was survived by his wife, Caroline, who passed away in 1973 at the age of 95.

Cushman, "Lizzie" Family

Elizabeth "Lizzie" Newell Cushman was born in Bellefontaine, Ohio on April 13, 1845, the daughter of James II and Elizabeth Newell.

Lizzie was married to Henry Cushman during the Civil War. Henry was a surgeon and served in the Union Army stationed at Louisville, Kentucky. He was born in Vermont before moving west with his brothers to Wisconsin and then to Iowa where he met and married Lizzie in Louisa County. Their children were Edward E. (born on November 26, 1865) and Francis "Frank".

In June 1885 Ed and Frank, along with two of their uncles, John and Robert Newell, came west to Wyoming to join the other Newells that were already there. They came by covered wagon from Louisa County to Atkinson, Nebraska and then southwest to North Platte, Nebraska and then followed the Union Pacific Railroad to Cheyenne.

Edward, in his reminiscences, tells about one of the first sights he saw when they reached the Union Pacific, "the Union Pacific train engines were carrying streamers of crepe in observance of the death, within a few days, of General Grant."

After working at a few jobs around Cheyenne they moved westward to Rock Creek and then north over the Fetterman Stagecoach Line road to Toltec where they branched off and went to Bear Creek and Horseshoe Park.

Lizzie came later in the year by train. She also came by Rock Creek. She and Henry were divorced by this time. She "squatted" on a parcel of land near Springhill, receiving her patent in 1891.

She was the first Postmistress of Springhill when it was established on July 21, 1887, having been instrumental in getting the post office established.

Lizzie also was a teacher, teaching one of the first schools in the Esterbrook area in her home at Springhill. She also taught at Fetterman City (Fort Fetterman) and was one of the first teachers in the new town of Douglas.

Ed went to work at the old Fort Laramie Sawmill on Mill Creek which was abandoned shortly after his arrival in Wyoming. Charles Webble was operating the mill at this time. Ed helped freight the lumber to Fetterman, Douglas and Fort Laramie.

At the end of one of his trips to Fetterman with lumber, Ed was hired to take down a log building at the "Hog Ranch" across the river from Fetterman and move it to Douglas. He recalls, "It was one of the roughest jobs of hauling I ever did. I came down the river on the north side and it appeared to me that the greater part of the way was entirely without a road and that most of my wheels were 'rough locked' half of the time. It was the first wooden building erected in Douglas."

Ed's next job was working in the hospital at Fetterman. He remarks, "I was then dignified by the title of 'hospital steward.' Doctor Barber was sometimes called away in emergency cases as far as a hundred miles, upon which occasion I would tend the dressings of the wounded. Patients in the hospital were, in the main, men who had suffered gun-shot wounds or been badly hurt in falls with horses. Some of them were typhoid patients. Mountain folk called it 'mountain fever', the home remedy for which was sage tea."

Following his stint as "hospital steward", Ed taught school on the Platte River a few miles above Guernsey. The site of this school now lays beneath the waters of Guernsey Lake. Ed tells about getting his certificate to teach in the following narrative, "Dr. Wyman, the State School Superintendent, living at Cheyenne, sent out the examination questions to one of the school directors who gave them to me in the living room of his ranch which had a well supplied library. He left me there to write out my answers to the questions submitted while he went about his ranch work. For years I considered it as proof of his confidence in me, but later years have led me to believe that it might have been that he thought there was great need for a teacher and feared that I might not pass the examination."

Later Ed taught school at "The Shawnee." It was at a settlement of coal miners from Boone, Iowa. The camp and the school were broken up by an explosion of the boiler at the top of the shaft, killing the engineer.

Ed was later admitted to the bar and practiced law in Washington state and was appointed as U. S. Judge of the western district of Washington.

Frank also moved to Washington and was elected to the Congress of the United States as its Congressman. He was also a lawyer.

Lizzie followed her sons to Tacoma, Washington where she died on June 11, 1919.

Daniels, "Abe" and Hiram

The first Daniels to come to Wyoming was Arthur Bruce Daniels, second child of Mason Smith and Theodocia Melvina (Ross) Daniels. He was born in Concord, Wisconsin, March 1, 1855. In 1882 he made his second trip from Gunnison, Colorado to Rawlins, and in 1884 he went from Rawlins to Rock Creek. All of this time he was engaged in freighting. He freighted from Rock Creek to Buffalo and the adjoining fort until the completion of the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad to Douglas in 1886, freighting from Douglas to Buffalo until the Burlington Railroad built through the northeastern part of the state. Then he quit freighting.

A newspaper account contained this statement, "His brick business block on North Second Street was one of the town's first improvements." "Abe" as he was familiarly known, built the first two-story building in town with the exception of the bank buildings. The upper story for a long time was used for lodge purposes. It is a guess that this building was the original Saddle Rock Saloon which was owned by Abe. In Guy Squires' account of the building he said it was built of brick made at a brick yard located along the Platte River just south of the fairgrounds. The roof was flat while McDermott's saloon just south had a pitched roof. Every time it rained the water poured onto the Daniels' building from McDermott's, eventually crumbling the bricks which caused the second story to topple over onto the McDermott building. After buying both buildings, Squires reconstructed, according to his account, "Daniels' historic Saddle Rock as well as other buildings."

Many stories have been recalled of Abe's kindness to the unfortunate. He befriended scores of "men on the plains." Shepherders coming into Douglas in the fall with a check covering their entire earnings from herding sheep all spring and summer would go to the Saddle Rock for a relaxing day or so. Abe acted as their banker, cashing their checks, giving them some money for their immediate needs, and when they were ready to return to their sheepherding duties, he would give them the balance of their pay. Had he not done this, they would have been "rolled" and had no money for their winter expenses.

He was a member of the Masons, Eastern Star, Odd Fellows, and Eagles. For many years he served the Masonic Lodge as Chaplain. An early day resident recalled that since Abe was Chaplain, he headed the Masons who followed the deceased in the funeral procession as they marched up the hill to the cemetery. Abe, who was a very portly gentleman, carried the Bible on a wooden structure which rested comfortably on his belly.

In his obituary it was recounted that Abe "owned one of the best ranches on the LaPrele and is a stockholder in the Table Mountain Sheep Company." Abe served on the city council for several terms and also was influential in establishing the library which was dedicated in 1910.

Abe married Esther Downey, December 6, 1890. They adopted two of Abe's sister's children, renaming them Arthur Bruce Jr. and Esther. Because of a haunting fear over his failing health, Abe took his own life on March 25, 1912. His mother died the following January 12, 1913 and his wife died November 8, 1931.

In the early 1890s Abe's youngest brother, Hiram Ross Daniels, and their mother (Abe and "Hi" were two of eight children of Mason and Theodocia Daniels) came to Douglas from Verona, Nebraska, after the death of their father. He was born in Oconomowoc, Wisconsin, August 25, 1871. In 1896 John J. Steffen induced Hiram to take charge of the jewelry department in the Steffen Drug Store in Douglas. This was the beginning of a business career in jewelry, music and gift goods that had been continuous for 44 years at the time of his death, February 1, 1940. As founder and operator of the Daniels Jewelry and Gift Shop he had the distinction of serving longer than any other Douglas businessman in the same business. After his death Lyle Olsen operated the business until it was sold to Christina Thompson and Georgia (Mrs. Ted) Daniels. They, in turn, sold it to Mary Gwynn and Louise Queen in March 1945. In March 1985 the jewelry business and building were sold to Bob and Janice Schwartzkopf.

Mr. Daniels had owned jewelry stores not only in Douglas, but also in Glenrock, Lusk and Wheatland. He was interested in photography, taking and developing his own pictures. Many of his pictures were made into postcards, especially one he took of Natural Bridge. This photo was also sent to Germany where a firm used it on mugs, plates, pin trays, and other items which he sold in his store. One of his favorite advertising slogans was, "A square deal for your round dollar."

Hiram Daniels married Florence May Curtis, December 8, 1900. She had taught school in South Dakota, but in Douglas she had operated a dressmaking and hat shop until her marriage. To this union were born three sons: Leslie, Theodore and Hiram, Jr. Mr. Daniels bought a "ranch" bordering on the southern edge of Douglas and across the Platte from it. The boys always joked that their dad bought this land to keep them busy after school and out of the pool hall. Although all three sons have died, that part of the ranch east of the river remains in the Daniels family.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Daniels were very active in the Congregational Church, serving in many capacities. Both had taught Sunday school classes for many years. Ted had said that while his father was busy helping organize the first church in Douglas, his Uncle Abe was establishing the first saloon. Like Abe, Hi was active in civic affairs, serving many years on the school board, as justice of the peace, and as the official weatherman. Being weatherman sounded tame enough but in one account in the "Douglas Budget" he was threatened that if he didn't produce the kind of weather all wanted and not the continual snow they were having they would replace him. He was an early captain of the old Company F, Wyoming National Guard.

Hi was an expert on rocks and minerals having spent many enjoyable hours exploring much of Wyoming gathering specimens and Indian artifacts. It had been his intention to polish and catalog these specimens upon his retirement.

Leslie, the eldest son of Hiram and Florence Daniels, was born in Douglas, October 13, 1901, and spent the major part of his life in Colorado and Wyoming. In 1917 Leslie enrolled in a gardening project in the first 4-H Club in Converse County. This experience influenced his interest in botany, zoology, and entomology. Entomology was the field in which he served for 45 years.

When Leslie was ready for college in 1920, Mrs. Daniels moved with her three sons to Boulder, Colorado. He earned his B.S. and M.S. degrees from the Colorado Agriculture College, now known as the Colorado State University, in Fort Collins. The University of Minnesota granted him his Ph.D. degree in 1956.

In 1924 Les married Anne Whipp of River Falls, Wisconsin. She had come to Douglas to teach in 1919. They lived in Fort Collins for 43 years, moving back to the "ranch" when he retired in 1967. "He was living proof," Anne always said, "that you can come back home and be happy." Leslie and Anne had two daughters, Rosemary Smith (Mrs. Everett) who lives on the Daniels' ranch and Donna Lowe (Mrs. James) who lives in Marin County, California.

When Leslie moved to Fort Collins to continue his schooling he was an instructor in entomology. Upon graduation he accepted a position with the university as an instructor, eventually becoming head of the Entomology Department of C.S.U. He also was the chief entomologist of the experiment station at C.S.U. He was instrumental in developing the Agriculture Handbook which was used throughout Colorado.

On two different sabbatical leaves, Leslie and Ann visited agriculture experiment stations throughout the United States.

Leslie dedicated his life and interest to research and teaching, specializing in the relationship between insects and plant disease, especially as it pertained to potato production. His influence in this field was a big factor in the knowledge now known regarding the subject of plant disease as well as on the economic impact on farmers in the state of Colorado.

One farmer who specialized in the production of potatoes told Leslie that if he, Les, had found the solution to the plant disease which attacked the potato plant and if he, the farmer, made $21,000 on potatoes that year using Leslie's recommendations, he would buy Leslie a suit. The farmer succeeded and he bought a suit for Leslie.

When Anne and Leslie returned to the ranch they followed his agricultural interest, raising large vegetable gardens and beautiful flowers. During this time, Les served a term as president of the Wyoming Pioneer Association. He also served as police judge and was bailiff of the Converse County District Court for a time.

After declining health, Leslie died May 3, 1984. Because he gave credit to his 4-H Club experience for awakening his interest in the field of botany and entomology, it is particularly fitting that his wife, Anne, has established a scholarship with the Converse County 4-H Foundation in his memory.

The second son of Hiram and Florence Daniels was Theodore, better known as Ted or T.C., who was born February 21, 1903. He lived in Douglas most of his life having gone to Boulder, Colorado his senior year in high school and then on to the University of Colorado, earning his law degree, L.L.B. in 1926. He passed the bar in both Wyoming and Colorado that same year and then returned to Douglas to open an office in the Unity Temple Building to practice general law for 30 years.

While practicing law in Douglas he served as county attorney of Converse County for ten years. At one time he and John Dawson, a prominent Douglas attorney, were partners until John moved to Illinois to go back to his other love, being a pharmacist. After World War II, Joe Sullivan officed with Ted until Ted went on the bench.

Ted was elected to the House of Representatives in 1946, serving as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, as majority floor leader, and finally as Speaker of the House of the 33rd Legislature in 1955. During his term as Speaker, the Legislature approved funds for the Wyoming Pioneer Museum, and in 1956, Governor Simpson and Ted, who was chairman of the Wyoming Pioneer Museum dedication committee, laid the corner stone of the fine new building which was dedicated on Pioneer Day at the Wyoming State Fair.

Ted was appointed judge of the Seventh Judicial District by Governor Milward Simpson and began serving March 1, 1957. He served a little over 18 years. On April 24, 1975, while he was conferring with counsel in his chamber, he suffered a fatal heart attack. It had been his intention to retire the following July. Funeral services were held in Casper with burial in the family plot in the Douglas cemetery.

During his years on the bench he presided over many noteworthy trials. Shortly after taking office he ruled that trading stamps were illegal. This was not a popular decision but the Wyoming Supreme Court upheld him. Another even more unpopular decision was the ruling that a welfare mother was entitled to medicaid funds to go to New York for an abortion. Again the Wyoming Supreme Court upheld his decision.

The Miranda decision which said the accused must be read his rights before he can be questioned forced Ted to dismiss a case where a young man accused of murder had confessed and even shown authorities where he had disposed of the body. But even though the Miranda decision was handed down after the accused had confessed, according to the United States Supreme Court, the evidence could not be used because his rights had not been read to him and Ted had no recourse except to dismiss the case.

But it wasn't always great stress, unpopular decisions, and heartache in the courtroom. Sometimes there were humorous situations. In one instance an attorney, Clarence Cypreansen, was arguing a divorce case before Ted when, according to the newspaper account, "the solemnity of the court was disrupted by Judge Daniels exclaiming, 'Zip! You're on fire!' Smoke was billowing out of his pocket. Court recessed for about ten minutes while the flames, caused by loose matches in his pocket, were extinguished."

On another occasion Ted was presiding over a case involving a difference between two ranchers. One of the attorneys was having difficulty getting the witness to answer his question. So Ted turned to him and said, "Mr., just what caused this situation?" The witness, an older man who had known Ted all of his life, turned toward him, putting his arm up on the bench and said, "Well, it was like this, Teddy." With difficulty the dignitaries suppressed their smiles and proceeded with the trial.

Ted was a lifelong member of the First Congregational Church in Douglas and an associate member of the church in Casper. He had served on all the boards in the Douglas church and had been a member of the choir in both churches. He had been superintendent of the Sunday school and had taught the high school boys class in Douglas for more than 30 years. Each spring the last session of the class was a weekend camping trip to Laramie Peak. Many of the boys through the years climbed the peak on this outing.

He loved music in all forms and was instrumental in organizing the Oil City Slickers Barbershop Chorus in Casper, serving as its first president.

In 1937 he was married to Georgia Nordgren, who had taught school in Douglas and Seattle, Washington. They had two children, Pat Burton (Mrs. Scott) and John Theodore. Pat, who lives in Lakewood, Colorado has two children, Daniel Begakis and Elisha Burton. She is a supervisory paralegal and is Chief of the Debt Collection Unit in the U.S. Attorney's Office in Denver. John, who is married to Sandra Kay Munsinger, lives in Casper and is in the construction business.

The third son of Hiram and Florence Daniels, Hiram Ross, Jr., after a long lingering illness, died at the age of 14, in 1927.

Daniels, John and Mary Family

John Daniels and Mary Elizabeth Stingley were married August 1, 1861 in Nodaway County, Missouri. To this union were born six children; Olive Livona, Sara A., William L., Nelson Milo, Joseph Milton and Lydia Parthena.

Their son, Joseph Milton, married Grace Garnett Young in the Maryville, Missouri, area of Nodaway County in the early 1900s. Their children were Chester, Guy (who died at 5 months of age), Roy and Dennie. Grace Daniels died of cancer on May 28, 1908. Ella Rachel Walden was Grace's good friend and nurse during her illness and later became Joseph Milton Daniel's second wife. She had a daughter, Lela Petitt, by a former marriage.

Joseph, Ella and family moved to Smith Center, Kansas, and Marie Elizabeth was born in 1910. Later the

John and Mary Daniels

Joseph Milton Daniels and mules he raised family moved to a farm near Wewela, South Dakota, where Wayne Milton was born in 1916 with an Indian midwife named Raymos attending.

In 1920, the Joseph Daniels family packed their belongings into two "covered" wagons and with a herd of horses traveled past cabins with sod roofs where sunflowers and cactus were blooming, to the Cow Creek Buttes area of Wyoming in Converse County. They moved to Douglas, Wyoming, the first winter so that Marie could attend school.

Lela Petitt homesteaded first in 1920 at the base of the Pinnacle Rocks, Cow Creek Buttes, in Converse County, proving up on the place in 1925. Lela later sold her homestead in 1952 to Rollie and Gladys Sadler. In the summer of 1920, Joe Daniels built a cabin on Lela's homestead and later bought the Lowry relinquishment homestead on Middle Creek. Floyd and Eva Rounds and three sons and Curtis L. and Elizabeth Emmons and one son (Joe's nieces) homesteaded in the same area, so a school was established for the three families. Eva Rounds taught at this school the first year, then Bess Russ came to Wyoming, at the age of 17, to teach there and later to marry Paul Miller and become a part of the community.

In 1921 John and Mary Daniels moved west to the Cow Creek Buttes area of Converse County and homesteaded near the Emmons and Rounds families.

Dennie and Roy Daniels stayed in South Dakota and visited Wyoming periodically; later they married and moved to other areas. Chester married, had a family and then mysteriously disappeared while seeking work around the South Dakota area. Joe Daniels hired a detective, but no trace was ever found of Chester.

Marie recalls early memories of living in Wyoming; of her father's raising mules to sell to the army and a favorite story about the first and only gray wolf seen by her mother and herself near the Buttes. Marie also raised a baby porcupine on a "sugar tit" made of bread, sugar and milk mixture and tied up in a rag. Wayne recalls the finding of a "still" on Middle Creek after the snowbanks melted and the copper pipes became visible.

Wayne recalls several rather amusing stories about his father Joe's uncanny knack for accidents, usually involving the team of horses. One time Paul "Blinky" Miller and Joe Daniels were returning home from Dull Center, Wyoming. They were travelling in an old Model T

Ford, coming through the gap in the Cow Creek Buttes, with Paul at the wheel. The trail through the buttes was passable for a wagon but almost impossible to travel by car. Part way down the steep incline, Paul lost control of the Model T, pulled back on the steering wheel and yelled "Whoa, whoa". The wheel came off and they continued to the bottom with Paul yelling all the way, "Whoa, whoa". Joe said "?!X*?!", why didn't you put on the brake?"

Joe Daniels was hauling blue shale rock for the homestead house roof, carrying the load with his team and wagon. While Joe was unloading the rock one horse caught his bridle, broke it, bolted ahead, upset the wagon box, rocks, Joe and all. Seen in the distance was Joe Daniels walking up the road, black as night and covered with shale dust. The horses were long gone with the front wheels of the wagon still hooked to the team.

Another incident happened with the team, wagon and a load of hay. Wayne went to unhook the horses' bridle, which was caught on the tongue. The horse, "Lightning", was startled, jumped, and broke the bridle straps and lunged forward breaking loose from the tongue. The horses ran down a steep hill with Joe yelling, "Whoa, ?!X*?! , you whoa". When the wagon reached the bottom of the hill the hay rack caught on the gate post breaking the double trees and freeing the team.

After John Daniels passed away in 1924, Mary Daniels filed on a new homestead, in her name, on lower Middle Creek, just a mile below the present day Converse-Niobrara County line. She was in her 80's. The homestead was approximately 5 miles below Joe Daniel's homestead. Wayne recalls a flood on Middle Creek that frightened his mother as water was flowing 6 inches deep through her home during the night.

In 1929, Marie Daniels married James Oscar Middleton and moved to his homestead (see Middleton story). In 1933 Wayne Daniels filed on his homestead two miles northwest of the Joe Daniels Middle Creek homestead and proved up on it by 1936. In later years, Oscar and Marie purchased Wayne's homestead and the Joe Daniels place and cattle.

Wayne Daniels married Laura Mae (Freeda) Keehmer and raised a family of four sons and one daughter. Freeda and Wayne now reside at Ten Sleep, Wyoming.

Duane Daniels lives in Alaska. Billy Max and his wife, Barbra, live and ranch on Owl Creek near Thermopolis, Wyoming. Third son, Milton and his wife, Donna, operate a dairy farm at Riverton, Wyoming. Royce and his wife, Nancy Kay, lives in Douglas, Wyoming; and Alice Fay Daniels AuFrance and her husband, Donald, ranch west of Douglas, Wyoming.

Oscar and Marie? They are still living and ranching on Middle Creek.

Daniels, John B. and Sarah Family

John Daniels was born in Victoria, Illinois on June 26, 1868. He married Sarah Wagher on April 28, 1888. Their children were Maude, Grace, Goldie, Hazel and Ethel.

John was a professional brick layer having laid bricks for brick oil tanks at refineries in Illinois.

Their daughter, Grace, was born on August 27, 1890 at Killerton, Iowa.

Two of Grace's schoolmates were Burr and Roy Sheldon who later came to Wyoming.

In 1917, John came to Wyoming with his son-in-law, Ralph Olds Sr. and Ralph's father, C. W. Olds. John homesteaded on Sage Creek near the Olds. Later in the year his wife, Sarah, joined him.

In 1920 the Daniels moved back to Iowa, later moving to Rapid City, South Dakota.

John later built a house for his daughter, Grace and her husband Ralph, on the North Platte River ranch.

John died on December 31, 1949 at Rapid City and Sarah on January 27, 1950 at San Marcos, California.

David, Edward and Mary

Edward Taft David was born on July 3, 1858, the son of Glenn and Sarah Taft David. His mother was a cousin of President Taft. His father's family was a wealthy family from Lyon, New York.

In 1883 Edward and his brother, John, came to Cheyenne, Wyoming where their uncle, Edward C. David, was located. Edward C. was the first surveyor general of the Territory of Wyoming. Edward C.'s daughter, Louise "Lulu" was married to Joseph Carey who was later a U.S. Senator and Governor of Wyoming.

Joseph Carey financed the David brothers in a cattle ranch venture near Meeteetse, Wyoming. After the bad winter of 1886 they went broke and turned the ranch back to Carey.

The Union Pacific Railroad hired Edward T. in 1887 to appraise the value of their lands that laid along the railroad through Wyoming.

By 1888 Joseph Carey and his brother, David, had decided to go into the cattle business on the North Platte River. Edward T. was hired to acquire the lands. David lived at Fort Fetterman while he was taking care of the transactions.

Edward T. married Mary Beebe on December 19, 1888 at Mystic, Connecticut. Mary was born in 1864 in Brooklyn, N.Y., the daughter of a New York tea taster. They came west immediately after their marriage. Arriving in Wyoming, they discovered all their trunks with their wedding presents, silverware, dishes and clothes were lost. They never were found.

The newlyweds moved to Glenrock for their first year of marriage. Mary found living in the west was very different than living in the east. Glenrock was at that time a new town with miners and wild cowboys.

The Davids then moved to the small settlement of Inez, Wyoming where they lived in a small log building.

Mr. David became superintendent of all the Carey interests in central Wyoming. It included the S.O. Ranch on Boxelder Creek, which was purchased from John Hunton, the CY Ranch at Casper and C Lazy Y Ranch on Muddy Creek. It was said that you were on Carey property from the time you left Boxelder Creek until the time you reached Casper. Bob Devine was its long time manager.

In 1896 Mary convinced Joseph Carey that they needed a nice house to live in at the S.O. Ranch. Cut stone was hauled from the quarry south of Glenrock to build the splendid house that still stands today on the Bixby Ranch.

Edward T. was instrumental in getting Converse County organized and was elected as one of the first County Commissioners in 1888. He also served in the 11th Legislative Territorial Assembly in 1890 and was a trustee of the University of Wyoming from 1891 to 1893.

On January 21, 1897 the Davids adopted a three year old boy, Robert, born in Chicago, Illinois on April 10, 1894.

In 1899 Mr. David moved his family to Wheatland where he, along with a partner, F. E. Davis, started the Wheatland Merchantile Company.

After a fire destroyed the company building in 1907, he moved his family back to Douglas where he purchased Frank Knittle's Florence Lumber Company on North Second Street. Among other things the lumber company built sheep wagons for $350.

The Davids built in 1907 and 1908 a house on the top of a hill on East Center Street. After the hill was leveled off 38 loads of rich dirt were hauled in to enrich the old soil. The house is owned today by the Williams family. The road going up the hill to the house was known as the David Hill. Many of the old timers have many happy memories of sliding down the hill on their sleds. One memory that isn't very happy is when a death occurred when a youngster was killed when his sled hit a utility pole at the foot of the hill.

Bob David, in his memoirs, tells of the style of living that he and his family had when they were living in the house. "I was engaged in a job making brick at the brick yard of H. M. Peters at the east end of Center Street and as a result of my labors, would get rather dirty. When I came home in the evening I would go in the back door, undress to my skin, then I would walk into the kitchen naked, past the Japanese cook, Kwini Kinitawa, and up the servants stairway, take a bath and be seated at the dinner table in a tuxedo 15 minutes after entering the house."

Bob David also writes of the splendid horse, "Bucephalus", a single footer, that his father kept in Tates Livery Stable located on the corner of Second and Walnut Streets.

Mary David was appointed to the University of Wyoming Board of Trustees in 1913 and served until 1919. She was president of the Board in 1918-1919.

When the Valley House Hotel was moved in 1914 to make way for the Burlington Railroad to come through Douglas, Ed David was instrumental in getting the LaBonte Hotel built by Ed Revill. H. O. "Bert" and Lillian Emery from Thermopolis were engaged to run the hotel.

Mr. David retired in 1919. He and his wife retired to Denver where he died on April 6, 1949; Mary on November 24, 1950.

Bob David married Edna Smith, daughter of Edward "Mountain Home" and Henrietta Mohr Smith, on August 16, 1919 after a long courtship. The Smiths were people who were associated with the raising of sheep and as such were scorned by the David family. In fact the marriage was a secret one and attended only by the couple's best man, Henry Bolln, and maid of honor, Vera Saul Trumper. Henry, whom Bob hardly knew, was asked to do the honors only minutes before on the street. When the marriage ceremony was over the couple was whisked off to the train where they departed to Edna's parents' home near Glenrock, where they spent their honeymoon.

Bob and Edna had two daughters. He was a prolific writer, keeping diaries and notes on anything and everything. One of his books, "Malcolm Campbell, Sheriff" is a story about the life of the early time law man.

Edna died on May 17, 1959; Bob in September 1968.

Davies, William and Nora

William and Nora Davies obtained their homestead land, about eight miles from Lost Springs, in 1913. Her parents, Thomas and Tillie Haley, were already in the area; as was her brother, John Swickhamer. At this time Will was working as a printing pressman in Chicago, and had recently been advised by his doctor to change occupations.

Nora and young son, Buster, arrived in Lost Springs by train on February 6, 1914. During the trip Buster became ill and it was found that he had contracted diphtheria. Serum was located in Chadron, Nebraska. A relay of riders carried the medicine in an attempt to save the child, but it arrived too late, and he died just nine days after their arrival.

Leaving Nora, Will went East to again work in the print shop, sending his earnings for the purchase of seed, stock and equipment. He returned to plant in the spring and again to harvest in the fall.

The original house was a small wooden structure. Until a well could be dug, Nora carried water from the section house or from the creek. Getting groceries and the mail meant an eight mile walk. At times she would walk into town, remain overnight, and walk home the next day. The oldest children were born in this home; Marian, Willard (Bud) and Mildred (Sis).

Will left the city, and returned to his family as quickly as possible. He had always lived in a large city, so homesteading was a drastic change for him.

During the summer months, Sunday picnics drew a big attendance. Home dances were called "kitchen sweats". During the winter months these parties were especially welcomed. Children were bundled into buggies, and bedded down wherever room could be found upon arrival at the host home. Babies were placed on beds, in drawers, and even under tables. The older children danced or played as long as they were able to, then found themselves a place to sleep. During bad weather folks often stayed all night, and returned to their homes at daylight when traveling was easier.

In 1922 Will and Nora sold their livestock and machinery. The house was purchased by Bill Lane and skidded to his homestead on Shawnee Creek. The Davies then opened a grocery store in Shawnee. The building was shared with Ed Sinn's hardware store. Here, in living quarters over the store, the youngest Davies child, Owen, was born in June of 1923.

About a year later this store was sold, and the store at Lost Springs purchased. Lost Springs was a thriving community and the Saturday night dances at the Community Hall drew big crowds. Will fired up the pot-bellied heater early in the day to insure the building would be warm by evening. Lunch was served during the midnight intermission; coffee brewed in a wash-boiler.

In 1928 the Davies leased the Cram homestead and again acquired stock and farm machinery. In 1930 a little one-room log schoolhouse, no longer in use, was moved onto their home place; the stock transferred, and crops planted. Marian attended school in Douglas and taught school after finishing her studies. Bud and Sis attended school, and graduated, from Shawnee. Owen alternated between the schools at Shawnee and Lost Springs. Although Will and Nora spent what time they could out at the homestead, most of the responsibility fell to Bud, while they ran the store and post office at Lost Springs. Bud well remembers the cold winter mornings.

All stock and farm machinery was sold in the fall of 1935, and the grocery store soon after. Will and Nora then moved to Lyman, Nebraska where they again operated a grocery store.

Friendships formed in these early years were friendships that lasted throughout their lifetimes. Nora died in 1959; Will in 1979. Both are buried in Douglas. Wyoming.

Davis, William H. and Amelia

William Davis was born in Belfast, Ireland. Amelia Protzman was born in Indianapolis, Indiana in 1849 and was married to William Davis at Fort Fetterman, Wyoming on June 21, 1883. William came from Ireland with his brother soon after the Civil War. He settled in Wyoming in 1870 and kept books for the United States Army at Fort Fetterman. He put up hay on the native meadows for the government. In 1886 he took squatters rights on Deer Creek in Converse County. Amelia Protzman and her sister came to Wyoming from Missouri and purchased the hotel at Fetterman in the late 1870's.

A son, Eric Davis was born February 17, 1888 on Deer Creek in Converse County, Wyoming. He married the former Susie Uriens, daughter of Fred and Rosie Brumbaugh Uriens, January 15, 1916 in Casper, Wyoming. She was born in Lander, Wyoming.

Eric and Susie became the parents of three children; Gertrude P., Viola R., and Robert.

Eric Davis was a rancher all his life. He homesteaded on Deer Creek in Converse County, one quarter of a mile from where he was born. Mrs. Davis served as cook on the VR Ranch, which was the old stage station and post office on the route between Fort Fetterman and Fort Caspar. Here, Major Wolcott started his first cow outfit.

William Davis died October 14, 1917. Amelia died March 13, 1932.

Dawes, Maud

Maud Dawes was born in Linneville, Iowa, November 17, 1866. She was the oldest daughter of Sarah (Hammond) and Edward Dawes. Miss Dawes came to Wyoming in 1894 from Nebraska, where she had been teaching for twelve years. She graduated from high school in Linneville, Iowa, at the age of 16, and taught there until she went to Nebraska.

In 1894 when she came to Wyoming she taught in the rural schools until 1909, when she took the office of County Superintendent of Schools. During the time she was County Superintendent of Schools, the counties of Niobrara and Converse were one county. She visited each school at least once a year, which was quite an undertaking, as at times there were as many as 70 schools in this combined county. She traveled many ways during her terms, first by buggy and horse, with snowshoes and during the later years, by car, although she never learned to drive. Many of the men in the county and even a future county superintendent drove for her; a Whippet, a nine-passenger touring car and a Stanley Steamer. If she decided to visit a school, no matter how deep the mud or snow, she would always say, "Well, we will go as far as we can," and would chuckle, "then we can walk." And they did.

Her life was full of love and interest for all children and she gave very generously of her time, finances and understanding for them. Her diary is full of interesting days in the schoolroom with the teacher and pupils. The day always started early for her, and by early she meant five in the morning. She used to say, "If you aren't up when the sun begins to rise in the east, you have not started your day right. You must see the sun come up to appreciate God." Her life was full of beauty, dedicated to her work, the supreme desire to help her fellow man, and to see progress in the rural schools.

During the nineteen years she supervised the county schools, she at sometimes had as many as 25 districts to visit. Some of these were mountain schools and their school was held during the months of April to November, sometimes school was held for only six months, and sometimes for only three or four months, depending on the weather. Her salary wasn't much to begin with, but for the time it was considered good wages. She was paid $60 every three months when she began and her "livery" was paid by the county. Teachers at this time were getting $25 a month, and out of this paid room and board.

Miss Dawes had a homestead in the mountains and when she wasn't busy with school work (they only worked during the school year) she spent her time there. She at one time had a traveler's hotel where the Cold Springs Ranger Station is now. This was about 1914-15-16, and many people came to visit there. She had a large collection of antiques, relics of all kinds, and books. All this was destroyed by fire. She moved after this, farther down the mountain on LaPrele Creek and with the help of her family, built another home. This was a log cabin with four rooms, surrounded by the mountains she loved.

This is a page from her diary, dated March 15, 1910: "I visited the Leman School Tuesday, went on to visit the Mary Cross School. Mr. Brenning came by and I went with him to the McReynolds' and there I stayed all night. We started early Wednesday and got along very nicely until we left the Oriole (an old mine) and then snow. Never in my life have I had such an experience. I waded snow for nearly a mile that was waist deep, sometimes I crawled on my hands and knees where I couldn't wade. It was awful, but God within me gave me strength. Today I'm hardly tired, only stiff and sore. My birds and squirrels were glad to see me and they were happy to receive their rations again".

Her diary is full of just such experiences, just as her life was full and overflowing. She always had time for teachers' and pupils' problems, patrons difficulties, and yet time for her many activities.

She was very active throughout the state in school enterprises, especially the audio-visual program. She made many trips to Cheyenne and other places to help start this program of teaching with visual-aids. Another activity was the publishing of "The Spectrum", a book of poems about nature, spiritual topics and joy of living.

Maud Dawes died Nov. 13, 1939, after a long illness, which caused the amputation of a limb. She was buried from the Congregational Church, in the evening as the sun was setting.

The balance of this story are incidents from the memory of Edith Leman Browning, whose middle name, Maud, was given her because their birthdays were on the same day and month. Miss Dawes was also her God-mother.

The Leman and Ashby families were close friends of Maud Dawes, who when traveling around the country and especially in trips from Douglas to Cold Springs, stopped around half-way in the Upper LaPrele country to rest and feed her horse and many times to spend the night at one or the other's home. At the Leman house this usually meant playing cards until the small hours of the morning.

Maud Dawes at Oriole Mine.

The Leman School mentioned in Maude Ryan's resume was the Beaver School and the Mary Cross School was likely the Sullivan School, some six miles to the south.

Maude Ryan writes of a "Traveler's Hotel" operated by Maude Dawes in the years 1914-16. She had more of a resort or camp operation and it must have started in about 1908. The patent to her first homestead in the area where the LaPrele Ranger Station is now located at Cold Springs, was dated June 23, 1914, recorded December 21, 1914, covering lands in T29N R75W. In taking up a homestead, one had to first make entry on the land, have the entry approved, and then spend some five years or so in improving the land, building a house, and doing other things to comply with homestead laws. After that a date was set for a hearing before a homestead commissioner and if the proof was OK, a final certificate was issued and then later the patent was issued. This process could easily take six or seven years and during that time one lived on the land and had possession of it.

At first her resort consisted of a fairly small house, with various sized tents set up around and through the pines at the back of the house. There was no running water and it had to be carried from the Cold Springs along LaPrele Creek. The first time I remember our family being there, we slept in a fairly large tent with a wooden floor, which was raised off the ground so rain water would not get in. We were all in the same tent and about the only furnishings was a stand with a pitcher and wash basin, maybe a mirror and someplace to hang a few clothes. We ate at the house, with Miss Dawes doing the cooking.

Later she had a large log building constructed, with a large kitchen, dining and living room, and a number of bedrooms, and also a number of cabins scattered under the pines where the tents had been. I remember going up there a couple of times with Charley George who carried the mail. He brought the mail to Crosses and left it there for that community and then went on up to Cold Springs and left mail there. I would go up with him one trip and wait for his next trip to return home. There were always a number of children there, 10 years old and older.

Everyone pitched in and helped with household chores, making beds, tidying up and with cooking and dishes but Miss Dawes did the most work and all the managing. I remember one day when a number of us girls went out with small pails and picked wild berries; raspberries on top of the "Old Indian" rock close to the camp, and strawberries and huckleberries under the pines up and down the mountains. We ate what we wanted and took home a pail full of berries. Miss Dawes made us up some of the most luscious pies I have ever tasted! It was all the berries combined together and topped with whipped cream.

Miss Dawes also gave us slices of bread and we went down to a small foot-bridge across LaPrele Creek and fed the fish. We would drop small pieces of bread and watch the fish come grabbing for them. What a wonderful place it was and what a wonderful person was the one who provided it!

Miss Dawes taught school in many of Converse County's school districts. She taught the Beaver School the year of 1904-05 and according to Mona Ashby's diary she must have slept at the schoolhouse during the weekdays. Mona mentions stopping at the schoolhouse to have tea, Miss Dawes entertaining their club at the schoolhouse, taking bedding to the schoolhouse and losing a pillow someplace. Frequent mentions are made of Miss Dawes staying at Ashbys or other places overnight. She was elected Converse County Superintendent and served from 1909 to 1919 and again from 1927 to 1937, serving 19¼ years altogether.

During the early years of being a county superintendent she made her rounds in a one-horse shay with a sorrel horse named "Sport". Once she and Bessie Leman made a trip to Douglas in the one-horse buggy and while there, Miss Dawes acquired (by purchase or gift) a large St. Bernard dog. She tied the dog on a leash in the back of the buggy and visiting along as they made their way homeward, one of them looked back and found that they no longer had the St. Bernard. Stopping to check they found the dog had jumped out and not being able to keep up with the pace of the horse, had fallen down and they were dragging him along behind the buggy. Luckily he survived and they managed to get him back in the buggy and home with him a little the worse for wear, but otherwise all right.

Another incident I remember well, was a Christmas Eve when Miss Dawes was staying with us, and we three older Leman kids would not go to bed. Finally Mother told us if Santa saw us up he would leave and some other kids would get our toys. Miss Dawes had quietly left the room and about this time we heard the jingle of sleigh bells close to the house and then suddenly, there was a bump on the porch like a sack of toys being set down soundly. In an instant three kids hit the sack! Miss Dawes knew how to get kids to do what she wanted without an argument.

On one 4th of July, Miss Dawes invited everyone to come for a picnic and dance at Cold Springs. She had a large dance floor constructed outside the buildings. Everyone came with their picnic lunches and kids. We picnicked and danced. The dance scheduled to be under the stars turned out to be a dance with gently falling snow. During most of the night we danced with our coats on and during intervals we crowded around a campfire to get warm. Dawn was breaking through before the crowd broke up and started for home, with fond remembrances of dancing in the snow and of Miss Dawes, not dancing, but visiting and looking out for everyone and making it a real occasion.

Later on, some years after fire had destroyed her resort and she had sold her land and moved to Douglas, she was invited by Governor Robert Carey for a dinner at his ranch home on Lower LaPrele. The evening must have had something to do with education as the Wyoming State Superintendent and other state officials were there. At that time Maud Dawes was not financially too well off and didn't have any fancy clothes to wear but she put on the best she had and went. According to reports from others, her enthusiasm and friendliness made the event one to be remembered. As one person put it, she was the "Belle of the Ball". She was herself wherever she was, well educated, well read, enthusiastic, interesting, dedicated to education and the welfare of children. Her life was not an easy one, but she lived it to the fullest.

Dean, Henry and Kate Family

My father, Henry Haskell Dean, was born in 1845, in Kentucky, 50 miles below Cincinnati, on the Ohio River.

Mother, Kate Hammond Dean, was born in Kansas near the Missouri border when that was all virgin land, covered with native timber and buffalo grass.

Dad and Mother met, I believe, in Valley Falls, Kansas. He was clerking in a clothing store and she was working in a boarding house where he boarded. I'm rather hazy on their life from then until Wyoming, although I have heard them tell of some experiences in Leavenworth, Kansas and Kansas City, Kansas. There was a nationwide recession in those days and Dad more or less went "on the bum" looking for work and hit Leadville and Denver, Colorado, eventually winding up in Douglas. He got some sort of job here and sent for the family.

He filed on a homestead, out of Douglas, and they lived there for a time, mostly on the charity of the established neighbors. Then they wound up in Douglas, operating a restaurant, Mother doing the cooking right up to a couple of days before I, Vern, was born. In the meantime, during the homestead period, Hal, at around 14, had left home to take a job as a sheepherder and Grace, about 16, had married Joshua and moved to Montana.

At the restaurant our living quarters were at the rear and the side of the place of business. The bedroom, which was on the side of the restaurant, adjoined a saloon on the other side. Only a thin wall intervened and dad frequently had to get up and rap on the wall with a shoe when the celebrations got too noisy. For instance, one night when George Smith, the proprietor, was at the piano playing "Peter, Peter, Pumpkin Eater" to accompany a quartet that was singing "Will You Love Me When I'm Old?" the rest of the patrons had spread matches on the floor and were dancing a square dance. (Matches in those days scratched anywhere and lighted with a loud pop.)

At times our store was a straight-away butcher shop and at others it was, I guess, more properly a delicatessen. Dad shipped in fresh fish, fresh fruit and vegetables. We carried luncheon meats and Mother made homemade bread and doughnuts and Dad and Mother killed and dressed poultry for sale.

Just watching in the blacksmith shop was a wonderfully satisfying experience. Seeing a horse shod or a tire shrunk onto a wheel, watching the sparks from the forge or from the red hot iron being hammered on the anvil and smelling the smoke from the horses hooves as the hot shoe was fitted to their feet, is a pleasant memory. The crowning experience, however, was being allowed to use the fly-minder, made from a horse's tail nailed to a wood handle and keeping off the flies while the blacksmith nailed on the shoes and rasped the hooves down to a nice fit. Another big thrill was to be allowed to pull the long handle that actuated the big bellows that blew the coals in the forge!

Many of the sidewalks in the business part of town were of natural flat sandstone blocks that were quarried a few miles from town. Many others, however, were of plank which were either laid with cracks between or developed them when the planks shrunk. It was a big event when any of the planks were taken up and all of the kids were on hand because quite a few coins got dropped and rolled down the cracks and we tried to salvage them.

The first phonograph in town was of the nickel-in-the-slot variety and you listened through ear tubes, like a stethoscope. Later on, the jeweler put in a stock of Edison phonographs and the cylinder records that they played. He had a machine set up with a large brass horn. The horn was probably four feet long and around 30 inches in diameter at the large end. He used to give a free concert every Saturday night.

Our fire protection consisted of a couple of hose carts in a fire house in the downtown area. These were actually large hose reels suspended between two wheels, about six feet in diameter, and with a short tongue with which two men guided it. Ahead there was a long rope harness to accommodate ten or twelve men to pull it. In actual use, however, it was usually hitched behind a light two-horse delivery wagon to take it to the fire. There were fire plugs all over town. When the apparatus reached the fire plug nearest the fire, two men grabbed the hose end and began attaching it to the plug while the cart continued to the scene of the fire. When the fire was reached, if there was still hose on the reel, the nearest joint was uncoupled and a nozzle attached. By that time, the water had usually reached there and was directed onto the blaze.

Cooking and heating were done with coal and wood which created a considerable ash disposal problem. Each family had one or two large ash cans at the back gate, next to the alley. Once a week "City Smith" picked them up and disposed of ashes and trash. The garbage was usually fed to the chickens which almost every family maintained in the back yard. In the winter, "City" also cleared most of the sidewalks in the residential part of town of snow. He drove a single horse down the sidewalk, pulling a "V" shaped snow plow. Most homeowners would then give their walks an additional cleaning and then sprinkle ashes on the walks to prevent slipping.

The Dean family usually took their Sunday dinner at LaFayette Restaurant. We would be served the entree consisting usually of roast chicken, roast pork or roast beef with a choice. Around the plate would be assembled six or eight small oval dishes (you would call them bird baths) which contained various vegetables and sauces and often the dessert as well. The tables were covered with clean ironed table cloths and cloth napkins were supplied. In the center of the table there would be a silver-plated caster containing glass receptacles of salt, pepper, mustard, horseradish, etc. The price of the Sunday dinner was 50 cents. Other meals during the week were 35¢. "Frenchie" Olivereau was a typical cartoon Frenchman with white hair, moustache and goatee and a broken English way of speaking. Hal used to enjoy telling of a local citizen saying to Frenchie, "Mr. Olivereau, I'd like you to meet my son-in-law." Frenchie's reply was "Ya, I know, I've got one of dose dam' tings."

At about that time, Dad bought some property at the edge of town, built a house and barn and sold out the store. We moved to the "ranch," planted truck garden, got some cows and started selling milk, produce, and dressed chickens.

On my first day of school, that fall, one of the upper classmen remarked, "Wall, ef thar ain't old Squire Dean! How are all the cows and chickens, Squire?" From that time on I became "Squire" to almost all of the kids, although a few continued to call me "Bun", which had been my nickname previously. My cousin Maud Dawes was responsible for "Bun," which I suppose was some sort of baby talk for Vern.

We gradually increased our dairy herd to about 15, plus one Jersey bull, named Brigham. During those years, I learned quite a lot about the individual personalities of a bunch of old dairy cows. Believe me, they are individual!

In the winter I had to pump tubs of water for them (electrically) and then temper it a little with hot water from a teakettle, heated in the house. I'd lead each one up individually from the barn and then stand and shiver while she fooled around and decided whether the temperature was just right for her to take a drink! By the time I'd processed 14 or 15 cows, I was not only frozen, but also hot under the collar.

About that time Dad was ill and the doctor told him that he would have to get out of that climate and altitude, or he would not last out the winter. So he went out to Reedley, California where some folks lived that we knew.

Vern "Bun" Dean

Vern Dean was born in Douglas in 1897. He moved to California in 1914. He died in about 1979.

De Haan, Henry

Henry was born in Kralingen, (now in the city of Rotterdam) Holland on November 15, 1885. He was born in a country house which had one big room with bed-stays in the wall with big double doors covering the opening. The floor was made out of bricks and the room was dark because they had only small windows with shutters.

When he was about four years old, they moved closer to the city. They had a small park in the center with twelve homes gathered around the square. Henry was the oldest of ten children and a real practical joker. He would let the neighbor's chickens out of their pen so that the neighbor would give him cookies to gather them up again. In those days everyone would leave their wooden shoes outside their doors when they entered their houses. Well, one evening Henry got the idea to gather up everyone's wooden shoes and put them in one pile in the middle of the square. The next morning when people started to leave for work they found their shoes missing from the doorstep and all hell broke loose. Henry had made one big mistake - he did not put his shoes in the pile so everyone figured out who did it. Needless to say, for a long while he was in big trouble. Some people never did get the right shoes back.

He was a good student and always did a lot of reading about America and dreamed that someday he would go there. When he was 13 years old he had to leave school and go to work.

His first job was working for a Wrecking & Building Co. where he was supposed to learn a trade, but much to his chagrin, he instead pulled nails and cleaned bricks ten hours a day six days a week. For this he made 1.50 guilder a week. He did this during the winter with no gloves because he could not afford them. His hands became so sore that he had to quit after a month.

Next, he got a job working for a baker, where he would deliver bread from 10 p.m. until 10 a.m. This job lasted for six months until he met a man selling magazines. After talking to him, Henry decided he would like to give this a try. Setting out every morning with his sack lunch he would travel by train and sometimes by boat, covering a radius of 25 miles and delivering the magazines for which he was paid 2¢ for each copy. For each new subscription he would earn 40¢. He covered places like the Hook of Holland and little towns such as Schiedam, Flaarding and Massluis. The people would welcome him because he brought news from Rotterdam. He did so well that he was earning more money than his father when the company went bankrupt.

After this, Henry did odd jobs until he was almost 15 years old, at which time he decided he wanted to go to sea. He was under age, (the age limit was 16) but he learned from an uncle who ran a bar that three sailors were too drunk to get back to their ship. This was his big chance! He went to the ship and lied about his age. That evening he sailed, with only the clothes on his back, to Indonesia. Half of his salary was sent home and the other half was given to him to spend in port. The trip on the sailing ship was to have taken six months, but it took almost 1½ years.

After he returned to Holland, he worked about six months as a longshoreman; however, he was not satisfied with staying in Holland. He signed on a steamship called the Statendam. He made one roundtrip to New Jersey. On the second trip he jumped ship in Hoboken, New Jersey. He stayed in a boarding house for about a week and then walked to Patterson, New Jersey. He stayed in another boarding house and worked at a cotton mill and helped in the house for room and board. He stayed there two months and had enough money saved for a train ticket to Chicago. Walking on States Street in 1903 he saw a sign in a window saying, "Men Wanted Out West to Work On The Railroad."

He signed up and went to Nebraska on a work train. They paid 10¢ an hour and he lived in a box car. There he learned English from reading catalogs. He worked about six months in the western part of Nebraska. The last place was Valentine, Nebraska. He became homesick and returned to Holland.

When he got back to Holland, the Dutch Army drafted him. He had to serve one year and was paid to serve four extra months for a farmer's son who wanted out of the army early. For this, Henry was paid 160.00 guilders.

After he had served his time in the army, he married Nies (Mary) and on May 5, 1907 they had a son, John.

Since his return to Holland, all he could think of was going back to the United States. He knew that the United States was truly the land of opportunity. He worked two and three shifts as a longshoreman so that he could save up enough for the passage for himself and for his wife. If he made enough before Johnny was a year old, Johnny could go for free. He did save enough, and Johnny was nine months old when they sailed for America. It cost them $25.00 apiece.

They came by ship in steerage class. The men slept separate from the women down in the hole in big rooms like dorms. People were sick all over the place, so with that and all the babies, the smell was awful. When they landed at Ellis Island and were checked out and found to be healthy, they took a train to Panama, Nebraska where Nies's uncle lived. He met them at the train station and was surprised to see them dressed so well. They stayed with them for a month and then moved to Firth, Nebraska.

In Firth they rented their first little house. Henry went down and bought an old stove at the junk yard. It had one leg missing, so he built it up with bricks. The only food they had was some buttermilk that a farmer had given them and a hogs head. They had orange crates for cabinets which Nies later made little curtains to hang in front. The very first thing they bought for their new home was a creamer and sugar holder. Nies was so proud of these. While living in Firth they made friends with the Bouwens family who were a big help to them and ended up lifelong friends.

Soon after they settled in Firth, they were joined by Henry's brother Pieter. They worked for farmers and would shovel coal cars on weekends to make extra money. One time, Henry made a bet that he could carry a 100 lb. sack of flour on his back and walk one block. He did and won $25.00.

On June 27, 1914, Henry and Nies received their citizenship papers. After receiving his papers, he drove a wagon with a team to Pipestone, South Dakota where he had a job working for the government working on the streets and roads. While he was working in Pipestone he heard about the government giving homesteads in Wyoming, so he applied, and was given his homestead of 640 acres in Orin Junction, Converse County. He built a home, a barn and a fence around his property. This homestead became final October 14, 1920. During this time another brother, Cor, joined them. After only one year, Cor got homesick and returned with Pieter to Holland.

In November of 1918, Henry moved to Casper and worked for the Standard Oil Co. for four years. For a while he was known as the king of Casper because he owned one city block and was so involved with the town. He bought a building that had a restaurant, barber shop and flop house. The restaurant was called the Boston Cafe. He also had a house on Railroad Avenue and he had a dance hall outside of town. Casper was a booming town and Henry was making lots of money. He bought everything for a low amount down and for a long time was able to make all the payments and had plenty of money to spend.

In 1923 he and Nies were divorced and for a while he stayed in Casper, but the boom was over and little by little he lost everything. His son, John, was 16 and had joined the navy, so Henry decided to move on. He went to Houston, Texas for a while and then to Oklahoma. In 1928, he took a trip to Holland to see his family and then came back and settled in Whiting, Indiana.

In Whiting he got a job for Standard Oil and later for Sinclair Refining Co. as a boilermaker. In 1931, he moved to California and worked in Bakersfield for one year, but the weather was too warm and he did not like it.

In 1932 he came to San Francisco to work on the Bay Bridge, but it was not ready, so he bought a gas station in Oakland. It lost money, so he walked out.

In 1933 Henry went to work for Ford Motor Company. How he got the job has always been one of the family's favorite anecdotes. When he arrived at the Ford plant, he saw a long line stretching for blocks and knew he would have no chance of getting a job if he waited with the other hundreds of applicants. So he decided on a plan to bypass the long lines. He found out the manager's name and returned home, where he put on his best suit and turned his old music case into a temporary briefcase. He then returned to the main office and asked to see the plant manager, Mr. Bullwinkle. When he told Mr. Bullwinkle why he was there, Mr. Bullwinkle became enraged and said that he had hiring foremen and should never have been bothered about this matter. Henry, however, persisted by pulling out his papers and showing Mr. Bullwinkle that he was well qualified for the job. Mr. Bullwinkle gave him the job, and he ended up working there for nine years. Occasionally, Mr. Bullwinkle would come down to the assembly line and say hello to Henry by name. Henry's co-workers were always surprised that he and Mr. Bullwinkle knew each other.

Henry remarried on September 24, 1938 to Dorothy Duignan, and on November 11, 1941 they had a daughter Suzanne Marie. During the 1940's they bought and sold different pieces of real estate. Henry would work on the weekends and at night fixing up the places and then rent them or sell them. During the war he worked for Basalt Shipyard.

After the war, he decided to go into the construction business full time. In 1945 he moved to Lafayette, California and started to build homes. He was actively involved with this business until he died at the age of 91 on May 29, 1977.

His son, John, was living in San Francisco working for a steel company when he died August 19, 1957.

Henry's wife Dorothy and their daughter, Suzanne and his three grandsons, Michael Bekedam, Frank, Jr. and James Cox all live in Walnut Creek, California. Henry's son-in-law Frank Cox now operated the construction company which they formed just before Henry died.

Deuel, George and Ida

Ida Eheler Deuel moved on a homestead with her husband, George, as a bride when she was 22 years old.

Ida was born in Norfolk, Nebraska on Oct. 18, 1898. George Deuel was born in Norfolk, Nebraska on June 15, 1895, but they didn't get really well acquainted as children. George lived in the country, and his folks sold Ida's family cream. Sometimes George would come along to deliver the cream to them. He told Ida later, he wondered who the pretty little Dutch girl was (although she was really German).

When George was older, he enlisted in the army and served during World War I. Ida's cousin, Mabel Slaughter, brought George to see Ida when he was on furlough from Fort Dodge, Iowa. They began to correspond with each other and were married October 25, 1919 at Wayne, Nebraska after George was discharged from the army.

George acquired a homestead in Wyoming, northeast of Douglas, and moved his new bride out here to the wide open spaces. They established residence in a sheep wagon. It was pretty lonely for Ida out here at first. In fact, she says she lived in the Wyoming wilderness for two years before seeing another woman. Her nearest neighbor, Steve Copendale, was a bachelor who lived 2½ miles away. Another neighbor, Zeb Ward, was also a bachelor. They both sent for wives later, sort of on the order of mail order brides.

When they first moved out to the homestead and lived in the sheep wagon, the Deuels had no toilet facilities so had to use the bushes. Ida tells how when she'd go out in the bushes, her husband, George, always a big tease, would yell, "Now watch out for the snakes, Ida." Ida said she'd always look around fearfully for snakes even though she knew George was just trying to get her goat.

Finally they bought a house from an oil company and moved it with horses out to the homestead. They were much more comfortable after that. As more people came out, they began to socialize with neighbors and went to picnics and dances.

The Deuels raised seven children: George J., Evelyn, Ruth, Betty, Delores, Darrell, and Darlene.

When Delores was born, Ida said the midwife came with a flour sack filled with various things to deliver the baby. The older children were playing outdoors and saw her come to the house with the flour sack. After the baby, Delores, arrived, the children said, "Mrs. Jones brought us a new baby in a flour sack, didn't she, Mama?"

When Ida wanted to visit someone she would put her smallest baby in a sling on the saddlehorn and ride horseback. When she would have to open a gate, she would take the baby down, put it through the gate, then get back on the horse with the baby after she had ridden through.

Ida recalls the good times they had with their neighbors. They would help one another work and then have parties and dances together. They really appreciated their neighbors in those days, she said, and they would look forward to their get-togethers.

When her youngest daughter, Darlene, was born, Ida suffered a stroke and she has not been able to use her left arm and left leg since that time. This did not stop Ida from leading a very active life and taking care of herself and her house and children.

Ida joined a Baptist church when she was 16 years old and joined the First Baptist Church of Douglas in 1938 when Reverend Knight was pastor. She joined the North Platte Homemakers Club in 1954. She has been an active member of these groups since then. George Sr. died of a heart attack in 1941. Things were pretty hard after that, but she and her boys managed to keep the ranch running.

Finally, she moved into Douglas where she resided on South Sixth Street. I asked Ida if it was hard to leave her family in Nebraska and come out to the Wyoming wilderness with George. She said, "No, we were young then and in love. I thought it would be a real adventure."

For Ida Deuel, life had been an adventure as she raised seven children in the wilds of early Wyoming. She said there were the good times and the bad, but she tried to remember only the good. She remembered especially, the good times when she and the neighbors helped each other with work or met for picnics and dances.

"The Lord has been very good to me," Ida said, "and I'm glad He has allowed me to live out my days in Wonderful Wyoming among my many good friends." Summing it all up, Ida said, "It was hard, but it was fun!"

Ida Deuel died in 1985.

Dickau, Walter and Lillian Family

Walter "Walt" A. Dickau was born January 21, 1896 at Atkinson, Nebraska.

Walt came to Converse County in 1917. He filed on a 320 acre plot under the homestead act 18 miles north of Shawnee. Because he had enlisted in the U.S. Army previous to his coming to Wyoming, he didn't have to prove up on the homestead until the time of his discharge from the army.

He served his country in World War I in the United States and in Germany.

Lillian "Lillie" and Walt Dickau

He was discharged from the Army in 1920 and married Lillian "Lillie" Mae Hoffman March 18, 1920, at Atkinson, Nebraska. Lillie was also born and raised near Atkinson. Her birthday was December 17, 1894.

During the summer of 1920, they moved their belongings by train to Lost Springs, Wyoming, where they picked them up by wagon and team of horses and moved to their homestead. They built a tar paper covered shack before winter as their home.

Their nearest neighbors were Alfred and Gladys Edison. They came from near Atkinson, Nebraska, too. Gladys has a fantastic memory of the events and dates of that time. She recalls that Dr. Storey from Douglas, the nearest doctor, delivered Norma Jean, the oldest child, March 14, 1921.

When a second child, Ilamae, was expected, Walt needed supplies from Shawnee; so leaving Gladys with Lillie and taking Norma Jean with him, he set out for Shawnee with horses and a wagon. On the way home a big thunder storm came up and they stopped at the Sunday School, which was about five miles from home. He tied up the team and went inside. While watching out the window, lightning struck both horses, killing them. After the storm, he walked to the nearest neighbors with his small daughter, Norma Jean, and borrowed a team to pull his wagon home. These neighbors names were Ray and Tessie Valentine. Ilamae was born July 1, 1922.

Gladys Edison was always available when needed and when Ivan was born, her husband, Alfred, went to get Mrs. Parker, a neighbor who was an osteopath. They didn't get back in time and Walt delivered his first son. He didn't know how much string to use to tie the umbilical cord, Gladys said, and he had used lots of it. When she bathed the baby later, she tied it correctly.

Three more children were born to Walt and Lillie; but as times got better and there were more conveniences, Gladys doesn't remember so many problems. Dwayne was born May 29, 1927; Betty, September 22, 1929; and Beverly, March 31, 1933. All the children were born at home.

During the depression and after, Walt and Lillie provided for their family by doing various things. Walt purchased a threshing machine and traveled around to the neighbors doing their threshing every summer.

We milked many cows and sold the cream. One of Walt's statements has been, "If it hadn't been for the cream during the depression, we would have been in trouble."

Walt and Lillie purchased additional land as it became possible and had quite a large farming and ranching operation.

Walt served on the school board of School District #10 and was elected Chairman of the Board for several years.

In October of 1947, Walt and Lillie purchased a lot at 600 South Sixth Street in Douglas. Roy Wampler built their home on this location, and they moved into it in time for Beverly to attend the eighth grade in Douglas.

Walt was elected County Commissioner in the fall of 1951 and served on this board until 1959. During this time, he was Chairman of the Board from 1957 to 1959.

Walt and Lillie joined the Airstream Travel Trailer Wally Byan Club and traveled extensively. Walt served as President of the Wyoming Chapter and arranged an antelope hunt during his term.

Lillie broke her hip while on one of the trips with the Wally Byan Club and spent several months recuperating.

Walt passed away July 29, 1970, with Lillie following him June 20, 1975.

They are both buried in the Douglas Cemetery.

Dickson, Clarence and Evalyn

In 1919, when Clarence C. Dickson returned from Germany after the First World War and Army Occupation, he found his wife, Evalyn A. Dickson, in poor health. To move to a higher, drier altitude he took up a homestead north of Douglas, Wyoming, on the Dry Fork of the Cheyenne River. It was located four miles below the William Dorr ranch where there was an established school. Two children, Howard and Dorothy, were to finish their grade school education there.

Tent living was the established medical treatment. As the months and years passed, Evalyn held her own, but permanent damage to her heart limited her activity.

Evalyn enjoyed people and was well supported by her husband. Many happy times were spent with neighborhood parlor games, dancing, and sing alongs; Casey Jones with fiddle and accordion, the Kieny brothers furnished the music. Picnics were instigated at the Dad Hendershot location on Big Woody including Pellatz, Schick, Federer, Hansons, Dicksons, Pershouses, Henleys, and Welchs. Dull Center get-togethers were enjoyed as well as Mrs. Good's literaries.

In the twenties, Mrs. Dickson became well-known for her cupcakes, and many a homesick cowboy stopped to visit with the friendly household. "Ma Dick" was a listening person; Clarence, a pillar of sound theories.

As the years passed from barren land to fences, corals, and cattle grazing, the need to sell the milk cows' products for grocery money diminished. Their life widened with the inclusion of the political and business world. They became interested in the Community Hall at Dry Creek and took an active part.

Eldon "Unc" Alvord (Evalyn's brother) established a winning baseball team which included many of the young men of the area.

Howard went on to the university and became a highway patrolman. He died in Washington in 1973.

Dorothy studied nursing in Denver, then married Frank P. Scott. They moved to the Dickson place in 1941 and took over. They later moved to Montana after selling to Dennis Irwin.

Clarence Dickson died in Cheyenne December 4, 1941, at the Veterans Hospital.

Evalyn Dickson made her home with Dorothy, moving to Montana in 1949.

She passed away in 1970 in Miles City, Montana.

Dieleman, Wm. W. and Dillie

My father, William W. Dieleman, came to Wyoming from Prairie View, Kansas in 1908 and filed on a homestead about seven miles southeast of Lost Springs in the spring of 1909. He brought my mother, Dillie Dieleman, my twin brothers, Carl and Earl and myself out from Kansas to live and prove up on this homestead. It was 320 acres of land which he started out on. He had built a small house and as time went on, he built other buildings, drilled a well, fenced this land and broke up ten acres of sod.

He shipped his emigrant car out from Kansas with his household belongings, a few pieces of machinery, a wagon, a top buggy and a team of mules.

He said he just had $7.50 after he payed for his emigrant car. So it was a hard life to get started in Wyoming. He worked out with his team of mules whenever he could to make a living for his family.

Then other people started coming to Wyoming to file on homesteads. It wasn't long until there was a family on nearly every half section. There were several families who came from Prairie View, Kansas; and the community where we lived was called the Prairie View Community.

In a few years the neighbors all went together and hauled lumber from a sawmill near Laramie Peak and built a church and this was called the Prairie View Church. A school house was built a short distance from the church and a cemetery was laid out a short distance from there.

In the fall of 1917, our family was stricken with diphtheria which claimed the lives of my two brothers Earl and Carl. They were ten and one half years old at this time. My mother contracted this disease and died a month later. They were all buried in the Prairie View Cemetery. I was eight years old at this time, my sister, Glenn Elaine, was three years old and Jack was a baby of six months.

My grandmother came out from Kansas and took us three children back to Kansas with her. My Dad was so broken up, he left the homestead and worked out for a couple of years. Then he came back to the homestead and started to build a new house which he completed in the spring of 1920. I came back from Kansas and lived with him while he worked on this house. I walked to school every day.

On April 4, 1920 my Dad married Mary Thompson. She was born on November 19, 1893, the daughter of Fred and Elizabeth Thompson. Shortly after that, Glenn came back to live with us. I called her "Mom". She was good to us kids. She became crippled with arthritis in later years. She had been in failing health for a number of years and passed away at the age of 56 in October 1950. She and my father had moved to Douglas in 1939. My father passed away September 9, 1959 at the age of 75.

I worked on the farm helping my dad. I went to high school for two years in Lost Springs. In the spring of 1929, I married Cora E. Bright. We lived about eight miles southeast of Lost Springs. In the spring of 1932 we moved to the ranch we lived on until moving to Douglas. It was the Bright ranch, about one half mile northwest of Lost Springs. I served on the school board for several years.

We have two fine daughters, Fern Ladwig and Betty Krivanec, their husbands and six grandchildren. I have carried mail from the Lost Springs Post Office for about twelve years. For many years I raised cattle and trucked. For the last four years we have leased our grazing land out, but we reserved our buildings and 150 acres.

Dilts, Fred W. and Elnora

The search for religious freedom and relief from economic strife were motivating factors of the Dilts family to immigrate to the U.S.A. from Europe during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. One of the direct ancestors of the New World Dilts family was a male person named Howland who worked in a laborers position on the Mayflower.

The Dunkelberger family evidently first set foot on America's shore in 1715. The name signifies the family origination in the "Dark Forest" or Black Forest region of Germany. The desire to eat and relief from Catholic persecution was the impetus to find a new environment, the latter probably being the prime motivation.

While most immigrants to the New World were engaged in agriculture, the Coryell family operated a ferry on the Delaware River. Boats from this ferry were used by General Washington in his celebrated crossing. The Coryells may be found in the Dilts geneological line.

Fred William Dilts, Sr. was born near Zanesville, Ohio on August 29, 1873. With his family, he moved to Kansas at the age of 12. The Dilts family farmed and grew livestock in central Kansas. Fred decided to ranch instead of farm and for a few years looked for the ideal environment for the ranch business. He investigated Oklahoma prior to the "sooner" activity and also Washington and Oregon. Climatcal, as well as economic features, guided him to Douglas where he got a job working for John Kern on LaBonte Creek in 1902. In 1906 he homesteaded on Bear Creek, north of Douglas and got into the sheep business. He built a 12 x 16 foot concrete house which ruins should endure much longer than a wood or sod shack. At this time, Fred had no mechanical means of transportation, and utilized freight wagons and saddle horses for business and social purposes. Mr. Dilts recanted an experience that happened at a dance which he attended, very similar to the one described so vividly by Owen Wister, about the mixing of the sleeping babies in his book, "The Virginian". It may have been the same function.

During those years supplementary feeding of livestock had not been utilized. Hay raising was not widespread and transportation was minimal and so hard winters took a great toll of ranchers resources. With a severe winter and a large loss of sheep in the winter of 1909 and 1910, Mr. Dilts liabilities exceeded his assets and he was broke. His personal relationships with "Ral" Collins of the Douglas National Bank allowed him to get a loan to replace his dead sheep. It was during this hard spring storm that the sheep were blown from the bedground and Mr. Dilts followed the band of sheep for three days and two nights so he wouldn't lose them — to no avail.

Mr. Dilts started purchasing adjoining parcels of land after he had established a base for a home. The homestead acts took place during this era and many people, becoming unhappy with rural life, sold their homesteads to folks like Mr. Dilts. At the time of Mr. Dilts death on February 3, 1944, he had accumulated roughly 50,000 acres.

Mr. Dilts wanted a family but in a traditional philosophy, he wouldn't accept the additional responsibility until he had at least $10,000.00 in the bank. He was married on December 3, 1921 to Elnora Dunkelberger, who was born in Halstead, Kansas on June 29, 1882. Elnora died on the 29th day of August, 1967 and is buried beside Fred Sr. in the Douglas Cemetery. Two sons were born to this marriage, John C. on April 1, 1925 and Fred Jr. on April 13, 1923.

Note: Fred Jr. died December 7, 1984 in Douglas.

Dorothy, Roy and Carrie

Roy Dorothy was born October 16, 1887 in Blakesburg, Iowa to Sherman and Emma Dorothy. Carrie Dunivan was born in Colony, Kansas.

Roy Dorothy and Carrie Dunivan Dorothy were married in Yates Center, Kansas on March 27, 1913. Due to Roy's poor health, he was advised by his doctor to move to a dryer climate. His father, Sherman Dorothy, owned a farm south of Douglas in the Irvine community. In 1920 he moved with his wife and three children: Fern, Edward and Eva, to the farm in Wyoming. Carrie was very homesick for her family in Kansas, this being the first time she was ever more than 10 miles away from them. She thought Wyoming was the end of the world. She learned to love it and made it her home for 44 years.

The family lived on the farm until 1928, when they moved into Douglas. Two more children were born: Ruth in 1931, and Carl in 1934.

Fern died in 1947. Her daughter, Julia, is married to Bob Dunn and lives on the Dunn Ranch south of Douglas. Eva and Edward live in Casper, Wyoming; Carl in Powell, Wyoming; and Ruth in Long Beach, California.

Roy died in 1959 and Carrie died in 1964. She enjoyed her work in the United Methodist Church of Douglas and was very active in all departments and functions of the church.

Doyle, George N. and Nellie Family

Nellie Peterson Doyle was born Pernilla Persson in Torup, Sweden in 1858. Her parents died when she was very young leaving her with an older sister. Nellie taught school in Sweden one year before borrowing money from her uncle to come to America.

In 1876, at the age of 18, Nellie arrived in Omaha, Nebraska where she resided for eight years working for families as a cook and housekeeper while learning the English language. Spurred by the promise of a new railroad being built through Wyoming, Nellie took her savings and traveled by stage through territories still inhabited by warring Indian tribes.

So it was that in 1884 Nellie Peterson came to a spot surrounded by large cottonwood trees near old Fort Fetterman where the stage forded the Platte River. Here in a small settlement of tents which had been dubbed "Tent Town" Nellie decided to try her luck in the restaurant business. Soon, Nellie's Restaurant was thriving and for a time the town, which was officially to be named Douglas, was called "Nellie's City" by the residents and those who passed through. People came from far and near to taste Nellie's Swedish baked goods.

One who passed this way was George Newton Doyle, who was born in Sharon, Connecticut in 1860. George's father, J. J. Doyle, was born in England in 1825 and married Catherine who was born in Perth Amboy, New Jersey in 1815. They had three sons, Edward, James and George. J. J. Doyle died in 1868 when George was only eight years old. Catherine lived until 1902. The Doyle brothers ran the butcher shop after their father's untimely death and George learned the trade well at a very young age.

In 1878, at the age of 18, he left for Fargo, North Dakota where he was employed by Captain May who owned a large milling company. Then George worked for a rancher in western Nebraska near Harrison. But as the Northwestern Railroad pushed across Nebraska and Wyoming, the Richards and Brown Company hired him to provide meat for the railroad crews.

George followed the railroad construction until the line was completed to Glenrock, Wyoming. While there, a cold-blooded murder was committed outside his tent and, in 1886, he returned to "Nellie's City" and continued working for the Richards and Brown Company until 1887 when he opened the first butcher shop in the area. George's brother, James, joined him but soon moved on to Ethete, Wyoming where he ran an Indian trading post.

By this time, Nellie had moved from the tent into a more permanent structure and her restaurant was doing a thriving business. She had purchased a home and was well established in this new community. The July 31, 1889 issue of "Bill Barlow's Budget" reports that George and Nellie were "united in marriage this morning at the home of the bride, the Rev. Staunton officiating" and on August 28 they returned from their "bridal tour" reporting a "very enjoyable trip."

Four children were born to this union, Mary Jane (1890), Alice (1895), Georgia (1897), and Della (1900). Della died as an infant. Alice married Rev. Wallace Bristor of Huron, South Dakota, in 1922. She gave birth to three children in her lifetime. By 1894, the Doyles had sold their butcher shop to Carson Adams to build a home along the Platte River near the state fairgrounds. It was on this property that the first ice house was built to furnish the community with ice during the summer months. C. A. Slonaker and Sons leased this property around 1908 and operated the ice storage along with their coal and transfer business for many years. In the meantime, George Doyle had homesteaded land in 1897 and became a successful sheep rancher as owner of the Doyle Sheep Company near Walker Creek. He successfully operated this business until 1918, when he leased it to his son-in-law, Paul LeBar and his wife.

The Doyle family moved from their home near the Platte River to one of the first two story homes in Douglas located at 217 North Third Street. They later owned a home on North Sixth Street and in 1909 constructed the three story house at 704 East Center Street. The home was completely prefabricated by the Sears and Roebuck Company and the materials were sent from Chicago to Douglas on a railroad flatcar. It was here that George and Nellie lived until death claimed them both in 1933.

In 1907, Bill Barlow wrote of George N. Doyle, "Success marked his efforts from the start, and he is today one of the leading flockmasters of the county-owning, also in addition to his town property, a large ranch adjoining the city. Mr. Doyle is a gentleman of wide education as well as a successful business man; has served as a member of the city council, and is always ready and willing to boost for anything tending to advance his adopted home."

Georgia Doyle married Paul LeBar in 1917. Paul, along with a younger brother Carl, and two older sisters had moved from Pennsylvania in 1908, to join two older brothers, John and Harry LeBar. Their first home was two miles west of Douglas. Paul was first employed by Ed A. Reavill, a construction contractor in Douglas. In 1919, he and his wife, Georgia, homesteaded on Walker Creek. Two children were born to this marriage, George and Winona, who married Ralph Brown in 1946, and made her home in Casper. The Paul LeBars eventually bought the original Doyle Ranch and ran stock for 30 years. This ranch has subsequently been leased and operated by their son, George LeBar.

The eldest daughter of George and Nellie Doyle, Mary Jane, enjoyed living along the Platte River. As a youngster, she would invite children to wade in a natural warm spring located on the Doyle property. Many of these social occasions were recorded in early editions of "Bill Barlow's Budget". As a young lady, she was graduated from Douglas High School. Mary and her classmates took many well chaperoned excursions to ranches for picnics and weekend outings.

In the fall of 1908, wearing a new frock designed by the local seamstress, her cousin Jenny Swanson, Mary set out for Ohio with her mother. Mary attended Oberlin College for two years, majoring in music. During that time, she took hundreds of photographs, leaving a pictorial volume recording all events of this era. On June 18, 1913, Mary Doyle married Max L. Russell.

Max Lester Russell was born in Halbur, Iowa, on March 7, 1891, the son of Otis Lester and Mary Lou Russell. At the age of 16, he came to Orin Junction and worked for the railroad. At 21 he was made an Agent for the C.B. & Q. and Northwestern. After serving as Agent for four years, he bought the General Merchandise Store at Orin from John Moran. A year later, Max and Mary moved to Douglas, where he was operator for the Northwestern for ten years. In March 1928, he became associated with the Converse County Bank.

In 1924, Max was elected to the town council to serve a four-year term, during which the water bond issue was resolved. Max was a member of the Masonic Order and the Douglas Kiwanis Club and was elected to the State Legislature as a Representative in 1926. He served five regular terms and was appointed by Governor Miller to serve on a special tax committee. Max sponsored the bill which largely governs the present motor vehicle laws. The numbering system for motor vehicle licenses, based on population, is a portion of his bill. On March 13, 1937, one week after his 46th birthday, Max died as a result of a gangrenous appendectomy.

Mary and Max Russell had three children, Lillian B., (1914), Doyle L. (1916), and Mary Lucille (1919). Doyle attended the University of Wyoming and continued in the banking profession until volunteering for service in the Army Air Corps. In 1941, Doyle married Fayettea Roush and their daughter, Leslie Gay, was born in 1943. As a pilot in the Army Air Corps, Doyle flew B-17's in World War II and reached the rank of Major before his plane was shot down and he was killed in 1944. Mary and Max's daughter, Mary Lucille, married Clark F. McIntosh of Cheyenne in 1941 and had two daughters, Lynn Mary (1944) and Connie Jo (1946).

Lillian, the eldest Russell child, was graduated from Converse County High School in 1931. She was employed by the County Assessor's Office until her marriage to J. Emmett Carver in 1932. Emmett and Lillian had two daughters, Beverly Ann (1934) and Judith Maxine (1943). Lillian was actively involved in activities associated with the First Methodist Church. She was the first Honored Queen of the International Order of Job's Daughters in Wyoming to become Wyoming State Grand Guardian.

After serving as secretary to the Converse County Selective Service Board for a number of years, Lillian served as Superintendent of Livestock at the Wyoming State Fair for many years. In 1958, she once again returned to work in the Converse County Assessor's Office, this time serving as Deputy. Lillian held this position until retirement in 1969 when she and Emmett moved to Sun City, Arizona, where Lillian died on August 31, 1983.

J. Emmett Carver, born on July 12, 1903, in Crocker, Missouri, attended college in Highland, Kansas and later the University of Missouri and the University of Wyoming. Emmett came to Wyoming in 1929, where he was employed as a teacher at Dry Creek and in Douglas at the North and South Grade Schools. Preceding Emmett in Wyoming were his sisters Edna Carver Umphrey and Peg Carver Poulson. The Umphreys homesteaded in Niobrara County and the John Poulsons homesteaded near Walker Creek, where they both taught. Scott Carver arrived in 1930, taught at Dry Creek and then at Douglas, later becoming an administrator. He served as a Principal in the Douglas School System, retiring in 1970 after 40 years of service.

From 1936 to 1937, Emmett worked as a bookkeeper for Hern Chevrolet. In 1937, he purchased the Standard Service Station which he operated for five years before becoming a sales representative for Standard Oil Company. In December of 1945, Emmett and Lillian purchased the Kandy Koop and ran this thriving business until Emmett subsequently began work at the Douglas Post Office, a position which he held until retirement on November 8, 1968.

Dugan, Harry S. and Wilma

Harry S. Dugan came to Wyoming in the summer of 1917 from Iowa. With his brother, Charles Dugan, Clifford Shields, and Charles Tompkins, they all homesteaded thirty-two miles northwest of Douglas, Sections 3-4-10, Township 36, Range 73 and Section 34, Township 37, Range 73.

In March 1918, Harry Dugan shipped an emigrant car of livestock, farm machinery and household goods to Douglas, Wyoming. He also, at this time, brought his wife, Wilma, and two sons, Russell and Raymond.

They only stayed a week as Mr. Dugan received a message from Iowa that his sick father was much worse. So he put his livestock back in the emigrant car and went back to Page Center, Iowa.

Harry Dugan again brought his wife and two sons to Douglas, Wyoming on May 2, 1920 to go to the homestead on Section 4, Township 36, Range 73.

Charles Dugan, Clifford Shields and Charles Tompkins came to Douglas and, with Harry Dugan, the four of them purchased a new Fordson Tractor and plow. Also a new Model T Ford. They took the body off the car, made a seat over the gas tank and a box on the back, like a pick-up today. They used this vehicle to haul gasoline, oil, plow shares, and groceries to the homestead where they were plowing forty acres on each of the four sections.

While one man was plowing, the other three were building a house or a homestead shack, as they were called then, on each section.

When they had completed the four houses and the plowing of forty acres on each section, they built a fence around the four sections, making it one big pasture. With the plowing finished, houses built and fence completed, they went out and plowed for other homesteaders that needed plowing done so they could prove up.

In 1921, Harry planted some corn, wheat, oats and five acres of alfalfa. He also built a second house sixteen by sixteen feet. It was ten feet to the rafters with a pitched roof. He put in an eight foot ceiling. This left enough room for the bedrooms upstairs.

In 1922 and 1923 we had 160 acres of crops and a garden of about five acres. In 1923 our mother canned over 100 quarts of peas. Also a lot of other vegetables.

We went to school in 1921-1922-1923 at Williams Flat with Fishers, Domsallas, Kurtzs, Numrichs, Terrells and Parrishs. They were all homesteaders' children. It was about five miles to school so we rode a horse through rain, snow, cold or good old sunshine. Sometimes it was a little rough.

Raymond bought twenty-five leghorn chickens in 1923 and joined a chicken club, a forerunner of the 4-H.

We bought a gilt pig with money they earned driving cows from Orpha to the homestead. We walked all the way. We showed both the chickens and the pig at the State Fair in Douglas.

In 1923 Dad planted about  $\frac{1}{4}$  acre of Wills Sugar Watermelons. We would take two melons a day to school in the nose bag on the horse we rode.

On May 2, 1924, the family left Wyoming and moved back to Iowa.

The four years we lived in Wyoming was a great and enjoyable experience. We have many fond memories of Wyoming.

Raymond Dugan now lives in Boulder, Colorado and Russell lives in Loveland, Colorado.

Dull, Walter and Mary Family

My father, Walter B. Dull was born December 11, 1868. My mother, Mary L. Martin, was born October 5, 1871. They were married September 17, 1889, in Union County, Ohio. From this union fourteen children were born, eight boys and six girls:

Homer Dull	February 24, 1891
Fenton Dull	December 26, 1892
Ira Dull	March 13, 1894
Denver Dull	January 8, 1896
Kenova Dull	November 7, 1897
Verbel Dull	April 13, 1900
Thurston Dull	March 21, 1902
Lee Dull	October 3, 1903
Arizona Dull	June 25, 1905
Winona Dull	October 17, 1907
Lottie Dull	February, 1909 (died April, 1909 at age 2 months)
Vernon Dull	September 29, 1910
Berdna Dull	October 16, 1912
Walter Dull, Jr.	June 22, 1914

During these years Dad farmed at two locations, the last being what was then known as the Case Farm, about three miles from Broadway, Ohio.

In 1915, Dad sold his farm and invested in a hardware store in Broadway, Ohio.

In May of 1917, Dad took four of his sons, Thurston,

Walter and Mary Dull

Lee, Denver and me (Vernon), and our dog, Bounce and headed west from Ohio in a 1913 Model T touring car. My brother, Denver, then 22, had tuberculosis and the doctor said that a dry climate might help him. Mother and the rest of the family stayed in Broadway until Dad could find a location. I was six years old and I remember how we camped out along the way. It was late in May when we arrived in Douglas, Wyoming, and made camp near the Platte River which is now the City Park. Dad, Thurston and Lee soon found work at the Morton Ranch. I stayed at the camp with Denver.

During this time Dad was looking for a homestead location where there was timber. He found the place he wanted along the Cheyenne River below the Fiddleback Ranch, 60 miles northeast of Douglas. He filed on a homestead there.

When money was available, Dad sent for Mother, Verbel, Arizona, Winona, Berdena and Walter, Jr. The rest of the family were married and had homes of their own and they stayed in Ohio.

We lived on the campground in Douglas in tents most of the summer. Mother cooked on a sheet iron camp stove outside of the tents for the eleven of us.

The last week in August we moved to the homestead. On the first trip, Dad took Thurston and Lee and the dog. They had the old Ford loaded to the limit. Dad set up a tent and left Thurston and Lee and the dog and went back to Douglas for another load. The boys did all right. They were brave. After all, they had their dog with them and he was a good watch dog. Along toward evening, the coyotes started to howl. There were a lot of them there in those days and they were close to camp. The boys didn't get scared until the dog came into the tent with his tail between his legs and they realized that he was really scared. That was quite an experience for them.

It took several trips to town to get us all moved to our new location. One of the times when we had the old Model T really loaded, one of us kids handed Dad a piece of sandpaper and said, "Here, Dad, let's take this." Dad looked at it and said, "No, we just don't have room for it." For years afterward, when someone mentioned sandpaper, we would all laugh. We never let Dad forget that.

We lived in tents until a cabin could be built. Mother had to cook on an open campfire. She had a large dutch oven that she could bury in the hot coals. I remember how good the biscuits tasted that were baked in it.

Denver's health hadn't improved. He needed his own cabin. Ira came from Ohio to help in building the cabins. Denver's log cabin, a 10' by 12', was completed first.

The main cabin was a large one built out of logs with small poles placed on the roof. These were covered with cottonwood leaves. We put gumbo on top of the leaves. When this dried, it shed water and snow. The logs in the walls were chinked and plastered with mud. It had no floor except dirt which packed down to a hard surface. Our heating system was a stone fireplace which also served as a cook stove. Ira kept us kids on the job carrying water, rock, gumbo and leaves. He would say, "Hey, you kids, while you're resting, fetch some more mud, rock or leaves." Our family lived in this cabin for several years. The temperature in winter got as low as 42 degrees below zero.

Plans for a school were in progress with Verbel as the teacher. She would need to go to Douglas for the exams sometime in the winter. Otherwise, she could teach on a permit at $50.00 a month, with the stipulation that she attend summer school at Laramie. One year would equip her for a four year accredited education. Even so, she must continue to attend school every summer for current qualifications.

School was started the first fall in a tent between the main cabin and Denver's cabin with Dull pupils.

Dad, Ira, Thurston and Lee did a lot of trapping and hunting that first winter. We lived off the land. We lived on rabbits, antelope, wild ducks and sage chickens.

Denver's health got worse in early January 1918 and then he died on the 28th of that month. Our nearest neighbors were the Patterson brothers who lived two miles down the river. Mrs. Patterson helped Mother bathe and dress Denver for burial and the two Mr. Pattersons took the body in their Model T touring car and started for Douglas the next morning. Dad, Mother, Verbal and Arizona followed them in our Model T. Winona, Berdena, Walter and I stayed with Mrs. Patterson. Thurston and Lee stayed in our cabin.

When Dad, Mother and the girls got about 20 miles from home, a blizzard struck. It was so cold that Dad's car stalled. They all got out and walked. They had to go about five miles to the Sewalt place where they had shelter through the night. They were almost frozen and Mother's varicose veins were bad so they were very grateful for the shelter.

The Pattersons had gone on and they got word to Vic DeMott at the Box Creek Ranch and he came the next day and took them to town. The funeral was the next day. That was one of the sad and hard things the pioneers had to face.

The Patterson brothers were hunters and trappers and they ran greyhounds. I remember seeing them come past our cabin in the evening with twelve to 14 greyhounds following the horses. That was quite a sight for us. I have had a love for greyhounds ever since. The following year the Pattersons left the country and we bought a team of horses from them. One was a bay and the other was white. We called them George and Grey. They were broke to work and ride. They were good horses and we used them for years, mostly for riding. My dad used to take Grey when he went hunting. He always said that when he got ready to shoot, Grey would hold his breath. I know this is true because I have hunted off of him myself and he would always hold his breath when I was ready to shoot. I told that story to some people from California recently and they wouldn't believe it. They just had a good laugh over it and said it was quite a story, but it is the truth.

During the summer of 1918, a log school house was built near the main cabin.

The next couple of years brought many changes. For one thing, more of our family moved to Wyoming. My grandmother, Marietta Dull; my brother, Fenton, his wife, Erma, and daughter, Doris, came to the Cheyenne River and filed on homesteads. Ira also moved his wife, Ora, and sons, Charles and Roger, out to his homestead.

What a joy it was when other people took up homesteads around us. We had neighbors and what a blessing they were. The Bert Good family, the Nachtmans, the Blakes and the Rothleutners were some of the first. Neighbors meant so much to us in those days. In fact, they became our very dear friends. Even our school was a lot more fun. There were Good kids along with the Dull kids. When the county superintendent came to visit our school, she went back to Douglas and told the people that she had visited the Good-Dull School. Later on, a frame school house was built near Rattlesnake Creek near the Nachtmann Ranch. It was named the Bethany School. It became a community gathering place and a while later a Sunday school was started there by Rev. Noyce of Wheatland.

The Sadler family and the Schmidt brothers homesteaded in the area also. Louie Arnold homesteaded across the river from us. He is the one who gave me the nickname of Stubb. One day I rode by where he and a neighbor were building a fence. I was riding Old Grey and my legs were too short to reach the stirrups, so I put my feet in the straps above the stirrups. Louie looked up and said, "Hello, Stubby. Get down and rest a while." That has been my nickname ever since.

Louie Arnold was a talented musician. His music on the guitar or violin was something to hear, especially the violin. When he played the violin, people just couldn't sit still. He used to say to me, "Stubby, if you can whistle, you can play the violin." Guess I couldn't whistle well enough, anyhow, I never could play the violin. People loved to dance to his music.

The Dull Center, Wyoming Post Office was established in 1921 and my dad was the first postmaster. The post office was located in the old log school house. Later, we built a new frame house and the post office was moved to our house. My dad was postmaster until his death in 1932.

In the spring of 1932, both my dad and mother were stricken with Rocky Mountain Spotted Fever. They were taken to the hospital in Douglas. Mother was not expected to live, but dad seemed to be improving. Suddenly, dad got worse and died at the age of 63½ years in May 1932. Mother recovered and lived for many years. Through the years, we milked cows and sold cream while we built up a range herd. It was my job to take care of the stock, and I loved it. I filed on a section of land in 1931. During the years after dad's death, Mother homesteaded 640 acres of land (as a widow). She lived on her homestead with Berdena, Walter and me for the three years required to prove the claim.

When the drought came in 1934 and the market was bad, many people had to sell their cattle. The market was closed and the government was buying cattle. That was the year we sold our cattle. Mother spent some time visiting in Ohio, and then she moved to Douglas and spent her declining years there. She died at the age of 79 years, 10½ months on August 21, 1951. Both dad and mother are buried in the cemetery at Douglas.

I have lived and worked in Colorado for 49 years and I have many good friends here. I have learned to love the mountains, but no place will ever take the place of Wyoming in my heart. There is something about the wide open spaces and getting on a good horse and riding through those draws looking for cattle that is like nothing else in the world to me. I will always have a deep love for Wyoming.

Duncan, Hugh and Blanche

Hugh Duncan was born June 15, 1902 on the Island of Butte, Scotland, to Ninian and Alice Esplin Duncan. His mother and father were both born in Scotland. Hugh was educated in the schools of Scotland and Wyoming. He followed his parents to Wyoming in 1914. His father came to Wyoming in 1908 and worked for several of the old outfits; including Dave Kidd, and for a period of time he worked for the Richards-Cunningham Grocery. In 1917 he became a partner with the Nicholaysen family in the Cole Creek Sheep Company. In 1919 he homesteaded on an acreage in Converse County.

As a youth, Hugh herded milk cows in a combined herd for many of the Casper residents. He herded the cows, at will, in the hills around Casper, in the Hilltop area, and returned each cow to its respective owner each night. Hugh had been on his own since an early age. He purchased his present ranch in 1934. The ranch represents a number of old homesteads.

Hugh Duncan was married to Blanche Kassis, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Abe Kassis, of Casper, Wyoming, On July 9, 1929. Mrs. Duncan's father and mother were born in Lebanon and came to the United States in the 1800s. Mr. Kassis homesteaded in North Dakota and after moving to Casper, he established a grocery store and later a dry goods store. The dry goods store developed into several branches, which are still in operation by the family. Mr. and Mrs. Duncan are the parents of three children; Mary M., now Mrs. Joseph Liseck, Hugh MacKay, a Casper attorney, and Bernard Joseph, a graduate of St. Regis College, Denver, Colorado. There are six grandchildren.

Hugh Duncan was interested in the economic development of Wyoming. He served tirelessly on many committees toward that objective. He was active in Soil Conservation District boards and on Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Committees. He served as County Commissioner for Converse County from 1963-1980.

Hugh passed away in January 1980. O.L. Nicholls

Dunn, Joe, Anna and Margaret

Joseph Dunn was born August 25, 1873, at Marshall, Colorado, the youngest son of Patrick and Margaret Dunn. In 1888, Joe helped move the rest of the Dunn cattle from Boulder, Colorado to Harrison, Nebraska after they settled near Harrison in 1886. Joe and his brother, John, came to Converse County about 1892. They worked for Jim Moran, herding cattle, and Joe was a round-up cook. John didn't stay very long, but Joe spent most the rest of his life here. He worked for Silas and Bill Guthrie on LaBonte. There was no bunkhouse, so the hired men slept in the haymow in the barn until they could make a bunkhouse. Joe first saw Bill Guthrie the day Bill got back from the Johnson County War. They were working sheep that day and Bill must have been very agitated; he was so rough with the sheep that he killed some of them. The Gunny-sack War was about that time, a war between the sheep and cattle men. Joe went on a hazardous mission to Montana to help recover livestock stolen by the rustlers.

Joe and John Dunn attended a big masquerade ball in Douglas in 1897. Joe went to Denver to work as an apprentice to learn the saddle and harness making trade, but the lure of the west called him and he returned to the LaBonte area, where in 1899, he was married to Anna Patterson, daughter of the Taylor Pattersons. They ranched several years and then moved to Douglas, where he and his brother-in-law, Luke Patterson, had a barber shop and pool hall and his wife, Anna, ran the Goodwin Rooming House.

L. to r.: Joe Dunn, Margaret Dunn, Ralph Dunn 1950

Joe was a lifelong Catholic, and helped build the Catholic Church in Douglas in 1912; he worked on the basement.

In 1919, they started ranching at the Sam Dewey place west of Douglas until 1925 when Anna died. Later, he ranched on Henry Bolln's place on the Platte River, where a big water wheel turned for irrigation.

In 1938, he was united in marriage to Margaret Hunter Carroll Oestreich, a lifelong school teacher, who was the daughter of pioneer Judge Hunter of Harrison, Nebraska. Joe had courted her as a youth. They ranched west of Douglas with her brother, Tom Hunter, and later on LaBonte with Margaret's son, Bill Carroll, and family, until ill health forced his retirement. They moved to Glenrock, Wyoming and bought a house, renting apartments in their home, later selling that to Albert Sewell. They went to Redding, California to be near the Bill Carrolls who were living there. They returned in 1961 to Harrison, where Joe died in 1963, and Margaret died in 1967.

In 1953, Joe Dunn and numerous members of the Dunn family went out to the old place near Harrison, Nebraska and located the unmarked grave of Johnny Connely, the scout, who died in 1887, and carried stones and laid in the form of a cross to mark the grave. Connely had no relatives that he knew of when he died, and lived up in the mountains from Marshall before going to Harrison, Nebraska with the Dunns in 1886.

Dunn, John and Pansy Family

John Dunn was born in Council Bluffs, Iowa on August 10, 1885. His parents were Stephen T. and Matilda Segrist Dunn of Lake Superior, Wisconsin. There were ten children in the family, John being the fifth child. At the age of twelve his mother passed away. Within the same year John accidentally shot his right arm off, at the shoulder, while crawling through a fence with a shotgun.

John struck out on his own in 1899 at the age of 14, catching a ride on the train as far as Chugwater, Wyoming where he was thrown off by the conductor. He spent the winter at Chugwater employed as a bellhop in a hotel. He herded sheep in the Big Horn Mountains and in the Downey Park area when he first came to Wyoming. He "cowboyed" on several ranches all over the state before he decided to homestead his own place. He filed on a homestead down by Lance Creek but the mountains were where his heart was. He took up a homestead south of Douglas on Reid Creek in 1916. While proving up on his own place he also worked for other ranchers in the area.

Even though there was a lot of work to do in the pioneering days, John still found time to court some of the young ladies, one of them being Miss Pansy Braae, a school "mom." On December 20, 1920, John Dunn and Pansy Braae made the journey to Douglas for the wedding of Pansy's sister, Grace Braae, to Vern Lockhart. John and Pansy went on to Lusk, Wyoming to visit John's sister, Ellen Mayfield; and they were united in marriage at Ellen's home on December 22, 1920.

Court Smith, homesteaded the Dunn ranch.

Pansy Braae was the oldest of four children of Anthon and Minnie Lester Braae. She was born June 7, 1899 at Chugwater, Wyoming. Anthon Braae was employed by the railroad so the family lived in several locations in South Dakota, Nebraska and Wyoming. They moved to Douglas in 1916. Minnie Braae passed away in 1918, the same year that Pansy graduated from high school in Douglas. Pansy lived with her Aunt Hattie Braae and her family at Braae, Wyoming when she started teaching school in the mountains. Pansy continued to teach at the various country schools in the area after her marriage to John on December 22, 1920. They moved from the homestead house to the Charlie Saul Ranch on Reid Creek where they combined working for Charlie, John working his place and Pansy continued to teach. She also took some time off to go to the University of Colorado at Boulder for some summer school courses.

In 1926 there was a place for sale up on the next hill west of the Saul place. It had belonged to Frank Smith who was killed in the war. His family sold it to John and Pansy. There was not even a fencepost on it, so John and Pansy started building. Undaunted by handicaps and environment, John struggled to carve out of sagebrush a productive ranch. With the constant companionship and aid of his wife, he succeeded.

Mr. and Mrs. John Dunn have one son, Robert, and six grandchildren.

Activities of the Dunns included; John served on the Federal Land Bank Board. Pansy was a charter member of LaBonte Homemakers Club and served 30 years on the local school board.

John passed away December 20, 1976. Pansy died October 24, 1981.

Dunn, Philip and Lenora Family

Philip Dennis Dunn was born near Ottumwa, Iowa, in 1864. He was the third child of Patrick and Margaret Dunn, both natives of Ireland. In 1866, the family moved in a covered wagon to the South Boulder Valley in Colorado. The Indians were very restless, and the scout saw them having a war dance but the wagons were not attacked. The Dunns bought some land from Mike Shanahan and built a home near Marshall, Colorado where they milked about 30 cows, set the milk in pans in the cellar, skimmed the cream with a skimmer, made butter and packed it in wooden barrels. They hauled the butter to a mining town in the mountains where butter brought $1 a pound.

In 1885, Phil's brother, Richard Dunn, and Johnny Hogan came up to Wyoming to about where Glenrock is now, with a covered wagon and a saddle horse. They liked the country and decided to settle there. They returned to Boulder, planning on coming back the next year. However, when they came, bringing a plow, the mine had opened at Glenrock, so they went back to Colorado, then went to an area near Harrison, Nebraska to settle. So, in 1886, Phil, Rich, Pat and Tom Dunn (his brothers) and Johnny Connely (who had been a scout with Kit Carson) took some cattle to the place near Harrison. About this time Johnny Connely died. He had been a scout in the Laramie Peak area and often expressed a wish that they all go to the "high country". He was buried at the foot of a hill with a pine tree on it in sight of the "dug-out" where the Dunns lived, on land later owned by Phil Dunn before he sold out and came to Converse County in 1919.

Philip was married to Lenora Sherrill in 1894 in Harrison, Nebraska. They ranched north of Harrison, raising their six children; Mary, Elizabeth, Edith, Clarence, Ralph and Ruth in a small sod-roof house. In 1919, they sold out and bought the Ft. Fetterman Ranch which they operated until 1923, selling out and moving to Casper where Philip died in 1927.

Lenora Dunn was born at Leadville, Colorado in 1879 and her mother's family were descendants of French Huguenots. After Phil's death she lived with her daughter, Mary Bruner, in the LaBonte Community, and also with her other children. The Dunns were devout Catholics. Lenora died in Douglas in 1951. Mary, Elizabeth and Edith Dunn taught schools in Converse County a few years.

Elizabeth was married to John Holland at Douglas, Wyoming where he was a Western Union operator and later became a Chicago and Northwestern Railroad operator working at Lusk, Wyoming and at Parkerton, Wyoming which is abandoned now, but was west of Glenrock. They had five children; Ruth, Iris, Jack, Glenn and Ralph.

Iris Holland was killed in a tragic car accident between Glenrock and Parkerton in 1936. Four girls, two on each side, were riding on the running board of the McElhinney car when it was sideswiped by another car, killing the two on that side. Iris was 13 years of age and Leona McElhinney was 17, were killed. The other two sisters, Winifred McElhinney and Ruth Holland on the other side of the car were not hurt seriously.

The family moved in 1938 to Logan, Iowa. John Holland died in 1960 and Elizabeth in 1965.

Ruth Holland graduated from the Glenrock High School and married Bill Delph of Indianapolis. They had three children; Shirley, Linda and Larry.

Jack Holland died at the age of four days. Glenn married Bonnie Hughes and lives at Pomeroy, Iowa where he is a truck dispatcher. They have six children; Debbie, Scott, Michelle, Jack, Tony and Brad.

Ralph Holland married Beverly Peterson and lives in Indianapolis. They have seven children; Chad, Lori, Vana, Tawna, Teir, Shay and Lynk.

Edith Dunn was married to Roger Holden who worked at the Texas Refinery in Casper most of his life. They had four children; Kenneth, Gordon, Patricia and Betty. Kenneth married Gloria Carroll and is a geologist for Kerr-McGee, living at Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. They have three children; Linda, John and Lisa.

Gordon Holden married Mary Runnion Kennedy and worked for the Texas Refinery in Casper for many years. They have two children, Wendy and Erik. Gordon was a star basketball player at the University of Wyoming partly due to his height, 6'7" tall.

Patricia Holden married Bob Moll and lives at San Jose, California. They have two children; Cynthia and Linda. Patricia was painfully injured one time when she was a girl and was spending some time at the Bruner Ranch. They were haying at the Willox Ranch and the team ran away, dragging her through the rocks and cactus.

Betty Holden married Harry Whitner of Denver, Colorado who was associated with Texas Pacific Coal and Oil Co. They have two children; Lee Ann and David.

Edith Holden lives in the Senior Citizen High Rise in Casper.

Clarence Dunn came to Ft. Fetterman ranch with his family and worked on various ranches, mostly in Converse County, all of his life. At an early age he started riding and breaking horses. He married Mamie Brow, and they both did well riding bucking horses at the Wyoming State Fair and Cheyenne Frontier Days. They rode at the Calgary Stampede in 1927 and at San Antonio, Texas. Mamie took fourth place on brahma bulls. She also rode bareback horses and did a lot of exhibition rides for so much money a ride.

They had two children; Philip and Dona Lea. Philip married Ann and lives in Alaska and has two children, Lynn and Stacy. Dona Lea married Dewayne Dawes of Douglas at her grandparents ranch, the Pat Brows', and lives near Riverton, Wyoming where Dewayne is a "cat skinner" and they have three children, Susan, Jim and Pat. Clarence was married a second time in later years to Edna Gilbert. He died in Douglas in 1973.

Ralph Francis Dunn was born at Harrison, Nebraska in 1903 and came to Ft. Fetterman while his parents were there. He went to Business College in Casper and started working for Stanoline Oil Co. at Midwest in 1925, later transferred to Tulsa, Oklahoma where he worked for Standard Oil until retiring in 1962. He married Rita Anderson in 1932, who also worked for Standard Oil. They moved to Douglas in 1970 and Ralph died in 1976. Rita is living at their home on North Fifth Street in Douglas.

Ruth Dunn was born in 1906 near Harrison, Nebraska, and after her parents moved to Ft. Fetterman she went to Douglas schools some and graduated from Casper High School. She married John Reber and they had a cattle ranch near Dubois, Wyoming and operated a tie camp in that area. They moved to San Bernadino, California in 1943, where John died in 1969. Ruth lives at Yucaipa, California.

Lenora Dunn's brother, Ben Sherrill and wife, Myrtle, also came to Douglas, Wyoming with the Philip Dunns in the spring of 1919 and lived near Gallagher's place west of Douglas, working for Joe Dunn. Ben was "farmed out" when his mother died and the people who took him tied him in the barn next to a stallion and made him wear shoes that were too little which deformed his feet. He always had big feet, was tall, and said he could wear a size 11, but a 12 felt so much better that he always got a 13. He worked for his room and board for Ferris Bruner in about 1930, after his wife left him. Later he married Theresa Meehl who used to teach school near Pat Brow's ranch. She had a son, Marvin, who married Kathleen Washenfelder. Ben worked for the City of Douglas, had his own truck, and lived in the City Hall. Theresa died of tuberculosis, and he later went to Casper and worked in the Red and White Cafe. He died in Casper about 1969.

Lenora's cousin, Emma Porter, came to Douglas in 1930 and was housekeeper for Marcus Nelson until her death in 1951. Marcus had a little place out north of Douglas where the gas plant is now. Emma and her husband, Samuel Porter, lived in Lusk for a number of years, where she operated a dressmaking and millinery store.

Philip and Joe Dunn were brothers of Richard Dunn who is the father of the "Dunn Bros.", Vernon and Lester Dunn, of Harrison, Nebraska, registered Hereford breeders.

Dunn, Troy and Ellen

Troy Dunn was born February 4, 1895 in Curtis, Nebraska, the son of David and Arminda Dunn.

In 1920, Troy, along with his brothers, Harley and Ira, his sister, Lellie and her husband Bill Jewell, and their Uncle Reilly McMaines, came to Wyoming from Nebraska to homestead. Finding land approximately eight miles northeast of Orpha, all but Ira and Troy staked their claims on it. Ira filed on a piece of land on Walker Creek near Paul LeBar, while Troy settled on Soldier Creek.

Troy was disabled during his service in World War I and had limited activity throughout most of his life.

Ellen M. Rosser married Troy in March, 1928 in Chapel, Nebraska.

They all tried to farm but it was too dry. After proving up all but Troy and Ira sold their sections and moved back to Nebraska. Troy and Ira came back later and disposed of their places.

Our three sons are: Troy L. of San Antonio, Texas; Donald, of Casper; and Kenneth M., who is in the Air Force at Anchorage, Alaska.

Troy died January 4, 1975 in Douglas.

Eastman, William and Vida Family

The first member of the family to come to Wyoming was William R. Eastman (b. May 23, 1887 in Waynesville, Illinois). He came in 1907 to seek his fortune in the west.

In 1911 and 1912, Bill worked and ran sheep on the Irvine Ranch at Irvine on the Platte River and cut logs in the mountains near Esterbrook and hauled them thru the winter on a bob sled to the Burlington railroad for the building of bridges and tressels near Orin.

Bill was a rodeo trick roper and rider from 1908 to 1917 at the age of 21 to age 30. At the age of 27 he won the Roman chariot race at the Wyoming State Fair. The story goes that he was driving 4 half-broken broncs. As a prank, someone had placed some 'itching-powder' in the horse collars to drive the horses crazy and break the stride of the race. Instead, the reaction hit the entire team at once and they broke into a run-a-way; resulting in winning the race and a record time, which stood for many years. Two complete revolutions of the track were made after the race before the exhausted team could be stopped. He and Lem Carmin were instrumental in introducing the chariot race at the State Fair and Frontier Days.

On October 12, 1910 he took out a homestead in the Douglas area.

In 1914, at age 27, he worked on the old Rice place under Sparks Butte on the North Platte River. This was located down river from the Warm Springs-the old Heaton swimming pool. It was known in the Eastman family as "The Old Ranch".

On May 29, 1917 he was married in Denver to Vida R. Leighton of Denver and continued to live on the Rice place for several years (William R. Eastman, Jr. was a baby there). That same year he registered for the draft, World War I, but the war ended before he was called.

Bill moved from the Old Ranch in 1920 to rent the Clark Bishop house in south Douglas. At this time he began developing the New Ranch (under the big hill three miles south of Douglas and just across the river bridge there). This became the 'home' ranch; the Eastman Ranch, which he ran until he finally sold it in October, 1960 to Clarence Nunn and moved to California. Here at the New Ranch he had 360 acres under irrigation and raised wheat, corn, oats, sugar beets and alfalfa.

At about this time the house at the New Ranch was completed and he moved from the Clark Bishop house to the ranch. He then had a house built nearby for his father and mother, Fred and Ellen Eastman, who had come to Converse County several years earlier, along with several daughters (Pauline Carmin). Fred helped him start the ranch and lived there into his early old-age; then visited various daughters until he and Ellen passed away in Oregon.

In January 1922 he moved from the ranch to town and lived in the Joe Alexander house on North Third Street on Antelope Creek until June when he moved into the Brenning house on North Fourth Street. During this period he ran the Eastman Dairy in the north addition of Douglas until the dairy burned and in 1924 he moved back to the ranch.

Bill's family made the final move from the ranch in October 1926 to 420 Cedar Street in Douglas and lived here until they moved to California in 1960. He continued to operate the ranch from Douglas. Bill Tylee (now of Glendo) lived at the ranch as his foreman through the 1930s and early 1940s.

During his farming and ranching years at Douglas he owned 7½ sections of land along the east side of the Platte River, beginning with the Scoggins homestead and including all of Spark's Butte and several of his sisters homesteads. It was known to us as "The Big Pasture", and included the Warm Springs Flat across from Heaton's swimming pool. For many years the only way onto the "flat" was via horseback, down a hazardous trail off the summit of Spark's Butte, or by boat or canoe across the river. Much later, a road was blasted and bulldozed down off the butte and in the 1950s he installed a big pump in the river and farmed the Warm Springs Flat under irrigation to corn and alfalfa. Into the 1940s, this flat contained one of the largest prairie dog towns in the Douglas area. Because of its isolation, his son, Bill Jr., was all for preserving it; so much so, that when he decided to poison the 'town' the story circulated around Douglas that Bill put out the poison and his son, Billy, followed behind him throwing out the antidote. In addition to the Big Pasture, he also owned and leased land on Bedtick Creek, adjacent to the main ranch and across the river from the Big Pasture. He ran sheep and cattle on both of these areas and raised crops on the irrigated ranch. He usually wintered his sheep there and summered them up on Bar-M Mountain and out onto the Laramie Plains around the post office location called Marshall.

In 1934, he leased the 4W Ranch from the Sherwin family of Sterling, Colorado. This ranch was located on the north fork of the Cheyenne River, partly in the northeast corner of Converse County. Here, he primarily ran sheep until about 1940 when Jim and Gus Sherwin took over the property. Bill then leased the AU7 Ranch further down the river and ran both sheep and cattle there during the war years. In 1943, he gave up the lease because Jiggs Thompson had purchased the AU7. Bill returned to Douglas to continue his ranching operations.

Bill sold out in 1960 and moved first to Los Gatos, California and later to Vacaville. In the later 60s, he and his wife moved to Honolulu, but he shortly became ill and his son, Richard, had to bring him back to Denver, where he passed away in April, 1969. His wife, Vida, still lives in Vacaville.

William R. Eastman, Jr. was born May 29, 1918 in Denver, Colorado and lived in Douglas thru high school. After graduation, he spent a year working on the 4W Ranch with his father. In the fall of 1936, he enrolled at the University of Iowa in Iowa City. His interest was natural history and museum techniques.

Bill, Jr. was married on December 28, 1941 to Maxine E. Peebles, who was born in Douglas in 1919. In 1942, after graduating from SUI, returned to ranching at Douglas and at the AU7. He returned to college at Fort Hays Kansas State in 1945 and received a Masters degree in botany-zoology. He taught there from 1945 to 1954.

Bill became one of the early faculty members in the founding of Central Oregon Community College in Bend, Oregon, in 1954. He taught and built visual teaching aids at the University of New England in Armidale, New South Wales, Australia in 1960 - 1962. Bill authored and illustrated the first field guide to Australian parrots.

While he attended the University of Wyoming in Laramie from 1962 to 1970 he was Agricultural Visual Specialist. From there he accepted a position as Curator of Natural History at the Denver Museum of Natural History from 1970 - 1972 and became Curator of Natural History and Director of Operations at the Kansas City Museum from 1972 to 1982, retiring in April of 1982.

Another son, Richard Leighton Eastman was born in Douglas, Wyoming on April 7, 1921.

He married Betty Jo Mitchell on July 22, 1944 at Brownsville, Texas. They were divorced in July 1964 at Denver, Colorado.

Betty Jo Mitchell was born in Muskogee, Oklahoma on April 16, 1923. She died in Jackson, Louisiana on December 23, 1980.

Richard and Betty had two daughters: Mary Margaret Eastman and Rebecca Kay Eastman.

Mary Margaret Eastman was born in Riverton, Wyoming on September 30, 1945. She was married to Marshall Ellenstein on August 22, 1970, at Oak Ridge, Tennessee. Marshall Ellenstein was born in Chicago, Illinois on May 28, 1941. Mary Margaret and Marshall are living in Chicago, Illinois and are both teaching. They have no children.

Rebecca Kay Eastman was born in Riverton, Wyoming, on January 26, 1947. She was married to Thomas Monroe Quinney, Jr., on February 28, 1965, at Gallion, Alabama. Thomas was born in Alabama in 1943. He was killed in the United States Air Force on March 13, 1966, at Sacramento, California.

Rebecca Kay Quinney married Roger Dale Crowson on December 30, 1968, at Jackson, Mississippi. Roger was born on November 27, 1949.

Rebecca and Roger have three children: Ashley Kyre, Chase Brantley and Jeremy Cade. Ashley Kyre Crowson was born in Tuscaloosa, Alabama on February 19, 1971. Chase Brantley Crowson was born in Jackson, Mississippi on September 1, 1972 and Jeremy Cade Crowson was born in Vicksburg, Mississippi on October 8, 1975.

Rebecca, Roger and children are living in Frankfurt, Germany. Roger is employed by the United States Army Corp of Engineers. He is an earthquake specialist.

Richard Leighton Eastman married Carole Ann Summitt at Denver, Colorado, on August 29, 1965. Carole Ann was born at Muscatine, Iowa on January 13, 1934.

Richard was a radio and aircraft technician in Texas during World War II. After the war he moved to Riverton, Wyoming, where his two daughters were born. In 1950 he moved to Denver, Colorado, where he worked as an electrician.

In 1967, he and Carole founded Eastman Electric Company, an electrical contracting corporation, which they operated until 1982. In December of 1982 they moved to Phoenix, Arizona. Carole is presently enrolled at Arizona State University, working on her master's degree in Counseling. Richard is semi-retired, and enrolled at Glendale Community College, where he is working on his Associate Degree in Electronic/Computer Engineering.

Eaton, Arthur and Florence

My husband, Arthur Eaton, and I, Florence, rode all night on the Chicago Northwestern train from Nebraska and arrived in Lost Springs, Wyoming, the latter part of March 1912. He wanted to go immediately to his homestead, which was about eight miles west of Lost Springs. . .there was no town of Shawnee at that time. He asked the section foreman if we could ride out on the hand car with him. The homestead was about one-fourth of a mile north of the tracks. The house was a dugout in a hill. The only furnishing was a bunk and a stove. It had a door but no windows.

We stayed there that night but when morning came, we couldn't get out of the house. A blizzard had come during the night and the doorway was covered with a large snowdrift. The door opened to the outside. After a while, we could hear the railroad hand car coming down the track, so my husband poked his gun through the roof and shot two or three times. The men heard the shots and came and dug us out.

We stayed there two or three days and then we went to a cattle ranch to work. We stayed at the ranch two or three months and then we went to a coal mine to work. I was the cook for the miners. We had a kitchen and a long room for the dining room. At first, there weren't many workers at the mine until the manager brought in about twenty-five men from Omaha. They were of several nationalities and none could speak English.

The manager cut down on our food allowance, but not too much at first. When those twenty-five men came in to eat they all came at once and they were hungry. The manager had only allowed a certain amount of bacon for their breakfast. I would cook it and serve it on one platter. The first eight or ten men would take so much of it that there wasn't any for the rest of the crew. The manager asked me to put two strips on each man's plate.

That was rather difficult to do when they all sat down to eat at one time. Well I quit!

We then moved to another coal mine which was much smaller and nearer our homestead. It had a small dining room where I did the cooking. Our bed was also in that room. The building was very cold in the winter as the inside had never been finished.

The owners' father-in-law worked at the mine. He was a Civil War Veteran and every month when he received his government check, it went for liquor. He would get so drunk. He would stand on the floor and give jumps and "holler every time he jumped." I guess he saw snakes. One time, he hid his bottle in the stove in their bunk house. I found it and I hid it. He never saw me get it, but he knew that I was the one who took it.

Once during the winter, it was very cold and we had very little food at the mine. The owner had gone somewhere. He was broke so we figured that he was trying to get some business for the mine. A young fellow, about twenty years old, was working there. He told me that he was going out and bring in some meat so that we would all have something to eat. When he returned, he brought in some fresh meat. I was scared when I saw it. I was afraid that the sheriff might be along. That meat was sure good, but was I glad when it was gone.

We were at this mine for over a year. Vicki, our daughter, was born while we were there, however, I did go to the hospital in Douglas, Wyoming for this event.

By this time, my husband had built one room on the homestead. It had a dirt roof and the walls were what I believe is now called "rammed earth." It had windows and two doors. There was a sort of sod shanty on the side for wood and coal. The inside of our room was lined with twelve-inch unfinished boards. Even the floor boards were unfinished. The lumber was green so it shrank and warped a lot and there were rattlesnakes around. The lumber for the room was purchased from a small, local sawmill.

I went to town and bought some white or light gray building paper and my good friend and neighbor, Mrs. Haley, who lived on a homestead a half mile away, helped me put it on the ceiling and walls. We used tin brads about the size of a half dollar with tacks to drive into the middle of each brad. I had a clean looking room. My stove was kept shining. I had no dresser so I sawed three or four boards and nailed them to the walls to store my flat pieces. I hung a curtain over the front. We had another long board in one corner where we hung our clothes with a curtain over that.

A family, the Harrison Eastons who lived a quarter of a mile away, had a well where I would walk to get my drinking and cooking water. They also lived in a "dug-out." It was a large room dug into a bank. Later on, they added a frame room. Mr. Easton was a carpenter and was gone most of the time working for others. They had two or three girls and the mother was expecting again. The baby came in the night. The oldest girl was six years old and she brought things for her mother to care for the new one. When morning came and it was light, the little girl walked to the railroad section house, which was a half mile along the railroad, to get the Section Foreman's wife to come and help her mother. When this little girl was about 12 years old, she went to the field with a team of horses and a disc. The horses ran away and the girl was killed.

Water for cleaning and washing was hauled to us in a fifty-gallon barrel by a neighbor who had a team and wagon. When I went to get drinking water at the hand-dug well, I had to let a bucket, tied to a rope, down to the water. When I heard a splash, I would pull on the rope, which was on a pulley, and I would draw the bucket of water up. I would take Vicki on one arm and a bucket of water on the other hand and walk home that quarter of a mile.

One day a cowboy stopped to tell me that my neighbor, Nora Davies, would like for me to come visit her. She lived a mile away. I had started to bake bread so I put the dough in a flour sack and tied it around my neck, took Vicki in my arms and away I went.

Homesteading was a hard, lonesome life and it was fun to go and spend a day or two with another homestead wife. It was necessary that we live on the homestead for part of the year in order to prove up on it. Most of the men worked away from their homesteads, some being gone several weeks or months at a time, so most of the neighbors were women. Later, when Nora got a horse and buggy, we would go to Lost Springs to shop and to Sunday School and to church on Sundays. Often Nora's mother, Mrs. Tillie Haley, would go with us. A round trip was about seventeen miles.

It was all open range with no fences anywhere. There were lots of range cattle and, of course, I was afraid of them. One night, I heard the door knob rattling. I had a small hand gun and I tried to shoot toward the door. The gun wouldn't go off. If it had, I would have had a beef as it was rubbing its nose on the door knob. Of course, I would have had to spend some time in the state penitentiary, as killing someone else's beef was a serious crime.

Another baby was on its way and our son, Gerald, was born in Douglas in November.

In January of 1914, I was almost out of food, as was my neighbor, Mrs. Haley, who had an eight-year-old nephew, Lee Swickhamer, living with her. It was cold and the snow on the level ground was up to my knees. She took care of my two babies, Vicki who was one year and seven months old and Gerald, who was two months old, while Lee and I walked three miles and flagged down a slow train at a box car siding. We rode the other five miles into town, bought groceries and took the train back to the siding. We had the groceries in a flour sack. We then walked the three miles home. I had no overshoes, just high top shoes, and in those days there were no slacks. I didn't even catch a cold.

I left Wyoming that January. A neighbor with his team of horses and only a flat box on its wagon, came by. There were no side boards. I asked for a ride to town. I sat up there with my two babies. Cold! Of course, it was! I had a small trunk with clothes in it. I caught the train at Lost Springs and rode all night back to Nebraska. It was morning when I got off the train. There was a mail truck, a two-seated car, that carried the mail to an inland town, about 30 miles away. It was the first car in that part of the country. I had to keep Vicki's head covered up or she would scream. I went to the home of an uncle and aunt who lived five miles farther up.

As a teenager in Nebraska, I remember picking up buffalo chips to burn in our cook stove. I can also remember burning hay to keep warm. It didn't give off much warmth, but it kept you from freezing and it cooked our meals. The hay burner was a large metal container, twice as tall as a wash boiler. You filled it with hay, packing it in tightly. Then you removed the front lids on the stove, turned the boiler upside down and put a match to it. You cooked on the two back lids of the stove. Talk about odor . . . you carried it in your clothes to school, to town, and everywhere. No amount of cologne would have killed it. But then, where we were, we had never heard of cologne in those days.

On September 12, 1982 Florence Davies celebrated her 90th birthday at her home in Coquille, Oregon. A reception for her friends and relatives was held with her daughter, Vicki, and her son, John, planning and hosting.

Florence passed away in May of 1983.

My maternal grandparents, Nora and William Davies, were married a few months more than 50 years when my grandmother passed away. Florence and my grandmother had remained friends since homesteading days, although they lived in different parts of the country. Several years later, my grandfather married Florence and they made their home in Coquille, Oregon.

Florence's daughter, Vicki, has asked me to submit this story which Florence had written for me.

Tom Eberspecher

Eberspecher Family

The Eberspecher brothers were born and raised near Harrison, Nebraska. Their parents, John and Frances Eberspecher, had come to Nebraska in a covered wagon and settled on a homestead in the Hat Creek Valley, north of Harrison, where they resided all of their lives. John and Frances had 13 children. The boys learned farming and ranching at an early age; and when the opportunity came they took out homestead claims in Converse County, Wyoming.

In 1923 Henry was granted a patent and in 1935 his brothers, Tom and Ted, also took homestead sections northwest of Glenrock. They built a house on Tom and Ted's lands. Henry, being the only bachelor, lived with his brothers and their families.

Henry worked at various jobs to supplement his brothers' incomes. He was always helping his brothers and neighbors at various tasks such as breaking horses, shearing, branding, lambing, etc. He worked for many of the large ranches in the area. He spent a lot of time with his nieces and nephews telling them stories. He loved children more than anything and they loved him.

When times were tough for the others and all he had was himself, he'd go to town and buy fruit and candy for the children. They all thought he was Santa Claus. The children often nagged him to get married and have children of his own. He made the hard times seem a lot better with his laughter and kind consideration for others. Henry helped his brothers build their homes and helped them with their land. They all helped each other.

Henry worked hard and thought only of the others and tried to help them get through their hardships. He later married Edith Lutcavish Shaw in Cheyenne on July 28, 1951 and had one son of his own, Richard "Dick", born August 20, 1952. Dick lives in Roswell, New Mexico. Henry died May 16, 1978 in Casper and Edith on July 14, 1983.

Tom Eberspecher married Helen Robinson, daughter of Thomas and Nettie McCormick Robinson, on February 26, 1926 in Torrington, Wyoming. Four of their children were born prior to moving to the homestead in 1935 northwest of Glenrock. They were: Thomas R., William R., Jean M., (Hayman), and Helen Lee (Dean Young). The last three: Catherine R. (Pace), Merelene Jo and Richard M. "Mike" were born later.

They built a ten foot by ten foot house on the homestead. They raised sheep and a few cattle and chickens. The winters were extremely hard. The roads were more like trails. There were many hardships in the winter.

The children were driven to Red Butte School by a team and wagon. The teacher's name at the time was Joy Ash. They went to school there for four years. After the old school was closed down, Helen and the children moved to Glenrock in the winters to go to school, going home on the weekends.

For entertainment the children rode horses, hunted Indian artifacts, and played in the hills. They went with their father herding sheep, hunting firewood, and in the evenings their father sang to them. His favorite songs were Strawberry Roan, Battle Hymn of the Republic, and The Old Rugged Cross.

Helen made all of the children's clothes on a treadle sewing machine. They visited the neighboring homesteaders: Todd Garriotts, Mayme Krebardis, Henry Eberspecher and Ted Eberspecher. They helped each other in order to survive, such as helping each other build their houses. Tom was the only one who had a windmill, as the other people lived near springs.

Once when Tom and Helen went to town to buy groceries, a cloudburst caused a flash flood. The children swam the river on horseback carrying sheep back one by one. The children were raised to take care of any emergency or problem that arose.

Tom often made a breakfast of hot biscuits, fried potatoes, and homemade apple or plum butter. Every year Tom's mother sent each family a winter supply of apple and plum butter. They had the homestead for ten years and then sold out and moved to Idaho where their youngest child, Mike, was born.

Tom died April 7, 1976 and Helen in the summer of 1982.

Ted married Rachel Duncan, daughter of Edward and Anna Duncan, on September 20, 1934. Rachel was born on January 21, 1917 in Harrison, Nebraska. Ted was born on April 24, 1908.

Ted and Rachel Eberspecher moved to their homestead in 1935. They had built their house in the spring and then moved out with their baby daughter, Merdith.

Their house was 12' by 24'. One side had four windows in it. The house is still standing at the Nicolaysen Ranch. (Ted worked for the Nicolaysens at varying times. He wrangled cows and herded sheep for them.)

On their homestead, Ted and Rachel raised a garden, horses, cattle, sheep and chickens. Times were tough and Ted took various jobs to support his family. He rode broncs in rodeos, broke horses, and wrangled cattle or herded sheep. Ted had a great love for horses and spent a lot of time caring for them.

Rachel took pride in her children, garden and chickens. After they lived there a while they had another daughter, Teddie Lou. When Teddie Lou was about two years old she almost died of pneumonia. Rachel stayed with her in the hospital day and night. It took almost all of their money for the hospital and doctors but she pulled through. However, it wasn't long before they were back in good shape again, as Ted always worked to supplement the family's needs.

He adored children and by the time his daughter, Merdith, was two months old he was taking her with him on horseback to wrangle cows. All of the water had to be hauled for a couple of miles, also wood for heat. Some of his horses had strange personalities. Merdith recalled how one horse named Mollie was the most stubborn horse in the world. Ted was hauling wood and this horse was part of a team pulling the wagon. Something made her mad. She laid down and would not get up. Ted finally stuck a big wad of chewing tobacco in her mouth. She got up all right but she kicked the heck out of the wagon. This same horse kicked a friend of Ted's in the head. No one seemed too excited. He was lying in the corner of the corral out like a light.

They laughed and joked about their hardships but also had good times. They went to visit their neighbors, had picnics, went to rodeos, visited relatives, but most of all enjoyed watching their daughters learn and grow. In the winter when there was lots of snow, Ted and Rachel took their two small children sledding. They also had a goat that they hooked up to a wagon and gave the children rides.

One year the snow was so deep that the only way to travel was by horse and sled. Ted's parents, John and Frances Eberspecher sent a hog on a sled for Christmas. Rachel's parents, Ed and Anna Duncan came to visit. They brought the children bedroom slippers. Teddie Lou had never had them before and thought they were to wear to bed. Everyone thought that was pretty funny.

Since the school had closed down they sold out and moved to Glenrock in order to send the girls to school. A few years later they had two more daughters, Lynna Faye and Gail.

Ted worked at the Continental Oil Refinery in Glenrock until it closed then moved to Lusk where he operated a gasoline station until his death on September 22, 1982. Rachel died on May 27, 1980.

Eddy, Leo and Ella

Leo Wilcox Eddy, married to Ella Winifred Fuller, was a salesman in Marshall Fields Department Store in Chicago. He had been married a year when he contracted tuberculosis. His physician gave him two choices, go west or die! He had a friend in Lusk, Wyoming so he left his wife in Michigan, and went west (1909).

He worked as a roustabout on the Mills Ranch and filed on a homestead north of Node, Wyoming. His wife joined him and there were rough years ahead homesteading, drought, prairie fire and little money. He taught the country school and farmed. A son, Robert Joseph, was born in 1914 and a daughter in 1916, Virginia Kathleen. A little daughter, Bernice Fuller was born in 1919 but died at 2½ years of age.

Leo raised Morgan draft horses before and during World War II and the "bottom dropped out" when the war ended leaving him with 32 matched unsaleable teams.

In 1920 he gave up homesteading, sold his holdings and got a job with the Chicago Northwestern Railroad as Section Foreman at Irvine, near Douglas; later in 1932 he was transferred to Orin Junction. In 1939 he was made Roadmaster of the C&NW RR between Chadron, Nebraska and Lander, Wyoming. He and his wife moved to Casper, Wyoming. In 1945 both were killed in an auto accident.

Robert, their son, raised and educated in Converse County joined the Navy, lived in California, then later in Rhode Island where he was a building superintendent until his death in 1980.

Virginia, their daughter, raised in Converse County, graduated from high school there, went to college and nurses training in Michigan, lived there for seven years and then returned to Casper, Wyoming. Of her five children, two lived in Wyoming, Meredith in Cheyenne, James in Laramie. The other three live in California.

Robert has a son, Stephen, in California and three daughters, Karen and Pamela in Delaware, Lucia in Rhode Island. Their children live with them.

Edison, Alfred and Gladys Family

Gladys Baker Edison was born in Amelia, Nebraska on March 20, 1898. She was the eldest of four children born to Olin and Adanella Baker. Her dad worked at various jobs including running a restaurant and a livery stable. Then her family, the Bakers, took a homestead under the Kincaid Act in the sand hills of Nebraska. There, Gladys met Alfred E. Edison who lived on a homestead with his grandparents, as his parents had both died. He was 16 and Gladys was 13 when they attended the same school in the sandhills.

Alfred Edison and Gladys Baker were married on March 30, 1918. Alfred had taken a homestead in Wyoming in 1917 which was located 27 miles northeast of Douglas, three miles from Twenty Mile Creek. Here he brought his new bride in a covered wagon to live. They met two other wagons at New Port, Nebraska and left there with them on April 7, 1918.

On the way, they stayed at the Desmond ranch at Node, Wyoming, during a blizzard. The horses were tied at a straw shed and they ate most of this shed during that blizzard. Mrs. Desmond and Mrs. Edison had quite a good visit during their stay there. Mrs. Desmond told Gladys how to plant tomatoes and gave her other household and gardening hints. Gladys confided to Mrs. Desmond that she would be glad to get to the homestead to do her wash as she was down to her last dish towel. The next day, when the blizzard had broken and they went to leave, Mrs. Desmond gave her some biscuits wrapped in a flour sack and told her to use the new sack for a dish towel. Gladys really appreciated this kindness.

They arrived at the homestead May 1, 1918. They lived in a tent and the covered wagon that first summer. Alfred bought a barn from a homesteader who was leaving and they made their home out of this lumber.

Alfred was one of the lucky homesteaders because he had horses and got jobs at four dollars an acre plowing other homesteader's ground. In order to prove up on a homestead, they had to plow forty acres and cultivate it. However, they didn't have to do this all in one year. Alfred was busy with plowing ground and they weren't able to move into their new homestead home until September 20, 1918. That first summer the living was pretty skimpy and they lived on dry beans and potatoes that their folks had given them when they left Nebraska. They killed some sage chickens and rabbits to add a little meat to their diet sometimes. They got a leave of absence from the homestead to go to Plainview, Nebraska to pick corn and they stayed there about five months.

World War I was on when they settled on the homestead and everything was rationed. When they went to Lost Springs for their first groceries they only had about nine dollars cash. Under the rationing program, they were allowed to get two pounds of sugar a month. They could only get 48 pounds of flour, so they had to get 48 pounds of cornmeal, oatmeal and rice etc. to make it stretch. A sack of flour cost seven dollars so they only had two dollars left to get the rest of their groceries. They got what they could and then Alfred went to the bank to see if he could borrow 25 dollars if they had to have it for their next groceries. Later, Alfred was able to put 90 dollars in the bank from their plowing so they didn't have to borrow it after all.

Alfred found his horses came in handy not only for breaking up ground for other homesteaders, but he also got a job digging with a slip using his horses in making the grain elevator at Lost Springs. They moved the covered wagon to Lost Springs to live in while Alfred worked on the grain elevator.

Alfred and Gladys realized that he had received that job because he had the horses to do it and they valued the horses a great deal. One time, the horses were lost on the open range and Alfred rode three days to find them. Everyone said they had probably gone back to Nebraska and he was getting pretty discouraged. He went out one more time, however, and finally found them along the creek.

When they were at Lost Springs, the Edisons went back to the homestead almost every weekend to see the garden and to tend to it. Alfred dug a potato and root cellar the first summer. They put carrots, squash, potatoes and corn in the cellar from their garden. They didn't have jars to can with. They had to dry some of the food, they salted some food down and kept some vegetables in sand. They had a big slab of bacon that her folks had given her in Nebraska.

There wasn't any water on their homestead. The water was too deep and they didn't have good tools to dig with, so they had to haul water in a barrel from a spring about six miles away. The neighbors later got a water well and they let them haul water from there. The Edisons were on the homestead 30 years before they finally could afford to get Frank Kirn to drill a well for them. They put a windmill in then, and that was the sweetest music to Gladys's ears - the sound of the windmill pumping water.

The Edisons had shipped a cook stove out on the train to Lost Springs. It was an ordinary woodburning stove and they had lots of wood to burn because of the cedars and pines on their place. This stove was one of the luxuries on the homestead and turned out many good meals. The next year they bought an organ at Atkinson, Nebraska when they went back to pick corn. It was a second hand organ, but played very well and still plays today. Gladys played the organ and the piano for Sunday school and church for many years.

An epidemic of the Spanish influenza broke out the second year on the homestead and the Edisons and their neighbors, the Reeds, got it. Other neighbors came in and cared for them. They kept the house warm and cooked for them or they would have died. There was an awfully deep snow in April when they were having the flu. Dr. Keller came out from Douglas and got stuck on the hillside on their place. The ruts are still there today. One neighbor rode clear to Lost Springs, 17 miles away in the deep snow, to get medicine for them. Fortunately, no one in their neighborhood died, but they were awfully sick there and in Lost Springs.

Alfred cut cedar posts around the Rosin Coal Mine near the homestead. This mine, when it opened, attracted many people there to work. The coal didn't prove the right quality, so it was closed. Alfred had the posts, though and would sell them at 20 cents apiece. One time, when they were expecting their first baby Arlene, they had no money for baby clothes and things for a new baby. There was a fellow who came out from Douglas, Mr. Henry, and he wanted to buy 60 dollars worth of posts. They sold those and Gladys made out an order to Wards catalog to get clothes for the baby. It was in April when they sold the posts and baby Arlene arrived June 5, 1920. Dr. Storey came clear out from Douglas to deliver the baby.

Arlene was the only child of the Edisons for 17 years. They had given up having any more children when a son, Fay, was born September 30, 1937. They were so happy to have another child after so many years. Fay and his family live on the homestead place today.

The first summer, when the Edisons lived in a tent, they just had a dirt floor, no windows, orange crates and apple boxes for chairs, tables, and cupboards. When they were able to move into the homestead house, it seemed like a castle to Gladys. They bought a solid oak table with four chairs and a six place setting of china dishes. She got two aluminum bread pans at the store in Lost Springs besides a tea kettle, dish pan and an iron skillet. It was like heaven living in a house after living in a tent and covered wagon all summer. She still had to make her own soap and do her wash on the washboard though.

It wasn't all work. They went to dances, pie socials, and school programs in the school house. Arlene was only four years old when she spoke a piece at the Christmas program. She stood on a chair so everyone could see her and she was really cute.

It seemed to the Edisons that it took all their strength just to live. It was several years before they got their place fenced. They had two little heifer calves that were picked up with some other cattle in one of the round-ups on the open range and were driven off with them. The Edisons felt awfully bad about this, but there was no way to get them back because they weren't branded and they had no way of proving they were theirs.

Mr. Edison passed away on March 15, 1970 at the Douglas hospital. They were still on the homestead then. Gladys moved to Douglas in November, 1970, where she still resides. Her son, Fay and wife, Sue and children bought the homestead ranch and run cattle, horses etc. there at present. Daughter Arlene and her husband Larry Eddy and family live at Keeline on a ranch.

I asked Gladys if she would do it all over again in spite of all the hardships. She said, "Yes, somehow with God's help, we survived the Spanish influenza, tick fever, rabbit fever, measles and all kinds of hardships on the homestead. We were poor, but everyone else was too, so we didn't notice. There were bad times, but there were many good times too. There seemed to always be lots of love to go around and people had time to help one another. We had lots of faith and we were happy, which are the most important things, after all."

Edwards, Arthur and Margaret

Samuel J. Edwards came from Liverpool, England. On May 20, 1862, he received a homestead grant of 160 acres near Aberdeen, Dakota Territory. This was signed by President Benjamin Harrison. He married Arvilla Boyd of Dover, Minnesota. Their four children, Arthur, Clarence, Pearl and Roy were born at Groton, South Dakota.

Among the early settlers to arrive in Douglas, Wyoming in 1917 from Omaha, Nebraska were Arthur and Margaret Edwards, small son, Arthur Jr., Margaret's mother, Margaret Z. Carpenter, and Roy Edwards. They acquired adjoining homesteads about 35 miles north of Douglas at Dry Creek, now Bill, Wyoming. Here three more children were born to Arthur and Margaret: Warren in 1917, David in 1931 and Margaret in 1932.

It was a rugged life. A trip to Douglas by wagon was at least a two day journey to pick up mail and supplies. Flour and other products were bought by the barrel. Much was ordered from catalogs and arrived in Douglas by train then freighted on to the ranch. Coal was hauled by wagon from the Burning Coal Mine approximately 30 miles away.

Antelope, deer, coyotes and rabbits were plentiful and other animals were trapped for their furs. Thanks to the Wyoming wind, a good well and much hard work they were able to raise large gardens that are still remembered. They raised the first peanut crop in the 1920s.

Arthur burned spines off the cactus with a burner fired by distillate for the animals to eat.

Roy enlisted July 1918 in the U.S. Army at Douglas. He left the United States for overseas assignment in August 1918 and returned in October 1919. He returned to Douglas but later went to California. In the mid 1930s he returned to Groton, South Dakota and farmed the original homestead. He married and remained there the rest of his life.

Margaret Z. Carpenter lived on her homestead where she died in 1930 and is buried in the Douglas cemetery.

In 1941 Arthur and Margaret sold to a neighboring rancher and moved to the vicinity of Centralia, Washington. They are both buried there.

Warren married Erma Bower in 1939. They moved to Washington in the 1940s.

Edwards, Con and Blanch

Con Edwards, son of William and Lucy Dickinson Edwards, was born in Galax, Virginia on June 20, 1880. He came to Nebraska in 1902 and on January 7, 1914, married Blanch Jones, daughter of Barney and Bertha Jones in Garrison, Butler County, Nebraska. Barney and Bertha were both born in Norway and Bertha crossed the ocean by ship nine times during her lifetime. When Blanch was ten years old she accompanied her mother to Norway where they spent a year. The main reason for Bertha taking her daughter, was for her to write home to the family, as Bertha only wrote Norwegian. Blanch wrote very legibly, and while in Norway she wrote a story of her trip and experiences there, which family members still have.

Four daughters were born to Con and Blanch in Nebraska: namely, May Rose in 1915, Ella in 1916, Marie in 1919 and Pauline in 1921. May Rose died the month before her third birthday from complications of having pneumonia and measles at the same time.

With their three daughters, Con and Blanch moved to Converse County, Wyoming in 1923 and homesteaded 12 miles northeast of Douglas. Con purchased a team of horses and hauled lumber in a wagon from Douglas to build the house on the homestead, while his family resided in Douglas until the house was completed. While Con was hauling the second load of lumber from Douglas, someone stole the first load that had been unloaded at the homestead site.

In 1924, a son Raymond was born to the Edwards family, then in 1927, another girl, Darlene, joined the family and the youngest son, Clyde, was born in 1930.

The lumber wagon was used in those early days to haul wood from the timber which was fourteen miles away. About once a month, the wagon and team would be used to travel to Douglas to bring back their needed supplies and groceries. Times were hard and money was scarce and it was said by Mrs. Edwards one time that there was not enough money to purchase postage stamps, but the Edwards children never went hungry. By milking their own cows and using the cream and milk, food was provided. Blanch sold eggs, and would churn the cream into butter in a large wooden churn, press the butter into rectangular wooden molds, wrap it in butter parchment papers and butter boxes and take it to Douglas to deliver it to many various regular customers almost every week. She sold this butter for 30 to 35 cents per pound.

The family always raised a large garden also, and there was much canning done every year. Of course, the Edwardses always did their own butchering, which was mostly pork, but this kept the family in meat and Mrs. Edwards always rendered the lard for their use, not only for cooking, but also for making laundry soap with lard and lye.

Con planted corn and it was picked by hand and dumped into long piles. The rabbits would come out at night to feed on the corn and Con would shoot them. On a moonlight night he would have an unusually good kill of rabbits.

Con believed in teaching his children how to work also, and they would chop sagebrush and pick up corncobs to be used for fuel to heat the house in the winter, along with the wood he hauled from the timber. One year in June, Con was sick in bed with tick fever, which meant it was up to Blanch (with the help of their children) to milk the cows and do the chores. This particular June gave forth with a Wyoming snowstorm that covered the west windows of the homestead with drifts so high that Con could not see out of the west bedroom where he was confined to his bed. Wyoming winters were severe more than once, and the Edwards girls can remember walking a mile to the Happy Hollow School during winters when the snow was deep enough that they were walking on top of the fence posts.

Seems as though people were tougher back in those days and could take things easier than they do now. For example, at the time of the birth of the youngest son, Clyde, Dr. Schaffer was called to the Edwards' homestead. After several hours of labor, the doctor was unable to deliver the baby, so it was necessary for Mrs. Edwards to get in their car (a 1928 Model A) and ride to Douglas to the hospital, where the baby was born, lifeless for a few minutes, but with medical help life returned to the child and he was able to go home with his mother in about ten days or so.

They had been able to purchase the brand new Model A Ford at the price of $700.00 and Con was so proud of this car, and wanted it to last a long time, that he would jack it up on cement blocks during the week, thinking that this extra effort would help lengthen the life of the tires.

In 1930 the Edwards family took a trip in the Model A to Nebraska, where Ella remained with relatives and the rest of the family continued on to North Carolina and Virginia to visit Con's sisters. We think our mother must have had the patience of Job to travel that distance with seven people in the car. Dad had built a small platform on the back of the car and that was where the luggage was carried.

They also purchased a new "Home Comfort" range for their use costing about $150.00, along with a new Maytag washing machine. These appliances had the very best of care and proof of that is that Marie, one of the daughters, still has the Maytag washer which is still in good working condition, and has the original wringer on it.

It was an extra special treat for the Edwards children to get to go to Douglas on Saturdays, to help deliver the saleable goods and purchase groceries, and buy material for Blanch to sew the children's clothes. The older members can remember their parents telling that Pauline (at about age seven), on the weekly trip to Douglas, when the car would get to the curve just outside of town, would start to sing, "I smell candy, I smell gum, I smell peanuts, YUM, YUM, YUM."

Darlene can remember one particular time when she was with her mother at the home of one of their butter customers, who had given Blanch a remnant a short time before. There Darlene (about age 4) stood holding her coat open wide until the "new dress" she was wearing was noticed by the lady of the house—from the gift remnant. There was amusement from both Blanch and the donor of the material but nevertheless, Darlene remembers how proud she was of that dress.

The Edwards family resided on the homestead place until 1935, at which time they moved to Douglas. They also moved the family cat with them, which had been the kids' pet for several years. She was a 3-legged cat who had the misfortune of losing one leg in a rabbit trap and freezing it off. After a day or two in town, Muncie (the cat's name) was missing and in less than a week's time the report was that Muncie had arrived back at the homestead, using her three good legs to get there. This happened two more times, and since she showed this much desire to stay at the homestead site, she was permitted to remain there for the remainder of her life.

The family only lived in Douglas for a few months and with the exception of Ella, all the rest of the family moved back to Butler County, Nebraska where Mr. Edwards took up farming on the Jones' homestead near Ulysses, Nebraska. In 1943, the family purchased a home in David City, Nebraska and moved there upon Mr. Edwards' retirement. Mr. Edwards died in May 1955 in David City. Ella remained in Douglas with her husband Tom Robinson, Jr. and baby daughter, Dorothy. Ella and Tom now own the land that was the Edwards' homestead.

The rest of the children did accompany their parents to Nebraska. However, Marie returned to Douglas in 1937 and worked at the seed house for a few years. She married Carl Hageman in 1940. Carl and Marie resided on the original Hageman homestead where Carl built a log cabin for their first home, and later added on to it as the family grew. They had two sons, Robert and Ron, who both lived in Converse County. In fact Ron and his wife (the former Kathy Campbell), and son, T.J., still live on the original homestead site. Robert married Judy Sims and they live just north of Douglas. They have two daughters, Tracy and Tiffany.

Carl Hageman died in May 1978. Marie married Bob Straw of Wheatland, Wyoming in February 1980, and they divide their time between Douglas and Wheatland during the summer and spend their winters in Arizona.

Pauline married Eugene Parke of Ulysses, Nebraska. To this union were born two children, Melvin and Patricia. They live in Lincoln, Nebraska at this writing.

Raymond worked for a dairy in David City after serving in the U.S. Army and then married Lorna Yocom of Lincoln, Nebraska. They moved first to Casper, Wyoming and then settled later near Lusk, Wyoming. They have three children, Monte, Russell and Denise. Lorna is presently the Niobrara County Assessor.

Darlene is married to Bob Shrader of Surprise, Nebraska and they have three children, Roberta, Rodney and Cindy, who all live in Nebraska.

Clyde served in the U.S. Army in San Antonio, Texas where he married Faye Johnson. They had three daughters, Carole, Jackie and Jerry and one son William. Faye died in June of 1976. Clyde later remarried and they still reside in San Antonio, Texas.

Mrs. Blanch Edwards continued to live in David City after Con passed away, and remained living alone, staying active in church and community work until 1970. The last year of her life was a bout with cancer, and during the last month she lived in the home of her daughter, Darlene and Bob Shrader in David City. She died on December 7, 1970.

Those of us now living in 1984 sometimes think that money is scarce and we have a rough time, but wouldn't it be great if we could get by on what our parents and grandparents made a good living with? By thinking about these by-gone years, it should certainly make most of us more appreciative and thankful for what we have to work with and the many advantages we have today that were unheard of back then.

Edwards, James "Nigger Jim"

James Edwards, "Nigger Jim," was a soldier in the Spanish American War. In 1900 he came to Wyoming and worked for the Willson Brother's Running Water Ranch. He homesteaded on Harney Creek. Several of his Negro friends homesteaded land near him. Eventually, Jim bought their land; and in 1950, he sold his ranch of 18 sections to Otto Bible, Wayne Bible, Roy Pennington and Beryl Fullerton.

Jim married Lethel Dawson in 1914 in Denver, Colorado. Lethel's mother and father cooked on a river boat on the Mississippi River. When Mr. Dawson contracted tuberculosis, they came to Colorado for his health, but in a short time he died. Lethel and her sister were educated in Denver. Lethel was a fine musician. Mrs. Dawson made her home with the Edwardses after proving up on a homestead that bordered on the landmark known as Rocky Top north of Lost Springs.

Lethel died in 1945 from leukemia. Mrs. Dawson died at her younger daughter's home in Salt Lake City.

From the Scottsbluff paper:

"James Edwards died from suffocation January 6, 1951, after water boiled away in a pot in which chicken was being cooked, filled a basement room with smoke. A companion in the room, Tillie Trimble, age 33, wife of Columbus "Monk" Trimble, also overcome by smoke was reported recovering at the Scottsbluff Hospital.

"Firemen were called to the house at 11:05 p.m. by Carmen Hernandez, age 13, niece of Steve Hernandez, who rents the upstairs rooms in the home. Carmen and her brother Rudy, age 8, reported seeing smoke pouring up through the bathroom floor and called firemen.

"Edwards and Tillie Trimble were found unconscious on a bed in the basement, and were immediately carried outside where manual respiration aid was given until a resuscitator was brought. Edwards was pronounced dead at 11:50 p.m. by Dr. John Heinke.

Edwards, William and Sallie

My parents were William W. (Will or Bill) Edwards and Sallie Ann Brian (Aunt Sallie) Edwards. They homesteaded six miles south of Douglas, near the North Platte River, in 1907. I was about three years old at that time and my first memory of the homestead is before our own cabin was built. We visited the site through the courtesy of some folks that lived about a mile and a half from Douglas, by the name of Broffels. They took us in a buggy to see it and the thing that enables me to remember it was the log building that was already on the place. The door to it had one of those peculiar sliding small log latches that was very intriguing to me. That latch has enabled me to remember the entire event. The way it worked was so fascinating to me. Also, there were many places on the inside logs where people had smoothed out a place to write their names. Early trappers or explorers had probably erected this log building. There was one particular log, the largest cottonwood I have ever seen, that was hollow and large enough that my sister and I could crawl inside of it. We used it as a playhouse as we were growing up. As was the custom then, my father had put small branches from the willow trees and dirt over the log roof to keep it from leaking. Later on, after we had built our own cabin to live in on the homestead, some travelers accidentally set that building on fire and it was destroyed. That did not happen, however, until we had used it for a barn and chicken house for a few years.

I, Bryan, was born in Whiteside Cove, near Highlands, North Carolina, in 1905. In 1907, my mother brought me with her to Douglas to join my father, who had come to Wyoming earlier that year to herd sheep and establish a homestead. My first memory of the town of Douglas is of the time I crawled under the passenger train at the depot. Mother was there to meet some relatives just arriving, was tired of holding me in her arms, and put me down on the brick sidewalk. I ran along the sidewalk to the front end of the train and got down under the locomotive. A man with a long-spout oil can, the brakeman, retrieved me from under that engine. The more he coaxed me to come out, the more cautious and afraid of him I became. Finally, he did get me out and he scolded me for being in that dangerous place. Mother saw him and came running to rescue me, and she was also scolded for not watching me more closely. In those days, the passenger depot of the railroad station in Douglas was the place to meet your friends and relatives. The train was the main daily attraction and just about everyone would gather there to socialize. Malcolm Campbell, the Town Marshal for several years, was nearly always there, greeting and offering assistance to everyone, coming and going.

In my early years, my father had to be away from home to earn money and was usually herding sheep further up into the mountains, near Laramie Peak. The man to whom he was supposed to deed his homestead tried to discourage Mother from living on the homestead one time by sending a herder with a band of sheep to camp very close to our cabin. He knocked down our fence and destroyed our garden, but because we had no irrigation at that time, the garden was small. One day, he appeared in the doorway and when Mother saw who it was, she refused to let him inside. She was sitting at the table peeling potatoes. He stood at the door and didn't seem to want to leave. Mother could not understand what he was saying to her because he spoke in Mexican language only. Mother wasn't sure what to do, but she came back to the kitchen of what was by then, a two-room cabin, and lifted me and my sister Pauline out the wide window and told us to jump to the ground and run hide in the willow bushes and trees down by the river and wait there until she came to get us. We were frightened, but did exactly as she told us. She picked up the knife she had been peeling potatoes with and went back toward the door where he was still standing and told him to leave. Evidently he was afraid of her because he left in a hurry and that sheepherder was never seen again around Douglas. When Mother came after my sister and me, we started walking toward the road to Douglas. There wasn't much traffic on the roads in those days, but we felt we were very lucky in that a Mr. Wiederanders, from a long way south, just happened to come along and took us to town in his wagon. Mother sent word to my father, and in a few days he came and took us back to the homestead. The sheep and the sheep wagon were gone by them and the sheepherder never returned. We were told that the sheep had wandered around out there by themselves for several days before the camp tender discovered their plight. That was the last time that anyone brought a sheep wagon to camp, close to our homestead.

Mother always tried to manage for us to live in Douglas at least three months out of the year, usually in the winter, which made me very happy as it was lonesome on the homestead for children, even with their chores to keep them busy. Sometimes, many weeks went by without seeing anyone but the immediate family and very few trips were made to town for groceries or supplies.

As time went by, my folks acquired a saddle horse. One day, the horse got away from us by breaking the lead rope from its halter and forded the river to the other side. There was no bridge over the North Platte River at that time, and there was no way that my mother could get the horse back. One day, while visiting with her friend, Mrs. Broffels, they saw a man across the river riding horseback and chasing some horses. There were three or four of them and one was our saddle horse and still had the halter on. The man yelled across the river and asked Mother if the horse with the halter on was our horse and she told him it was. He said he would bring it across the river to us and roped it and started across, riding his own horse and leading ours. About the middle of the river, it looked like he just got off of his horse and started swimming but then, he disappeared from sight. My mother and Mrs. Broffels ran along the river bank for a long ways, following it very carefully and calling out to him, but to no avail. His horse swam to the other side of the river and his hat floated down the river. His name was George Vernon Castle. There was no sign of him until about three days later when his body surfaced and was recovered a mile or so, further down the river. My parents acquired his brand and all the cattle and horses my parents ever owned were branded with the "VC" brand.

As I look back and recall my growing up years on the homestead, I realize how valuable they were to me, even though at the time they seemed pretty rough. In early years I enjoyed selling newspapers on the streets of Douglas and meeting the train to sell papers to passengers, arriving and departing. By doing so, I earned money to buy candy for myself and my sister. In 1915, when I was ten years old, I was an agent for the Blade & Ledger and in this connection I also was instrumental in starting the first Lone Scout Troop which later became known as the Boy Scouts of America. I started the first troop or tribe of scouts west of Kansas City, which was called the Washakie Tribe of Lone Scouts of America. This was under the auspices of an Englishman named William D. Boyce. There is a building in Chicago at the present time that still bears the plaque that was dedicated in honor of him years ago, known as the Boyce Building.

My sister and I walked the twelve miles each day to attend grade school in Douglas. I started in the second grade and my sister, being two years younger than I was, walked to school with me. I never could understand how she could keep up with me, walking the six miles each day to and from school. In my junior year of high school, I drove the first school bus in Converse County. Also, while growing up on the homestead, I sold vegetables door-to-door from what my family knew as "Bryan's Garden". One reason it was successful was the fact that I could irrigate it. My father dug a mile of irrigation ditch by hand with a shovel from Bedtick Creek down to where my garden spot was. At that time he was working on what was called the LaPrele Dam Project and from the experience of building that large ditch, he was able to get water rights and subsequently planted crops of potatoes, oats, alfalfa, wheat and corn which flourished under his irrigation system.

In 1921, I joined the Wyoming National Guard. At the time of the Cole Creek Train wreck, when a flash flood washed a passenger train, track and all into the North Platte River, I joined 20 other volunteers to patrol 23 miles of the river, looking for victims. About 30 lives were lost and the engine was buried. This was a major tragedy in our area.

Also, in the beginning we had to carry water to our house from the river for domestic use, but as soon as it was possible, my father and a man who came to help him, dug a well to the back of the original homestead house on the south side of Bedtick Creek and this well had a windlass. Much later, this well was supplanted with a well and a pump about a half mile west of the first well. The third well we had was on a hill and it had a windmill and a cement holding tank to store water for use when the wind didn't blow. This well was west of our house and eventually we had modern plumbing and water piped into our house from that well.

Water certainly was a big part of homesteading and because we were located near Bedtick Creek, which was a big, wide, sand draw, we were always wary of the flash floods that came roaring down it, especially in the summertime, sometimes without warning. Several terrifying and tragic events resulted from those flash floods in those horse-and-buggy days. Yet, on the open prairie, water was almost held sacred because wells were few and far between. A shepherd told us a story about trailing a herd of sheep across the southwestern Wyoming prairie when he came to an old pump by the side of the trail he was following. There was a rusty tin can wired to the handle, and inside the can he found a piece of paper which had been a brown paper bag. It had a message written on it with a stub pencil. The message said: "This is your only chance for water along this trail. The pump is all right as of June 1932. I put a new washer in it and it ought to last five years, but the washer dries out and the pump has to be 'primed'. Under the white rock I buried a bottle of water out of the sun and the cork end is up. There is enough water in it to prime the pump, but not if you drink some first. Pour in about one-fourth and let her 'soak' to wet the leather washer. Then pour in the rest and pump like crazy. You will get water. The well never has gone dry. Have faith. When you get watered up, fill the bottle and put it back like you found it for the next fellow. Remember, no matter how thirsty you are when you get here, don't go drinking up the water first. Prime the pump with it and you will get all the water you can hold. Life is like this pump, it has to be primed first. There have been times when I have given my last dime or spoonful of beans to a stranger and it never failed to get me an answer and sometimes you have to give before you can be given to." The shepherd still had the note and it was signed "Desert Pete".

These early experiences and business acumen proved very helpful to me in later years in establishing my career in Douglas. I went to business school in Grand Island, NE, went to school in Los Angeles, CA, and traveled to Canada as a salesman, but I returned to Douglas to make my living and raise my family. My various endeavors include being a real estate broker, gunsmith, as well as an appliance and electrical radio and music store proprietor. I am the oldest of six children and while I was the only one born in North Carolina, my brother Glen and sisters, Pauline, Grace, Vera and Lillian were all born and raised in Douglas. As of this date, we all are still living; however, our parents, those brave and hardy pioneers who preserved our heritage, both passed away at the age of 87. My father moved back to North Carolina in 1930 but my mother stayed on the "homestead" as long as her health permitted and she had to sell it. She had the spirit and perseverance of a true pioneer. She passed away at the Michael Manor Nursing Home in Douglas in the spring of 1971.

Elbourne, Charles and Blanche

My parents, Charles and Blanche Elbourne, a brother and I, Grace, moved to Wyoming from Florence, Nebraska at the beginning of World War I. Dad had made a trip here earlier, filed on a homestead some fifty miles northwest of Douglas and at the same time, made arrangements with Jack Morton for work and a place for our family to live. A boxcar was rented from the railroad and all of our worldly possessions including one bay mare, furniture and around four hundred quarts of all kinds of fruit and vegetables Mother had canned were loaded aboard. Our first home was a log house just south and east of where E.B. Combs and family lived. Through the years the house and out-buildings have disappeared. Dad hired Slonakers to move our things from the railroad and in the process the team ran away and a great many of our things, including much of the precious canned goods, were destroyed. Dad and my brother had come in the boxcar and Mother and I came later. How well I remember my grandmother crying as we boarded the train, because she was sure we would never have enough to eat in Wyoming or that we would be scalped by Indians.

After several years with Mortons, we moved to a big cement block house owned by E. B. Combs. This house had been built by Merris Barrow who was editor of the original Douglas Budget. It was about a mile closer to Douglas and has been destroyed by fire in recent years. Dad went to work for the highway department and we took care of 300 head of sheep on shares for Mr. Combs. At that time, the highway from Douglas west toward Casper, was just a heavily graveled road and Dad was to maintain a stretch from the Platte River to the Natural Bridge turn off. Several times a week he went over this with a horse drawn grader, keeping the gravel smoothed out.

I attended what was known as the West Douglas School. Rain or shine, a small pony was my transportation. I am sure there must have been others, but the teacher who stands out in my memory was Pansy Braae (Dunn). She was 19 at the time and it was her first school. All eight grades were filled with children from Pexton, Amspoker, Harris, Mitchell and other families whose names elude me. Esther Johnson (Bruegman) was one of my classmates. No cars, so everyone, including the teacher, walked if close enough or came by wagon or horseback.

While we were still living in the Barrow house, a school was established at the entrance to the Morton Ranch and was known as the Morton School. The teacher and her name, Amber Carmen Feezer, will forever remain in my memory. A typical old maid who, I am sure, came to Wyoming with dreams of capturing a wild and handsome cowboy. My parents provided her with room and board and she and I rode horseback to school each day. Some of the Morton ranch hands gave the poor woman a bad time. Tex Conner and Frank Batton in particular loved to gallop their horses around the school house and disrupt the kids. Needless to say, Miss Feezer failed to capture her cowboy. During the summer months, Mother and I moved to the homestead in order to comply with the "proving up" regulations.

I was in the eighth grade by this time and it was necessary then for the eighth grade students to go to Douglas for their final exams. We were all very unhappy to discover that Miss Feezer had failed to instruct us in Social Studies, and we were therefore forced to another year in the same grade.

Dates I am unable to recall, but our next move was to a place closer to Douglas where Dad was able to do a little farming, put up some hay and run a few dairy cows. He still worked for the highway department. By this time, I was a freshman. I rode horseback to school each day and kept my horse in the barn back of the old Barrow house where United Savings and Loan now stands. My freshman year was spent in the old Douglas High School - all that remains of it is the Youth Center. Those were the days of uniforms - middy blouses and yes, skirts. I possessed one divided skirt (because I rode horseback). Now the same thing goes by the fancy name of "culottes." On weekends, my skirt was cleaned and made ready for Monday. No hot lunches in those days for anyone unless it was brought from home. The bridge across the Platte River was under construction and many times it was a scary place for my horse. Dad was transferred to Shoshoni, Wyoming, where I spent my sophomore year. Shoshoni was a very small town at that time so all grades including high school were in one building. A new system was being tried out. All lessons were assigned ahead for each quarter and everyone completed their assignments at their own speed and if grades were high enough, no exams were required. A very unusual method and I'm sure I would never have gotten through the hated subject of geometry by any other method.

My parents had been having marital difficulties for some years and by the end of my sophomore year were divorced. Mother and I moved to Oregon where I attended school at Klamath Falls during my junior year. The following year we returned to Douglas for my senior year. I signed for the Normal Training course as I planned to become a teacher. Virginia Ailor (Mrs. Scott Layton) was my instructor. We were still in the old high school and at that time, if the individual's scholastic standing was high enough upon graduation, a Teachers Certificate was available which was good for two years without further training. I was given the two year certificate and put in my application for what was known as the Spracklen School, some 50 miles north of Douglas.

Mother had filed on a homestead in that area and I was to help her in proving up on this. My future husband, Mick Hardy, lived a short way from us. I kept my horse at his barn and rode ten miles each day to school. Needless to say, I had no weight problems in those days. My salary the first year was 90 dollars each month and there were one or two pupils in most of the eight grades. During the colder days, I prepared something hot for the children on the big coal and wood heater. Sometimes we baked potatoes in the ash pan; and yes, I was there in the mornings early enough to build a fire and have the building warm when the children arrived. Sometimes, I carried milk in a covered bucket from home to make hot chocolate. Other times, ingredients for a stew. I felt really rich when my salary was increased to 95 dollars a month for the second year.

One year, the ninth of May, brought a five day blizzard. Monday I made it to school and home but the remainder of the week I stayed at the Spracklen home. By Saturday I was determined to get home at any cost. I left Spracklens about nine on a bright sunny morning, and by following trails made by range horses, I managed to get within a mile of the home barn about four o'clock.

Unable to get my horse across Bear Creek, I unsaddled and turned her loose and started walking. My husband-to-be saw me coming and rode to meet me on his horse. Thanks to the Good Lord, I had dark glasses on but had never been warned of snow burn. The next day my face was one huge blister. I missed one week of school and still bare a scar on one lip. Just one of the experiences never to be forgotten.

Dad worked as sexton for the Douglas Park Cemetery for many years.

Blanche Elbourne died in 1966.

Elder, Albert "Bert"

Among the early settlers on Lower LaPrele Creek were "Bert" Elder and his brother Daniel. The Elders could trace their ancestry back to the Revolutionary War period, the families being of Dutch and Welch lineage.

Bert Elder was born in Bedford County, Pennsylvania on August 27, 1856, a grandson of Robert Elder and the son of J.S. and Sarah Rhodes Elder. After living with parents in Pennsylvania and Harrisonville, Missouri, he joined the stampede of goldseekers to Leadville, Colorado in 1879, and engaged in mining in that state until 1882, then to Carbonette, near Colorado Springs. In the same year, he made his home at Tie Siding, Wyoming where he was engaged for three years in lumbering operations; and in May 1886, he located on Lower LaPrele on what later was known as the Jacob Jenne Farm and later as the Albert Sewell place.

He married Florence Sherwin on December 23, 1885. She was the daughter of Marshal and Mary B. Sherwin, natives of Illinois and later residents of Wyoming in the early eighties.

On June 4, 1895, a tragic accident happened. "While crossing the swollen LaPrele Creek near the Elder home, the horses became unmanageable and swung down the stream, the wagon was partially overturned, throwing Mesdames Powell and Elder and their babies (Alice Sherwin Powell, Baby Powell, Florence Sherwin Elder and Mary Elder), Mr. Elder and his little boy into the water. Mr. Elder made almost superhuman efforts to save them, and succeeded in getting his boy to the shore, but the two women with their little ones were swept away and seen no more. Others in the wagon were Mrs. Sherwin, mother of Alice Powell and Florence Elder, Sarah Elder, daughter of Bert and Florence and two children of Alice Powell. Later the four bodies were found 100 feet downstream."

In February, 1896, Bert married Zenana Miller, his childhood sweetheart, in Missouri. She died within the year.

Alma Peterson, half sister of Bill Nuttall, married Bert on January 4, 1905. They had two children, Albert, born in 1906, and Lawrence, born in 1910. Mr. Elder died June 25, 1917 from a stroke and was buried in Douglas.

Elgin, Charles Lee

Charles Lee Elgin, came from Shelby County, Missouri in 1908 with his younger children, after the death of his wife Lucy Ann. Mr. Elgin settled on a homestead, about a mile south of Shawnee, Wyoming where he lived until about 1924 when he moved to Shawnee and lived with his son-in-law and daughter, Clyde and Blanche Ivester, who managed the Shawnee hotel.

In 1929, he moved to Douglas with the Ivester family, where he remained until the death of his daughter, Blanche, then he returned to Shawnee, where he lived until the time of his death on January 28, 1937.

Four of Mr. Elgin's daughters, settled in the Shawnee and Douglas area and raised their families. They were Elizabeth (Henry) York, Myrtle (Tom) York, Evaline (John) Swickhamer and Blanche (Clyde) Ivester.

Enbody, Elmer and Mable Family

Elmer and Mable Gilman Enbody of Amelia, Nebraska purchased the Dwight Cole ranch on LaBonte Creek at the confluence of Mill and LaBonte Creeks, from Thomas Bruner on August 1, 1929.

Operating the ranch until 1936, they returned to Nebraska and lived on a farm that Mable had inherited.

At the time of Mable's death on October 16, 1981, she was survived by two sons, Warren and James, and five daughters: Mabel (Eggleston), Frances (Ballagh), Betty (Winings), Hellen (Bilstein) and Estelle (Blomgren). Elmer, her husband, and two sons and two daughters had preceded her in death.

Warren and James operated a sawmill in the area at one time before leaving for the west coast.

Mabel married Jack Eggleston, the son of Harvey and Alice M. Eggleston, in 1934. Jack came to Wyoming in 1919, working for Jim Shaw from 1919 to 1929.

Three children, Shirley (Brown), Warren Thomas and Jerry, were born to the Egglestons.

Jack and Mabel assumed the loan on the Cole place after her parents returned to Nebraska and continued to operate the ranch. The Whitaker family now own the land.

Jack accepted employment with the U.S. Forest Service and manned the Fletcher Park Lookout tower in the Laramie Park area for 14 years. Mabel also worked as an employee for the Forest Service for many years. She was a fire lookout on Black Mountain. She also drove a school bus for School District #19 to and from the White School for many years.

Jack died on July 22, 1971.

Emery, Dick and Lulu

Dick Emery married Lulu Ferguson, cousin of O.D. Ferguson, in 1913. Lulu was teaching school on LaBonte Creek at the time. They lived at Careys' CY Ranch where Dick was employed as its manager after their marriage. In 1920 they left Careys and homesteaded on Upper Boxelder near the Robbins. They remained on the homestead until 1927 when they returned to the CY to work until 1941 when the ranch was sold to Bixbys. The Emerys then moved to South Dakota close to where Mr. Emery had been raised as a child. One son, William, was born to them. He married Merna Huddleston.

Engdahl, Carl and Esther

Carl Gunnard Engdahl was born in Orebo, Sweden in 1896. He came to Wyoming via Canada and Nebraska. He came to Douglas, Converse County, with his new wife, Esther Johanna Nordstrom Engdahl from Waverly, Nebraska in 1908.

He worked as a masonry man and carpenter in Douglas for five years before he purchased his home place five miles west of Douglas.

They lived in a tent for two years before they could afford to build a house to live in. In 1916 they built a one-room house (12' x 20'). He continued to work in town and walk back and forth each day, carrying home any salvage lumber or cement that they had left over from his job.

Esther packed water from the Hansen place, ½ mile away, in five-gallon buckets each day, until they dug a shallow well about 1920.

Carl helped build the LaPrele Dam. They used horses and mules to pull the slips to build the fill.

Carl and Esther were never fortunate enough to have any children.

Carl died in January of 1972 of a fall off his chicken house, and Esther died in April of 1973 of complications from a broken hip.

Engelking Family

The Engelking family moved from Chicago to a homestead in Kansas in 1890 when Gus, John, and Louise were young. Gus (August) was born July 9, 1878, John was born in 1875, and Louise was born December 5, 1885. Their dad didn't think the city was a good place to raise them. After poor crops and bad luck and the death of her husband in 1894, Mrs. Engleking and Louise moved to Nebraska where they had relatives.

John and Gus had been to Wyoming on a Texas Trail drive in 1894 and liked the country so decided to move to Wyoming. This was in 1895 and getting late in the fall. John was 20 and Gus was 17 when they came out in a team and wagon. They had bad weather and delays, so ran out of food and hay. When they got to a Dad Whitticar's place, a friend of theirs, they were mighty hungry and the horses barely made it. Dad Whitticar's place was on Muddy Mountain. Gus always said that beans never tasted so good as they did when they got to Dad Whitticar's that day.

Gus and John went to work on the Webel ranch on Muddy Creek and stayed there for a number of years until they were able to get a ranch of their own. The one they bought around 1904 or 1905 was northwest of Glenrock on the north side of the North Platte River. Their brand was the quarter circle AE. Another brother Otto joined them in the ranching business.

John and Otto were married by this time. John married Celia Stanley of Casper and had one son, Robert (deceased); and Otto married Bertha Stanley, a sister of Celia. They had two daughters, Ruth and Dora (deceased). After the death of Celia, John married Jessie Kelly.

Since Gus was single he went out on the roundups. He often said when he was on the roundup he never slept in a bed for 3 months at a time. The roundup lasted most of the summer, as all the ranchers turned their cattle out north to graze, and then they had to be rounded up so they could be separated and returned to their home ranches before the winter set in. The cattle would range far out north and it was a big job to get them all rounded up and ready to ship them to market. Most all of the ranchers shipped their cattle to Omaha, Nebraska on the train. Gus spent quite a few years working the roundup.

Gus homesteaded on land west of the ranch and adjacent to it. He built his log cabin there and stayed there when he wasn't on the roundup.

In 1912 he wrote his sister, Louise Matthies, who was a widow now after the death of her husband in 1911. She was living in Ohio, Nebraska, and had three children, Esther, Leo, and Ivan. She came to the ranch and brought all her belongings in an emigrant car.

Each of the three families had their own home on the ranch. They raised a garden and chickens and put up hay on the meadows, as they had a water right out of the river.

Gus said that where the North Platte River runs through their ranch it was the farthest north that the river runs in all of its course.

The CB&Q (Burlington Northern) Railroad went right through the middle of their ranch. Louise told the story about the summer her niece was visiting her from Milwaukee, and there were many men working on the railroad. The two women were by themselves and could see the men working. They were convicts from down south, mostly blacks. They came to the house for drinking water, and it really scared the two women as they didn't know what they might do. It so happened that Gus had a chance to come home for a day from the roundup. When he saw what was going on he thought of a plan to protect them. He set up a target out in the yard and had the women practice shooting a gun. This put a stop to the pestering for water and such.

A story was told about their pet pig whose name was Ferguson. Louise was making grape wine and when she was through with the mash she threw it out in our yard. Old Ferguson found it and really tanked up. He got so drunk he couldn't stand up. Everytime he tried to get up he fell over. Ferguson had a hangover for two days. They all got the biggest bang out of telling the story about Ferguson.

Gus and John went into the oil business in 1917 with some other investors. They hired a drilling rig and drilled several wells on their ranch. They didn't hit oil but oil was later discovered on Gus' homestead. It was probably a deeper sand than the original wells were drilled into. Louise cooked for the drilling crew. She was an accomplished cook and cooked many wonderful meals for family, friends and strangers.

The children of Louise: Esther, Leo and Ivan grew up on the ranch and went to school in Glenrock.

In 1924 Louise and family went back to Nebraska to live. Leo didn't like it back there so he came back to Wyoming in 1925, and made his home with his uncle Gus. Leo worked on different ranches in the summer, the VR and CY ranches, and stayed on the Engelking ranch in the winter.

The Engelking brothers split up. Gus and John stayed on the ranch and Otto moved to town and bought a small place. Gus and John had good years and bad ones on the ranch. One real bad winter they lost almost all of their cattle, and they had a hard time of it for awhile. They bought some land on the east side of them known as the Wood's place. Their ranch was never very big so they didn't run too many cattle. Louise had homesteaded west of Gus' homestead so they had 160 acres more to graze on. Gus moved into the house Otto had lived in, and his homestead house sat empty for a number of years.

Louise Matthies came back to Glenrock in 1937 after she sold her Nebraska farm and again kept house for Gus.

John Engelking was a Converse County Commissioner in the 1930s; and in the 1940s Gus Engelking ran unsuccessfully for Governor of Wyoming. He got quite a few votes but not enough to win.

In 1943 Louise married Arthur Bruns and left the ranch. Gus and John ran the ranch till John died. Gus and John's widow, Jessie, ran the place until Gus died. The ranch has changed hands several times since his death in 1959.

Louise and Arthur Bruns lived in Casper for three years after their marriage. Mr. Bruns worked for Schulte Hardware and was their head bookkeeper. In 1946 they bought the Kennaugh place on the southeast edge of Glenrock. Arthur had a heart attack in 1949 and as a result had to retire from his job.

Arthur and Louise continued living in Glenrock. Arthur died November, 12, 1969 and Louise died on October 30, 1980.

John Engelking died around 1948 and Gus F. Engelking died January 17, 1959.

Louise's daughter, Esther Marie, born March 25, 1906, married Fred H. Pohler on November 22, 1928, in Ohio, Nebraska. In later years Fred and Esther lived in Glenrock and raised their family. They had three children, Lorraine James living near Casper, Wyoming, Roland Pohler living in Houston, Texas, and Kay Williams living in Rawlins, Wyoming. Esther died on August 8, 1879 and Fred died on February 21, 1984.

A son, Ivan Lou, born March 29, 1911, married Mildred Thomas in June 1934 in Ohio, Nebraska. They lived in Denver, Colorado for many years. They had one daughter, Luann Faye, who is a teacher in Vermillion, South Dakota. Ivan died on August 4, 1966, and Mildred died in March 1968.

Another son, Leo Adam, born August 4, 1909, married Mildred Rainey on September 15, 1935 in Casper, Wyoming. They had three daughters, Linda Cole, living near Wheatland, Wyoming; Merna Blackburn living in Douglas; and Jinny Foland living near Torrington, Wyoming. Leo and Mildred lived many years in and around Glenrock. Leo died December 14, 1978 and his widow, Mildred, is living in Glenrock.

England, Fred and Opal

Fred was born at Brevard, North Carolina December 10, 1907. He grew up on a small farm just outside of town. He received his twelve years of schooling at Brevard and went two years to college at Weaver, North Carolina.

In June of 1930, he, along with three other boys, came to Wyoming looking for work. Fred went to work for Archie Picklesimer of LaBonte Creek, on a ranch known as the "Old Dunn Ranch," now owned by Pextons. Fred worked on the ranch helping put up hay and irrigating. In the winter he worked there feeding stock and out north on Cow Creek tending sheep camps. In the spring he worked at the sheep camps doing the cooking for the lambing and shearing crews.

In the spring of 1935 he went to Montana and worked on a ranch south of Big Timber on the Boulder River. He returned to Douglas in late fall. He worked on Cow Creek for Archie Alexander during the fall and winter of 1935 and 1936 tending sheep camps and hauling feed. He returned to Montana in March of 1936.

On July 5, 1936, Fred married me, Opal Bridges, daughter of Sydney and Edith Kemps Bridges after a four month courtship. I was born in 1915 in Absarokee, Montana. I met Fred when I was working as a cook and housekeeper on the same ranch in Montana as he was. We moved back to Wyoming in August of 1936 to Fred's homestead on Cow Creek. He had filed in 1933.

Fred herded bucks on the Cheyenne River for Fred Dilts in the fall of 1936. The rest of the winter was spent improving up on the homestead. He also trapped coyotes that year.

We had two daughters, Sydney and Lucille. Sydney was born in 1937, she married Gene Dixon. Lucille was born in 1939. She married Larry Cramer.

After selling the homestead to Archie Alexander in 1938 we leased several ranches, among them were the Archie Picklesimer place on LaBonte (Forgeys now live here), Mrs. Sallie Edwards' place on Bedtick (Buzz Philbrick lives here) and the Leet Place at Irvine.

In 1947 we bought the old Brown place from Dick Strock. We lived there until 1975 when we sold it to Larry Crummer and moved to town.

Fred worked for the LaPrele Water Users for four summers. He died on October 20, 1979.

Engstrom, Carl and Augusta

Carl John Engstrom was born in the Parish of Ryda Province, Skaraborg Vaster Gotland, Sweden on Nov. 22, 1857. Augusta Berg Skodve was born in Vaster Gotland, Sweden on April 17, 1861. Their sons, Karl Joshua and Ernst Fridolf, were both born in Gotland, Helas Province of Vester, Sweden. Karl on January 8, 1893 and Ernst on July 18, 1894.

In the 1800s, Sweden had a compulsory two-year military duty for all young men. It was the custom to allow a man to legally change his surname when the records became ungainly with common names. At this time Karl Johan Jonsson changed his name to Carl John Engstrom (meaning: a meadow stream).

Carl John, Augusta and their two young sons, Ernst Fridolf and Karl Joshua, immigrated to this country in 1903, partly to avoid this compulsory military training, and they settled on Omaha for a permanent home. Carl John came to Wyoming in 1909 to establish a homestead, Augusta remained in Omaha to provide a home and opportunity for their sons' education. The boys graduated from Omaha High School. Augusta was a very successful businesswoman and contributed strong financial aid to the homestead. Following the boys graduation, Carl John had developed the property to the extent that he needed help, so Fridolf and Karl responded, more with a sense of duty than by choice. The following account was taken from Karl's diaries and quotation marks indicate direct quotes.

The combined Engstrom 620 acres are located 11 miles west of Douglas, T.33, R.72 and 73, defined as Lower LaPrele in Brenning Basin, school district #20 and intersected by the Oregon Trail, registered brand CJE. This location was chosen for good range land and crop development and promising oil and coal potential. Karl Joshua, age 20, traveled by train. "And so I arrived into a desert of sand and thorns. Found Douglas to be a town of daylight robbery. It lacks cash, credit and cooperation. A full-fledged tiller of the soil? No! A slave of the soil, whipped and lashed by mental anguish and only to be put on the rack of melancholy."

Encouraged by his father and his brother, Fridolf, who had established his homestead the previous year, Karl immediately started proving up. The first step being the construction of the "shack," a small but substantial one-room house.

The immediate neighborhood consisted largely of young single men, most of Swedish ancestry. Improvement of all the properties followed the same pattern; first the shack, then barns, water wells, fences and clearing the land of sage and rocks for cultivation. These tasks were accomplished only by long hours and arduous man and horse power. Poles for fences and lumber were taken from Pine Ridge and transported by horse and wagon. Water wells were often witched, hand dug and rock cased; plowing, disking, harrowing, fertilizing, seeding and ditching were done by horse power. The basic ranchers needs were furnished by Gene Payne in Douglas.

The Engstrom property developed quite rapidly from 1912-1915 due to the combined efforts of Carl John, Karl and Fridolf. They built a house, granary and garage, three barns, shop, fenced range land and cultivated fields. As other homesteads developed, it became increasingly difficult to handle some chores. These formulative first years, this unique community had become extremely close knit and they solved the labor problem by joining forces to help each other with major tasks moving from place to place until completed.

In the summer months, the cattle were put on summer range, freeing the men to cultivate crops so important to winter survival, as well as surplus for cash flow. Water rights were purchased and irrigation was carefully planned as water was as big an issue then, as now. Severe winters brought added work and hardship; cattle to be fed and watered, coal hauled from Inez, grain shipped and hay sold or traded. Survival and success depended on self-sufficiency; they ground grain for flour, baked bread, canned and learned to cook such things as green tomato pie, stews, chili, marble cake and the eternal Swedish coffee.

These pioneers were hard working and ambitious, also fun-loving with extremely social lives. The "Lonely, Local Bachelor Group" included Bob Anderson, the Olin Brothers; Henning, Reinhold and Levene Larson; Enoch and Eric Carlson; Johnny Peterson; Karl and Fridolf. Barn dances were a favorite form of entertainment and people traveled long distances to these all-night affairs. "Attended a party honoring Dave Johnson. With much fun and laughter the merry crowd took themselves to the grainery where under the strains of the violin (probably played by Carl John) they in frenzy beat the floor, while out in the moonlight in nearby gulches the coyotes mourned in distant howls."

Card parties, often referred to as wakes, were popular with the men. "As we departed for Carlsons a dense fog made it difficult to keep our bearing. The bottle was passed and voices in unison rang out in quaint tune. All went well but after passing Alkali Creek the road became faint and soon lost. Robert took lead and after vainly trying to restrike it, led us in circles and finally in the gulches. Our rambling stranded us at the reservoir but knew not which side from the other. Reinhold's bronc took the lead and led us to his place. Morning dawned as we reached his shack. Abashed, we promised to keep the matter strictly confidential."

All holidays and birthdays were celebrated. "Departed for Olins. On Pine Ridge everything seemed high and wild. The pines and bold crags in somber silhouette stood in the crimson and silvered sky. It was severe and pensive. The evening spent in merriment. Najma (Olin) a master of coquetry and Ruth (Blomquist) distinctive allurement. If Eric Olin did not have Najma to manage his love affairs he would simply be out of luck."

Harsh living conditions did not diminish their sense of humor. "Over at Erics in aft. and found no one home. Reset the alarm for 4:00 a.m. in the bunk wagons. Had supper at Johnsons." Levene owned an errant bull and seldom concerned himself with the bulls whereabouts. "Reinhold, with Walt's help, roped that bull. Thereupon we wired in-between his horns a car license, with a red ribbon on his tail, drove him into the Larson lane. Disguised by the dark we saw Larson switch car lights into the fighting herd. Oh such yelling and cursing! Fine! He had it comin.'"

Fall of 1915 yielded the first real income for the Engstroms, with 1330 Bu. of oats and butchered hogs selling at $6.05 a piece. Spring of 1916 brought many changes. Fridolf moved to Chicago to pursue flying and a career in business. Carl John was diagnosed by Dr. Cantril as having severe heart trouble. He returned to Omaha and died on June 16, leaving Karl alone on the property. Drilling for oil began due west of Engstrom property, resulting in strong shows and creating general excitement in the community. "Land locators are active. Such terms as forage crop and what not won't make the range bloom." Drilling at that time was a slow process with many break downs and greatly hampered by inclement weather. The Douglas, Wyoming Oil Company converted into a stock company causing "Properties put upon a bargain counter and wrapped in red tape." In 1918, they reorganized as Salt Creek Consolidated.

Spring of 1917 there was plenty of moisture, adequate irrigation water and the crops were good. Oats sold for 3¢ a pound and hay $20 a ton.

By 1919, Karl's cattle herd had increased to over the 100 mark. Crops had been excellent and Karl purchased a "Lovely Buick," delivered from Chicago by Fridolf. However, the 1919-20 winter greatly diminished the herd, starting with a nervous disorder known as the staggers. Entry March 1, 1920: "Weather of past months has been very cold, raw and unsettled. I have suffered heavy loss in spite of heavy feeding, care and housing. In all it has been a nightmare and the future is full of apprehension and misgivings." Entry April 20, 1920: "Still snowing and still shoveling. The more I curse, work and pray, the more they die, then the more I curse, work and pray. The north pole fell down on Wyoming and covered a bunch of innocent birds." Entry May 1, 1920: "I have suffered a 50% loss! But today one could not wish for a more loveable spring morn. A most welcome relief. When the next storm strikes the range — Goodbye!"

April 1921 Entry: "Summer of 1919 was an unprecedented range drought, winter 1919-20 unprecedented in length and severity; Spring 1920 a virtual depressed panic and fall 1920 an enforced liquidation. But the mild winter of 1920-21 turned the tide which otherwise would have wiped out the livestock industry out west."

Conditions did improve and the years 1920 to 1927 were generally good times and most of the LaPrele properties became successful farming and ranching operations. Karl expanded his herds, his irrigated crops, added to and improved buildings, built a large cement water tank and purchased machinery. "Walter (Johnson) staged a wild runaway with the horses on the mower, Dolly and Duke. Nothing left but words." Dec. 1922 Entry: "A rider from Boot Ranch looking for cattle, runs across the charred remains of Old Cal (Nearts?) down in Alkali Gulch where he camped trapping muskrats. Upon investigation found he had been murdered and thrown in the fire to cover up. Sheriff and undertaker removed the body. Now—who done it? An old enemy of the past?" Oil activities continued strong, along with the Sinclair pipeline going through the place in 1923. There were rumors of a new railroad to go through Douglas and talk of making Douglas the state capitol. During those years, Karl used his spare time to complete a correspondence course in law, develop his talents in wood carving and ornamental wrought iron works.

Doris Lucille Enyeart, newly graduated from normal school in Nebraska, was hired to teach the Hagaman Country School, northwest of Douglas in 1924. At Christmas she was chosen to fill the 4th grade vacancy in Douglas, where she taught for the next three years. During these years, she boarded and roomed with Mr. and Mrs. Tom C. Rowley, who had opened their hearts and beautiful big home to a few carefully selected young women in Douglas. Many life-long friendships were established and they were happy years.

Karl and Doris were married August 27, 1927 and for a few months lived in the old homestead shack. One of their wedding gifts was a radio, the only one in the neighborhood. The large speaker, covered with a beautiful tapestry sea-scape was mounted on the wall. For a few hours every evening they were able to enjoy the news and limited programming. The first major change was to relocate the pet bull snake who had been sharing the shack to keep the mouse population down. The community welcomed Doris with open arms into their active social life. She and Karl shared an interest in politics and campaigned for Francis E. Warren. Karl served as Secretary-Treasurer for Converse Oil and Gas Company.

August 11, 1929, Kathryn Doris was born.

The year 1930 was the beginning of very difficult economic times for the entire country. "Times are bad. Millions filter to Wall Street but not a dollar for diligent farming. The only rest we farmers will ever have is 6' beneath the sod." Karl served his first of many years as judge for primary and general elections. "Rowley, Dawson, Meinzer and Cross easy winners." Karl and Doris managed to cope with the early 30s quite well, as did most of the surrounding ranchers, although there were some foreclosures. They raised most of their own food, sold or bartered produce to pay for such necessities as coal, seed and mortgage payments. Fridolf also provided some financial aid, and they received some income from an oil and gas lease. Both continued active in community and political affairs. Election of 1932: Prohibition - Wet 77, Dry 15. "Prohibition does work - in Church! The Democrats won for a change."

March 4, 1933 Entry: "Bank holiday declared on radio flash. To late to withdraw our account out of Converse County Bank. We have $20 and Kathryn's 25 pennies in cash."

On February 7, 1936, the area was surprised with the worst blizzard since 1919, with temperatures 20°-40° below for 10 days. "The teats of the cows are frozen. Ben Wheelock claimed to have frozen his ears in bed!" Entry March 8, 1936: "Mrs. James Pexton passed away yesterday. She and James, partners inseparable, have slaved and pioneered. What price life?" The blizzard was followed by a hot spring and summer, drought, terrible dust storms, grasshoppers, tumbleweeds and poor crops. Grazing land could no longer support cattle herds, so Karl resorted to a small band of sheep and turkeys, as did many of the adjoining ranchers. A huge hog wire pen was built containing feeders and roosts. The young turkeys were trained to roost by Karl himself perching on the stands. Turkey rustlers made many an attempt and were sometimes successful in spite of flood lights, an alarm system and guarding. The price for turkeys in Douglas and Casper ranged from 20¢-30¢ per pound, and 70¢ for smoked turkey.

January 18, 1937 Entry: "Ex-Senator 'Bob' Carey is dead. We, the commoners, held him at high regards. No doubt, the last of the old line western stockmen has passed away."

Entries from 1938: "Purchased clothes for my hired man. Overalls and shirt $2.40, BVDs 50¢, shoes $3.00. Bought 100 foot rope for $4.50. Shipped 75 pounds wool to Baron Woolen Mills, the freight exorbitant at $2.86. Kathryn received her first perm. I provoked at the $5.00 splurge and she delighted! Auto license and tax $9.90."

Recovery from the disastrous 30s would no doubt have been more rapid had it not been for the war. Fuel and rubber were in short supply, causing curtailed farming procedures and hired help difficult to obtain. The entire community was saddened by the news of Joe Larson, only son of Carrie and Henning Larson, killed in action.

Due to a life-long heart condition, Karl's health began to fail and he died January 19, 1943. Doris leased the property and she and Kathryn moved to Sheridan where Doris resumed her teaching career. In 1962 she retired to Estes Park, Colo. Fridolf retired from his career in Chicago in 1969 and moved to Casper. The property was sold to Ed Boland in 1971 but Doris and Fridolf retained a large portion of the mineral rights. Kathryn, husband Warren and two sons, Randy and Kevin, reside in Casper.

Epperly, Arthur and Cecil

Arthur Epperly and Cecil Guthrie were united in marriage at Leon, Iowa on September 15, 1915. Both being born in 1893, they were a young ambitious farm oriented couple. A daughter, Dorothy was born July 10, 1916, the starting of their brood.

Hearing about the homestead opportunity in Wyoming and being desirous of having some land of their own, they made the decision to go west to obtain some of that sagebrush covered terrain. On a bitter cold Iowa afternoon in February 1917, Art, his wife and small daughter, along with their few personal belongings, furniture, a few head of livestock and horse drawn farm implements, boarded a freight train and headed for wild and woolly Wyoming.

They arrived in Douglas and filed a homestead claim on Box Creek, 25 miles north of Douglas.

Times were tough and Mr. Epperly ran a freight-string for Fiddleback Co. several years to keep the home fires burning. He freighted with eight horses pulling two wagons. His longest run was from the Cheyenne River Fiddleback Ranch to the vicinity of the Whitaker Ranch south of Douglas. As he related to me, winters were rough and cold and he walked alongside the head wagon to keep from freezing at times.

A son, Gerald, came along in 1919 and another daughter, Evelyn in 1921. A set of boy and girl twins, Verl "Curly" and Vera, were born at the homestead in 1928.

Art Epperly, 1920 — frt. wagon in front of homestead shack.

Art stated that when they started coming two at a time, they had better quit!

Through hard work and toil, Mr. and Mrs. Epperly increased their acreage, dry farmed and raised grade Hereford cattle. Their five children received their earlier schooling at Dry Creek Elementary School or Bill University as Curly called it! All of them graduated from Converse County High School.

Dorothy married Ernie Holtorf and they lived at Wahoo, Nebraska. Their family included a boy, Gary, and a daughter, Pam. Dorothy passed away in 1955 from cancer.

Gerald married Helen Burden, making their home in Glenrock. Helping to keep the Epperly name in existence, they were blessed with three sons, Gerald "Shorty", Larry and Dennis. Gerald perished in a car accident near Douglas in 1954. His widow and two married sons reside in Glenrock.

Arthur and Cecil's three remaining children are married and live in Douglas. Evelyn married Les Spracklen and they have a son, Bob, of Douglas. Vera married Jim Bartshe and they have two daughters, Debbie and Becky, both residing in Douglas. Curly married Sue Waters and they have no children.

Epperlys sold the ranch to Jake Johnson in 1947 and moved to Douglas where they dealt in rental properties and retired.

Art, who enjoyed joking, brings to mind when his dog barked at a visiting neighbor he would call out "Come here you $500 dog." When quizzed about the high price of the Heinz variety K-9, he would reply that he traded two $250 cats for it!

Mrs. Epperly maintained that if she wanted to hide something of importance from the children, such as legal documents, pictures, etc., she would put them in the family Bible because the children would never look in there!

Arthur was called from his busy life July 3, 1975 and Cecil expired February 24, 1982, ending the era of another Dry Creek Community homesteading couple.

Erwin, B. J. and Marie

B. J. Erwin was known in the vicinity of Douglas as the "Cowboy Minister." He packed the local Congregational Church with stockmen and ranchers who came from miles around to hear him preach. Mr. Erwin enjoyed a wide acquaintance throughout central and southern Wyoming. He had a reputation as an eloquent speaker as well as being a witty conversationalist.

Mr. Erwin was born in 1872 in Missouri. He moved to Nebraska where he taught school in Kearney and Cozad. In 1900, he came to Douglas as the resident pastor of the Congregational Church.

After three years, he left the church to identify himself with the mineral resources of this area, believing that he could accomplish something toward mineral development.

B. J. was one of the promoters of the LaPrele Irrigation Project, which served 36,000 acres of land lying west of Douglas. He was also a member of the first board of directors of the original ditch company.

Mr. Erwin acquired a great deal of property under the ditch, and at one time, was a successful livestock producer. He also owned the large ranch property opposite the town across the Platte River.

B. J. was married in 1912 to Marie H. Homer of New York City and to them one child was born. This girl was named Elizabeth Jane. By a previous marriage, Mr. Erwin was the father of three children, Arthur, Hally and Richard, who died in 1931 at the age of 21.

In 1911, B. J. was elected mayor of Douglas and served until 1914. He held the position of Register of the United States Land Office which was located in Douglas from 1924 until 1928. He was also an active member of the Wyoming Stock Growers Association and served as a member of the school board for a number of years.

Mr. Erwin died in 1937 at the age of 65.

Esau, John C. and Elma Family

Both Jacob and Anna Dalke Esau were born and raised in Germany. They were wed there but shortly afterward, they migrated to the United States. Jacob took up a homestead in Nebraska where he engaged in farming.

In 1891, a son, John C. Esau, was born to Jacob and Anna in a sod house located in Hampton, Hamilton County, Nebraska. John's father died in 1894 when John was three years old. Seven years later, John lost his mother, leaving him an orphan at the age of ten. For the next five years of his life, John was cared for by relatives and foster parents.

At the age of 15, John Esau was making his own way, learning the fundamentals of ranching and the rough work of a cowboy on the open range. His teenage years were a series of hardships, but he was a determined young man who worked diligently to build a life for himself.

In 1914, John C. Esau married Elma Thomas in Petersburg, Nebraska. Elma was born in Petersburg in 1894 and educated there. Elma's father was a native of England, her mother a native of Illinois. They had come to Nebraska to farm.

In 1915, the Esaus came to Wyoming, where for a time, John was employed at the A L ranch on LaPrele Creek as a cowhand. In 1917, John took a homestead at Dull Center. When the opportunity presented itself, he sold his homestead and purchased property from Newt Scott, located thirty miles north and six miles east of Douglas. During the years that followed, John was able to enlarge his holdings to eight thousand acres. Part of his land originally belonged to W. C. Irvine. John confined his operation to raising commercial Hereford cattle.

Six children were born to the Esaus — Ivan, Don, Dick, Harold and Helen (the twins), and Irene, all of whom received their education in Converse County. The Esaus raised their family, worked at the ranching business, and made the ranch their home until the time of their deaths.

It was just before Thanksgiving in 1973. Elma and John were preparing for the arrival of their daughter, Helen Esau Bess, her husband Dr. Howard Bess, and their five children. It was necessary for the Esaus to go into Douglas for supplies, and the "extras" for the special occasion. The weather was very cold, with snow covering the ground that morning. John had recently purchased a new pickup, since he did not want to face the coming winter with the old vehicle. He and Elma were getting on in years and John's health was poor; he suffered from emphysema.

The trip to town was uneventful. The couple completed their shopping and left to return home. A short distance from their home, the pickup stalled. John and Elma decided that they would walk home and return next morning with some gas, for John thought that the gauge was faulty, and the tank was empty. So the two elderly people began to walk. Not far from the pickup, John collapsed from lack of oxygen and the intense cold. Mrs. Esau did not leave her husband, and she, too, died from cold and exposure. Their bodies were found together.

Dr. and Mrs. Bess had arrived at the Esau ranch about one a.m. on Thanksgiving Day. They had passed the vehicle stranded on the road, but thought little about it, since they were not aware that John had bought a new pickup. Upon their arrival at the ranch, they noticed that the Esaus' old pickup was parked in the yard in its customary place. The Bess family did not wish to disturb the Esaus, so they went to bed. Thus, it was morning before they discovered that the house was empty.

Frantically, they began to search, and shortly discovered the bodies of Mrs. Bess' parents lying together beside the road. The coroner was summoned. He estimated that the deaths had occurred sometime on Wednesday.

A double funeral service was held for the Esaus before they were interred in the Douglas cemetery. Mr. and Mrs. Esau had been active in their community and county. They were members of the Congregational Church, the Farm Bureau, the Wyoming Stock Growers Association, and the Old Cowboy's Association.

John and Elma Esau lived together for 59 years. Just as they had lived together, they died together in the snow.

The ranch which John started so long ago remains in the family. However their son, Harold, lives on the property and operates a cattle business. The eldest of the Esau children, Ivan, is now deceased. The rest of the children married and reared children of their own. There are sixteen grandchildren by these marriages.

Eskew, Wheeler

Wheeler Eskew was born near Forsythe, Missouri on December 29, 1876, the son of Willis James and Rhoda Ann Elizabeth (Warren) Eskew. He had two brothers and two sisters. They grew up in Polk and Taney Counties of southwestern Missouri.

In the late 1890's he went to Livingston, Montana, where he worked for two or three summers guiding tourists from Livingston, Montana to the Yellowstone National Park entrance at Gardiner, Montana. He worked at various other jobs the rest of the time.

In January 1901, he came to Wyoming and worked that first winter at the Double Box Ranch on Sand Creek or Stinking Water, about 50 miles north of Glenrock, which in later years became part of the Slaughter and Patzold Sheep Co. Wheeler also worked as an engineer at the coal mine at Glenrock, prior to becoming a partner in the Slaughter and Patzold Sheep Co. with Mr. O. A. Patzold.

In 1907, a couple of uncles of his, Len C. and Thomas Marion Eskew, homesteaded on the Cheyenne River a couple miles below where the North and South Forks came together, about 30 miles north of Glenrock. These homesteads became the nucleus of the Slaughter and Patzold Sheep Co. Around 1912, or there abouts, the uncles left Wyoming and Wheeler took over as a partner in the company, being it's president and general manager.

On January 27, 1914, he was married to Olga Ione Hendrickson of Bern, Kansas. They were the first couple to use the bridal suite of the newly opened LaBonte Hotel. To this union, three children were born, Edna, who died in infancy, Mable (Mrs J. Douglas) Fowler, and Pauline (Mrs. Fred A.) Fitch. Mrs. Eskew passed away November 12, 1933; and on May 12, 1938 Wheeler was married to Mae (Morris) Fisher.

He joined the Glenrock Oddfellow Lodge on March 10, 1905 and later affiliated with the Douglas Lodge. He was also a member of the Converse Encampment of the lodge. He was a prominent Republican leader and worker. He would see that every man on the ranch and any neighbor that didn't have a car got to vote. He would take a relief man and go to every sheep camp and get the herder and take him to vote. The precinct was Theresa (Teresa) at the old 88 ranch house at Brown Springs.

He passed away in his sleep January 6, 1940 of a heart attack, at the age of 63, at his ranch 40 miles northwest of Douglas, Wyoming

Although the ranch name was Slaughter and Patzold Sheep Co., it was better known as the "fifty five" after the main brand that was used.

Mable E. Fowler

Esmay, Edgar, Laura and Julia

Ed Esmay was born January 28, 1880 and died November 20, 1936. He was a resident of Douglas since 1897. Ed was born in Subula, Iowa. He came to Douglas in 1897 with his father and brother Charles. They had homesteads about five miles east of Douglas. They went to work for Pete Esmay, who was in the contracting business, as subcontractors for painting, plastering and general finishing work. Ed sort of "rode herd" on the crews. He was one of the most energetic fellows that Howard Esmay ever knew. Howard said, "he never heard Ed speak an unkind word and his crew always had their work done on time". All of them usually rode horseback to and from their work as autos were slow in getting around due to the poor roads.

Ed married Miss Laura Dean on September 24, 1908. They had one son, Harold Dean, born 1909 in Douglas. Mrs. Esmay died in California in 1912.

Ed volunteered as a musician with the Wyoming Infantry in World War I on August 13, 1918 at Cheyenne. He went overseas with the 163rd Infantry Band on April 27, 1919. On May 10th, he transferred to the 103rd Infantry and served his country in France, Belgium and Germany. Ed returned to the United States in June 1920.

He returned to Douglas where he met and married Miss Julia McCleda Mulligan on July 3, 1921. Ed was an efficient member of the Douglas Fire Department for 15 years, part of which he was Fire Chief. Ed and his wife lived in an apartment above the fire hall. A daughter, Betty Jean, was born October 22, 1923.

Ed and his wife, Julia (Bobbie), were janitors for 16 or 17 years at the Converse County High School. Then due to Ed's health, they were transferred to the South Grade School. A son, Martin James, was born January 5, 1934.

Ed lived a quiet and unassuming life, was efficient at his tasks and always had a ready smile for everyone. But he suffered much during his last years, never indicating his pain to his friends. He passed away at the Veterans Hospital in Cheyenne at the age of 56.

Summertime was always busy for Ed and Bobbie, as that was the time for repairs, varnishing the floors, polishing the desks, painting the restrooms and checking the playground equipment for the start of another school year. Both the high school and grade school had an apartment for them to live in.

Ed loved to fish, so the family spent vacations with him camping up at Cold Springs. Their close friends, the Earl Cashners, also spent many weekends on fishing trips to the mountains with them.

At one time, they had a small one room cabin built on the hillside above Sam Carothers' ranch on Wagonhound which they were homesteading. Betty remembers her mom and dad having to shoot rattlesnakes before they could get out of the car to get to the cabin.

One summer, when they were still at the high school, Bobbie ordered a couple pair of coverall slacks with wide legs. Guess they were such an oddity that Ed modeled a pair of them. They made quite a picture together.

One year, when Ed was still janitor at the high school, the senior class had a picture of Ed with a poem dedicated to him in their annual.

When Ed and Bobbie moved to the South Grade School, they bought some lots on South Sixth on which they had planned to build a home. They had already built a small garage on one lot.

Ed's mother, sister Addie and her husband, Martin Peterson, lived in Spokane, Washington. One summer, Ed took his wife and daughter through Yellowstone Park to visit them. Betty remembers them stopping along the highway to feed some lemon drops to a mother bear who got very aggressive when Bobbie didn't feed them to her fast enough. Bobbie had to roll the window up to keep the bear from reaching into the car after them.

Ed belonged to the American Legion and Bobbie belonged to the Royal Neighbors which was very active at that time.

I married Lewis George, son of Harry and Mabel George.

Esmay, Pete and Eva Family

The Esmay (Ismay) family originally came from England. Religion, Anglican.

The description of the Esmay Coat of Arms from England is as follows: Arms—or, a fesse sable, in chief a demi-lion rampant gules. Crest—a savage, wreathed about the head and middle with leaves, in the dexter hand a club, the top resting on the ground, all proper.

John Henry (Pete) Esmay was the tenth child of Francis F. Esmay and Nancy Seeber of Jackson County, Courtland, New York. They arrived in Sabula, Iowa in 1850. Pete was born on January 28, 1871.

John (Pete) married Eva Louise Beesley, who was born in Lyons, Clinton County, Iowa on August 30, 1871. Her parents were Alice and Benjamin Beesley of Sabula, but were born in Birmingham, England. She and Pete were married in Sabula, Iowa on November 3, 1891. They moved to Douglas from Sabula in 1900.

Pete was a building contractor, building many of the present-day buildings in Douglas. He built the old Carnegie Library and the building that housed the Judevine Creamery for many years. Music was very much a part of his life. He played in and was director of the Douglas Bands and Casper Bands as well as the Wyoming Shrine Band.

The Esmays homesteaded where the Jackalope Plunge is now, later building a spacious two-story house two miles northeast of there on the banks of the Platte River.

Eva died on January 29, 1932 and Pete on June 23, 1957 in Douglas.

They were the parents of four sons: Howard, Wayne, Rhodolph and Benjamin.

Howard — born June 1, 1893, Sabula, Iowa. Married Frances White in Douglas, April 8, 1917. She died in La Jolla, California in 1954. No children. Howard was a banker in Douglas, Wyoming, La Jolla, California and Gillette, Wyoming. He married Helen Elliot of La Jolla, a widow with a daughter, Marsha, whom Howard adopted. Howard died November 1, 1985 in San Diego, California.

Wayne — born February 14, 1895 in Sabula, Iowa. He was in the oil business. He married Willa Hamilton, a widow with a son, Jack. He served in World War I, and in World War II, was a prisoner of war on Kyushu Island, Japan, and died of starvation in the prison camp.

Rhodolph Leslie — born May 15, 1898 at Sabula, Iowa. Served in the Mexican Border War, World War I, twice wounded hero of the Argonne and St. Mihiel where he led an Infantry Line Company in terrible battles. Received many medals including Purple Heart. Served as the Adjutant General and Director of Selective Service for the State of Wyoming. His military record covered 47 years. He married Florence Neis in 1929. He died November 15, 1965 with a military rank of 3-Star General. They had two sons:

John Charles Esmay, — born May 17, 1932. Married Chrisola Polous July 31, 1955. Divorced. One daughter, Niki Elana Esmay, born April 21, 1962, who is a senior at the University of Wyoming (1984). John is a dentist, graduated from the Washington University, St. Louis, Missouri, and practicing dentistry in Cheyenne, Wyoming. He married Donna Wright Schultz, June 16, 1981. Served two years of military active duty and at present is a Lt. Colonel in the Wyoming Air National Guard.

Rhodolph Lesley Esmay, Jr. — born October 23, 1945. Graduate of Arizona State University, Tempe, Arizona. Military record - 2 years in Germany after university. Married Sandra Lee Swedlund in Tempe, Arizona May 27, 1973. One son, John Rhodolph Esmay, born December 25, 1980. At present, Rhodolph is with General Motors and the District Manager for the Pontiac Division in Minneapolis, Minnesota.

Fourth son, Benjamin Beesley Esmay, of Pete Esmay — born in Douglas, Wyoming, in May, 1903. Died in Seattle, Washington, January 21, 1941.

Etchemendy, Pierre and Anna Family

In 1920, Pierre Etchemendy, along with his sister, Catherine Harriet, immigrated to the United States from the Basque Country in the Pyrennes Mountains of southern France. They came to Buffalo, Wyoming, where Pierre worked for John Iberlin herding sheep. He returned to France in 1927. In 1929, he was married to Anna Inchauspe and they came to America. On the way, they met some people who were going to Colorado to work for sheepmen, so Pierre and Anna decided to go on to Montrose, Colorado instead of returning to Buffalo.

Pierre and Anna Etchemendy and 6 grandchildren.

When they arrived in America, they had no knowledge of the English language, but after working for other people, were soon speaking enough English to get by. After working for other people, he started his own sheep outfit in 1934. He sold out in the fall of 1948 in Colorado because of the inaccessibility of land.

In 1950, Pierre bought the ranch north of Lost Springs, Wyoming from Roy Condray, and that spring he, along with his wife and two sons, George and Prosper, moved to Wyoming, leaving behind a daughter, Grace, who was married and a younger daughter, Eveleen who was still attending high school. She finished her education in Colorado and spent her summers in Wyoming.

When Pierre arrived in Lost Springs, he bought a band of sheep from Grover Gallagher and lambd them at Spring Canyon at Natural Bridge because he couldn't take possession of the ranch until June 1st. It snowed and rained every day. George left high school early that year to come up and help his father with the lambing and Prosper was still in college. In spite of the adverse conditions in the weather, they still had a 120% lamb crop. In 1955, they purchased the George McCormick place that adjoined the Condray land. From 1953 to 1955, Pierre (also known as Pete) managed the ranch by himself while George and Prosper were in the armed services in the Korean conflict. From 1955 to 1965, the boys helped with the ranch, at which time Pierre sold the sheep to them and they leased the land. In 1968, the boys dissolved their partnership and George took over the sheep and land.

In 1981, Pierre sold the ranch to his son, George and wife, Bobetta. Pierre and Anna still continued to spend their summers in Wyoming and winters in Colorado, where the climate was much more agreeable.

Although they did learn to read and speak the English language, they continued to speak the Basque language, which was the predominant language spoken at home.

Anna passed away at Montrose, Colorado in 1980 at the age of 77 and Pierre passed away, also in Montrose, in 1981 at the age of 85, being preceded in death by their daughter Eveleen and two granddaughters. They are survived by their two sons, one daughter and ten grandchildren.

Fackler, Dan and Augusta Family

My father was born in Cedar Rapids, Iowa on February 29, 1868. He was the son of Ira Bloom and Margaret Silverthorn Fackler. He had four brothers, Sam, Bill, Tom and Jim as well as two sisters, Anna and Lily. Because he was born on Leap Year, he and I, Margaret Fackler Carlson, always celebrated our birthdays together, mine being on the 25th of February.

Because of a disagreement with his father, my dad left his family home at the age of 14, arriving in Cheyenne in 1882. What his experiences were on the way to Wyoming, neither my brother or I can recall hearing about. The exception was that he was barefooted when he left and he met up with a wagon train where a lady member of the train took pity on him and saw to it that he was fed.

After arriving in Cheyenne, he hired out to Harry Hines working in his livery stable and barn. How long this lasted, we don't know with the exception that they were close friends for years. We know he was also employed by the Charles Carey outfit and the 2 Bar or Swan Livestock Company at Chugwater.

Following this, he served as Deputy U.S. Marshal Cheyenne for two years. He was 19 years old at the time and was getting well acquainted with the Wyoming Territory. He had followed a freighter across the Laramie Plains to Fort Fetterman, landing in Douglas for the first time. He was especially fond of the Downey Park area and later, when his brother Tom came to Wyoming, they bought some cattle together and Tom took up homesteads there in 1900. For a while it was called Fackler Brothers. Later, in 1914, Tom sold part of his claim to Dan. The other part went to Roy Combs. In 1889, he came to Douglas and made his home there. During this time, he worked as a sheep foreman for John T. Williams. While working for Williams he had a close encounter with Tom Horn. It was late evening and dark when my dad made into camp. After lighting a lantern and starting a fire, he went out to take care of his horse. When he started back to the cabin, he spotted a man peering into the cabin window. He instinctively stepped back into the shadows and waited until he had gone. Later, he learned Tom Horn had ridden through the area and he would have been shot if he had made his presence known.

He also worked as round-up foreman at the CY for Joseph Carey. This was important then because this ranch covered a large span of territory. Starting at the Old Goose Egg Ranch, southwest of Casper, it extended north almost to Sheridan, east and south to the railroad and into western Nebraska. He also punched cattle for the Ogalalla and VR ranches.

In 1904, he served as Deputy Sheriff under Sheriff Charles Messenger. During this time he was riding through the Toltec area on the Laramie Plains when he met the woman he was later to marry, Augusta Wallin. She had come to that area from Hildreth, Nebraska, to teach a summer session of school. In those days, the ranch children were unable to get to school in the winter because of heavy snows, so they made up for it during the summer. Mother told me the school children came running into the school house shouting "Dan Fackler is coming!" Later, he told her as soon as he met her he knew she was the woman he was going to marry. They married on May 10, 1905 at her family home near Hildreth, Nebraska. They then moved into the home he had built for her in Douglas at 338 South Fifth Street. Two sons were born while he was in the sheriff's office. Decie James (1906) and Thomas Wallin (1908).

He had a special horse he called "Old Blue" and he told about the time he rode to Rock River from Douglas -90 miles one way - then back to Douglas the next day. When dad was freighting supplies out to the sheep camps, "Old Blue" always tagged along. When they reached the river bridge he refused to cross but would always swim across instead.

In 1908, Dad ran for sheriff but lost to Sheriff Messenger. My mother told us the reason he lost was the Wilsons at the Platte Valley Ranch wanted him to run their ranch, so they gathered up all their ranch hands, sheepherders, etc. to vote against him. He lost, and sure enough, Dad moved his family to the Platte Valley and ran the Wilson operation. Another son, Paul Newton, was born in 1910 in Douglas while they were there.

The Richards and Comstock Cattle Company at Manville called him then and wanted him to take over their ranch holdings ten miles north of Manville. My dad and mother were delighted because the owners had told him if everything went well at the ranch, it would eventually be his because they had no heirs and consequently there would be no one else to turn it over to.

After twelve years of success and contentment and two more children, Richard Comstock (1913), and Margaret Christine (1916), born in Manville, disaster hit. When Theodore Roosevelt was elected president, one of the first things he did after being installed was start an investigation into the ranch holdings in Wyoming because he wanted to obtain some of Wyoming's ranch lands for himself. As it turned out, many of the ranchers of that era were in the habit of fencing in range land that was owned by the government. Richards and Comstock were among them and they were chosen to be made an example of for the wrongdoing, Mr. Richards was put into prison and later died there a broken and disgraced man. The ranch was sold to Ad Spaugh, and my dad moved his family back to the Douglas area where he purchased the Tom Rudd homestead five miles west of Douglas in 1923. He purchased a band of sheep, intending to use the Downey Park homesteads for summer pasture. This lasted only a short time, until 1925, when the Taylor Livestock Company called and asked if he would take over management of their ranch holdings west of Casper. Since he missed the wide open ranges he had been used to, he again moved his family to the Effie and UC ranches where we lived during the summer months, moving into Casper in the fall for the school term.

On May 9, 1928, in Casper, Wyoming, Dan passed away at the Natrona County Memorial Hospital at the age of 59 from lung cancer. Funeral services were held at the Methodist Church in Douglas. Burial was in Douglas Park Cemetery.

My mother then brought the three youngest children, Newton, Richard and Margaret back to Douglas so that we might finish our education. Decie and Tommy stayed, going to work on the Grieves and Ben Roberts' outfits.

My mother, Augusta Teckla Wallin was born in Ishpeming, Michigan, January 5, 1879. Her parents, Edward and Christine Jacobson Wallin, had migrated to the U.S. from Sweden around 1868. After several moves, they decided to homestead in southern Nebraska near Hildreth. She grew up there, finishing her schooling in Minden and Grand Island. She taught school in that area for several years before coming to the Laramie Plains area in 1903 where she met my dad. She passed away after a lengthy illness in April, 1965 at Converse County Hospital. Burial was in Douglas Park Cemetery.

Fackler, Jim and Ivy

The youngest Fackler brother to homestead in the Douglas area was James Luther Fackler. He was born near Hebron, Iowa, on June 30, 1874. He married Ivy Graham in North Platte, Nebraska on October 22, 1893. His father, Ira B. Fackler, officiated at their marriage. Uncle Jim and Auntie, as they were called by their many nieces, nephews and friends, did not have any children of their own. They lived in a number of places; Illinois, Nebraska, Kansas, Iowa and Texas. He had a job in Kansas City as a street car conductor and he was a police chief in Iowa. In Clear Lake, Iowa, they had a home on a lake where he rented fishing boats.

In 1925, they homesteaded in Downey Park in Albany County. They continued to spend the winters in Clear Lake, Iowa until 1929, when they sold that home and moved to a small place on Bedtick Creek, eight miles south of Douglas. Auntie raised turkeys at the homestead each summer while Uncle Jim put up hay at the Bedtick.

One spring, when it was time to move back to the homestead, the turkeys were put in boxes and then into a small open trailer towed behind the car. Before they started up Moss Agate hill, Auntie got in the trailer with the turkeys to prevent them from piling up. Uncle Jim, with their niece, Sara, started up the hill. About half way up the hill and around a corner, he noticed the trailer was not following. He stopped the car and he and Sara walked back around the corner. The trailer had been attached to the car bumper with only wire and it, with its load of turkeys and Auntie, had come free and rolled back to the bottom of the hill. Needless to say, no one rode in the trailer the rest of the way to the homestead. Oh yes, all the turkeys survived, too.

In 1937, they sold the homestead to Art Horr and moved to the Frank Rogers place, south of Douglas. About 1940, they purchased a place from Dudley Ferbrache in the upper LaPrele Creek area. In 1944, they sold this place to Art Horr and moved to Douglas in 1946. Uncle Jim then worked as a ditch rider for the LaPrele Irrigation District and for several years was caretaker for Natural Bridge Park.

Uncle Jim was 81 years old when he died on August 24, 1955. He and Auntie had been married for 62 years. Ivy died on February 12, 1959.

Fackler, Thomas David and Nellie

This is the biography of Thomas David Fackler, born January 4, 1872 in Johnson County, Iowa. But first, a little on the history of the Facklers moving ever westward until Tom came to Converse County.

Most who came west, dreamed of owning land and a better life. This was also the dream of Wendal Fackler, when he came to Philadelphia from Germany in 1763, at the age of 17. He was apprenticed to work on the streets of Philadelphia for three years, but when one-half of his time had expired, he was released and employed at regular wages. He joined the colonists in the war for independence. When the Republic was established, he purchased land from the government. There, he and his wife raised ten children.

As the land became more settled, his grandson, Samuel, started moving west, stopping in Ohio and Wisconsin for a few years. Some time after 1850, he settled in Johnson County, Iowa.

Ira Fackler, second son of Samuel, married (Hannah) Margaret Silverthorn, June 1, 1859. He worked in various places in Iowa, where their children, Anna, Samuel, William, Daniel, Thomas, James and Lilly were born.

In the mid 1880's, land to be homesteaded drew the Facklers on west again to Lincoln County, Nebraska. By this time, Anna had married, Sam, Bill and Dan had left home. Sam went west with an uncle where they freighted from Cheyenne to Deadwood. He later settled in Nebraska near North Platte. Dan had also gone to Wyoming.

Tom and Nellie Fackler.

Tom left the family home in 1895, going to Missouri Valley, Iowa. While there, he was a member of the fire department until 1908 when he came to Wyoming. He joined his brother Dan in raising livestock. Their brand was  $\frac{N}{X}$  on the left ribs.

Dan had homesteaded several years before Tom came to Wyoming. Tom also filed on a homestead in Downey Park.

In 1916, Tom married Nellie Jewart in Medicine Bow at the home of her sister, Mrs. Chas. Richards.

Nellie was the daughter of Ephriam and Sarah Babb Jewart; she was born August 10, 1886 in Liberal, Missouri. Nellie had six sisters and three brothers.

She also had homesteaded in Downey Park in 1915. In 1918, they sold their homesteads to Roy Combs. The land is now owned by his son, Lee. The original cabin is still there; it has been added to over the years.

In October of 1918, Tom and Nellie purchased a ranch from Harry Isaac on lower LaBonte. There they made their home until Nellie died August 17, 1925, leaving two small daughters, Sara Margaret; age two and Nellie Nadine, just four days old.

Due to the caring for his two young daughters, Tom decided he should move to Douglas, and in 1926, he sold the ranch. For the next three or four years he drove the mail route to Esterbrook.

One of the big events for me was when Dad would take me with him on the mail route, with a stop at the post office at the Fitzhugh ranch where I would play with the children. Then, when we got to Esterbrook, we would eat our lunch on the porch at the post office while the mail was being sorted, then back to Braae Post Office, then on to Douglas. I would put the mail in boxes for Dad. It was great fun until I slammed my fingers in the car door; they turned black, and that took the fun out of that trip.

Tragedy again entered Tom's life with the death of his youngest daughter, Nellie. She died after a short illness in February, 1927.

In 1930, Tom married Lillian Crowe. She had two daughters, Betty (Brock), and Dorothy (Gillespie), and one son George.

In the early 1930's, Tom hauled coal to Douglas residents from the Badger Coal Mine near Glenrock. In 1934, they moved to the White Lilly Motel, which they managed until 1939.

Tom passed away February 12, 1941.

His daughter, Sara, married Lawrence Nachtman, September 3, 1952. They have three daughters, Patricia (Palmer), Linda (Aeschliman) and Susan (Downs), one son, James (Jim) and eight grandchildren and two great-grandchildren.

George and Anna Falkenburg.

Falkenburg, George and Anna

The Falkenburgs, George and Anna, came from the Essen, Germany area on the ship, Pennsylvania September 29, 1892. Two sons, Herman and Garriet had come to the U.S. from Germany with them; children Elizabeth and Fred had died very young in Germany.

Early day posse: L. to R. I. G. Phillips, Herman Falkenburg, Bill McMaster, George Walkinshaw, Bob Barker, Sheriff Albert Peyton and Howard Jackson.

From Philadelphia they traveled to Iowa where George worked for the railroad. A daughter, Mary Ann, was born while the family lived in Missouri Valley, Iowa.

In 1894, George was transferred to Douglas, Wyoming where he worked as a Section Boss for the railroad for five years. At Inez, Wyoming, west of Douglas, Rose was born in 1895, Lucy in 1898, and Inez in 1900.

George filed on a homestead after receiving his citizenship papers. Rose well remembers the move there. "It took four days, as we had some cattle and horses to drive 72 miles to our new home. Dad drove the white span of mules and Herman, my brother, the brown span." The homestead was 15 miles north of the Little Medicine Post Office located in the beautiful valley with natural meadows and several large springs. Soldier Creek ran through the middle of the homestead. The family lived in a large two room cabin for two years owned by John Manlove, a Douglas sheepman. George and his sons built their home out of hewed logs. The cabin consisted of three large rooms and four small bedrooms with a large woodshed. They worked to paint all the woodwork and paper the walls. They moved to their new home in 1902 and a boy Carl was born in 1903.

The next spring, Mary and Rose went to the Little Medicine Summer School. They boarded with Mr. and Mrs. Matt Burnett, paying $8.00 per month for room and board. The teacher's name was Ida Purdy. After two years, the Falkenburgs got a winter school of their own; the first in the district at that time.

After clearing the big sagebrush off the natural meadows, and adding to the homestead land, the family cut enough hay to winter one hundred or more head of cattle. The winters were very severe in the mountains, so a winter supply of groceries were purchased in early October and again the first part of June. It was a long drive with horses and lumber wagon—72 miles to Douglas, and 69 miles to Medicine Bow.

Rose remembers the death of her father: "My dear father passed away one cold wintry morning on March 7th, 1907. Brother Herman was ill with pneumonia and the rest of us had a siege of "LaGrippe" as they called it then—the flu now! We put his body in the woodshed until Garriet and Mary could ride over to Little Medicine to get help. Our good neighbors came the 15 miles with bobsled. They had to follow the ridges as the snow was so deep. They buried my father in the Little Medicine Cemetery."

Anna and the boys continued to run the ranch. The winters were the hardest as the stock had to be fed every day, shedded at night, and the large shed cleaned each day. The girls helped after school with scoop shovels. It was all hard work; stacking hay in the summer, or running the horse mower or rake in the summer haying time; but they all worked together.

Anna Falkenburg married for a second time; a sheepman, Mr. William LaRue, in 1910. By this time the children were old enough to care for the ranch by themselves. Garriet passed away in 1910 with blood poisoning in his foot. Mary was married to Edward McGraugh the next fall. Rose went to Laramie to the University of Wyoming in the fall of 1913 to complete two years normal training to teach school. She and Hubert George married in 1915.

Anna and William LaRue continued to live on the "Plains" until 1914 when they purchased a place close to Casper, Wyoming. They both passed away in June 1930 and are buried in Douglas, Wyoming beside Garriet. Herman and Rose both settled on Wagonhound Creek in Converse Co. Mary and Lucy lived with their families in the Bates Hole area in Natrona Co., Wyoming. Inez made her home in Washington, and Carl settled in Caldwell, Idaho, and later Provo, Utah.

After his father's death, Herman helped his mother with the homestead until at the age of 30 years he enlisted in the Army in World War I.

He has vivid recollections of the war years, including the severe flu epidemic where he saw some of his best friends go to the great beyond. His orders were received to go overseas when the Armistice was signed in 1918.

His rank of corporal was earned while he was serving in the 33rd Balloon Corps - Air Service at Lee Hall, Virginia.

After the war Herman worked as foreman for Winnie Bucknum of Casper and saved his earnings, with which he purchased the Bob George ranch on Wagonhound Creek in 1929.

On January 2, 1931 he married the former Gertrude Bicart who was a school marm at a neighboring ranch.

Gertrude was born October 20, 1906 at Fulton, Kansas to Joseph and Mary Bicart.

She attended public schools at Fulton, Kansas and college at Kansas State Teachers College at Pittsburg, Kansas.

After receiving her certificate she taught at St. Francis, Kansas and McKinnion, Wyoming. Upon raising her family, she received her Bachelor of Science Degree in education from Chadron State College at Chadron, Nebraska.

She taught the 3rd grade pupils in Douglas, Wyo. for 18 years before her retirement in 1971.

Herman and Gertrude experienced some of the worst years during the dust storms and grasshoppers of the "Dirty 30s" (1930s).

Gertrude recalls being unable to see the sun for days during the dust bowl days because of wind and blowing dust.

In 1933 and 1934 the grasshoppers ate every useable bit of foliage, even the fence posts. One summer the total hay crop on Wagonhound Creek was three ton.

In March of 1937 the thermometer registered 45 degrees below zero, so there were other adversities besides drought and insects.

The storm of April 12, 1945 brought four feet of snow on the level and the news of Franklin D. Roosevelt's death.

1949 was another never-to-be-forgotten winter with six weeks of bitter cold and blowing snow. The roads were only open twice during that time to bring in supplies and hay for livestock.

As the years moved along the Falkenburgs added to their holdings in the fertile valley.

In the 1940's they purchased over 640 acres of fine grass land from Roy Hylton, son of former prominent Douglas doctor, J. R. Hylton.

Included in this acreage was the famous Poison Lake, which at one time was refined for Epsom salts. The water in the lake is very poisonous and has been fenced for 122 years.

The fall of 1960 saw a group of ranchers purchase the R. L. Manning Ranch on LaBonte and Westfork LaBonte Creeks. The Falkenburgs were one of the group purchasing or leasing over 3,791 acres of this beautiful mountainous property.

Herman and Gertrude's children are George Falkenburg, who lives at the home ranch on Wagonhound, Dr. Joe Falkenburg, who lives on a ranch north of Harrison, Nebraska and teaches at Chadron State College, Mrs. Eugene Hardy (Joy), a registered nurse, who lives on a ranch north of Douglas and Mrs. Kenneth Hollibaugh (Rose Mary) who lives on a ranch near Hay Springs, Nebraska.

Gertrude died August 2, 1982. Herman died on February 27, 1983.

Fawcett, Art, Ruth and Jane

Art Fawcett was born in Morgan County, Chesterhill, Ohio, the son of Clifford and Florence Steer Fawcett. After attending forestry school in Minnesota he went to work on a private forest. Later he went to work for the United States Forest Service and was working at an experimental station at Amherst, Massachusetts when he met Ruth.

Ruth and Art were married on January 23, 1931. She was born on August 31, 1905 at Eastport, Maine. She graduated from Springhill, Massachusetts Hospital School for Nursing. She served, for a time, as a personal secretary to Dr. Gilbert Grosvenor, founder of the National Geographic Society.

After their marriage, Art served with the Forest Service in Idaho, Utah, Colorado, Nebraska and North and South Dakota.

As a U.S. Forest Ranger, Art was transferred to the new Esterbrook District of Medicine Bow National Forest in 1937. The lanky ranger, his wife, Ruth, and their two children, Russell, six years old, and Ethel, five years old, lived in Esterbrook. Art remembered, "Logging was prevalent, and that first year I spent the winter marking and scaling timber."

Art rented the Norcross house in Esterbrook and built a small utility building to use as an office.

While Art served three years on the Esterbrook District, Russell and Ethel attended the small Esterbrook School. Art was kept busy establishing the first fire lookout on the District, building telephone lines, and constructing the Eagle Peak Truck Trail. Then came new orders to move, but by this time both Art and Ruth had grown to like the Esterbrook country, and Art turned down leaving, resigning from the Forest Service in 1940.

He rented a small ranch south of Laramie Peak for his first venture in the livestock business, but after four years, in the spring of 1945, he and Ruth returned to Esterbrook. "That was the spring following the April blizzard. We bought a few acres south of Esterbrook at the old Hamner place on Horseshoe Creek and we've been here ever since."

Another small piece of land was added later. "A car dealer in Casper had taken over a 40 acre homestead from a man who couldn't make the payments on his car. When he took the land in lieu of the payments, he was under the impression the 40 acres were at the forks of Horseshoe and Roaring Fork, but when I explained to him that his new 40 acres were up the ridge from the forks, he sold them to me," Art said.

Another 160 acres Art purchased during the growing years were sold to him with the proviso he would do nothing to change the character of the land. "It had been the woman's husband's final wishes that the land would remain undeveloped, so I was able to buy it for grazing," he related.

So, over the years, Art was able to add a little here and there.

But all that cost money. During the years that Art guided hunters, almost one-third of his income was derived from that occupation. Many years he had up to 25 out-of-state hunters for both deer and antelope, including outdoor magazine editors, other well-known sportsmen, and one Attorney General of the United States, William Saxebey.

In addition to the guiding, he began haying for his neighbors as early as 1945, when he went up the hill to cut, rake and stack hay for Bob Sturgeon. "All the stacking was done by hand," he remembered.

Although much of the raking and sweeping still was done with teams of horses into the 60's, Art purchased a red Farmall Cub tractor in the late 40's and launched into "custom haying," cutting and baling for half the hay.

In the early 50s when drought hit the country and things went downhill in a hurry for many area ranchers, Art branched out into both horse breaking and saw-milling. "We boarded and broke horses for $25 a head," Art said, adding wryly that "now you can get $250 a head."

He went into sawmilling by working for Floyd Russell in 1954, and later that year, following the forest fire on the "burn" along the crest of the ridge to the south of the main ranch buildings, he and a hired hand used a cross-cut saw to fall the still standing, burned-over timber. By 1956 he was working on Ashenfelder Creek for Dale Anderson and Grover Stinson, and a year later he was cutting and skidding for Francis McVay.

"That was the year I decided it might be better to have my own mill and stop giving everything away," Art said, and that summer on Ernie Newell's place he set up his mill and with the help of Bill Dunn and Tom Bishop, he began cutting and skidding for himself, using a team of horses, "King" and "Queen" to do business.

But, while all this was going on, he still was a cattle rancher. When the drought inched into the country during the early 50s, Art was running polled Herefords, and he well remembers that the summer of 1949 was "a tough summer." That fall he sold his Herefords and brought in a few registered Angus, the first rancher in the shadow of the Peak to raise them.

Along with ranching, guiding, haying and saw-milling, Art also found time to enter into the business and politics of the county. For many years both the Wyoming Angus Association and Wyoming Hereford Association held their sales throughout the state. When Art became the manager of the Angus Fall Sale, we went to the manager of the state fair, Jim Roush, with an idea. By the time the two men were through talking, the idea of holding the annual fall sale permanently in Douglas was set in motion.

It seemed logical to the people of Esterbrook that their home should be included in Converse County, rather than in Albany County. So, Art and his neighbors started paving the way for a change in the county boundaries, and making that change took six years. "Of course, Albany County officials were opposed to the change, but Converse County officials were willing to take us into their county as a favor to the Esterbrook people," Art said.

Douglas attorney Joe Garst contributed time, money and effort, as did Lisle Pexton and many others of the area, including County Commissioner Earl Clayton and legislators Charlie Irwin and Bill Lindmier, Sr. It took three sessions of the legislature to finally get the job done, but as Art said, "We convinced a majority of the legislators we had a just cause, and they went along with us." The deciding factor was a unanimous vote among the residents just before the 1954 legislature convened.

While Art was involved in his ranching, Ruth also was busy. "When we came to Esterbrook, Ruth was a registered nurse in an isolated community and while Douglas doctors supplied her with medicines, she cared for the ills of the people," Art said.

"It's astounding how few people ever got sick during the winters," Art recalls, "but one winter one of the logging family's boys broke his leg. It just happened that we were the only ones near who had a working passenger vehicle, but the snow covered the roads. We hitched a team of horses to the car, and other neighbors joined in to shovel a path. It took us seven hours to finally reach a spot on the Glendo road where we could drive the car, and we took the boy to Wheatland and returned the following day with the boy in his cast. We took care of our own out there."

Times change. Ethel, now Mrs. Larry Nauman, is raising a family in Rock Springs and Russell is living in Casper. Ruth died in 1974 and Art married his present wife Jane in 1976. Art sold his ranch in 1982 to Drs. Kirkland and Thiel, but he and Jane still live there on a small acreage he retained.

Fenex, William and Sabra Family

William Lane Fenex, Sr. and Sarah St. Clair, who came to Buffalo, Missouri, from Tennessee, were married and had six children: Robert C. Fenex, born 1845 in Tennessee; Thomas Fenex, born 1848; Mary Jo (Mag) Fenex, born 1851; Sarah M. Fenex, born 1858; John C. Fenex, born 1860; and William Lane Fenex, Jr., born 1865, the latter five being born in Missouri. Both of the parents died in 1871, Sarah preceding William Lane, Sr. in death by five months. They left three minor children, who were sent to live with three different families who were paid to care for them. John and William Lane, Jr. came to Converse County, Wyoming, as hereinafter related.

John C. Fenex came to Wyoming in 1880, at the age of 20, presumably by train. William Lane Fenex followed two years later, in 1882, and he did arrive by train.

John was killed at a hog ranch across the river from Fort Fetterman in the summer of 1885. John was shot in the stomach following an argument with a gambler. He is buried at Fort Fetterman and his grave was the only one with a marker or headstone for many years.

William Lane Fenex, better known as Billy in younger years and Will as he grew older, worked at a number of jobs. One was herding oxen, which was accomplished by tapping them on the rear near of the spine with a small shingle with a tack in the end. He also cowboied at several ranches in the Douglas and Glenrock area, and, according to an account in a book by B. B. Brooks, later Governor of Wyoming, the two of them camped out one winter on the Big Muddy.

Billy Fenex and a friend, Missou Hines, saved their money all one year to go home to Missouri. At that time they had to ride horseback to Scottsbluff, Nebraska to catch the train. They arrived in Scottsbluff one evening, but the train was not due until the next morning. They became involved in a poker game, lost every nickel they had, and got back on their horses the next morning and rode back to Douglas.

A story Will Fenex used to tell of his early days occurred one winter in 1887. He and a friend, Jap Sumner, stopped for the night at Fort Fetterman. When they went to bed there was about six inches of snow on the ground and the temperature was below zero. A chinook wind came up during the night and when Fenex opened the window in the morning he found the parade ground was covered with water, the snow was all gone, and the air was warm and balmy. Going back to the bed where Jap was still sleeping, he shook him by the shoulder and said, "Damn it, Jap, wake up! We've been asleep all winter."

Will Fenex made several trips back to Missouri. On one of the trips, his parents' estates were settled. Out of his share of the estate he bought a matching team of white horses and a buggy, and he squired Sabra Johnson around town at breakneck speed. He and Sabra were married in 1889. He returned to Wyoming ahead of her, and she arrived on the train, disembarking at Orpha, where she was met by some of the cowboys from the SO Ranch.

Will and Sabra made their home on the old Jim Barrie place on Boxelder Creek, near the Carey Ranch. During that time Sabra returned to Buffalo, Missouri, twice to have her first two children: Grace E. Fenex, and John Franklin Fenex.

In 1897 they moved to Glenrock and Will went to work in the coal mines. Over the years of their marriage, eleven children were born to them: Grace (B. January 1, 1890, M. Claude Lam, D. June 25, 1973); Gladys (B. April 1, 1906, M. Harold Thornton); Helen, (B. 1900, M. Hugh Smyth 1919, D. May 29, 1984); John (B. May 26, 1891, M. Gertrude Anderson, D. November 17, 1959); James E. (M. Hazelle Paxton); Leroy (M. Maude Rice, Myrtle ? and Marjorie McQueary Miller); Homer (B. January 2, 1902, M. Mary Foss, 1935); Guy (M. Wanda Whitney); Floyd (M. Marjorie Smith); Walter (D. age 10); and Ruth (D. age six months).

Later they homesteaded west of Glenrock in what is now known as the Big Muddy Field. Oil was struck on this land and thus ended for a number of years the struggle of making a living. They built a beautiful large brick home in Glenrock, one of three similiar ones, where they resided for many years. These homes may still be seen in Glenrock after some 65 to 70 years.

Sabra's father had died when she was three years old, and until her marriage she had never spent a night away from her mother. She didn't know how to cook or sew or keep house. After she married Will and came to Wyoming the cowboys taught her how to cook. And what a cook she was! Oranges, lemons or any fresh fruit were rarely seen. But she could make do with practically nothing. She made delicious "lemon" pies out of vinegar and flaky-crust ed apple pies out of dried apples. Nobody could touch her pies.

Sabra was a warm, lively witty person, with unlimited energy and very modern ideas. Her wedding picture shows her with a very short, mannish haircut, without the curls and puffs of her time. She always had time to run out to the yard to sing and play games with the children. Her favorite songs were "Buffalo Gal" and "Skip to My Lou." She made everything an occasion-fishing in the North Platte River and bringing home a fish long enough to drag on the ground. (That was an outing for the kids, but it was also supper). And picking chokecherries and buffaloberries (better known as bullberries) made a day long picnic, but it was also chokecherry jelly and jam, bright clear red buffaloberry jelly, and canned berries for pies, all for the coming winter. She loved a picnic until the time she died, and about once a week the call went out to the members of the family: "Let's go down to City Park and have a steak fry," or "Let's go up to the Bean Pot and have a picnic."

Life was hard. Money was scarce. Winters were long and cold. Water was hauled by hand. Laundry was done on the board. Sabra made outing-flannel lined mittens from the good pieces of wornout overalls. Overshoes were paper or gunny sacks wrapped around the shoes and tied. Sabra baked bread to sell in order to buy a piano for Grace to play. She took in laundry. In short, she did whatever was necessary to be done.

Periodically the Indians came through Glenrock, often camping down on Deer Creek. The children would buy wild ponies from them for $2.00 a head and break them. But when the Indians came the family's pet Great Dane, Jumbo by name, was chained inside the house and the shades were all drawn.

Will died December 28, 1941, at the age of 76, from complications following a hip injury suffered by having been butted by a ram while working at his sheep camp. He was a charter member of the Glenrock IOOF Lodge, a member and Past Master of Masonic Lodge No. 22 of Glenrock, and a 32nd degree Mason and Shriner. He served as Mayor, County Commissioner, Marshal and Deputy Sheriff.

Sabra died in 1955 at the age of 87. She was a charter member of the Baptist Community Church, which she and Will helped found; a charter member of the American Legion Auxiliary; a charter member of Golden West Chapter No. 37, Order of the Eastern Star, and Past Worthy Matron. At the time of her death, Sabra had 54 direct descendants. In 1983, there were 168 family members, spouses and friends present in Glenrock for a family reunion. Sabra was adored by her children and grandchildren.

Three of the Fenex sons born to Will and Sabra served in World War I: James E. Fenex and Roy Fenex having served overseas in France with the Infantry, and Floyd Fenex with the Navy. In World War II, their grandchildren served as follows: William Fenex, in three arenas, ending with Merrill's Marauders walking across the "Hump" in Burma. John F. Fenex, Jr., brother to William, was taken prisoner on Wake Island at the beginning of the war, remained there all through the war, and was beheaded by the Japanese when our country went back to retake Wake Island. James E. Fenex, Jr. flew a P-38 and Raymond Smyth flew a P-40, both attached to the British Eighth Army, chasing Rommel in Africa; William C. Lam was Flight Deck Officer on the carrier Yorktown; Dixie Lam served two years with the Air Force as a WAC.

Fenton, George and Sarah Family

My parents, George Aaron Fenton and Sarah (Sadie) Rebecca were married in 1901 in Alliance, Nebraska. They met in Hartville, Wyoming where Mother's parents, Jacob and Margaret Stoudt, ran a hotel. My father owned and operated a saloon and livery stable. A daughter, Violet Kathlyn, was born September 19, 1902 and a son, Arthur Jacob, was born December 25, 1903, both at Hartville. They lived there until 1909 when they moved to Lost Springs and filed on a homestead May 7, 1909. They built a home and moved their family there. My father built a saloon and later a livery stable. I, Mary Josephine, was born on May 17, 1910. He made proof of his homestead and it was patented June 13, 1913 after getting permission from the town of Lost Springs, as it was only one mile north and was in the city limits. They didn't make any protests so it was allowed. Herbert Nelson was born November 8, 1914. Georgie Wilma was born December 31, 1917. Charles Alvaroy was born October 1, 1920. There were three baby girls that died in infancy. Margaret Louise, born May 22, 1913, died in August, 1913 and is buried in Douglas. A still born, date unknown, buried at the homestead and Willa Lee, born in 1923 and died at age three months, buried in Douglas.

At the time my father and mother moved to Lost Springs, Jake and Widdie Canon ran a hotel there. The Northwestern Railroad built a stockyard there as it was a large shipping point for cattle and some sheep. In the earlier years our transportation was by buggy and horseback. In the 1920's it was a Ford sedan. After prohibition my father, with his teams, contracted dirt work such as building road beds and sub-contracted building the Burlington Northern road beds at Orin Junction. He also put up hay for several ranches such as the old LaBonte and Joss ranches.

He was a deputy U.S. Marshal during the years the Onyon coal mine was in operation and settled several disputes among the miners. Sometimes he brought the prisoners to our home where Mother always fed them with our family until some other U.S. Marshal would pick them up and take them to jail. There was an incident I can remember of finding the body of a man in the railroad water tank. Also, the livery stable burning on a Saturday night after a dance and killing several horses. Also, the suicide of our railroad agent, Delbert Smith.

Often, in the middle of the night some of our neighbors would come for Mother as she was a midwife for many babies born on neighboring ranches and people who were ill. She worked with Dr. Christensen of Manville, Dr. Hylton and Dr. Nast of Douglas.

We all started our elementary schooling in Lost Springs and the three older ones finished the eighth grade.

Entertainment for my folks was dancing, playing cards and neighbors getting together for meals. We always had lots of company.

For the children we all had our own horses and got together with neighboring children on weekends and rode to baseball games at Shawnee, Keeline and Manville.

I played on the girls basketball team with Mildred Bowell, Dolly and Bertha Spellman, Lolo Ruhl and Donna Dern. Ray Reed was our coach.

Our highlight of the summer was the fourth of July celebration which Mr. Fero would put on, dressing all the kids like cowboys and Indians. There would be horse races for all ages, sack races, foot races, a barbecue and dancing in the evening at the community hall. In September, we looked forward to going to the state fair at Douglas.

About 1930, my folks left Lost Springs and moved to Casper where my dad worked on several ranches. He died in Denver, Colorado after being operated on for cancer, February 9th, 1938 and is buried at Freeland, Wyoming. My mother died November 12, 1956 in Casper and is buried at Freeland, Wyoming.

Violet Kathlyn married Carl Svare in Douglas in 1920. They divorced about 1931. She then married Floyd G. Carter in 1942 and they made their home in Casper until her death December 1, 1982. She is buried in Memorial Gardens at Casper.

Arthur Jacob married Georgia (Dode) Ward at LaGrange in January 1933. They ranched in the Goshen Hole country, later moving to Hysham, Montana with their two boys, Ward and Tyrone Vidal. They continued in the ranching business until Georgia's death, March 6, 1973 at Forsythe, Montana. She is buried at Myers, Montana. Art (as he was known to all his friends) continued living in Montana. He died of cancer in Billings, Montana on September 17, 1980. He is also buried in Myers, Montana.

Herbert Nelson married Eva Belle Cheney Adamson, July 1946 at Casper. She died May 25, 1971 at Casper and is buried at Freeland, Wyoming. Herb has a public scales in Casper.

Georgie Wilma married John Erickson, January 8, 1933 at Harrison, Nebraska. They divorced. She then married Cleveland Snelling. They divorced. She then married Donald Walkins and they are retired in Florence, Oregon.

Charles (Chuck) and his wife, Jane, live at Shoshoni. They have a farm and run cattle on grazing land near Hiland.

Mary Josephine married James (Jim) H. Cheney, November 24, 1925 at Lusk, Wyoming. We ranched in the Bates Hole country (Freeland, Wyoming) until the time of his death, March 26, 1967. With my son, Vern Cheney, we carried on the ranching business until his death, November 3, 1971. I married Ben. F. Moore, December 31, 1969. In 1973, we sold our Cheney Livestock Corporation interest to my son, William and his wife, Pat, and they are carrying on the business. Ben and I bought an acreage and continue raising cattle and horses.

Fenwick, Robert and Blanche Family

On June 10, 1909 in Evansville, Indiana, a red-haired baby boy was born to Robert Lee and Blanche Cover Edmondson Fenwick. Named Robert Wesley after his father and Robert E. Lee, and Wesley in honor of his mother's religious beliefs, which at that time were of the Methodist faith.

The Fenwick family hailed from the state of Kentucky where his father, like his grandfather, was a railroad employee. A telegrapher, his father was sent to Indiana for a short period in the spring of 1909. Soon after Robert's birth, the family returned to Kentucky, but it would only be for a short time. Young Robert's mother contacted tuberculosis for which she was medically advised to move to Wyoming. So, at nine years of age, the young boy traveled with his family to a town north of Douglas, Wyoming, known as Locket. There, for the Burlington Northern, his father resumed his telegraphing career. The family home was made in a railroad car.

An opening with the Burlington Northern in Douglas afforded the family the opportunity to move to the town within the next year. By then, the "town" of Locket began to fade and today it is marked by prairie grasses and the passing of grazing cattle.

The health of Blanche Fenwick continued to fade and on March 3, 1922 in the front parlor of the Fenwick home on North Third Street in Douglas, she asked for a priest before whom she converted to the Catholic faith and then passed away.

Her love for her home state of Kentucky prompted her husband to sell her diamond engagement ring, enabling him to pay for her to be returned to Earlington, Kentucky for burial. The young boy and his father returned to Douglas to live.

Robert Lee Fenwick remained with the Burlington Northern as a telegrapher until a few years before his death, which came late in December of 1957. His service for the Burlington Northern was devoted, having begun after WWI. He is buried in the cemetery at Douglas and because of his love for railroads and his particular job, the epitaph on his gravestone reads:

Robert Lee Fenwick

The Burlington Man

From his gravesite yet today can be heard the whistle of the Burlington Northern trains as they pass through the town of Douglas.

An English teacher at Converse County High School noticed Robert's flair for the English language and began tutoring him after school in writing. Her guidance and belief in his talents inspired the young boy, who by then had become affectionately known to his classmates as "Red" because of his hair coloring, such that his entire life would be devoted to the written word.

Alice Nordgren's statement to her pupil, "Study hard, and one day you will become famous for your writing," became more of reality than even she imagined.

Red Fenwick also loved the life of a cowboy. His mother was more than a good shot with a 22-rifle. While growing up he worked on the "Morton Ranch" and at 19 years of age became a member of the United States Horse Cavalry F115th Troup. He was honorably discharged on May 27, 1929.

It was during these times as a cowboy and cavalry man that Red concluded his life would be spent in the west and writing about it.

Red's first job on a newspaper was with the Greybull Standard. Prior to that he headed a Civilian Conservation Corps camp in Yellowstone National Park; lineman for the telephone company; Press Secretary for U.S. Sen. Harry Schwartz in Washington, D.C.

From the Greybull Standard he went to Casper where he became city editor of the Casper-Times (now the Casper Star-Tribune) newspaper. His career as city editor at the paper held many highlights for him. One was the birth of his first son Robert Wesley, Jr. Married to the former Dorothy Scofield of Douglas, the couple eventually had five children, including Brian, Timothy, Patricia, Dorothy and Blanche. They were later divorced in Denver in the late 1940s. As city editor in Casper, Red was paramount in closing gambling, which had run ram-phant in the late 1930s.

On December 7, 1942, Red went to work for the Denver Post newspaper in Denver, Colorado. His career as a reporter, newspaper columnist and respected friend of the West made him a legend in his own time. His list of honors and credits include the following:

Honorary Doctorate of Laws Degree from the University of Wyoming for carrying on the tradition of writing of Bill Nye, Will Rogers and Mark Twain; the first recipient of the Colorado March of Dimes Citizen of the West Award in 1978 for writing a series of articles on the plight of the Navajo Rehabilitation fund; the 1982 Westerner Award, the highest award given by the Old West Trail Foundation for perpetuating the lures and legends of the old West; the 1981 International Toastmasters Communication and Leadership Award (one of 50 recipients in the world) for a lifetime of distinguished leadership in the field of communication and leadership; Big Hat Award by Sigma Delta Chi at the University of Colorado for his series of articles on the Plight of the Plains Indians; The Denver Press Club Award for journalism about the Navajo Indians; The Pall Mall Award for distinguished service in journalism for freeing a man serving life in prison for a murder he did not commit; the 1974 Outstanding Citizen of the Year Award from the Wyoming Air National Guard, presented by then Gov. Stanley K. Hathaway; he was a charter member of the Cowboy Hall of Fame and Western Heritage Center at Oklahoma City for giving the first publicity for the facility when it began; he was awarded the Silver Medal Award from the Cowboy Hall of Fame for outstanding commentary on western art; and was a Colonel Aide-de-Camp on the staff of the governor of New Mexico.

Just shy one month and three days, Red would have marked his 40th anniversary in writing for the Denver Post. He died in Cheyenne, Wyoming, where he made his home the last years of his life with his wife, Donelle, whom he married September 23, 1978. His death came on November 4, 1982.

Red Fenwick also authored a book, Red Fenwick's West, Yesterday and Today, a culmination of his columns the first ten years he wrote for the Post. It has been republished and is available at the Pioneer Museum in Douglas. Proceeds go to the journalism scholarship fund named in his honor at the University of Wyoming.

Red Fenwick was a legend in his own life, although he considered himself just a "local yokel". He left behind a legacy of good deeds and great western writing. He also left behind a host of loved ones and friends and a heritage Douglas (his old hometown), Wyoming can forever be proud to write among its history pages.

Ferguson, Alexander J. and Sarah

A Scotchman by birth, (born on February 21, 1856) Alexander Ferguson left Banffshire, Scotland as a young man to come to America. He arrived at Huron, South Dakota in 1882, where he engaged in the freighting business between the Missouri River and Black Hills for several years.

Sarah E. McDougall, also of Scotland, became his wife in the early 1880's. A daughter, Margaret M., was born at Pierre, South Dakota on August 8, 1884. Donald was born in 1889, and died May 28, 1917, from acute appendicitis. Marcella, another daughter, died in her early youth.

In 1888, the family came to Wyoming where Alexander continued the freighting business until the late 1890's when he entered the sheep business on the lower end of Dry Creek in northeast Converse County. Lands were purchased in Section 12, Township 37, Range 68 in 1904.

After Alexander's death on November 12, 1918, in Douglas, Sarah and Margaret operated the ranch for a few years, selling part of it to Alfred Bachle on October 25, 1925. These and other lands were later acquired by Fred Williams and later by Hap Ketelsen.

Sarah died on August 14, 1930, in Douglas.

Margaret attended high school at Ursaline Academy, York, Nebraska. She worked at the old Douglas Mercantile and at the Golden Rule when it was first started by Robert Gentle. Later she worked at the County Assessor's office when Grant Houghton was Assessor.

She lived at 315 South Fourth Street in Douglas until her death on January 1, 1968.

Fiddymment, Edward and Cora

In the spring of 1918, Edward James Fiddymment, his wife Cora, and two daughters, Gertrude, seven years old, and Doris, two years old, moved from Illinois to Wyoming. Their worldly goods were moved in a boxcar on the railroad. Edward was a railroad engineer, and took a year's leave of absence to see for sure they wanted to make their home in Wyoming. Cora had a sister living six miles south of Douglas, Mrs. Ernest Nauman, with her husband and four children. Also, Pete Johnson and wife lived near the Naumans. He was Cora's father. Edward had just inherited eight thousand dollars. Everything looked good to them - a ranch in the west!

They had made a trip previously to look at the situation. Ed bought a homestead from Pete Johnson, and some more land from Shirley Call bordering the Platte River. A new house was built on a dry creek about one and one half miles from the river where he was able to homestead. A couple of years later, a new barn, a corral to train horses, chicken house and a cellar were built. Ed was a horse lover. He bought a set of books by Dr. Berry and several riding horses; two or three teams for driving were on hand, besides a number put out to roam the land, seeing them only every few months.

A good picnic and community gathering place was near the river in a grove of trees, sheltered by a high bank, where the dry creek flowed into the river. Dances were held beside a block house on a pavilion. Ed Jewell was the main fiddler for them. The first summer after the arrival of the Fiddymments, the pavilion was moved across the river and put in the bunkhouse of the Riverview Ranch, where more dances were held. The children would sleep while the parents danced. Often the sun was up when the dance was over. The river was forded or most often the ferry was used.

Crops were planted; sometimes the yield was good, but more often, hail would shatter the crop or rain would not be abundant enough. Sometimes the rain really came quickly, and the dry creek that bordered the home would rise to ten feet and lowlands were flooded. Nobody crossed the creek then.

Two schools served the Irvine community — the Dorothys, Brocks, Eddys, Naumans, Williams, Clays, Durans, Leets, Stocks, Spellmans, Schneiders, Carmins and others. The first one was a half mile south of Naumans on a hill. Later, about 1920, a one-room building with a small barn for ponies was built a mile east of the "overhead" bridge (where the Burlington line crossed over the Northwestern line). Teachers in the new school were, first, Mrs. Fritz Schneider, then Mrs. Ward Brooks, Miss Read, and last, Mrs. Mable Nauman. In 1925, the children were bused to the school in Douglas. Mr. Wyatt served as driver many years.

Bennie Tubbs was a pupil at the new school. His stepfather treated him badly. At school he would search for crumbs in the coal bucket to eat. His stepfather beat him, and he ran away from home and hid in a straw stack one winter. Neighbors and his stepfather found him. His feet were frozen so badly they had to be amputated, then he was sent to an orphanage in Casper, where he was later adopted by parents of another crippled boy he would carry around at the orphanage.

The neighbors were enraged at Mr. Tubb's treatment of the boy, then they heard of him beating his wife, so they planned to beat him. When he was seen walking to the railroad empty boxcar station at Irvine to flag the passenger train to go to Douglas, they planned to watch for him when the train came back that day. He came back, and several men on horses watched him until he was a half mile from his home. They tied him to a fence post and whipped him, then released him. It was not long after that when both Mr. and Mrs. Tubbs were killed at Orin.

In 1931, Cora managed the county farm for county-assisted people who were in need of assistance to live. Cora had previously helped to deliver babies, nursing various people who were sick. From 12 to 24 people lived at the county farm until 1939 when it was moved from the Fiddymment ranch to Douglas.

In the days of 1918 to 1925, going to "country school," our mode of dress for girls was buttoned high-top shoes, black bloomers with elastic on the ends of the legs that came to the knees, and cotton ribbed stockings over long underwear. The underwear was put on in the fall, washed once a week, and worn every day until spring, the first of May or such. We kept warm by hot stones, or water bottles. Straw or feather ticking often served for a mattress. Every family boasted of a boiler, an oblong tub you could boil clothes in. The family wash made a big long day for the mother to do by hand, using a scrub board and hand wringer and two round tubs, besides the boiler.

Everyone knew the food must be "put up," fruit and vegetables from the garden, in jars, sauerkraut in crocks, for sure potatoes in a bin in the cellar, carrots, cabbages also in bins. Almost everyone milked a few cows, used a separator run by hand, and put the cream in a can day after day until it could be taken to town and sold to the creamery. Probably an average family received three to six dollars a week from cream. That bought the necessities of flour, sugar, yeast, crackers and such. To buy commercial canned food instead of raising it in your garden and home canning was considered very wasteful. Some housewives made butter out of the cream, and molded it in a pound, put their name on it, and sold it to grocery stores. Some would have high reputations of good butter makers.

Edward Fiddymment was born in Lockport, Illinois in 1881. Cora Johnson Fiddymment was born in Frankfal, Kansas in 1884. Edward and Cora were married November 27, 1905 in Blue Island, Illinois. Their children are:

Gertrude, born February 22, 1911 in Blue Island, Illinois. She married Urland Meadows on January 16, 1933 in Basin Wyoming. Their children are James, Ruth and Nancy.

Doris, born March 9, 1916. She married Marshall Johnson on January 1, 1934 in Hot Springs, South Dakota. Their children are Sharlene, Carol, Gail and Stephen.

Edward Fiddymment died in 1958, Cora in 1965.

Fleming, Tom and Margaret Family

Tom Fleming was born on June 1, 1876 in Marshalltown, Iowa, the son of Robert and Catherine Lithgoe Fleming. Robert was born in Scotland.

When still a lad Tom moved to Chadron, Nebraska, where he received his education attending business college. He came to Wyoming at the age of 19. He worked on several ranches in the area before going into business for himself.

In 1913 he married Margaret Stewart, a native of Scotland, in Elgin, Illinois. They lived on Duck Creek northwest of Douglas after their marriage. Two children were born to them: Stewart, born in Chicago, Illinois and Catherine, born in Cheyenne.

Reuban Black Lucas and Tom Fleming dressing out an antelope.

Mr. Fleming homesteaded in 1914 west of Fort Fetterman near the North Platte River. Later he leased a ranch on Lower LaPrele Creek from Mart Madsen. In 1925 he purchased the ranch. It is the family home of Catherine and her husband, Dick Strock, in 1985.

Tom served Converse County as its County Commissioner from 1933 to 1935.

Stewart served in the Air Force in World War II where he learned to fly. Stewart was killed in a plane accident on August 21, 1947 while competing in an aerobatic contest at an airshow in Casper.

Catherine married Dick Strock, son of Leonard and Hazel Strock, on May 27, 1942. They have five children: Thomas, Margaret, Shirley, Richard and Brad. Thomas lives on the old Wheelock place on LaPrele Creek.

Tom Fleming died on February 24, 1947, Margaret in December 1964.

Flynn, John and Elizabeth

John Martin Flynn was born in Des Moines, Iowa on Feb. 12, 1869, the son of Martin and Ellen Kean Flynn. He acquired his early education through a governess and by private tutoring. He completed his studies at Notre Dame University in Indiana. John was associated with his father in the Walnut Hill stock farm near Des Moines where they raised purebred Shorthorn cattle. Martin Flynn was also the president of the People's Savings Bank of Des Moines.

John came to Converse County to engage in the sheep business in 1886. He was associated with his father and brothers in the venture. The company became one of the largest sheep outfits in Wyoming, running, at one time, 30,000 head. In addition to their sheep interests, the Flynns had extensive mining interests in Nevada.

John was united in marriage to Elizabeth Jane Lee in 1895 in Fremont, Nebraska. Mrs. Flynn's parents were William Brownleigh Lee and Margaret Cassidy Lee, both of whom were born in Ireland. Elizabeth was born on Jan. 30, 1870 in Fremont. Elizabeth's father was a cousin of Robert E. Lee, Confederate general. He, along with a cousin, founded the city of Fremont, Nebraska. John and Elizabeth were the parents of one son, John Lloyd. John L. died September 23, 1958.

Mr. Flynn founded and was the first president of the Converse County Bank of Douglas in 1918. He served as a member of the State Fair Board for many years, and was president of the board for a time.

John is remembered as a big man physically, and a simple, kindly human being, considerate and helpful of his fellow man.

John died Dec. 31, 1936. Elizabeth on Sept. 21, 1962.

Ford, Bernie Everett and Anna

Bernie Everett Ford was born in Missouri in 1888, the fourth in a family of eight children. His father, Andrew Alexander Ford was born in Missouri in 1859, his mother Mary Jeanetta Purcell Ford was born in Illinois in 1863. In 1904, the family moved to Red Cloud, Nebraska, hoping to find a drier, more healthful climate. There they were engaged in the farming business.

Bernie was married to Anna Morgan in 1915 in Oregon. In 1916, Bernie, his wife and their small son, Thayne, came to Wyoming where they filed a homestead claim on the north side of the Cheyenne River about 48 miles north of Douglas. Part of the time the family spent on the homestead, and the remainder of the time, they lived in Douglas. Bernie had built a home for his family in the Brownfield Addition. He was a carpenter by trade, working in Douglas as well as in Casper. A second son, Dean was born in 1919.

Bernie and Ross Owen, a fellow carpenter and neighbor traveled out to their claims together by team and wagon. There they helped one another build improvements on their homesteads.

In 1924, Bernie moved his family to Denver where they lived until 1933. At that time, they moved to Medford, Oregon where they operated a fruit and vegetable farm. In addition to his truck farm, Bernie kept on with his carpenter trade. He died in 1971.

Jewell Reed

Fowler, Lee and Rachel

Lee Fowler arrived in Converse County on the 11th of November, 1916, at the age of 24 to file on a homestead. He was born July 13, 1892 on a small farm outside of Hope, Kansas and lived in that area until 1913. That summer, times were very hard and, with several other young men, he went to North Dakota to help with the harvest. From there he traveled through the northwestern part of the United States and western Canada, looking over the country and working wherever he could find a job.

In the fall of 1916 while in Saskatchewan, he received a letter from his family asking him to join them in Douglas. These included his parents, Ed (Daniel Edwin) and Catherine Haley Fowler; two brothers, Eugene Thomas Fowler and wife, Dora and children and Dennis Fowler, who was not yet 21 or married; and his sister, Nettie Fowler Cowger and husband, John and children. They had decided to move to Wyoming to take advantage of the additional land available under the Homestead Law.

The family filed, as near as possible, on adjoining homesteads approximately 22 miles north and slightly west of Douglas (between Box Creek and Skunk Creek) in the community which was later called Hyland. That first winter of 1916-17, they lived in Douglas in the front part of an old laundry building. Part of the time they shared this building with another family by the name of O'Leary. The living quarters were divided by the hanging of blankets between the two families.

One of the family's favorite stories concerns the building of the first house on the homestead. Early one morning, Lee and his brother-in-law, John Cowger, walked about six miles from his brother Gene's homestead, built the house, and put up the stove in time for John to make biscuits for lunch. In the afternoon, they started digging a well with the help of Gene and Dennis who had blown the morning taking the horses to water on Skunk Creek. The story, while true, leaves out such small details as the fact the lumber was already there, precut, and the house just eight foot square.

The hand-dug well, started that afternoon, is an example of the optimism Lee and his brothers shared. The site was chosen because it was on a corner which would serve three families. In an area where water is inadequate, deep, or non-existent, they were lucky and actually found a good well at 40 feet.

With a number of other men from the area, Lee went into the army in 1918. He left on June 6th and after a few weeks basic training at Camp Lee, Virginia, sailed for France on an old German freighter re-named the Susquehana. The crossing took eleven days and was a miserable trip with terrible food. One morning they were served hard-boiled eggs and cracked them open to find baby chickens instead. Overseas he served as an Asst. Farrier in the Veterinarian Corps. and returned to this country on a Japanese passenger ship with accommodations far more comfortable than on the first voyage. He was separated on July 4, 1919 in Cheyenne.

Rachel Furman (Fowler), and her twin sister Ruth (Mrs. Walter Whitaker), arrived in Douglas in the fall of 1923 to accept positions as teachers in the rural school system. They were born June 11, 1903 on a ranch a few miles east of Marsland, Nebraska on the Niobrara River. The youngest of eleven children, they were the only ones to move to Wyoming, but their father, Howard G. Furman, had traveled extensively over the state many years before.

In a short, hand-written document, Howard Furman wrote a little about his experiences at that time. The first paragraph reads as follows:

"In the fall of 1867, I landed in Nebraska. At that time, Omaha was not much of a town - just a few frame shacks - the end of the U. P. was at that time at Pine Bluffs, Nebraska. I remember seeing lots of deer and antelope along the track coming out from Omaha. Cheyenne was rather a noisy little town. From Cheyenne I went to Fort Sanders and when the U. P. built into Laramie City, I carried the mail from Fort Sanders to Laramie City."

He spent the next two years traveling around Wyoming, Utah, and other parts of the west before returning to his home in Pennsylvania. In 1872, at the age of 24, he enlisted in the army and returned to the west where he served at a small post near Laramie Peak at the time Lt. Robinson was killed. Of particular interest to Converse County is another paragraph:

"In 1876, we left Camp Douglas, Utah to take a hand in the troubles that General Custer was having with the Indians in the Big Horn country. We left the train at Medicine Bow. I was sent on ahead with material to cross the Platte at Fort Fetterman. We got across the Platte all right and were well on our way when we met a courier with the news of the massacre."

Rachel's father eventually homesteaded in Nebraska and many years later (almost 50) was seriously concerned about his two youngest daughters moving to Converse County, Wyoming because he was not sure anyone would make a living in what he called "short-grass" country.

Rachel was assigned to teach at the Sunnyside School which was located (at that time) less than a mile from Lee's homestead. She boarded with his parents, Ed and Catherine Fowler, and Lee and Rachel were married March 29, 1924. To this union four children were born; Ruth Helen, Rachel Leona, Robert Lee (deceased) and Mary Jean.

Soon after Lee and Rachel married, both of his brothers left and then his sister (the John Cowgers) moved to Douglas. In 1928, his father died and his mother also moved to Douglas where she lived until her death in 1946.

The early days of homesteading through the drought and depression of the 30's were years of hard work and hard times. Like many other families, we sold eggs and cream for grocery money, but it never occurred to us that we might be poor. There was always a big garden with the surplus canned for winter, all the meat and dairy products we could eat, store-bought candy when we went to town and cod-liver oil all winter long. Naturally, most money went for more land, livestock or equipment, but there was enough squeezed out for a trip to Nebraska every year and short trips to Yellowstone Park, the Black Hills and other places. In 1937, we took our first long trip. Lee wanted to show his family the wonderful country filled with green fields and orchards of his youth but the ensuing years had not been kind to Kansas. The trees were mostly dead and the land blighted. From there we went to Oklahoma and then Texas. Near Corpus Christi we hit a nine-inch rain with the road invisible and although we loved the orange groves in the Rio Grande Valley, on the way home (outside of Amarillo) we hit a dust storm so black that even with the lights on we were unable to drive until it was over. We were certainly glad to get home to the clean, dry air of Wyoming.

In 1938, Lee and Rachel bought their first sheep. Although financially the sheep were more suitable for the ranch, we girls found them far less interesting. The cows had descriptive names (Brockie Face, Lump Jaw, Little Line Back, Anteover, etc.) but the sheep all looked alike. Another drawback to sheep, we soon discovered, was their ability to disappear. No sooner were we comfortably settled on our horse, one leg hooked over the saddle horn for stability and a good book in our hands, than they were over the hill and three miles away.

In addition to travel, Lee was an enthusiastic reader and always interested in new ideas. In the early 30's, he bought a Zenith radio and a windcharger for the power to run it and then a larger windcharger for lights and an electric fence to discourage cattle (and kids) from crawling through fences. After he got sheep, he ordered docking rings from Australia and was one of the first to try (and reject) crested wheat grass to reclaim fields. Not all of his experiments worked out, of course, but they kept life interesting.

Rachel loved being outdoors and spent as much time as she could helping outside. In the early years, she worked cattle, sheep and in the fields and now devotes that same enthusiasm to flowers and golf. This was in addition to all the inside work and Lee insists, even today, that they never went anyplace without Rachel staying up all night, the night before, making each of us girls a new dress.

The 40s did not change hard work much but times were better. With Ruth and Leona both graduated from the eighth grade at Sunnyside School, they got an apartment in Douglas so the older girls could go to high school and Mary to North Grade. All three girls graduated from Converse County High School. With the girls out of school and building material again available after the war, Lee and Rachel almost completely remodeled the house on the ranch. This house burned in 1969 so we have no early photographs.

In the spring of 1955, Lee suffered a serious heart attack and to a large extent retired. Lee and Rachel still made their home on the ranch but spent most winters traveling. The only other item which may be of future historical interest was the discovery of uranium by Humble Oil Company (now Exxon) north of Box Creek on federally owned minerals. The site they wanted for the uranium mill was on our deeded land which we traded for land they had purchased from Mortons, Inc. Since that time, Exxon has been busily and happily (we presume) re-landscaping the south end of the ranch.

1984 finds Lee (at 91) and Rachel (at 80) in excellent health. They still live on the ranch where they are joined by their three daughters for about three months of each summer and they still spend their winters traveling.

Fowler, Wade and Maude Family

In 1899, Wade H. Fowler came to Douglas, Wyoming where he lived in the area for many years. He was especially active in the Democratic party, serving as State Senator for two terms and as County Assessor for two terms.

Wade was born in 1874 in South Carolina, the son of Elijah and Edda Corbin Fowler. He was educated in the elementary schools of his native state, continuing his education in Cullowhee Normal and Industrial School at Cullowhee, North Carolina.

After his schooling ended, he returned to the family home farm where he worked with his father until he reached the age of 21. During that period of life, he became familiar with all aspects of farming, learning the most effective methods of tilling the soil and gathering the crops.

When Wade was in his early twenties, he left his home. He served in the Spanish American War, after which he went to Texas where he remained only six months before coming to Wyoming in 1899.

Upon his arrival in Wyoming, Wade worked on the range, and was identified with the sheep business. In 1903, he started his own business, owning the Bates Sheep Company located north of the Cheyenne River. Later he was principal owner and director of the Dixie Sheep Company, having sold the Bates Sheep Company.

Maude Kimbrough Fowler became the wife of Wade Fowler in 1906. Maude had been born and raised in Madisonville, Tennessee. There were five sons born to the couple, namely, Fred, Carey and Douglas (twins), Corbin and Wade Kimbrough Fowler.

Maude worked for many years for local dentists.

Wade was appointed to the position of registrar of the United States Land Office in Douglas in 1913, and served in that position until it was relocated in Cheyenne in 1917.

Wade was a member of the Baptist Church, Woodman of the World and of the Commerical Club. He never regretted coming to the West, for here he was able to take advantage of opportunities to further his aims. He was active in the community, working for its development, as well as working toward the betterment of the State of Wyoming.

Foxton Family

Six known children of George Fredrick and Clara Roberts Foxton of Fettercairn, Cincardshire, Scotland came to the United States in the 1880s and settled in what is now Converse County. They were: George (born April 16, 1863, died November 22, 1940), Jack (born November 30, 1866, died November 28, 1927), Fred (born May 17, 1864, died February 17, 1929), Clara (born 1867, died September 16, 1949), Henry "Harry" (born April 20, 1869, died August 26, 1938) and Mary (born 1870, died 1912).

George and Fred were the first of the family to come over. George, being the oldest in the family was, by family tradition, supposed to follow in his father's footsteps and be an Episcopal minister, but upon his decision not to do so he left the family home and came to America, bringing his brother, Fred, along with him in 1884.

They first arrived in Cheyenne but before the year was out they came to Converse County where George found work on the Harry Pollard ranch. Fred moved on to Buffalo where he worked for the "76" outfit.

By 1885 George had squatted on land on Indian or Wilson Creek south of Douglas (Tim Pexton lives here now). It is evident by the water rights granted that Jack must have come over to join his brothers in 1885 because water rights were issued to him in that year on Mill Creek (Ann Grant Brock lives here now).

In 1888 George and Fred married sisters, George marrying Anna and Fred marrying Clara. They were daughters of the Richardson family, a well-to-do family of Scotland having acquired their wealth by dealing in junk. The newlyweds had known one another in their youth. The couples were married in New York where the sisters had been met by Fred and George upon their arrival from Scotland.

Fred and Clara H. (as she was called to distinguish her from her sister-in-law Clara) lived on Indian Creek before moving to Elkhorn Creek where they purchased the George Howe ranch in 1893 (Gus Gruwell lives there in 1985).

Harry and his sister, Clara, came to join the family. They lived with Jack on the Mill Creek Ranch. None of the three married.

Dick Foxton on the Indian Creek Ranch.

Jack became interested in the mineral development around Esterbrook and was instrumental in starting the mine at Esterbrook. He was also postmaster of Esterbrook from 1909 to 1911.

Clara is remembered by many of the neighbors and relatives as a person who loved cats and had many of them in the house at all times. She was a tall woman and was usually found sitting on the floor rather than on a chair. She is also remembered as being one of the first ladies to smoke in the community, rolling her own cigarettes by hand. She was known to usually have a sink full of dirty dishes; whenever one set got dirty she had another set that she would use.

Fred and Clara H. moved to Douglas in their later years where he worked in the mercantile business with George Metcalf. Their only daughter, Dorothy, married Frank Messenger, son of Charles Messenger. Clara H. died in 1940.

George and Annie had five children: George Jr., Marjorie (Hauf, Lewin), Richard, Jack and Douglas. They sold their holdings on Indian Creek to Arthur Kenyon in 1909 for $15,000 and moved to Horseshoe Creek near Glendo where he purchased a ranch from George Boyd. Annie died in 1921. (Jack Lancaster lives here in 1985.)

The Foxtons were considered as country gentlemen ranchers by their neighbors. The early issues of the "Douglas Budget" have many items where the men are mentioned as having participated in shooting matches and in local social activities. Their Scottish and English heritage lives on in the architectural style of houses they built in the area.

Freeman, General Henry and Sarah

Henry B. Freeman was born in Knox County, Ohio in 1836.

He entered the army as a private in 1855 and at the outbreak of the Civil War he received his commission as a second lieutenant. His service in the great war was marked by gallantry in action and long periods in southern prisons. He received the Congressional Medal of Honor for distinguished gallantry in the battle of Stone River. In May, 1866 he received his commission as captain in the regular army.

While visiting General Sherman in St. Louis, he met Sarah Darlington of Zanesville, Ohio. This meeting led to their marriage on April 26, 1866 in Newark, Ohio.

In 1866, Captain Freeman was stationed in the west and took part in the Sioux Wars of 1866-1868. He was at Ft. Fetterman from 1869 to the early 1870's. It was his command that buried General Custer at Little Big Horn.

His wife followed him throughout his service in the west, sharing the vicissitudes and dangers that went with an army officer's life.

During this time there were four children born: Louie, Cozie, Luther (B. November 27, 1871 in Ft. Crook, Montana) and Sarah (B. December, 1882 in St. Paul, Minnesota). Cozie lost his life while rescuing his younger brother, Louie, when he fell through the ice while skating on a lake.

In 1882, while in command at Fort Laramie, he made a hunting trip through this section and was so impressed with the beauty of the country in which the LaBonte flowed that he filed on a piece of land here.

George H. Cross, Sr. tells about this same piece of land in his journals. "Dennis Leman and I had become friends and, anxious to get settled before winter, decided to use our pre-emption and desert rights to file on adjoining claims on some very good land we had selected. We hired Wilbur Sampson, a deputy surveyor, to stake out the acreage and to line up an irrigation ditch. Dennis and I paid Sampson and went to file our claims only to meet with great disappointment as we learned Sampson had double crossed us and the day before had given General Henry Freeman the descriptions. Freeman had filed on the best part of the land so we lost out completely. Sampson had political aspirations and thought Freeman could swing more votes his way than Dennis and I. Freeman later told us Sampson had tipped him off. We protested to Sampson and demanded our money be returned but never got it."

The irrigation ditch that furnished water for their claim was called the Darlington Ditch. It was filed with the State of Wyoming with a priority date of October 1, 1885 and covered 645 acres.

Henry was made a major in 1891 and Lt. Colonel in 1895. He served in the Spanish American War in the Philippines. In January of 1901 he retired at the age of 64 with the permanent rank of brigadier general.

General Freeman died on October 16, 1915. Brief services were conducted at the residence of E. T. David in Douglas on October 17. He was buried in Arlington Cemetery at Washington, D.C.

Sarah died in November, 1927.

Julia, their daughter, married Robert D. Carey on September 4, 1901. He later was to become governor and a U. S. senator from Wyoming. They had one daughter, Sarah, and one son, Joe. Julia died in 1971.

Luther graduated from the University of Michigan becoming an attorney-at-law. He became acquainted with Harry Sinclair at school and was involved as a counselor for the defense for Sinclair Oil Co. in the Teapot Dome oil leasing case in 1924.

Luther married Margaret S. "Tippie" Willox. They had two daughters, Ann (married Newt Fackler) and Julia (married C. A. Thomas of Glendo) and one son Henry B. The Freemans lived on the ranch until 1935 when it was sold. The Whitaker Family own it now. Tippie later operated the Tippie Inn in Esterbrook and Glendo.

Luther died on July 19, 1957 and Tippie on December 18, 1966.

French, William and Fannie

William Lee French was born in Chester, New York on December 3, 1858. Fannie Benham was born in Saranac Lake, New York on June 16, 1865. They were united in marriage in Saranac Lake in 1887.

They were engaged in farming in New York before deciding to go west. Their first stopping place was Fort Collins, Colorado and then they moved by covered wagon to Esterbrook, Wyoming. Lee, as he was known to his friends, and his brother Tim worked together in the lumbering business at Esterbrook.

Tim French later moved to Lost Springs where he farmed for the rest of his life. He is buried in the Lost Springs Cemetery.

In 1903, Lee and Fannie moved to Douglas where they operated the LaFayette Restaurant for three years. Then he hired out as foreman on the Clelland Ranch near Ft. Fetterman. In 1909 they homesteaded northeast of Glendo where they farmed until ill health forced them to move to Glendo where they lived until his death in 1939.

Lee loved horses and working with horses. In addition to farming, he operated a dray business and also did road work around Glendo, Orin and Manville. This was in the days when roads were built with horses and scrappers. He told of many narrow escapes with runaway horses.

William and Fannie had three children. Their two sons were drowned in the LaBonte Creek near the George Goodwin Ranch (Rita Alexander now owns the ranch). They fell in the high waters while playing on the banks of the creek. Their bodies were found down stream later after the waters had receded. They are buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Their daughter, Bessie, married George Jacob Snyder in Douglas, December 6, 1903. She was a very attractive girl, and according to the young men of the community at that time, the prettiest girl in Converse County at that time. She was a devoted homemaker who liked music, dancing and reading.

William, who passed away in 1939, and Fannie, who died in 1941, are both lying at rest in the French-Snyder plot in Douglas Park Cemetery.

While Lee and Fannie lived in Douglas, his sister Claudia French Miller and her son Bill came to visit and decided to make their home in Douglas.

Dr. Claudia Miller was the first woman to graduate from the Palmer Method School of Chiropractics and licensed to practice. She started practicing in Douglas. Her office was in her home located in the 500 block on North Fourth Street. She practiced in Douglas until about 1915 and moved to Oberlin, Kansas where she practiced until her death.

Froggatt, Lloyd and Ruby Family

It was a humble beginning. The old log structure with dirt roof atop provided a simple birthplace for Lloyd Froggatt on the 15th day of February in 1887. He was the only child born to Tillie Brockway Froggatt and George L. Froggatt. The couple had claimed squatters rights in the Little LaPrele area. Lloyd's father died when he was only three months old so he and his mother left the meager cabin to live with her father and family on Fetterman Flats. There they homesteaded. It was the Brockway Family that originated the Morton Ditch.

Lloyd worked for George W. Metcalf in 1905 at his general store. In 1907 he went to work for the George Bolln Company, purchasing the store in 1932. He operated the store until 1937. In October of that year he was appointed County Treasurer, the office being vacated due to the death of William Burgess. Mr. Froggatt held this office for five years.

In January 1908, he was married to Ruby Davis. They were the parents of six children: Veronica (Toots), George, Harriet (Mrs. Earl Scott), Jim, Anna and Jack.

In 1943 Lloyd was elected County Clerk and held that position until his retirement in 1966. Mr. Froggatt drove the Beaver mail route and part of the Ross route at the age of sixteen. A team and buggy, sled, cart — depending on weather conditions — were used for this purpose. He attended the first State Fair which was held in Douglas in 1905 and was present at one performance each year until the time of his death in June 1969. Lloyd was a gentleman dedicated to our county government and its people and spent his entire life in Douglas, Wyoming. Ruby died on May 11, 1938.

Fryer, Robert

Robert Fryer was born at Cadiz, Ohio in 1837. He served with the 11th Ohio Cavalry in the Civil War. He came to Wyoming in 1878 to find work near Fort Fetterman on John Hunton's Milk Ranch located on Lower LaPrele Creek. (The ranch was located north of where County Road #30 crosses LaPrele Creek. The Strock family own the land today.) Mr. Hunton used the ranch to supply his freight wagons and to shoe the oxen in the blacksmith shop located there. Hunton mentions about having hogs on the ranch, no doubt they were butchered and either sold to people going through on their way to Robert "Bobby" Fryer.

Rock Creek or to the southeast to Fort Laramie.

In December 1878 Hunton sold the ranch to Fryer. Hunton wrote in his diaries the following, "Thursday, December 5, 1878, turned over the shops to Robert Fryer. Sold him all of the hard wood left there except enough to finish my wagon. Went to Post (Fetterman) and reported to Captain Coats that I had moved Milk Ranch and abandoned shops to Fryer."

Records show Fryer getting a water right in 1890 out of LaPrele Creek for 37 acres.

Pauline Smith Peyton wrote about Fryer, "The idea of a rural school to be located in the lower LaPrele Valley originated in the mind of Robert Fryer, a bachelor who was commonly known as "The Blacksmith Poet of Lower LaPrele." The school became known as Pleasant Valley School with the school house being built from money donated by people living in the valley. Fryer was one of the first school board trustees.

Robert Fryer died on June 2, 1919.

Gallagher, Grover and Emma

Grover Gallagher, stockman and farmer, came to Wyoming in 1907. Born in Lawrence, Kansas in 1888 he spent an early life and schooling in southern Missouri. His first job was with the Mahan Ranch near Casper. Shortly thereafter he connected with Gov. Joseph M. Carey's CY Ranch and participated in following years in the stock roundups extending from the Ross country to the Chugwater. Grover spent his next twenty years on the Careyhurst Ranch as foreman of irrigation and stockfeeding. He then went to work for the Freeland outfit in the Bates Hole south of Casper where he stayed in the same capacity until 1936.

In that year he purchased his own first operation from the B. C. Wheelock acreage in the LaPrele district. In succeeding years he acquired additional land and livestock to a total of 600 acres. He was a member of the ASC and the LaPrele Irrigation Association. In 1924, Grover married Emma Marask of Springfield, Illinois. The children of this union were Patrick (b. 1924) and grandchildren Michael, Matthew, and Robin; daughter Helen (b. 1930) and granddaughter Cherie. Fond of card games and the exercise of an acerbic wit Grover and his wife related tales of trips by buckboard and sleigh to early dances at the LaPrele Community Hall. Both Grover and his wife died in 1979. His son, Patrick, was a sergeant with the U.S. Army in the European Theatre during World War II.

Gardner, R. R. and Beatrice

I went to Wyoming in February, 1917 when the state was still new. People were coming in to file on homesteads and oil was being discovered.

I landed in Glenrock completely broke and worked for Jack Crow as a barber for about two months. Then I met Mr. Joe Slaughter who was a director of the Glenrock

State Bank and part-owner of the Slaughter-Patzold Sheep Company. He said, "they needed help in the bank," and told me to ask for a job. They hired me and in about six months I was Assistant Cashier.

I worked for the bank for seven years and at that time. C. Leonard Smith, an attorney, heard that I was studying law under the American Bankers Association and he asked me if I would like to study law in his office. I said I would and so I entered his office and studied law for three years, took the bar examination, passed it and practiced law in Glenrock until I retired and came to Florida in 1950.

During those early days in Wyoming, I handled applications for homesteads and took the final proofs and got patents for the homesteaders.

I was City Attorney for many years, and was active in all civic affairs: the Masonic Lodge, the Eastern Star, Lions Club, American Legion, etc.

I feel that I did have a part in the early development of Wyoming. I married Beatrice H. Rollins, granddaughter of Col. Emerson H. Kimball and his wife, Lizzie, both of whom were real pioneers in Wyoming. My wife and I proved up on a homestead so we knew what it was all about.

One of our sons, Leonard, still lives in Wyoming. He is retired and lives at Dubois and Dick lives at Merced, California.

Gaylord, Preston O. and Grace Family

Preston Otis Gaylord, of English descent, was born in Marshalltown, Iowa on November 27, 1884, the youngest of six children of Rial Wilson and Sarah M. Gaylord. When Preston was 18 months of age, his mother died. Shortly thereafter, Rial brought his family to Hay Springs, Nebraska. In July 1887, they moved on to Chadron, then a small town of 400 people. It was the terminal for the Elkhorn, Fremont and Missouri Valley Railroad. In 1894, Rial married for the second time to Eliza F. Moore. To supplement their income, Eliza took in washing, mostly for the railroad engineers.

Preston grew up in Chadron and received his meager education there. He started working for the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad at the age of 14, wiping engines in the roundhouse. It was night work—16 hours paid $1.10. He became ill from the gas created by the use of Iowa coal which contained sulphur so he quit the job to go to Wyoming, hoping to regain his health. He was employed on a sheep ranch, located about 50 miles west of Casper belonging to Adams and Crawford.

The sheep were grazed on the summer range near the Hole-in-the-Wall with Preston herding them. In 1902 the Curry gang came by the sheep camp and forced Preston to feed them. This is coincidental since George Curry grew up in Chadron and was a childhood friend of Preston's brother, Arthur Gaylord. George left home to go to Wyoming where he joined a band of outlaws who preyed on the shipments of gold carried by the railroad. After one such robbery, they stashed their gold in the Hole-in-the-Wall and went into Casper to celebrate. Misfortune befell them, however, for the sheriff gave chase. Curry was separated from his gang and killed in the Utah desert. Arthur Gaylord was summoned from Chadron to identify the body.

After regaining his health, Preston returned to Chadron and was once more employed by the railroad, this time in the supply yard where they handled materials for building bridges. On October 15, 1905, he hired on as a freight brakeman. There was no limit to the number of hours one could work at that time. Preston's first trip lasted 44 hours. Later, laws were passed governing the hours, limiting them to 16 per day with relief for at least eight hours.

Grace M. Farmer was united in marriage to P. O. Gaylord on September 14, 1910. Grace's parents had homesteaded eight miles northwest of Hay Springs, Nebraska in the days when Indians forced farmers to grab a few blankets, pile into wagons and hurry to town, remaining there in churches or in the city hall until the emergency was over. Grace's family moved into Wyoming in the late 1890's to live in the Bates Creek country west of Casper.

Of interest is an account of a heroic ride made by a ranch hand in 1897. There was little or no available medical help then, and when a young woman of the community was stricken with a high fever, the man rode 25 miles to a neighboring place, changed to a fresh horse and rode another 25 miles to get the necessary medicine.

"J" type locomotive and snow plow, 1928, on Northwestern Railroad track in Orin. P. O. Gaylord, pilot.

He made the round trip of 100 miles in eight hours.

After their marriage, the Gaylords lived in various towns depending upon where the railroad required Gaylord to work. Two children were born to them, Otis G., in 1911 and Earl F., in 1913. At one time they lived on Capin Street at the east edge of the town of Chadron. Indians would camp on that block with their tents pitched on the hill. Their object was not actually battle, but they wanted instead to drive the farmers from their homes just long enough so that they could slaughter their cattle. The Ninth Cavalry from Ft. Robinson, a regiment of black horses and black men, would ride out to confront the Indians. Local children would wait for the soldiers to return, hoping to be given some hardtack.

In 1914, Grace and Preston filed on 160 acres at Orin and built their home near the old Cedar Tree Spring. Grace and the children lived there during the summer but returned to Chadron during the winter. Orin was the junction point for the Colorado and Southern Railroad and the Chicago and Northwestern. Passenger trains for both roads stopped there at noon to eat, the meals being served to the travelers in an old railroad dining car.

The homestead at Orin was improved and grew in size. A barn, chicken house and a well were added, as well as several more quarter-sections of land acquired by homestead or by purchase.

The Gaylords moved to Douglas in 1919. About this time, the highway through Orin was relocated to follow along the railroad tracks. It crossed a corner of the Gaylord property and Preston decided it might be lucrative to establish a filling station near the highway, so he moved the building from the homestead to the new location. During the next few years, he built a rooming house, along with sheds, corrals and a barn. Gaylords rented rooms to tourists, had a free campground with places for fires for cooking and furnished free wood. They also set up a small grocery store and stocked spare Model T parts. The Gaylord home was equipped with gas lights and they had the first refrigerator in town.

The C&NW purchased a plot of land from Preston near the filling station where they built a roundhouse for two engines, a turning "Y" and a water tank. The railroad was transporting gasoline from Casper to Houston, Texas at the time for shipment overseas. The oil trains needed help over the long grade from Orin to Jireh. Preston took the pilot's job, having charge of the two "helper" engines. This job lasted for 18 years. During this time period, the two Gaylord boys were educated in the grade school in Orin and later in the high school in Douglas.

Nearly all of the small towns had baseball teams in the early 20's, some of them being Dry Creek, Walker Creek, Orpha, Glenrock, Manville, Lost Springs, Keeline and even Braae, Wyoming, where over half the players carried the family name of Braae. Orin boasted a good diamond and a very good team. They made all their own bases, plates and even their uniforms. In 1933, Orin won the State Championship of the Farm League.

Prior to 1930, dances were held every other Saturday night at the Orin garage. The cars in the building were pushed to the rear, the cement floor cleaned and waxed and food was prepared for the midnight supper. Later on, dances were held in the warehouse behind the store and in the hayloft of the Pollock barn. Music was by local talent, Lewis and Harold Gillespie and Mary Gillespie, Clifford's wife.

After the discontinuation of the "helper" engine, the Gaylords moved to Casper for a year. In 1939, Otis, the eldest son, died of leukemia. In 1944, Preston sold his property to Mr. Burke and the family returned to Chadron where Preston worked in the capacity of conductor on a passenger train. In 1947 he was involved in a hair-raising incident. He was on a passenger train south from Rapid City when they encountered a huge prairie fire. Close to Fairburn the crew found a bridge on fire. For a time, they tried to put it out with their engine hose, but failed in this attempt. Then they decided to make a fast run across the burning bridge, and they did! Further on, however, they found a bridge which was completely burned. They regretted their daring crossing of the first bridge. The crew bought rolls and cookies at Fairburn and made coffee on the burning bridge for the 13 passengers, two of whom were nuns. They were rescued later by a relief train. On a later run, the two nuns were again passengers on the train which Preston was conducting. They recognized him and laughingly reminded him of the night they all drank coffee from an old black coffee pot.

Preston retired in 1950 with an unblemished record with the railroad. In 1973, the Gaylords celebrated their 63rd wedding anniversary at their home in Chadron, and that same year Mr. Gaylord became a 50 year member of the Masonic Lodge.

Preston passed away on the 22nd of November, 1976 at the age of 93. Grace, who also reached the age of 93, is buried beside her husband in the Greenwood Cemetery in Chadron. Otis married Mary Rooney in Cheyenne in 1936. He died on August 20, 1939 in Denver.

Earl Gaylord graduated from Converse County High School and worked for the Wyoming State Highway Department and at home for a year. He then attended Wyoming University when he met and married Vesta Jane Kinsley, daughter of Doctor Elmer Kinsley. Earl and Vesta became parents in August 22, 1938 when Gerald E. Gaylord was born. Both parents graduated from the university in 1939. Vesta with a B.A. in Education and Earl with a B.S. in Civil Engineering. The couple lived in various towns of Wyoming, where engineering work was available.

One stop was the Soil Conservation Service at Gillette where son Daniel W. Gaylord was born June 3, 1941. Upon completing necessary requirements in 1941, Earl was hired by the U.S. Army Corps as a professional engineer. Soon thereafter, he was called for service in the U.S. Infantry as a result of the commission he had earned while at the university. Shortly thereafter, he was sent to the Pacific Theater, and Vesta returned to Casper where son Thomas K. Gaylord was born September 22, 1943.

Earl returned from the service early in 1946 after seeing action from Milne Bay, New Guinea to Japan. Earl and Vesta then lived for seven years at Fort Peck Dam in Montana where the three boys attended school and Earl worked as a hydraulic engineer while the Corps of Engineers completed that great project.

The corps moved the family to Kansas City in 1952 to help update the Missouri River basin hydrology as a result of the 1951 flood. The family lived in Independence, Missouri for several productive and also tragic years. Vesta Jane passed away in 1965 with Hodgkins Disease leaving a great void in the family. Earl retired from the Corps of Engineers in 1971 with 31 years of service and also retired as a Lt. Col. from the U.S. Army Engineers.

Gazlay, Edith Cross Garnick

Edith M. Cross was born on August 26, 1900 in Arcadia, Nebraska, the daughter of Joshua and Nancy David Cross. She was the youngest of seven children. Edith's mother was born in Pennsylvania and her father was from Nebraska.

The Crosses homesteaded near Arcadia on the Loup River. A large sod house was built by the family members on the homestead.

In 1906 Nancy died of an infection incurred while giving birth to a daughter. Edith remembers the heart-break and sorrow that the family went through as her mother died. Nancy called each of the children to her deathbed, one at a time.

Edith married Arnold Garnick. They moved from Marsland, Nebraska to a rented farm near Veteran, Wyoming where they ran a sawmill. They also had a homestead here.

The depression came and with it hard times for the Garnicks. Arnold went to work elsewhere and as a result Edith got a divorce. She remained in the area, living in a cabin in Esterbrook. She made a living by taking in ironing and washing from the CCC boys stationed at the nearby CCC camp one mile north of Esterbrook. There was one time when things were very desperate. They were saved when a lady from the welfare office showed up at their door with some groceries.

The family moved to Lingle for a time but Esterbrook was always their home.

Edith married George Gazlay in 1950. They moved to Oregon where they lived for ten years before coming back to Esterbrook where he died.

Edith lives in the Irwin Towers at the present time.

Gedney, John and Martha Family

The roots of the Gedney family in America began in 1637 when they came from England to settle in Salem, Massachusetts. By the 1870's a branch of the family had settled in Central Iowa. It was here that twin sons, Harry and Harold, were born to John and Martha Jane Teeter Gedney in 1879. Later John and his family moved to South Dakota.

In 1909 Harold married Cecilia Meoska in White Lake, South Dakota. Cecilia and her sister Sophia, who married Harry, were born in Plankinton, South Dakota to Joseph and Barbara Haberkorn Meoska.

Harold and Harry, along with their wives, came to Platte County in 1909. They purchased the Billy Burkett place on lower Elkhorn Creek.

Finding that the Elkhorn ranch was too small for two families, Harold and Cecilia began looking for another place.

It was the lure of milk and honey that beckoned the Gedney family to Converse County. The LaPrele Ditch and Reservoir Co. thru their agents Thomas Brownfield, W.F. Hamilton and B.J. Erwin hosted a picnic in Downey Park for prospective buyers of land under the LaPrele Dam. They were also shown fields of peas grown by Ralph Olds in the park. The display of lush fields was supposed to exemplify that crops could be grown profusely in Wyoming. So it was in 1911, after succumbing to the sales pitch of Brownfield and associates that Harold and Cecilia; his parents John and Martha; his sisters Lola, Fay, Hazel and Marie came to Converse County settling on upper Bedtick Creek.

Shortly after moving to Wyoming John died in 1911 while Martha lived until 1919.

Lola, Fay, Hazel and Marie became teachers and taught around the area. Fay teaching at the Pleasant Valley School in 1911-12 with Marie as one of her students.

Later Lola was to marry Fred Roediger and moved to Platte County where they homesteaded and raised a family. Hazel and Fay married brothers, Lawrence and Charlie Graham, and moved to South Dakota. Marie met and married Fred Lietritz. They made their home in Alliance, Nebraska. Fred was named to the Cowboy Hall of Fame recently.

Three sons were born to Harold and Cecilia after they came to Converse County, Joseph in 1911; Lawrence in 1912; and Henry in 1916.

School for the children was first held in a building on Bedtick and later in a place near the Harry Anderson homestead on Little Bedtick. Some of the teachers were Marie McNamara, Edna Senters and Tillie Fourfangs. Mary Dunn (Bruner) was also a teacher at one time. Some of the teachers lived in Douglas and rode back and forth horseback using horses belonging to the National Guard Cavalry. Joe remembers that Thomas Brownfield was on the District #17 School Board at the time and was instrumental in seeing that everyone had good schools. Later on, a Model T Ford bus took the students to the Douglas School.

Harold died in 1934 and Cecilia in 1974.

Joe married Mary Stuckey of Hill City, Kansas on Jan. 20, 1949. They were parents of three daughters, Linda, Carol and Barbara. Mary passed away in Sept. of 1963 and Joe died in 1984.

Henry married June Stewart. They operate and own the original land that the family bought when they came to Converse County. They are one of the few families that still have the lands that were patented to them under the LaPrele project.

Gentle, Robert and Minnie Family

The Gentle heritage is now in the sixth generation in the USA.

It started with Andrew Gentle, who immigrated to the U.S. from Scotland in 1784. He married Anna Yale, whose uncle was one of the founders of the Yale University. Not liking the new government and being a strong lobbyist, he moved to Sweet, Canada. Three children were born of the union, Hiram, Sally and Betsy.

Hiram married Mary Bateman in 1821; and they had 13 children, of which Robert and Hiram left Canada and went to Iowa where they started to farm and do bridge work for the railroad.

Hiram, Jr. married Sara Tracy in Rome, Iowa in 1867. Three children were born to this union, Minnie, Albert and our father, Robert Tracy.

Robert moved to Livingston, Montana as a young man and started a men's haberdashery. He married our mother, Minnie Cresap (who can trace her family tree in the U.S. before the Revolution War). Three children were born to this union, Justine and William, who were born in Livingston and Robert who was born in Douglas, Wyoming.

In 1915, our father moved to Douglas, Wyoming where he and his brother-in-law, J. N. McCracken bought the Metcalf Mercantile. The store in general has changed many times. The first major change in the Golden Rule Store came in 1948 when all new modern fixtures were installed. In 1970 again the store went through another major change in its appearance.

After World War II, Robert's sons, Bill and Bob, became very active in the management of the Golden Rule Store. Tracy, Bob's son, is now taking over the active management of the Golden Rule Store, thus making the Golden Rule Store the oldest retail store in Douglas owned by the same family and in the same location — 70 years.

Robert Tracy died in 1950, Minnie in 1951.

George, Emanuel and Mary

Emanuel George was born in England, probably Yorkshire about 1823, the son of Wm. Henry and Eve (Marshall) George. He came to the U.S. with the rest of his family on the ship, Ontario, to New York in 1839. The family migrated inland to Greene County, Wisconsin where he met and married a Swiss girl, Barbara Blum. Emanuel served in the Civil War in Co. C of the 43rd Regiment of Wisconsin Infantry, and shortly after his discharge must have made his first trip to Wyoming. In the "Annals of Wyoming" Vol. 6 Book 4, p. 318 Mr. E. J. Wells, in an article entitled, "Mineral Resources of Central Wyoming" tells of Emanuel: "In 1869, Emanuel George, an experienced and intelligent prospector, came to this section and found the old shafts and opened more. He found an abundance of copper, but as it was worth only about ten cents a pound, it could not be marketed because the Union Pacific, the nearest railroad, was over 100 miles to the south and roads were very poor. George was further handicapped by being a miner in cow country. The cowboys dubbed him "Crazy Horse" George. This nickname was advanced further because Emanuel wore his hair long and was often seen in buckskins."

Emanuel's home was a cabin between Rabbit and Crazy Horse Creeks; he later built another on Wagonhound Creek.

Barbara, his first wife died in Wisconsin in 1868.

Emanuel George.

He remarried a widow named Mary (Wisdown) Wallin who followed him to Wyoming. Little is known about her life in Converse County. Mention is made of Mary George in George Cross' journal in 1887 when she worked for them. At the time of their daughter Stella's marriage (1896), she had a home on 4th Street in Douglas. The Court-house records of Converse County show this was sold by Emanuel and Mary to the First Congregational Church of Douglas who later sold to the Chambers family. By 1886 Emanuel had sold his land to Charles Horr.

In the mid-1880s Emanuel made the long trip from Douglas to Cheyenne by wagon team to pick up his son Fred and family from Wisconsin. They had come to Wyoming by train to settle after farming in Wisconsin and Nebraska. Blanche (George) Carothers, daughter of Fred and Mary Ellen, recalled years later: "The journey from Cheyenne to LaPrele took 13 days." The children kept inquiring of their grandfather where his place was.

His reply was always the same — "over the next hill."

Emanuel left Wyoming, traveling west to visit his children on his way back to Wisconsin. Three of his sons had married girls by the name of Copsey. Mrs. Copsey, who did not like the terse ways of "Mann" George remarked she "didn't care for her girls marrying those George boys!" According to family legend, Emanuel replied, "Your cares will be great, for I have a son for every one of your girls!" To add to that, two Copsey cousins married the other two George boys! Emanuel died in Wisconsin in Oct., 1900. He is buried by his first wife, Barby. Mary, meanwhile left Douglas and lived with her daughter, Mary, at Topeka, Kansas. She died there in 1923.

George, Fred Jr.

Fred George, Jr. was born in Douglas, Wyoming August 15, 1896, the 9th child of Fred George, Sr. and Mary Ellen Copsey George.

Fred grew to manhood on his parents' ranch south of Douglas. He received his schooling in the rural schools and in the high school in Douglas. In 1918, he married Beatrice Hattie Poirot, daughter of Gene and Edith Brockway Poirot. Bea was born in Lusk, Wyoming on Sept. 17, 1898 and died May 11, 1935 in Douglas. They had one son, Eugene and two daughters, Lorraine (Cashner) and Betty (Homer). Lorraine made her home in Roseburg, Oregon, and Betty in Eugene, Oregon.

In 1939 Fred married Elsie McCleery.

Fred worked most of his life on ranches until 1940 when he traded his boots for a hammer and started driving nails for Uncle Sam on barracks and camps during the war. Later he signed up to go to Kodiak Island to work. It was quite an experience for someone who had always worked on a ranch.

He always made lots of friends wherever he went and made the best of a bad situation. He was a man who always saw both sides and always said there were two sides to everything. He loved to pull a joke on someone and could take one on himself. He would sit and tell of lots of pranks pulled on the ranch by him and on him. He loved to tell about a horse he was breaking and he brought him to the cabin where the family lived. His younger girl Betty said, "Tie him to the wagon Dad, I will gentle him for you." He always had a good laugh over that.

Fred was very active in the Odd Fellows Lodge. He went through all the chairs and after his retirement spent lots of time out at the hall working around repairing things. He made two altars and platforms with rollers so they could be moved off the floor.

Fred passed away July 29, 1971.

George, Fred and Mary Ellen

Fred and Mary Ellen George came to Wyoming from Crawford County, Wisconsin and York, Nebraska. Both had come from families who had come to Wisconsin from England. The George family had immigrated from Yorkshire and Hampshire, England, while the John and Mary (Talbot) Copsey family had come from Suffolk, England to New York on June 10, 1834 on the ship ELIZA. The Copsey's lived for a short time in Herkimer County, N.Y. before traveling further west to Crawford County, Wisconsin.

The children of Fred and Mary Ellen born in Wisconsin were Bertha, Arthur, and Blanche. A baby, Earl who died at birth, Guy T., and Robert S. were born in Nebraska.

After the arrival of the younger George family in Wyoming they made their home for a time with Fred's father, "Mann" George on LaPrele. The community was rapidly growing, so Mr. and Mrs. George Cross donated an acre of land for the new school on the little hill near the Cross home. Anne Sanford (nee Rice) listed the first students in a letter to Emma Cross Morton: "School opened Jan 15, 1887 with Mary Cooper as the first teacher and pupils as Blanche, Bertha, and Arthur George and Lottie Virden."

The George family later moved to the place Ed Raeber developed, then to the Guthrie place (now the Frank Pexton ranch) where Fred was employed. Fred and Mary homesteaded the present Rody Brow Ranch. During this time Goldie, Maude, Hubert, Fred, and Harry were born. The oldest son, Arthur was killed in a haying accident June, 1898, and lies buried on the hill behind the ranch home.

Articles from the "Years Ago" Column of the Douglas Budget tells us on Dec. 5, 1906, Mr. and Mrs. Matt Carothers and Fred George left for Ohio and points east for a visit with relation. Also noted, "Bob and Guy George purchased from E.T. Kelly a fine three-year-old Percheon stud. It is one of the fine string of horses Mr. Kelly has been showing here for the last week."

Fred enjoyed the hobby of beekeeping and on May 12, 1914 the Douglas Budget related: "Mr. and Mrs. Fred

Fred, Sr. and Mary Ellen George.

George of LaBonte were in town last Thursday and remained overnight. In addition to a large load of chickens and other produce raised on their ranch they brought in 100 dozen eggs, which they disposed of to the Geo. Bolln Co. Mr. George, in addition to raising some mighty good horses, has furnished the local market with large quantities of honey and it would seem as though he had contracted to supply the egg demand."

On April 2, 1925 a social note appeared in the Douglas Budget: "Mr. and Mrs. Fred George of LaBonte, Converse County pioneers, celebrated their golden wedding anniversary on Tuesday with an open house. In the evening they were feted at a dinner at the Methodist community house. Nine of their children, thirty-three grandchildren, and three great-grand children were there to wish them their best."

The George children and their descendants have called Converse County "Home" for many years. Mary Ellen died in 1926. Fred made his home with the Hubert George family until his death in 1940. Both are buried in Douglas, Wyoming.

George, Hubert and Rose Family

Hubert George and Rose Falkenburg met when Rose and her sister and brother, Mary and Herman Falkenburg rode from their home, the old Fishspear Ranch on the Little Medicine, to the Guy George Ranch to purchase and trail cattle back to the Falkenburg Ranch. During the Thanksgiving dance at the Matt Carothers' home, Hubert and Rose became well acquainted, and were married the next year on Feb. 3, 1915 at the Wheeler Ranch near Casper, Wyoming. Rose was the daughter of George Henry and Anna Lisetta (Schroer) Falkenburg, who had come to Wyoming from Essen, Germany in 1892.

The honeymoon was a short one—Hubert's father, Fred George, was ill in the Douglas hospital and a cook was needed at the George home. Rose can remember how the boys teased her about the "FAT German noodles" when they were used to the "THIN English noodles" their mother made. She won't forget the time Fred Jr. told her the biscuits were "hard enough to break a door in," and tossed one at the kitchen door. To Rose's dismay, the top panel fell to the floor with a crash! After the laughter died down, they explained the panel had been loose for years, and the biscuits were pretty good.

A baby girl, Mary, arrived Mar. 28, 1916. "That spring we moved to the old Ralph Wilson place that adjoined the Fred George Ranch. The next year we built a small house on the Fred George Ranch and lived there three years. Mathew was born Feb. 13, 1918, and Allen Jan. 24, 1920. The following spring Hubert filed on a homestead on Trail Creek southeast of the old Fred George Ranch. The youngest son, Warren, "Jiggs" was born Sept. 4, 1922. Later in the year a move was made back to the Fred George Ranch to farm and ranch on shares. That was how Rose recalled the years with small children and several moves.

After the death of Mary Ellen George, Fred sold the ranch. The Hubert George family moved to the old Jim Marsden Ranch on Wagonhound owned by Mr. C. Zimmerman. The three oldest children were in school by then. In November 1929, Hubert and Rose purchased the ranch on Wagonhound from Harry Durham, a lawyer in Casper.

The children grew up during some years of hard work and few conveniences. Mary can remember lines full of the family's and hired men's clothes—all done on the washboard. Few of us modern gals have stood over a wood burning stove in the hot late summer canning fruits and vegetables for winter food.

School was not far from the ranch, so it was convenient for the school teacher to board and room at the George ranch. The George kids were average American youngsters with their share of scraped knees, burns, croup, and a bout with the measles brought on by "measle-infected funny papers" passed around the community from family to family. Hubert found a small prairie dog in a post hole one morning and brought him home to the children. He always slept with Allen, and when the evening milk was brought in from the barn, there was the prairie dog with his doll bottle for his share.

A lot of tears were shed when the little guy was caught in the screen door and died. Neighbors and friends still remember the "cow riding" contests behind the barn in the summer and the many branding times with tables of good food. When the grandkids visited there was always a battle over the Chinese checker board and who was the champion croquet player!

Hubert was especially proud of his Hereford cattle. Rose enjoyed her home and lovely yard. When Hubert passed away Oct. 17, 1958, Rose continued to operate the ranch with the help of her son, Mathew and his family. In 1963 she leased the ranch to Mathew and bought a home in Douglas. After Mathew's death July 19, 1966, the ranch was leased for five years to his wife, Bernice and two sons, Hazen and Stephen. At the end of the five years they did not want to renew the lease or buy the ranch, so it was sold to Rose's nephew, George Falkenburg and his wife, Phyllis.

The George children have families of their own now. Mary and her husband, Stanley Lass are retired after selling their ranch and moving to Douglas. They have two daughters, Sharon married to Sam Field who lives in Cheyenne with a boy, Shadd and girl, Shelly. Bette married Jim Hildebrand and lives in Douglas with sons, Todd and Troy.

Allen and his wife, Alice have a home in Thermopolis. His children: Craig is married and lives in California, and Nancy, married to Glen Miller, lives near Torrington, Wyoming. Nancy is a registered nurse.

Warren and his wife, Norma Jean have a ranch on the upper Bates Creek near the Shirley Basin uranium mines in Natrona County. They have two sons, Jeff and Paul, and run cattle on their large ranch.

Mathew's widow, Bernice, had a home in Douglas. Kristeen, their daughter, married Jack Moore, and they manage one of his father's ranches north of Douglas. The sons, Hazen and Stephen are both deceased. Hazen left three sons; Stephen and his wife, Marlene, did not have children. Bernice died on Dec. 13, 1983.

Rose enjoys her home and yard, and keeps busy with many organizations around Douglas. She has served on the Board of Directors for Senior Citizens and as a Deaconess of the Congregational Church of Douglas.

George, Peter and Amy Family

The George family came in a sailing vessel, to the United States from England, when Peter was seven years old. They settled in Green County, Wisconsin. Peter received his education there and married Amy Green on Dec. 7, 1855. They had four boys, two died in infancy. Frank was born October 2, 1856 and Charles Henry on January 20, 1862.

Peter enlisted in the Wisconsin Volunteers during the Civil War. He was wounded twice, taken prisoner and spent some time in the Andersonville prison in Georgia, where tens of thousands of Union prisoners were confined in 1864 and 1865, under conditions so bad that over 12,000 of them died.

Peter George survived and he was mustered out at Madison, Wisconsin, after waiting 40 days for his dismissal.

Sometime in the early 1870's, Peter and Amy and the two boys moved to Nebraska, near Grafton. Here Mrs. George was taught by Indian women to tan deer hide and make buckskin gloves. She always made three instead of two for a pair, an extra one for the roping hand as they wore out much faster. While living here, she made some and sent them to General Custer.

In 1878 Peter and his wife and son Charles started for California. When they stopped at Fort Fetterman for supplies, they were advised not to move Mrs. George, who was very ill. Peter paid a squaw man $500 for a dugout house where they remained. A log house was soon erected.

Mrs. George's health improved and she was soon selling her dairy products to the officers at the Fort. She also made the buckskin gloves to sell to the cowboys and the stage drivers. The stage from Rock Creek passed right in front of their door.

As soon as Peter had the log cabin completed he started improving the land. He built an irrigation ditch, which he surveyed with a straight edge and a carpenter's level. It was quite a wonderful feat of engineering. It was told he carried a shovel on his shoulders from early spring until well into the fall. State water records show Peter getting his water right on May 1, 1879 in Sec. 6, T.31, R.73 for 104 acres.

After a few years a frame house was built which was the first of its kind in the area. The doors and windows were freighted from Cheyenne.

When the Peter Georges left Wisconsin, Amy's brother Emerson had just lost his wife, leaving four young children. His health was also bad. After the Georges were settled in Wyoming, she sent for her brother, believing the climate would benefit his health. He came and brought his family and Aunt Amy raised his children.

When the ranch work became too heavy for Peter George he and his wife moved to town, where he still found plenty of work building sidewalks and planting trees in the cemetery and fairgrounds.

Death claimed Peter on October 12, 1911 and "Grandma," as she was known, lived in the family home until shortly before her death on April 26, 1918.

Charles H. married Dema Kuhns on Dec. 15, 1884 in North Platte, Nebraska. Their children were Pearl (1885-1921), Vernon (1888-1973), Dennis (1891-1904), William (1893-1893), Dema (1895-1985), Edward (1898-1965), and Earl (1900-1939).

Charles operated a livery barn in Douglas for several years. Dema was the local librarian for numerous years.

Charles died on Dec. 24, 1920, Dema on Jan. 19, 1918.

Their daughter Dema married W. Wallace McCrillis. She lived in California. She died in 1985.

Edward married Faye Chambers on June 23, 1920. Their children are: Maxine (Erwin), Charles and Marilyn (Blassingame).

Ed purchased the Kandy Koop in 1919 after his discharge from the Army and World War I. He bought the building to the north and cut a door between the two. Ed continued to sell to the theater crowd as they came in while also serving the Koop's fountain service.

In 1939 Ed started an insurance business, the George Agency, which is still in business today and run by his son Charles and his sons Randy and Jeff.

Ed died on Sept. 24, 1965, Faye in 1982.

Gerlach, William and Mary

John William "Billy" Gerlach came to Douglas in May 1898 from Harrison, Nebraska. He was the second child of Lewis and Anna Kreitzberg Gerlach and was born May 10, 1874 at Lyman, Iowa.

Upon arriving, he went to work in Merritt's store, then he worked in George Bolln's clothing store; and in May 1902, he established his own "William Gerlach men's clothing store" on the corner of Center and 2nd Streets, where Slick's Sportin' House is today. In his store he not only had ready-to-wear suits, but advertised to come in and be measured, and this service was affiliated with Hart, Shaffner and Marx. He also was the tobacco broker for the town, keeping the tobacco in a special case, and the other storekeepers came to him to get it. He did business with cowboys and sheepherders, who came in and either paid cash for whatever items they wanted, or they exchanged items they brought in for new merchandise. Ralph Merritt and Orin Young were two of his clerks.

In 1903 he went out hunting one day, hiring a team and buggy from Powell and Amspoker's livery stable. His shotgun went off accidentally and shot one of the horses in the hip, but didn't hurt it permanently.

In 1907 he bought the land where his store was, for $600.00 from Wilbert Stewart, and kept it until 1945 when he retired. That year he installed a new up-to-date cash register in his store as well as a fine four-section clothing cabinet in which to display his clothing, selling three old showcases to Arnold Lumber Co.

He bought one of the first cars in Douglas — a 28-horsepower Ford Roadster, purchased from the Rice Brothers. He dearly loved automobiles, and traded them in at least once a year, so he could drive the latest thing out, usually Studebakers.

He was married October 24, 1911 to Mary Martha Bruner, daughter of Thomas and Martha Bruner, at the Bruner home near the foot of Mill Hill below Esterbrook. They left on their honeymoon in their car, heading for Laramie through the mountains. Roads were nothing but wagon ruts and they had a flat tire on Mill Hill. Billy tied a rope around the wheel and managed to get to Frank Newell's at Springhill, where he was able to get a tire of the same size and on they went. Coming home they had sprung the front axle on the car and it had turned very cold, so Mary boarded the train near Glendo to ride on to Douglas.

Soon after that Billy had a narrow escape with death. He was driving on the LaBonte Road and met a four-horse team and wagon on Fitzhugh Hill. In order to miss the team he turned it into a bank where it upset and the steering gear was laying on his chest. The car was raised before he suffocated.

In 1917 he had a 46-foot new brick addition made to his store.

In 1925 he was a director of the First State Bank of Douglas, and he served on the local school board, was a member of the Kiwanis Club, and a charter member of the Douglas Shrine Club, and of the Natural Bridge Chapter of the Royal Arch Masons.

Billy and Mary had five children: Martha, Lewis, George, Jesse, and Harvey, then tragedy struck when Mary died of pneumonia in 1923. His sister, Lucy Bonne, came and took care of the children for a time and then Mrs. Ernest Finney took care of them.

Billy had some high button shoes in his store that had gone out of fashion, so he decided the boys could wear them. Jesse says that they hated them so bad, and found that with practice, they would wear out a pair in two days! The boys got plans for an ice boat from Popular Mechanics, and built one. The runners were old ice skates, and the sail was a new muslin sheet. After a month's work they took to the river somewhat south of the fairgrounds. The boat started downwind, and really went — straight for the center bridge pier. The best part about the crash was they didn't have enough left to cart home. George built a pusher air cart. He had a Maytag motor and some old wheels, everything but a prop. The day it came $7.00 C.O.D., his dad really hit the roof, but at two-bits a week allowance, it was hard to get things. All of the children helped in the store.

Billy developed diabetes and died in his sleep in 1946.

His daughter, Martha, lives in Seattle, Washington, with her husband, Karl Lind. They are retired from their graphics arts business and have two sons, John and David.

Lewis lived at Mercer Island, Washington, with his wife, Van. Lewis was sales manager for Kenworth for 44 years. He built a fantastic red firetruck bunk bed for his grandson, complete with headlights, grill, wheels, etc.

They have three children: Leonard, Karol, and Joy, and six grandchildren. Lewis died October 30, 1985.

George and his wife, Yvette, live at Seattle, Washington where he is a building contractor. He was a member of the "Jolly Rogers", Liberator group of the Pacific, earning five battle stars and unit Presidential citation with oak leaf cluster. They have three sons, Gary, Robert, and David and one grandson, Jason.

Jesse and his wife, Ruth, live at Napa, California. He is a retired carpenter. Jesse remembers catching rides with his sled hooked to cars as they backed out from the post office in Douglas, when he was a boy, and the circus days in Douglas — they came in on the Burlington train unloading with elephants, and a parade by noon and a show that afternoon — with all the kids watching, if possible.

Harvey, the youngest, and Jesse, spent their summers out at the Bruner Ranch. One time Harvey went up in the mountains in a Model T car. While he was up there, he had to crank it to start it, and as often happened, it backfired, and broke his arm. He was married to Ruth Daley and had two daughters, Susan and Sharon, and then was killed in 1949 in an Army surplus P-40 airplane he had bought, which had been undergoing repairs, and as he took off, it swerved out of control and crashed. Then Ruth married Jesse Gerlach who had a son, Charles, from a previous marriage, and they had a son, John, and now they have six grandchildren.

Gibb, James and Judy

Jim was born on May 14, 1906, near Montrose, Scotland to Edmund S. and Catherine McKenzie Gibb. He attended schools in Scotland. As a young man of 17, Jim decided to come to the United States. While in Scotland, he worked for J. P. Morgan, at the Morgan Shooting Lodge; and when he left for America in his pocket was a letter of recommendation from Mr. Morgan.

Jim worked in Detroit for awhile and then came to Wyoming in 1927. Jim established a trucking business in 1928 in Douglas, Wyoming. Jim also sheared sheep around Wyoming and was one of the top sheep shearers in the area. Jim tells of many of his trucking experiences in his business. He talked of taking 3-4 days to go out into the Ross Country, just to get a load, as the roads were so muddy and bad, you fought every mile of the way. One such time, Jim tells of getting stuck on the Ross Road in a snow storm, and all he could see was a light in the far distance, so he walked to the old Amspoker place, where he found a hot meal and a warm place to sleep. Many old-timers kept lights burning in their windows for such just occasions.

One other time, Jim tells of a narrow escape from getting shot. The Sheriff had foreclosed on a small rancher on the east end of Converse County, and Jim was ordered to go down and get the livestock. As he approached the place and backed into the loading chute, he came under gun fire. All the tires were shot out on his truck and he waited for the Sheriff to arrive and help him out of the mess.

Jim was so strong that when loading lambs, in his earlier days, he would just stand in the loading chute and throw the lambs into the top deck.

On April 6, 1959 Jim married Mrs. Judy Gilbert Wilson, widow of Charles M. Wilson, son of Dr. and Mrs. J. M. Wilson, pioneer people of Converse County. Judy, daughter of Dan B. and Anna N. Gilbert, was born in Sterling, Colorado.

Serving his country in World War II in the United States Air Force in the 423rd Photo Reconnaissance Group for four years, Jim saw service in Europe and England. While overseas Jim got to see his father for the last time as the senior Mr. Gibb died in 1954. Jim's mother died in 1908 when Jim was two years of age.

Following World War II Jim and Judy bought the Boot Ranch, which was established by the Kellogg Family. In 1966, they bought the Etta Nichols Ranch, another old-established ranch, once owned and operated by Tom Pexton.

Jim died on July 8, 1979 in Douglas.

Giehm, Carl & Marie Family

Charles L. "Carl" Giehm was born October 11, 1874 in Germany. His parents did not come to this country and their names are not known. Carl and his brother came to America when Carl was but a small boy and settled in Philadelphia where they lived until they enlisted in the army during the Spanish-American War. After the war, Carl's brother changed the spelling of his last name to Geihm and moved to Aurora, Illinois.

Marie L. Meyers was born March 1, 1880 in Murhard, Wittenburg, Germany. She came to the United States when she was twelve. While at Ellis Island, she bought what she thought was an apple from a vendor. It was a tomato, which she had never seen. She took a bite, became ill, and never ate another one. Marie's sister lived in Philadelphia, and it was there that Marie went to live.

Carl and Marie met in Philadelphia just after he returned from the army. They were married on August 5, 1903. Later that year he was transferred by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company to LaCrosse, Wisconsin.

It was in LaCrosse that their first son, Rudolph C. "Rudy" was born on October 1, 1905.

The family moved to Ferryville, Wisconsin where Albert H. (born March 5, 1909) and Herman P. were born.

It was in 1916 that the family came to Wyoming to homestead six miles east of Douglas. Carl built a small three room house; it was sided and painted white.

At some point in time, Carl worked in a chicken slaughter house in Wisconsin. One year during threshing time at the Matt Kirn place, Mary, Anna, and Sophie Kirn were killing chickens for the crew's dinner. Carl came early and decided to help the ladies with this chore. After the chickens had been scalded, he demonstrated how to clean them. Carl said, "You don't pick a chicken, you rub it." In no time at all, he had the chickens clean of feathers. After that, the Kirns saved much time by following his proven method.

Rudy married Marian Cranston of Casper. Marian's father came from Scotland in the late 1800s. Her mother was a Freeze and was born in Buffalo in about 1890. Rudy and Marian had three children, Wesley Paul, Beverly, and Joy. Marian died in Casper on November 19, 1937. The children were raised by their grandparents, Carl and Marie Giehm. Rudolph died January 28, 1964 in Seattle, Washington.

Albert married Thelma Noel of Casper. They had four children, Noel, Albert Jr., James, and Faye Giehm Barrera. Albert passed away November 28, 1975 and was brought to Douglas for burial.

Herman married Rose Leigh Peterson of Douglas, the daughter of Percy "Pete" and Zella Van Dalsem Peterson. They have two children, a daughter Mary and a son John, and presently live in San Mateo, California.

The Giehms farmed and raised cattle until 1941 when they retired and moved to Douglas where they purchased a home at 502 South Fourth Street.

Paul, Beverly, and Joy all graduated from Converse County High School. Paul joined the Marines from which he retired; he presently lives in Kennewick, Washington. Beverly attended the University of Wyoming and became a rural school teacher, teaching the Frank Rothleutner children. She later joined the U.S. Army, retired as a major, and settled in Shady Side, Maryland. She died May 30, 1979 from cancer and is buried in Arlington National Cemetery. Joy Giehm Menard lives in Bellevue, Washington and has two married daughters.

While Bill Chapman was Converse County Agricultural Agent, Carl began working for the county helping to prepare the agriculture exhibits for the Wyoming State Fair. When Chapman became Wyoming's Commissioner of Agriculture, Carl continued to work under Orville "Nick" Nicholls who took Chapman's place. During this time, each county had a booth containing exhibits of fruit, vegetables, grains, hays, etc. in the Agricultural Hall. Carl would gather produce from the farmers, ranchers, and gardeners in Converse County for exhibit. One year Converse County placed second in this competition of counties to determine who had produced the best agricultural products.

Marie passed away January 4, 1952, and Carl passed away September 1, 1957. Both are buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Gillespie, Harry and Lena

Harry Gillespie was born in Howard County Nebraska, September 17, 1874, to Joseph and Anna Gillespie. He left home at the age of 18 and came to Wyoming where he punched cows on the Yellowstone and Powder Rivers until 1897, when he returned to Chadron and farmed until 1903. From there he returned to Wyoming and went to Hartville where he worked in the mines. From there he ranched on Horseshoe Creek near Glendo. He then went to Orin where he opened a cafe. In 1912 he filed on a homestead northeast of Douglas which was then known as Shawnee Basin. While living there he served as County Commissioner from 1921 to 1932.

On November 16, 1897 he married Lena Speckman.

They had two boys, Edwin E. and Clair C. In 1948 he sold his ranch and moved to Douglas where he died in 1950. Lena died on February 13, 1962.

Edwin had two daughters, Mary Irene and Betty who died when a baby. Clair had a boy, Stanley, and a girl, Phyllis.

Gillespie, Lewis and Alice Family

Lewis Cook "Mose" Gillespie, son of Joseph and Anna Gillespie, was born October 30, 1877 at Ord, Nebraska. In 1885 the family moved to Chadron, Nebraska where Mose, his three brothers and his sister grew up. While living there my grandfather, Joseph Gillespie, rode in the famous Thousand Mile Horse Race from Chadron to Chicago. Among the riders was "Doc" Middleton.

In 1889 they traveled by covered wagon from Chadron to Fay, Oklahoma. I, Helen Lam, have a copy of a diary that my grandmother kept while they were enroute.

In 1899 Dad attended and graduated from Grand Island Business and Normal College.

Dad's first glimpse of Wyoming was when he helped Jim Shaw trail Texas longhorn steers up from Texas. He fell in love with the country and returned to make it his home. In 1906 he and my mother, Alice Nylen, daughter of Charles and Mary Nylen, were married. He filed on a homestead south of Orin Junction where he lived until 1919 when they moved to what was then known as the Haynes place. In 1938 he was elected as County Commissioner and served two terms.

My mother was born at Camp Carlin, Wyoming in 1880. This was a supply depot for twelve forts in Wyoming and located east of the main entrance to Fort D.A. Russell. Grandpa Nylen drove one of the supply wagons until the camp was dismantled in 1890 by the War Department. From there they moved to Hartville where Grandpa ran a saloon, which is still standing, and is one of the oldest in Wyoming. From Hartville they moved south of Orin Junction where they ran a stage station.

My mother and her four brothers went to school in the Shaw house. Their teacher was Belle Dodson, who was a sister to Mrs. Jim Shaw. Mother said that many a time they could hear wolves howling in the timber at McKinley and, needless to say, they did not waste any time getting home. As there were still Indians in the area, it was not a bit uncommon to see Indians looking in their windows.

My three brothers, Lewis, Clifford and Harold, were all born at the ranch and I was born at Douglas at Grandpa Nylen's home.

We all attended a little country school and for several years I was the only girl in the school. The other pupils were my three brothers and Bud and John Pollock. Having no playground equipment, we made up our own games. Many a wild football game took place and, not having a football, we used an old overshoe. We did lots of ice skating and hockey was another favorite game. We used a cottonwood stick and a bean can for our equipment. How excited we all were just before Christmas, when we had our Christmas program at school. I can still smell the cedar from the freshly cut tree and see the candles glowing. How we worried for fear we would forget the piece that we were supposed to speak.

Other forms of recreation were skating parties on the Platte River and dances in a big garage building at Orin. We attended Sunday School in the school house and on Sunday evening we had Christian Endeavor. Some of my other memories are the good times we had at the Churchill Hotel in Orin, where we spent many an evening making fudge, popping corn and dancing to the Edison phonograph.

George Pollock was our nearest neighbor, and we never tired of gathering around the piano at his house having an old fashioned sing-along. Mollie Pollock was always ready to play the piano for us.

We also had many a wild rodeo at the ranch when we would attempt to ride the "milk pen" calves. I always got bucked off.

Having no car, our means of transportation was with a team and wagon or by train. Mother would make out a grocery list and send it up to the George Bolln Company and they would send it down on the train to Orin where Dad would pick it up at the Orin Depot. This we looked forward to, as Mr. Bolln would always include a sack of candy for us kids.

We usually came to Douglas on the train and stayed at Grandpa Nylen's house which used to stand where the Tillard and Bill Smith Sr. home now stands. In fact, I was born in that house. This was quite a treat as there was indoor plumbing and the best stair bannisters to slide down, which came to an abrupt halt when Grandmother informed me that "little ladies did not do such things."

Mother and I went to the state fair on the train, while Dad and my brothers rode their horses up from Orin. The boys usually entered the kids' cowpony race and the wild cow milking. My uncle, Gus Nylen, raised race horses and had a horse entered in the races.

My three brothers were all talented musicians and had their own orchestra. They earned their spending money playing for dances. They acquired a Model T Ford and traveled many a mile to dances. Harold would take along a pair of coveralls and about halfway to their destination, would stop along the road and take up the connecting rods.

The only way we could get across the North Platte River to go to Orin and Douglas before the bridge was built, in about 1920, was either ford the river or go down to the Platte Valley Ranch bridge at McKinley, Wyoming.

Mother died in 1938 and Dad in 1958.

Lewis W. was born in 1907 and died in 1972. He was married to Dorothy Johnson in 1952.

Clifford R. was born in 1910. He died on March 28, 1954 in a tragic accident when a westbound Burlington train crashed into his pickup as he was crossing the railroad track on the road leading out of his ranch. He was married to Maud Mary Lees on June 1, 1929. They had one son, Calvin.

Harold W. was born in 1911. He married Frances Haworth in 1936. He worked for the LeBar Motor Co. as a mechanic for several years before going into the trucking business. They had one daughter, Sharon.

I was born in 1912 and married Harry Lam in 1935. He was killed in 1955 at the Clayton Tank Farm. We had two children, Helen and Harry.

Gilmore, Clarence A. and Dessie

Dessie Margret Ford was born in Missouri in 1892, the sixth child of Andrew Alexander Ford and Mary Jeanetta Purcell Ford. She was united in marriage to Clarence A. Gilmore in 1917 in Colorado. Immediately after the marriage, the couple, accompanied by Dessie's sister, Vena Ford, came to Wyoming to homestead. Bernie Ford, brother of Dessie Gilmore and Vena Ford, had homesteaded in Wyoming in 1916. Vena and the Gilmores filed claims on lands adjoining that of Bernie.

The Gilmores' first home in Wyoming was in Douglas. There they waited for their homestead goods and farming equipment to arrive. Clarence was employed on a part-time basis by the Ford Garage. When their equipment arrived, they set up a tent on their claim and began hauling logs with which to build their cabin and that of Vena.

In the fall of 1917, the Gilmores, along with Vena, returned to Colorado where Dessie and Clarence became the parents of a son, Eugene, born in February of 1918. Later that spring, they returned to Wyoming in the Gilmores' new Chevy touring car.

Since the spring of 1918 was very wet, the new car became mired down in the Cheyenne River Crossing. The party had no choice but to walk to the Gilmore cabin in the dark, a distance of about two miles, carrying the baby and a sack of groceries. When daylight came, they discovered that they could have walked to Vena's cabin which was only about one-half mile from the stranded vehicle.

Gilmores' cabin was built on the shore of a shallow lake. Due to the abundant rain, the lake was full. The Gilmores built a log raft and enjoyed boating on the lake that summer.

Dessie and Eugene Gilmore

The Gilmores lived on the homestead each summer to "prove up". Clarence spent one winter hunting and trapping. From his winter's catch, he had a fox fur neck piece and a bobcat rug made for Dessie for Christmas. They completed their "proving up", after which they chose to relocate in Happyville, Colorado where they built a store which also housed the local post office. In 1924, Clarence and Dessie sold their Wyoming land to Vena Ford Pellatz and her husband, Orville Pellatz.

The Gilmores raised their family of three boys and one girl in Colorado. Clarence died in 1966, and Dessie, in the company of her youngest sister, Mary Ford, lives in her home in Loveland, Colorado. She has 19 grandchildren and 29 great grandchildren.

Githens, Milton and Geraldine Family

What is progress to one person may not be to another. This appears to be the case with my great-granddad, James Riley Githens. (I am Bill Githens, Jr.).

It seems he had a freight line from Missouri into northern New Mexico. His dad freighted in this area also, whether it was with his father or on his own, I don't know.

Anyway, he was living in or about Watrous, New Mexico when his wife felt the labor pains of her first child's birth, Milton Riley Githens, February 5, 1883. Milt, as he was known, was my granddad. It is said that he was the first child that wasn't of Spanish or Indian descent to be born in Watrous.

One day the clop of the oxen, horses, and mules feet were drowned out by the clang of steel, a puff of smoke, and the hiss of steam. The great iron horse went galloping by, and before long there was no need for the freighters.

What now? Gold. Great-granddad felt the lure, so he took his wife and now three sons and headed for the Colorado goldfield. They arrived in Boulder, Colorado and there decided to make their home.

It was in Boulder that Milt, my granddad, grew up and learned the masonry trade. On September 16, 1903, Milton Riley Githens and Geraldine Gloria Sledd were united in marriage at Denver, Colorado.

They made their home in Boulder, Colorado to start with, and it was there on December 10, 1904 that my dad, William (Bill) Edward Githens, was born.

My grandparents continued to live in Boulder until after my uncle, Milton (Roy) Githens, was born in January 1907. Early in 1907, Granddad moved his family to Denver and remained in that area until 1913. Granddad heard that there was need for masons to work in construction of refineries in a little boom town in Wyoming.

Sometime in 1913, Granddad moved his wife and two sons to Casper, Wyoming. During this time period, he also layed brick on the Hotel LaBonte in Douglas, Wyoming. While working in Douglas, Wyoming, Granddad met Mark Gitthens. Mark got Granddad to file on 160 acres a few miles north of Douglas. Part of the land is now owned by the airport.

Early in 1914, Granddad started moving his family onto the 160 acres he had filed on. Bill (my dad) and Roy, who due to his red hair had obtained the nickname of Red, went to the old North Grade School in Douglas. Milt and Geraldine Githens also added two girls to their household, Geraldine (Lorraine) Githens born in January of 1919, and Lela May Githens born June of 1921. Both my aunts also went to the North Grade School in Douglas for their grade school education.

Living in a ranch community and having a love for horses, I guess it was only natural that Dad would want to be a cowboy. One day the school room could no longer hold his attention, so dad quit school and sought ranch work. Dad was a good story teller, and as youngsters, my brother and I enjoyed hearing tales of his life and work on the CY and George Cross ranches.

Granddad was contracting brick work and Dad worked for him some, mixing mortar and carrying hod. A couple of the brick contracts Granddad had in Douglas were the Masonic Temple and the National Guard Armory. My uncle, Roy (Red) Githens, has the handwritten contract Granddad had on the Armory Building.

Three of Granddad's brothers had also moved to Wyoming from Colorado. They all filed on homesteads in the Dry Creek community north of Douglas about 1922. Dad and Red also filed on homestead land in this area when they were old enough.

It was here that William (Bill) E. Githens took Velma Viola Fisher to live after they became husband and wife on June 17, 1927. I also took up residency here after my birth, May 12, 1928. My brother, James Richard (Dick) Githens, also came to live with us after his birth, June 18, 1930.

I stayed with my grandparents and went to North Grade School in Douglas my first year of school. Other than that, my brother and I took all our grade school and some high school at Dry Creek, now known as Bill.

There were years of depression and also drought, so times were pretty tough. All Dad's uncles had proved up on their homesteads, sold them and moved back to Colorado. This wasn't unusual, almost all the homesteaders moved on to other parts once they had proved up on their land. Most sold their land back to the U.S. Government, but a few to individuals.

My dad, with his brother and father, formed a partnership and started trying to put together a little ranch in the Dry Creek community.

Granddad didn't stay in the partnership very long. I don't remember what year it was, but Granddad decided to move back to Boulder, Colorado. He bought a little farm north of Boulder, that was later sub-divided into a housing area. Grandmother, and the girls, Lorraine and Lela, left Douglas with my Granddad.

The girls completed their education in Colorado and were married there, but have lived in Wyoming most of their married life.

Lorraine married Charles Raynor and they made their home in the Lander, Wyoming area, where they raised their three children. Lela with her husband, William (Bill) Adams and also three children lived in the Big Horn Basin of Wyoming, with Worland, Wyoming becoming their home town.

Dad and Red continued to work their ranch, but times were tough. Government programs provided some work. Dad and Red both worked with horse crews, building dams and reservoirs on homestead land the government now owned in the northern part of Converse County.

Due to the drought, Dad and Red shipped most of the cattle to pastures in Colorado. Red went to Colorado to look after the stock there. Dad and Mother stayed with the place at Dry Creek, stacking tumbleweeds to feed the cattle they kept there.

While in Colorado, Red met a lady, Agnes Preston, and they were married at Glenrock, Wyoming, October 6, 1938.

Dad and Red continued to ranch at Dry Creek until 1944-45. Dad sold his interest to Red and went into dirt work construction full-time. In 1947, Dad bought into a partnership called Hinkle and Githens, Worland, Wyoming. Dad managed this company, which specialized in land leveling, until shortly before his death in February 1965.

My parents were living in Greybull, Wyoming at the time of Dad's death. Mother continued to reside there until September 1, 1972. She moved to Buffalo, Wyoming where at this writing, she continues to reside. She is active with her home, gardening, making quilts, and is very active in her church.

In 1945-46, Red sold out at Dry Creek and bought a ranch at Laramie, Wyoming. Red's nickname didn't follow him to Laramie, so they knew him as Roy Githens there. Roy and Agnes ranched in the Laramie area until the spring of 1971, when they sold out and retired in southern Arizona.

My brother, Dick Githens and Dorothy Seeber of Chappel, Nebraska, were married August 1950. They have lived in California for a good many years, where they raised their two children, Gayle Richard Githens and Genelle Githens Bloom.

Myself, I married Margaret Miles from the Texas panhandle town, Hereford, Texas. We were married in February 1948. We have lived in Sheridan, Wyoming since August of 1964. Our three children finished school here. They are David E. Githens, Synthia Githens Cooley, and Linda Githens Cecil.

Wm. (Bill) E. Githens, Jr.

Gladson, Elmer and Verna

Elmer Gladson was born at Shelby, Iowa on September 9, 1884, the son of William Preston Gladson and Elsie Ready Gladson, who carried on a farm and ranch operation a few miles from Shelby, Iowa. Elmer was the eldest in a family of ten children.

Elmer was four years old when his parents left Iowa in 1888 and traveled by team and covered wagon to Custer County, Nebraska. In 1892, William, Elsie, and children returned to Shelby Iowa, making the journey again by team and covered wagon. Due to several dry, hot summers, farming did not prove profitable, so William with his wife and children once again packed their belongings in the covered wagon and moved back near Milburn in Custer County, Nebraska in 1898.

Elmer finished his schooling at the Sand Ridge Country School near Milburn, Nebraska. He helped his father on their ranch and farm, and worked out when not needed at home.

Elmer was married to Verna Robertson in 1912. Her father had taken up a homestead claim on land near New Helena, Nebraska. He and his wife established residence on his homestead. Verna grew to womanhood on her father's place.

Soon after Elmer and Verna were married they traveled by team and covered wagon to Rosemont Colorado, where Elmer had a job. Their son, Forest, was born at Rosemont on July 29, 1913.

In 1915 Elmer, Verna and child traveled by team and covered wagon back to Nebraska.

Their second child, Lucille, was born at Merna, Nebraska on January 10, 1916.

Two years later Elmer, Verna and their two small children once again left Nebraska and traveled by team and covered wagon to Lusk, Wyoming in 1918. Verna had a sister living at Lusk.

Soon after reaching Lusk, Elmer and his family moved on to Douglas, Wyoming. Ruth, their youngest daughter was born at Douglas.

Elmer homesteaded on land fifty-five miles north of Douglas in the Verse community in 1920.

Jobs were scarce in Wyoming, so for several years after Elmer had established residence on his claim, he would return to Milburn, Nebraska in late fall, and hire out to pick corn during the corn picking season for the much needed extra money.

It was in the mid 20's when an acquaintance of Elmer's, known as Shorty Trusty started a coal mining operation on Antelope Creek, where there was a high creek bank and named it the Antelope Mine. A thirty foot vein of coal showed below the ground vein of soil. Settlers living near there used picks to knock the coal off into their wagon for their own use. Elmer freighted coal to Douglas, Shawnee, Lost Springs, Manville and Lusk with team and wagon and sold it. He would bring back groceries and other supplies for William Boehler, who owned and operated the Verse store and post office.

Coal was in great demand at that time. Many people had coal burning stoves and coal was used in furnaces for heating their homes during the winter months. A number of people living in Douglas used coal in their furnaces for heating, still in the 30's. Coal at that time was selling for $1.50 to $2.00 a ton.

Elmer got his homestead patented on December 14, 1925 on Section 26, Township 41, Range 72. In 1928 Elmer and Verna Gladson sold their 640 acres of land to Florence B. Kane of Campbell County for three thousand dollars.

In 1931, J.B. Morsch obtained a state land lease right on one hundred twenty acres which included the Antelope coal mine. Elmer and Shorty had no lease so could no longer mine coal there. They started another coal mine about three fourths of a mile down stream on Antelope Creek, and named it the East Antelope Coal Mine. Soon after they had the mine in operation, Shorty sold his share in the mine to Felix Niemcyk. For several years Elmer and Felix kept the mine in operation.

In 1933 Elmer decided to get out of the mining business. He sold his share to Felix, the mine then became known as the Niemcyk Coal Mine.

Elmer went to work for the government, using a four horse team and fresno building reservoirs and ditches on government land.

In 1937 Elmer, Verna and daughter Ruth, moved to Sandpoint, Idaho to be near their other daughter Lucille Phillips and family.

Elmer died January 8, 1957. Verna continued making her home in Sandpoint until she passed away on April 10, 1963. They both rest in the Pinecrest Cemetery at Sandpoint. Lucille passed away suddenly July 7, 1968 of an apparent heart attack. She rests in the Pinecrest Cemetery beside her husband at Sandpoint Idaho.

Forest Gladson died February 11, 1971 of a heart attack in Denver. He is buried in the cemetery at Gillette, Wyoming. Ruth (Gladson), their daughter, lives at Spokane, Washington.

Goldsby, Bruce and Elsie

Bruce Goldsby was born on January 22, 1896 near Pendleton, Oregon, the son of George and Louise Ellen Nail Goldsby. At the age of nine he and his family moved to Kansas.

In 1918 Bruce came to Converse County and homesteaded northwest of Douglas in the Hyland community.

He married Elsie O'Brien Powell, young widow of Warren Powell, on April 13, 1929 in Casper.

Elsie was born in September 1893, the daughter of John and Margaret Devoe O'Brien. Her mother died in 1895 while giving birth to a girl. Elsie was raised by her grandparents, Captain and Mrs. John D. O'Brien, in their home on LaPrele Creek.

One of Elsie's fondest memories is being presented a bouquet by Mrs. Al Heaton for an outstanding performance in one of the school programs at the Douglas Opera

Elsie O'Brien Goldsby

House on North Third Street.

Elsie attended school at the Pleasant Valley School on LaPrele Creek until she was 13 years old. At that time she went to work to help her grandparents. One of her first jobs was doing housework and caring for children at the Wilkie Collins home in Douglas.

In 1913 Elsie married Warren Powell, the son of William "Billie" and Alice Sherwin Powell. Warren and Elsie homesteaded northwest of Douglas in the Hyland community.

They became the parents of two daughters, Margaret and Blanche. Margaret married "Red" Morris. Blanche married Don Brannan. A son, Billie, died at the age of three from croup.

Elsie tells of the many times that she would take Margaret with her while riding a horse. Margaret was placed on a pillow in front of Elsie on the saddle.

After their marriage, Bruce and Elsie lived on his homestead raising bum lambs and growing a big garden. Bruce found work operating a caterpillar tractor for their neighbors, the Mannings.

In 1941 they purchased a place east of Bill, Wyoming. They lived there for 20 years raising livestock. In 1961 they moved to a small place south of Douglas which they purchased from Dee Harkins. Bruce rode ditch for the LaPrele Ditch Co. and sold cars for Messick and Rogers. Later they moved to Douglas at 320 South Third Street.

Bruce passed away October 10, 1985 in Casper.

Gonsalves - Phillips Family

Verissimo Gonsalves was born October 1, 1865 on a small island off the coast of Portugal called Tresada. His brother, Izadorio, was born on April 4, 1867. They were part of a family of eight, four boys and four girls, born to Joseph and Louisa Cortez Gonsalves. The Gonsalves were devout Catholics and named their sons after the saint whose day it was on the day they were born. The family was pretty well off when they lived on Tresada but they decided to go to Brazil. On the way to Brazil they were shipwrecked and lost all their belongings. They were rescued and taken to Fayal, one of the Azore Islands.

When Verissimo was a small child he caught a severe cold which settled in his eyes. It caused the loss of all sight in his left eye. Despite his handicap he grew into a big man, towering over his smaller brother, Izadorio. When the boys were old enough they went to work on a dock that was being built on the island. There they saw the ships and heard about America.

In order to avoid being drafted into the Portuguese Army they stowed away on a ship going to America. This was easy to do, the captain just looked the other way. It was a cheap way to get good labor. They had to work for their board, no pay. Verissimo worked in the kitchen on the ship. There were a lot of animals on the ship because they had to keep their food alive until they were ready to eat it.

At the time Verissimo and Izadorio came to America, emigrants had to have a relative living in the U.S. whom they could stay with. Verissimo and Izadorio had an uncle living in Chugwater, Wyoming. Their uncle's name was John Phillips, better known as Portuguese Phillips, the man who made the dangerous ride from Fort Phil Kearney to Fort Laramie which saved the fort but killed the colonel's favorite horse. Later he moved to Chugwater and ran the stage station there.

Verissimo and Izadorio arrived at Chugwater in March of 1883. It was a very cold reception from the tropical climate of the island to the Wyoming plains in winter. Neither brother could speak any English when they arrived. The ranch hands played pranks on them. They told them their wrist was their ankle and their ankle their wrist then laughed when they made mistakes. They helped their uncle at the stage station. Both boys learned to read and write English despite the obstacles.

John Phillips died in November of 1883, the same year they arrived. Soon after he died they had some trouble with the old man who managed the stage station. He was picking on Izadorio so Verissimo grabbed him by his goattee and knocked most of his teeth out. The tooth that didn't get knocked out had to be pulled out. After that, Verissimo and Izadorio felt they should leave Chugwater. They worked on the Union Pacific Railroad and also as civilians at Fort Laramie.

Then they heard about Casper which was not a town then but a freighting station. They decided to leave Fort Laramie and go to Casper, but they only had one horse. They couldn't both ride the horse and neither wanted to walk so they compromised. One brother rode the horse for several telegraph poles, tied the horse to a pole and started walking. The other brother walked to the horse, rode it several poles, tied it and started walking. And that is how they got from Fort Laramie to Casper.

They arrived in Casper in 1886. Izadorio decided to go by I.G. Phillips (I.G. stands for Izadorio Gonsalves). Everybody called Verissimo, Vic. Both brothers filed for homesteads. Vic homesteaded on the Big Muddy. He raised a small herd of cattle and cut mine props for the coal mines on Casper Mountain and Muddy Mountain. I.G. homesteaded east of Deer Creek at the base of the mountains. They helped each other build identical log houses. There were two small bedrooms in the back and one large room in front which was their kitchen, living room and dining room.

I.G. was married twice. Evelyn, his first wife, died in 1927. Bertha, his second wife, lived with him at the homestead until his death in 1937. There were no children from either marriage.

Vic met Flora when she was working as a cook at the Grand Central Hotel. It was the fanciest hotel in Casper at the time. They were married on January 26, 1901. They rode into Casper on a load of hay when they went to get married. Flora had three children from previous marriages. Together Vic and Flora had three children; Isadore, born May 24, 1902, Mabel, born May 25, 1904, Louisa, born January 21, 1906.

They were living on the Big Muddy when the children were born. Most women had their babies at home with the help of a midwife. However, the spring before Mabel was born there was a lot of rain and all the bridges washed out. The midwife couldn't get to the Gonsalves' homestead. When Mabel's time came there was no one to help Flora (Vic was on the mountain cutting mine props) so she had the baby by herself, got up and bathed her off. A couple of days later Vic came down and Flora told him to take his men and go back to work because she didn't need him.

A favorite pastime of the small Gonsalves children when they were living on the Big Muddy was playing with the sulfur matches. They would crawl under the table and rub the sulfur on their hands so they could watch it glow in the dark.

Vic and Flora sold their place on the Big Muddy. On May 20, 1909 they and their children moved to a new place in the mountains where Willow Creek meets Boxelder Creek. The next day they put in a patch of potatoes. On June 9 of the same year there was a flood. The water came up around the house and they had to evacuate. Vic had to carry the kids to the buggy. They went to the school house because they didn't know any of their neighbors yet since they had just moved in. Flora worried all night that they would not have a house left in the morning but the house was still there. They soon moved the house to higher ground. The potato patch, however, did not survive the flood and they found potatoes along the creek banks all summer. Another job that summer was picking all the rocks out of the field that the flood had left.

They raised and sold hay on the new place. Vic was an excellent irrigator and he used water from the creek nearby. The children had to walk about a mile over a big hill to get to the small school house. They went to the same school all the years they went to school. Their teacher usually boarded with them so they really got to know the teacher. Mabel and Louisa were the only girls in the school except for summer school. During the summer people who worked in the coal mines during the winter would come to live on homesteads, prove them up, and sell them to neighbors for pasture land. These places are usually named after the families that homesteaded them. This would mean more kids for summer school. The kids from town would make fun of the Gonsalves children because they had never been to town.

Two summers after they moved to the mountains, May, one of Flora's girls from a previous marriage, got scarlet fever even though she hadn't been to town or in contact with anyone who had it. May and Flora were quarantined in the house and everyone else had to stay in a tent. The doctor came periodically to check on her and she got better but the only way he could find that May could have caught the fever is through Montgomery Wards. She ordered some clothes from Montgomery Wards which must have been packed by someone who unknowingly had scarlet fever.

Vic and I.G. were the only Portuguese around which worked to their advantage sometimes. When they first got telephones around the area some people liked to listen in on other people's conversations, but when Vic and I.G. talked people could listen but it wouldn't do them any good because they talked in Portuguese.

Vic developed cataracts on his good right eye and he became totally blind. He and Flora lived on the same place until they died. Flora died April 17, 1942 and Verissimo died May 3, 1942, exactly two weeks after his wife.

Mabel married Ralph Hiser while Louisa married Joe Alley.

Good, Bert and Ela Family

James Albert Good, the son of William Allen and Irene Matilda Dundas Good, was born December 9, 1879, at Glenrock, Nebraska, the sixth of nine children.

When in his late twenties, Bert (as his friends called him) went to Ewing, Nebraska, to help his brother Alva get his family settled into their new home. One day he was there alone when a horse and buggy came into the yard and a beautiful young lady, who introduced herself as the new school teacher, asked if she might board there with him. With a twinkle in his eye he told her that he didn't mind but it would be proper if she asked his brother since it was his home. She did ask and she did board there.

Ela Rosalind Mann, the beautiful young school teacher, was the daughter of Augustus Caesar Dodge and Ida Alice Bruno Mann, born at Central City, Nebraska, on Bert Good homestead.

June 6, 1883. Ela was the first born of twin girls, making her the second of five children. The twins had been born when their mother was at home alone with their four-year-old son, Joy. When their father returned home, he was surprised to find his wife had given birth to twin girls, Ela Rosalind and Etta Vivian. Both girls grew up to become school teachers.

Ela paid the smart young fellow no mind at first because she already had her eye on a certain young man. Before the school term was finished, Bert was not only interested, but interesting!!!

On September 4, 1907, Bert and Ela were married at the home of the local Justice of the Peace, Alva Good. Later on they had a real church ceremony in the Christian Church in Palmer, Nebraska. The happy couple worked on ranches in the area for the next several years. One night, Bert was detained in town and being a jokester at heart, decided to pretend that he was intoxicated. He came into the house dragging the harness. Ela met him at the door, totally disgusted, and told him that he did indeed have the right idea. "Leave the harness right here and you go sleep in the barn!" He sobered up instantly!

August 30, 1908 made the Goods a real family, with the birth of little Ida Agnes. She was a perfect baby in every way.

October 10, 1910 was the day that Frances Irene joined the family, she finally received her name when she was about three months old.

On Christmas day 1911, little Ida Agnes lost her bout with pneumonia. She was laid to rest in Chambers, Nebraska.

One year later on Christmas day, Maurice Albert was born. It seemed to Bert and Ela to be a sign to return to happiness.

Ela June was born June 29, 1915, and Rua Vee completed the family on April 23, 1919.

When Rua was about six months old Bert and Ela decided to move their family of four to Wyoming. They bought a Ford car and crammed Frances, Maurice, June and baby Rua and themselves into the car and headed out. Ela later commented that "we felt pretty high up in that car, but it was a pretty tight fit."

They spent two years in Douglas and in the spring of 1921, after a bout with scarlet fever and whooping cough, they were feeling pretty weak but mighty happy to be headed at last to their new home. They moved into an old homestead shack and lived there until they could renovate the old Douglas Ice House that they hauled out from Douglas on a truck.

"I was glad to be out on the ranch, where the kids could get out and run around. Snakes came right up on the doorstep. I was trapped in the cellar one time, with a snake between me and the door, a rattlesnake, and nothing to kill it with!" commented Ela years later. Ela also held a certain fear of the range cattle around the children. At night she would warn them not to get too far from the house for fear the cattle could see them. "No telling what they might do to you."

Bert and Ela brought some of, if not the first, black cattle into the Dull Center Community. They went to Antioch, Nebraska and purchased a Black Aberdeen Angus bull to up-grade their range cattle. This venture caused a bit of contention at the time, however the Angus cattle are rather popular in that area at the time of this writing.

Bert's brother Will and nephew, Wayne came from Nebraska and got work on the Fiddleback Ranch. Later his brothers Evett and Harold and twin sister, Hattie came out to help Bert on his ranch and also took homesteads of their own. Ela's brothers Joy and Seymour came out also. Wayne relinquished his homestead to Seymour and Joy also got a relinquish homestead.

How those homesteads could support so many is a wonder at all.

They had to haul water from the Cheyenne River until Bert could drill a well. He started drilling wells to supplement their income. Many were the tales that came from those experiences. Ela later commented about Bert's well drilling, "He drilled wells all over the country. He drilled a lot of wells. Boy, boy, boy, he was gone all the time. One time he drilled a well and then the people had no money to pay him with, so he came home with a crate of four or five chickens and a bottle of hooch!"

One well that he had just completed was near Bonneville, Wyoming and Bert was eager to get home. The ride to the train depot was extended, due to a flat tire, and he missed the train. That train wrecked later that night in the famous Cole Creek Train Wreck. My, how thankful the family was for that flat tire.

In 1924, Bert and Ela helped to organize the Dull Center Sunday School, which they named Bethany. Ela was either teacher or superintendent or both for the next 20 years. Sunday afternoons were often filled with picnics and/or a ballgame.

During and shortly after the depression of the thirties the Goods and the entire community would get together on Saturday night once a month and "make their own pleasures" in the form of a Literary Society. Every member was to have some kind of entertainment for each monthly meeting. It could be a reading, a skit, or they could speak a piece, or sing, . . . anything. Then they enjoyed lunch afterward. One evening a debate was planned. "Which is the Most Useful, a Broom or a Dishrag?" Ela took the side of the broom and Molly Dull took the side of the dishrag. The debate went on for some time and was finally called a draw. That evening when the Dulls were ready to go home, Walter did not come when called. Molly promptly picked up the broom and went after her son. After much laughter, The Broom was declared the winner of the debate!

All the girls were married now and each one had a family, Maurice had gone to the navy after Pearl Harbor was bombed, and once again it was two against the wilderness. The decision was made that town was the place to live when all was considered, especially the 65 mile ride to town.

Only four years after the move to town Bert passed away on January 3, 1950. Bert's philosophy for life is best illustrated by this true life incident. Hail was in the process of ruining the best grain crop ever for the Goods since being in Wyoming. Bert turned from the window where he had been watching the storm and went to lay on the floor until it was over. Then with a smile he got up and said, "Best thing to do at a time like this is to get some of that stuff and make ice cream!"

After Bert's passing Ela supported herself by boarding high school and air force boys. Later she took the job of hostess for the Shoppers Lounge in Douglas, Wyoming, where she worked for 30 years. She retired shortly after her 101st birthday and now lives by herself in Douglas.

In the last seven years Ela has experienced a broken leg and several surgeries but has not lost her dedication to life and work.

Frances married Lee Clement Wells on August 23, 1937. They now live in Gillette, Wyoming. They have two girls.

Maurice married Betty Janice Dickau on May 29, 1947. Maurice managed the Converse County Airport, R. and G. Aircraft, and lived in Douglas. They have three boys and one girl. Maurice died on Sept. 4, 1985.

June married August Henry Riehle on May 3, 1935. They own and operate a ranch 47 miles north and east of Douglas. They have one boy and one girl.

Rua married Ed Irvine Whiting and after his death in 1952 she married Robert Edward Kirk in 1954. They own and operate the Highway 59 Self-Service near Douglas. They have two girls and three boys.

Ela has 13 grandchildren, 26 great grandchildren and two great, great grandchildren. Her life has been lived around her favorite Bible verse, Psalm 118:24, "This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it."

Goodwin, George and Emma

George F. Goodwin was born on January 1, 1847 in Chicago, Illinois, the son of J. P. and N. B. Reynolds Goodwin.

Mr. Goodwin came to Wyoming in 1883 settling on LaBonte Creek, one mile south of the confluence of West Fork LaBonte and LaBonte Creek. His water rights were granted in 1887.

He married Emma Barnes Marsh, a widow with two children, Clarence and Dell Marsh, in 1891 in Kansas City, Kansas. Emma was born in Oshkosh, Wisconsin on May 26, 1844, the daughter of Hiram Barnes.

Moving his family to Wyoming in 1891, he lived on LaBonte Creek until 1899 when he moved to Douglas. During the time he lived on the ranch he was also in a partnership with O. P. Witt and George H. Cross, Sr. running sheep in the Wagonhound Creek area. They sold their property to the Sims brothers.

After moving to Douglas he built a two-story rooming house on South Second Street. It was known as the Goodwin Rooms for years.

George died on December 30, 1918; Emma on January 26, 1929.

Gordon, Dave Jr., and Edith Mae

A native of Ballymena, Ireland, being born there March 4, 1877 to Dave and Isabella Gordon. (Isabella died in Ireland.) Dave Jr., along with his father, one brother, four sisters, and a nurse came to Wyoming in 1882. They settled on Horseshoe Creek on the Bob Walker and "Skew" Johnson place. Dave Sr. married the children's nurse, Mary Ferguson, shortly after arriving in Wyoming.

In 1892, when Dave Jr. was fifteen years of age, he went to the mountains near Laramie Peak to live and work. He first homesteaded on Trail Creek (where Justin Werner has his mountain headquarters). After selling his homestead to James Carragher, he purchased the Giles Strangeways place on Muddy Creek on July 3, 1907. Soon after, in September 1908, he sold this to Archie Hamner.

Shortly after his father's death, Dave purchased the ranch on Horseshoe Creek from his father's estate.

Edith Mae Mitchell became Dave's bride in February 1911. Miss Mitchell had been teaching at the school where the children of his sister, Sarah Shepard went. They made their home on the Horseshoe Ranch.

Dave and Edith had one son, Donald. Edith died in 1935 and Dave Jr. in 1958.

Gorsuch, Frank and Phoebe

Frank was born on Jan. 9, 1876 at Bloomington, Kansas. He worked in coal mines in Kansas and Missouri before coming to Douglas, Wyoming in 1919. Frank homesteaded 47 miles north of Douglas, and seven miles north of Bill, Wyoming, which was Dry Creek in those days. The Bill Post Office was approximately four miles east of Frank's homestead.

Frank built a one-room log house. In August of 1922 he went to Osborne, Kansas for his mother's funeral. Frank met Phoebe Elda Powers and was married. Frank and his wife returned to Douglas and enjoyed the State Fair, before going out to the homestead. One of Frank's neighbors took them home with a team and wagon.

Frank then built on two more rooms to the house made of rock. He built a rock chicken house, a rock smoke house and a rock cellar to store vegetables in.

Frank owned 36 cows, four work horses and one saddle horse. Water was from a dug well with a hand pump on it. That was a daily job to pump water for the livestock. In wet years, a small creek had holes which held water.

Feed for the livestock was grown—oats, corn, cane. In dry years when there was no rain, crops wouldn't grow and thistle took over. They were cut and stacked with salt for feed.

Frank added a windmill and barn in about 1930. The barn was made of logs hauled from the Black Hills with team and wagon. Then he would chink the cracks with fresh cow manure.

On September 26, 1923, Frank and Phoebe had a daughter, Mary Susan. Phoebe stayed at Dr. Lynch's place which was about two miles north of the Dry Creek Post Office.

On June 24, 1926, a son was born, Lee Francis. Phoebe and daughter, Mary, stayed at the Lon Waltons homestead then.

On July 18, 1928, another daughter was born, Marjorie Marie. This time Pauline Riehle stayed with the Gorsuch family.

Mary went to the first two grades of school at Verse, Wyoming, approximately fifteen miles north of Dry Creek. Then there was a school house built close to the Bill Post Office, where there was about 30 children from first to eight grades.

In good weather the children would walk to school, but on stormy days, Frank Gorsuch and Ernie Steinle would take turns taking their children to school by team and wagon or team and sled.

Mary stayed with the Jim Stevens those first two years of school.

Roy Lynch ran the Dry Creek Store and Post Office Tom Hamlin ran the Bill Post Office.

People from different homesteads would get together to make soap from cracklins and lye.

Trips to Douglas were three or four times a year. It was a day trip with a team and wagon. At those times Frank would take eggs and cream to town to trade for flour, sugar and salt.

Baby chickens and turkeys were hatched in a kerosene incubator or under a setting hen.

In the early 1930's a road was built from Douglas to Dry Creek. Frank worked on this project with four head of horses and fresno.

In the early 1930's Frank and Phoebe got their first car, a Model T Ford. Then Frank built a rock garage.

The toys for the Gorsuch children were all home-made, out of old clocks, driftwood and tin. Frank made airplanes and tractors. The old clocks were stripped down and the main spring used for the power unit, and wooden wheels of spools were generally used. Frank made doll cribs, table and chairs out of orange and apple box wood.

Frank traded turkey eggs for a toy cook stove, 18 inches by 2 feet. It was made of good cast iron. There was a water reservoir and a warming oven in it. That was really great, because you could cook on it. It burnt wood. The Gorsuch children enjoyed a sled purchased in 1935. The sled is being put in the museum at Douglas.

On Sundays, the families would fry up chicken for picnic lunches and all gather along Dry Creek, just south of the store for a fishing spree. Bullheads were the fish. On one Sunday there were 32 families fishing in the holes along the creek.

John Downs was the game warden and he came up the creek and caught all thirty-two families without licenses. They were all fined $50.00, but suspended, except two who sassed the judge.

In 1938, Frank's health got bad, times were bad. Frank sold the homestead back to the government and moved to Douglas.

At this time, he traded for a 1933 Ford car. A former sheriff's car, it had seven corks in the door to plug bullet holes. William R. Silvers was the sheriff.

Sheriff Silvers owned a small place three miles south of Douglas, where Frank moved. He lived there for three years, until Silvers left the sheriff's office.

Frank bought a small house in Douglas. He gathered railroad ties and saved them up for fire wood, which he sold for $7.00 a cord. Frank and his son, Lee, would saw the wood with a two-man cross-cut saw.

Frank would gather old clothes and cut them into strips. These strips were run through a rug loom. He would sell the rugs for a few dollars.

On December 10, 1950, Frank passed away at Douglas Memorial Hospital, which was located west of Douglas, where the Prisoner of War Camp was located during World War II.

Grant, Ulysses and Gertrude Family

Ulysses S. "Uly" Grant was born in Vermont on February 16, 1864 to Daniel Seaver Grant and Frances Sophia Adams Grant. Daniel, born in Steven Town, New York, was related to the 18th President of the United States. Frances was born in Vermont, and was related to President John Adams, and John Quincy Adams.

The family moved to Wisconsin when Ulysses was 6 weeks old. Later they moved to Illinois, and in 1872, they moved back into Iowa. They came by covered wagon to Green County, where they settled on a claim of 160 acres near Rhodes.

Uly was the third son in a family of nine boys and one girl. At the time the Grants settled in Iowa, Fred was 16, Will, 14, and Uly was 11 years of age. As soon as the sons were old enough to earn their keep, they left home to seek employment.

Fred and Will made their way to Virginia Dale, Colorado to work in the railroad yards. In the spring of 1887, Uly left Iowa and went to join them. He had been advised to find a higher drier climate in which to live. His health was poor.

The three brothers decided to go into the Wyoming Territory to homestead. They traveled to Tie Siding from Virginia Dale by train. There they bought a team and wagon and what supplies they could afford. The trio went first to the Bates Hole country, but it was not appealing to them, so they proceeded across the Laramie Basin, and then northeastward into the Boxelder Creek area. It was here that they found land to their liking.

The young men took up homestead claims, side by side. Will's was to the north, Fred's was in the middle, and that of Uly's was to the south.

Uly's improvements consisted of a small one-room log cabin, a log stable and a corral. Natural springs provided him with water for his home.

Since the range was open, numbers of cattle and sheep roamed in the mountains, straying from the lowlands to the north. There were few other people in the immediate vicinity at that time. Mart Smith had a homestead north of Will's location, and Buck Pratt was situated to the south of Uly's homestead.

In addition to doing the work on his claim, Uly found employment on the Laramie Plains. He worked for a homesteader by the name of Failes the first summer. It was imperative that the brothers find means of earning some income. They arranged a trade with Mart Smith in the summer of 1888. In return for hay which they would cut from their meadows, Smith would give them cattle. He had brought heifers, predominantly Hereford, in from Iowa. Thus, the brothers got their start in the cattle business.

In the years which followed, they broke the cows to milk, made butter from the cream, and used it to trade for food and supplies. The butter was molded into one pound blocks and placed in a large tank of salt brine in the spring house. When they had accumulated enough for a pack horse load, Fred would ride into Medicine Bow, some 65 miles distant, to trade the butter. In addition to this means of income, the brothers killed and butchered elk, antelope and deer. They had a ready market for the meat at the red rock quarry located at the foot of Clayton Hill. The larger deer and elk heads and antlers were also in demand. The meat brought 15¢ per pound, but a trophy head might bring as much as $50.00.

As the brothers accumulated the necessary machinery and horses required for farming, they planted oats, and sold the surplus grain.

Will proved up on his homestead in 1891, but became disgusted with the country and went to work for a time at the rock quarry. He leased his land and the horses which he had acquired to Uly. Later he sold Uly his claim.

In 1889, Fred brought his bride, Josie to Wyoming from Iowa. Their daughter was born in 1890. In 1891, Fred became seriously ill; Uly and Josie applied hot cloths and mustard to his abdomen. On Saturday morning, Uly saddled a horse and raced down to Glenrock to get a doctor. The doctor refused to come, so Uly returned home. Fred's condition had become worse. In desperation, Uly saddled a fresh horse, and rode to Douglas to find a doctor. This doctor agreed to come, but was too late to save Fred's life. Fred died in agony on the following Friday of a ruptured appendix. Uly had ridden 130 miles making the two trips, and had gone without much sleep for the entire six days of Fred's illness. It was decided that the body must be shipped back to Iowa for burial. That presented another problem. There was no casket in Glenrock, so one had to be shipped in from Omaha. Josie, her baby daughter, and Uly accompanied the body. By the time they arrived in Iowa, Uly was on the verge of collapse.

After the funeral, Uly and Josie remained in Iowa for about three weeks to rest and visit. They returned to Wyoming, but after spending the summer there, Josie decided to go back to Iowa to live. She sold Fred's homestead and stock to Uly.

Several years later, Uly hired his younger brother, Charles, to work for him. Charles took a homestead claim, bought some cattle, and worked for Uly for seven years. Subsequently, he bought the Ed Smith place, and operated on his own.

In 1900, Uly returned once more to Iowa to marry his childhood sweetheart, Gertrude May Chamberlin. The ceremony took place in Des Moines. Gertie was born in 1881, a native of Iowa. She was the daughter of August Eliab Chamberlin and Mary Emogene Russell Chamberlin who were neighbors of Uly's parents. He brought his bride to live in a 16' x 30' log house, which he had built some distance north of his original cabin. After the birth of their fourth child, Zelma, Uly doubled the size of his dwelling.

In 1906, Daniel, Uly's father, decided to sell his Iowa farm. Uly bought the farm with the intention of moving his family back to Iowa to educate them. The move was not made, however, and Uly leased the farm to his brother Merrill. Some years later, he disposed of the property.

About 10 years later, Uly bought the Noah Young place near Glenrock. His intention, once more, was to offer his children a better education. The schools in the rural community of Boxelder were in session for only six months, and often were held in summer due to the severe winter weather. The school house was located about two miles from the Grant home, thus the children either walked the distance or rode horseback.

To help finance the move to Glenrock, Uly started a dairy on the Young property. The children delivered milk on foot to the townspeople. While the family lived in Glenrock, Uly spent most of his time on the mountain ranch. After four years, the family moved back to Boxelder. The dairy was rented to John Fenex. Evidently circumstances were such that Uly was obliged to change his mind about his family's education. After Fenex quit the dairy business, Uly rented it to his only sister, Gertrude, and her husband, Gus Herzog. During their school years, some of the members of the Grant family boarded with the Herzogs.

Twelve children were born to Uly and Gertie — five boys and seven girls — of which nine lived to maturity. Uly delivered, or helped deliver all of his children except the second daughter, Helen, who was born while her mother was visiting in Iowa.

Emogene May was born at the Snowshoe Ranch in 1901. She married Wes Henderson, and is the mother of five children. She was widowed in 1983, and makes her home now in Denver, Colorado.

Helen Arvilla was born in Baxter, Iowa in 1905. She married Roy Smith and was widowed in 1953. She is the mother of four children, one of which died in infancy, and one after reaching maturity. She lives on Deer Creek.

Jess Nelson was born in 1906 at the Snowshoe. He was married to Elizabeth Naggadai, and is the father of three children. Jess died in 1971.

Zelma Isabel was born in 1908 at the Snowshoe. She married Robert Hiser, and to them were born three children. One son died after reaching maturity. Bob died on April 14, 1982. Zelma made her home on an acreage west of Douglas, Wyoming. Zelma died on August 15, 1985.

John Mason was born in 1910 at Snowshoe, was married to Lydia Matthews and is the father of five children. One son drowned at the age of two. John died in 1974.

Elmer Lester, born in 1916, at the Snowshoe Ranch, was married to Helen Oberg in 1965. Helen died in 1979, after which Elmer married Ruth E. Mitchell.

Allen Ulysses was born in 1919 in Glenrock, Wyoming. Allen was married to Ann Robbins, and was the father of two sons and one step-son. Allen died in 1977.

Amy Frances was born in Glenrock in 1922. She married Oscar Hansen and is the mother of five children. She makes her home with Oscar in Montana.

Bessie Gertrude was born in 1923 at the Snowshoe. She is the surviving member of a set of twin girls. She is married to Edward Hiser and is the mother of 16 living children.

After the birth of her fourth son in 1919, Gertie's health began to fail. She developed a dropsical condition. During the next four years, Gertie lost a baby girl in infancy as well as one of a set of twin girls. Two months after the birth of the twins, Gertie died, leaving four children, aged 2 months up to 7 years. Uly and his older sons and daughters cared for the younger children. A large part of the responsibility rested upon the shoulders of Helen and Zelma, aged 19 and 16, respectively. Helen married when she was 20, but continued to help with the youngsters, particularly, Bessie, the surviving twin girl. Bessie had been very frail since her birth, and at times, it was thought that she would surely die. Her sisters carried her about on a pillow since she was so tiny and fragile.

Roy Smith, Helen's husband, worked for Uly. He had homesteaded about 20 miles from the Grant place. Helen divided her time between the two households, helping Zelma to care for the family. In addition to working in the fields, Zelma helped care for the family, and spent a little time in Glenrock attending school. Life was difficult, to say the least, for the Grants during these years. Though Uly hired men to help with the ranchwork, the girls were expected to manage by themselves.

After Helen and Roy had started their own family, Helen was not able to help Zelma as much as she had previously. It was plain that Zelma was in need of help with the household. The first two "hired girls" engaged by Uly did not stay long. The third woman, Lydia Matthews, had a small son of her own. Her mother had remarried to a man named Naggadai after the death of Lydia's father. Naggadai had taken a homestead in Mormon Canyon. Besides Lydia, there were two half-sisters in the family. At the time Lydia came to work for Uly, her mother had died. Shortly after Lydia was hired, her two half-sisters moved into the Grant home to work for their room and board. In 1932, Zelma married Bob Hiser and began her life at his home.

Uly purchased his first tractor and mower in 1935. Up to that time, all of the work on the ranch was done with horses and horse-drawn equipment. A "Model A" Ford had replaced the saddle horses as a means of getting to town. During the haying season, there were always extra hired hands to handle the six or seven teams of horses working on the mowers, rakes and stackers. In the winter, all the livestock feeding was done by moving the hay on sleds drawn by four head of horses. By then, there were around 200 head of cows and 100 head of horses and colts to be fed and cared for. Uly called his outfit the Snowshoe, naming it after the brand which he used. Cattle belonging to John Nelson Grant, son of Jess, wear the brand today.

By 1940, Uly owned about 54 sections of land. He had increased his holdings over the years by acquiring the homesteads of his children and those of many others who became disenchanted with the rigorous life of the mountains. Uly had a set price of $2400 which he offered for a section of land. The owner could take it or leave it. Together with State, Federal and Forest Reserve lands, Uly owned or controlled 40,000 acres.

John Mason married Lydia Matthews in 1933. They began their married life in the Grant home, and lived there until 1940. Then they moved to the Mart Smith place to make their home. Jess, the oldest son, married Elizabeth Naggadai that year, and he and his wife moved into the home where Uly and Jess' younger brothers and sisters lived. About three years later, Elmer and Allen decided to move to the Buck Pratt homestead to the south where they "bached" until Allen married Ann Robbins in 1948. Elmer continued to live with Allen and his family.

By this time, Uly had celebrated his 84th birthday. He had enjoyed good health for the most part since he came to Wyoming, but now his health was deteriorating. At the age of 89, Uly died, having lost his battle with cancer.

After the death of his father, Jess, John, Elmer and Allen assumed the operation of their father's business. For six years, the brothers managed the ranch together. In 1956, however, Allen sold his share of the ranch to the three other brothers, and moved to a ranch he had purchased on Mill Creek south of Douglas.

In 1965, Elmer was married to Helen Oberg of Glenrock. A year later, the brothers agreed to divide the land into three separate ranches, each brother having his own. They would continue to run their stock together, sharing the work. The eldest, Jess, died in 1971, leaving his son, John Nelson, to assume the operation of his share. John Mason died in 1974, after which his son, Lester Ulysses, carried on his father's business.

In the spring of 1972, it became apparent that Elmer's wife was not at all well. For this reason, among others, Elmer decided that he would withdraw from the business, and continue his operation alone. In 1973, Helen's health had deteriorated considerably, thus causing Elmer to dispose of about half of his land and all of his livestock. From that time until her death in 1979, Elmer's days were spent caring for his wife — living in Douglas so that he could be near her. She spent a large part of the last six years of her life in some hospital, or in the nursing home in Douglas. After his first wife died, Elmer remarried and makes his home north of Lost Springs, Wyoming. He leases his remaining land for livestock grazing.

Ulysses S. Grant had very little formal education. He was a self-taught, self-made man. He was ambitious, intelligent and thrifty. He existed with few creature comforts. His Scotch ancestry was reflected by his austere way of life. He demanded much of himself and of those around him, willing to make any sacrifice to achieve his goal — that of acquiring vast amounts of land and livestock. He expected his family to be equally self-sacrificing. In his opinion, conveniences within his home were luxuries. While he believed that his children should have some education, he thought that a higher education was unnecessary. He once remarked that girls did not need a college degree to change diapers.

Uly was stern with his family. Laughter did not come easily to him, nor any demonstration of affection. He was generous only if he could foresee some benefit by being generous. Uly was respected by his family and friends, but permitted little interference with his management of the ranch or household. He often said that he would rather give a man twenty-five dollars than to tell the man anything about his business. Because he was willing to trade his time and labor, Uly was a good neighbor.

As a member of the local school board, he donated his time and money to establishing and maintenance of the few schools in the area. He worked hard his entire life, with little time or inclination for pleasure. Though he was a determined unyielding man, he must be admired for what he was able to accomplish in the rugged, beautiful mountains which he chose for his home.

Although there are a large number of great-grandchildren, there are only four great-grandsons who will perpetuate the name of Ulysses Grant. Craig and Mark, sons of Lester Ulysses and Norma Jean Haygood Grant; William, son of John Nelson and Margaret Davidson Grant; and Dillon, son of Kenneth and Linda Townsend Grant. Three of the four live today on the ranch in the Boxelder mountains which Uly loved so well.

Grant, Walter and Cora

Walter Mason Grant first came to Converse County, Wyoming about 1888 to visit his brothers who had located in the Boxelder Park country in 1887. At that time, the stone quarry was going full blast, and there was a railroad spur running from Glenrock to take the stone to the shipping point. By 1889, they were laying off men and a letter to Walter said, "Glenrock is dead, the funeral is New Year's Day." Potatoes were sixty to eighty cents per hundredweight, beef was five to ten cents, and the judge in Douglas was 29 years old.

Walter was the son of Daniel and Frances Adams Grant. He was born on October 16, 1865 in Illinois. The family was on their way from Vermont to Iowa where they had heard that land was cheap. After a few years in the woods of Wisconsin, they did arrive in central Iowa. The father bought a little flour for the wife, corn for the horses, and had ten cents left.

Walter grew up on the farm with his eight brothers and one sister, attended country school and went to State Center High School. He said they lived on seven cents a day, but he took food from the farm. At home, they took fried cakes made from cornmeal, salt and water for school lunches.

Walter learned the barber trade and worked in Forest City. He contracted typhoid and was told to find outside work, so he did odd jobs. He fell in love with Cora Lundy, the daughter of James D. and Mattie Mathews Lundy, and they were married on Thanksgiving Day in 1903 at Natoma, Kansas where Cora was teaching school. They took a wedding trip to Wyoming, and after Cora taught the spring term of school in Boxelder, they built a cover for the spring wagon and with a team of mules made the trip through Yellowstone Park. Only horses were allowed there then, and the stage was pulled by teams. On Sundays, they layed over and Cora washed the clothing and baked bread for there were no bakeries.

They left Glenrock one morning and that night, they were at the Iba cabin east of Evansville. No wonder it took them all summer. Years later, they made the trip by car and were amazed at the miles covered in a day.

In the fall of 1904, they went back to Iowa and settled down in Baxter. They had several lots on the west edge of town and had a huge garden, a cow, chickens, a horse (for driving) and many fruit trees. It was a great place for their children to live. Jessie was born May 12, 1905, Marian on January 13, 1907, and Merritt Mason on May 27, 1910. Jessie obtained a nursing diploma at the University of Wyoming, married John Hakalo, and they raised three children. Marian studied public school music at the University of Washington, but quit to come home and marry Alvin Clark. They made their home in Glenrock and had one son, Stuart, who died in Korea when he was 21 years old. They now live in Hemet, California. Merritt worked at the two Casper theaters and was the installer of the first sound equipment at the America Theater. He joined the diplomatic service and served as vice-counsel in England, India, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Greece and Egypt. His wife, Margaret Curry, is now deceased, and he lives in Fort Bragg, California.

Walter bought and sold furs, and one of my earliest memories is of going with him by horse and buggy to an Indian camp. They had a nice tent, two girls and puppies — but papa would not let me (Jessie) take one home.

About 1915, the family moved to Clarence, Iowa, and Walter had a hardware store. He was not very successful and after Mother and Marian had the 1918 flu, they loaded everything in a box car and moved to Jireh, Wyoming where his brothers Theron and George were. Papa found no work there, but his brother Uly offered him a job on his ranch, so we moved up by wagon. While we were in Jireh, a little white dog came along and stayed. We called him Joe because we were reading the book, "Beautiful Joe". He lived to a ripe old age but was blind in one eye because he ran into the wheelbarrow chasing a coyote around the house in Jireh.

On the ranch in Boxelder, the family did well. Walter took up a homestead at the mouth of Horse Canyon, and Cora took a stone and timber claim. Both were sold to Uly. While we were proving up, Marian and I went up each afternoon and stayed the night. Marian usually managed to find a grouse or young cottontail to shoot for our supper. One night, Joe trapped a packrat behind the wood box. We took the poker and pulled out the box, and the rat ran up on the open door where Marian shot it. Not to eat, tho!

Walter planted grain on his homestead, and the grain won a prize at the fair that fall. Mother cooked for the men until we moved to the lower ranch, purchased by Uly from Charlie, then she taught school and went to summer school. She had a life certificate in Iowa, but she had to upgrade her certificate by going to the University of Wyoming summer school. The cooking fell to me.

After a few years Walter was not able to keep up the ranch work, and they moved to Glenrock. He bought the little second hand store, and Cora taught school at Careyhurst. Parkerton, Glenrock and served four years as County Superintendent of Schools.

At first, they rented the little house on First Street owned by Lewis and Adelyna Smith, and later they bought the house on the hill now owned by Gilmore Kennaugh.

Walter was a sportsman and often had articles published in the Sports Afield Magazine. He was an active member of the Odd Fellows Lodge and a deacon in the Baptist Church.

Mother died in California in 1950. Walter died of pneumonia in 1930 and is buried in the Glenrock Cemetery.

Graves, Fred and Florence Family

A westward trek that started in a covered wagon and ended in an emigrant car brought Fred Graves to his Wyoming homestead.

Fred was born January 14, 1883 at Guilford, Mo. and lived there until 17 years of age. He traveled with his parents Rufus and Ellen Graves, and brothers Glenn and Marcus and sister Bessie, by covered wagon — first to Waverly, Kansas and later to Kirk, Colorado — where he grew to manhood. There he married Elizabeth McLean on August 7, 1907, to which a son Tyson Jewel was born. This marriage ended in divorce in 1910.

Fred eventually left Colorado — working in Kansas, South Dakota, and Nebraska on farms and in the harvest fields. Finally he came to Brady, Nebraska and went to work for his future father-in-law; and thus met his wife-to-be, Florence Abercrombie. Meanwhile, he acquired a small business containing a pool table, bowling lanes, and a snack bar, which he operated for two years. By this time, he was planning to marry; and since he and his bride-to-be decided to farm, he sold his business and rented a farm.

Florence "Flossie" Abercrombie was born September 23, 1888 at Brady, Nebraska; the eldest daughter of Agricol and Ida Abercrombie whose family numbered seven daughters and one son.

Flossie grew up first on a farm and later in Brady where her father ran a livery stable. She received her education in Brady and at the North Platte Junior College and State Teachers College in Kearney, Nebraska. She received her lifetime teachers certificate (a certification similar to a present day Bachelors Degree) and taught for several years in the Brady area. She remained interested in educational issues all through her life and at an advanced age took oil painting lessons and enjoyed painting for her family and friends.

Early on June 10, 1914, Fred and Flossie were married at the home of her parents and after a wedding breakfast left for their rented farm 18 miles away. All their worldly possessions were piled in the wagon with them. There they farmed for three summers, and there the first two daughters, Gladys and Berniece were born. Later, in Wyoming, sons Wayne, Marcus and daughter, Virginia were born.

The prospect of owning their own land, by homesteading, enticed Fred on westward to Wyoming. His plans were to settle at Jireh, Wyoming; but the land agent was not in his office that day. So, Fred continued on to Douglas. There he was shown out to a site which was open for filing by Milt Githens. For this service, Mr. Githens was paid, at a later date, with 12 chickens. Fred filed on the land (parts of Sections 6 and 7, Township 70, Range 33) in 1916, but when the laws covering homesteading were changed, returned to refile in 1917. That summer, he and his wife's uncle, Jim Harmon, built a one room homestead-home; the usual 'car' roof and tarpapered to turn the wind and snow. He returned to Nebraska and the next spring loaded all the family's possessions — livestock, chickens, farm implements, household goods and personal belongings — into an emigrant car. On Good Friday he started for Wyoming, arriving in Douglas on April 1, 1918. While waiting for the rest of the family to arrive, he added another small room to the house and hand dug a water well.

Flossie and the girls came on a later train, benefiting from the luxury (?) that a passenger car could offer. She marveled at the brightness and seemingly nearness of the stars as they left the train. They spent their first night in Wyoming at the White House Rooms, which has only recently been moved from its original site on South Third Street.

In order to establish the boundaries of their land they located the southwest corner stone. Flossie measured the circumference of the wagon wheel, tied on a bright marker and counted the revolutions as Fred drove the team on a straight line to a pre-established land mark set up by the North Star. When the number of turns to make the mile was completed, they were only a few feet from their goal of the northwest corner.

As soon as possible, the land was fenced — plowed — disked — harrowed and planted. In the early years, this Wyoming land produced great crops — corn, wheat, barley and oats. The family raised their own beans, potatoes and garden produce.

After the first year passed, Flossie had the house moved to a hillside further south of the original site so that she could see farther toward the town. There the house was enlarged and a screen porch added, as well as, a cellar dug for storing surplus root crops and home canned goods, and later a well was drilled near the house.

The cattle produced milk and cream, as well as beef. Milk was separated to obtain cream for butter and to sell, to produce cash for the items that had to be purchased.

Sometimes there were even the luxuries of dried apples, apricots and prunes and for Christmas socks — an orange!! Fred also worked at odd jobs moving houses, carpenter work, or in the Casper and Glenrock oil fields, to produce needed cash for taxes, clothing, seed, etc.

Many tales could be told of cold winter mornings, winter blizzards and flash floods, hauling water in barrels which froze in the winter — going to “the timber” six to ten miles away to lay in a winter supply of wood; but these could well be repeated in variations by all homesteaders.

Flossie, though raised on a farm was not as well adjusted to the homestead life as was her bluff husband, Fred. She was dreadfully afraid of lightning and would let out a scream each time it thundered; and taught her children that a “feather bed” was best protection from lightning — so at the first crack; there the family went — like an old hen followed by chickens — plop, plop into the feather bed. Coyote and hawks were her mortal enemies and though deathly afraid of a gun, she one time had to save her chickens by shooting a coyote. She trembled for hours before finally calming herself, and then, basked in the glory of her bravery. She had taught her chickens that at the appearance of a hawk she would emit a sharp coo-coo-coo and it was a sight to see those chickens hustle for shelter when so warned. In later life, she was proud of her membership in the “Sod House Society” signifying that she had been born in a sod house and had taught in a sod school house, as well.

Illness was a special dread because of the distance to travel to a doctor. The family kept a supply of basic remedies; epsom salts, turpentine, mustard for mustard packs, and castor oil, senna tea, and asafetida which was worn on the person to ward off germs — and probably owed its success to its dreadful stink — which kept everyone so far away that no doubt the isolation did the trick. The family had their share of childhood illness — and Flossie managed to have them all over again with her children — mumps, measles, chicken pox and scarlet fever.

Accidents did happen in spite of the caution taken. When chopping wood for the fire, a chip flew from the ax into Fred's eye. Unable to remove it at home, Fred walked the seven miles into town to the doctor. The chip was removed, but Fred lost the sight of his eye. Flossie had blood poisoning due to an abscessed tooth and her face swelled double in size. By putting hot epsom salts packs and rinsing with hot salt water, she was able to cure the problem. Gladys was carrying milk pails to the barn astride the family horse when the rattle of the buckets frightened the horse, who bolted and ran for the barn. About to enter the barn (which would have decapitated Gladys) the horse stopped, turned and dumped Gladys — with only a broken arm. At the time the parents didn't believe it to be broken — so it healed without the benefit of a doctor and is still crooked.

Wayne was severely ill with the mumps; the only time a childhood illness became dangerous. One time when traveling to a club meeting at a neighbor's house, Flossie accidentally dropped the harness lines and in trying to retrieve them stepped out onto the tongue of the wagon and spooked the team, which bolted and ran away throwing her out. Marcus and Virginia were left in the wagon for a ways, but eventually they were thrown out, breaking Marcus' leg. Flossie moved to town into one room where Marcus was bedfast with weights attached to his legs. He suffered great pain, and when the cast was removed, it was found that it had been too tight at the ankle and caused “proud” flesh. This flesh had to be cut away and doctored and the terrible scars and adhesions remain.

Berniece became ill and had a condition the doctors called Saint Vitus Dance — they removed her tonsils and she slowly outgrew this condition. Amazingly, through it all, no lives were lost and Fred and Flossie died natural deaths at 79 and 87 respectively, attributed to old age — and all of the children remain alive.

Great fun was also part of the homestead life. Once Flossie, upon reading of the new flapper style hair cut, waited till Fred left, then “bobbed” her hair — and as he returned took a flapper stance; and she laughed, till tears came, at the sight of his shocked face. Christmas and birthdays were made great events by Flossie, even though sometimes it was with an ‘eggless’ cake. Choosing the Christmas tree was a major family event and the popcorn strings and home made decorations were beautiful in the family's eyes, and never once did Santa fail to arrive.

Pets were part of the household. One of the favorites was Blue — a pigeon who became a character. He discovered that he could enter the house through an upstairs window and would hop down the stairs — one at a time; and then, if the phonograph happened to be playing, would pace across the top, cooing until someone chased him outside. He learned when school was out and would fly to meet the children, would light and walk home with them.

Old Tom was a pet hen who demanded attention if she was expected to lay an egg! She would nest as close to the house as possible, then she would cackle several times so the family would go out and pet her. One time she tried to nest in the old ash box of a heating stove that had been set out on the back porch for the summer.

Ted was a black and white mongrel who was a hero. Several times he was bitten while killing a rattlesnake; which he would grab in his mouth and shake and throw till he managed to kill it. After he attacked a porcupine, we had to remove the porcupine quills. He stood still in spite of the pain and then whipped the young dogs into submission, too.

Queen was afar from a queenly horse, but how the children loved her — sometimes riding three or four deep. And there was the nameless pet sow who carried corn husks and straw to make a bed by the back door to have her pigs.

One time Fred was aroused in the middle of the night by barking dogs and went out in his shirt-tail to investigate. Just then, around the corner came a dashing skunk followed by angry dogs — between Fred and the door. Needless to say, Fred took off around the house leading the pack — shirt-tail flying, while the family, who had been awakened also, peered down from the upstairs window roaring with laughter.

Since the Graves' original home had been replaced and was quite large, the neighbors often met there on Saturday nights, for a country dance. The wives brought cake or sandwiches and the husbands helped move all the furniture out on the front porch. Someone would start out on the fiddle and several women were able to 'chord' the pump organ. So much fun for all of the family to waltz and two-step and even have a "square" or two while Fred made the calls. After a midnight break for lunch, dancing continued until "Three O'Clock in the Morning" signaled time to get that special partner for the final dance, "Home Sweet Home". At other times there were Halloween masquerades or taffy pulls. Good times were plentiful — as were the hard times — but Fred and Flossie maintained that these were the best times of all.

However, the drought came and it became impossible to grow the crops to feed livestock, although by then they had a windmill and could irrigate the garden. Even the grass no longer grew long enough to wave in the wind, as it did in the 20's, so the family had to look elsewhere for livelihood. The market crash would have had no effect on them, if only the rains had continued to fall. It became necessary to reduce the number of cattle by selling to the government. So, the Graves sold the horses and remaining livestock to neighbors and moved into town, into a small house Fred had built on a lot they owned. Fred took various jobs until his health failed and then Flossie went to work, using her education to again go into teaching what was the forerunner of the first kindergarten in Douglas. She continued to work while Fred built several houses which they rented for income in their retirement years. They both remained active in community affairs — Flossie became a charter member of the Red Cross Grey Ladies. Fred died on Dec. 15, 1962, Flossie on Nov. 18, 1975.

In spite of the lean years, all of the children graduated from Converse County High School, except Wayne — who graduated in Nebraska. For the first eight years, all attended the rural 'Graves School' — walking a mile through snow and blizzards, rain and blistering heat. For high school, they continued to walk the mile to catch a bus to ride the six miles into Douglas.

Gladys, the oldest, taught school for four years; she then married and raised a family of three — two sons and a daughter, who is deceased. She later became a book-keeper and for seven years a store manager. She is now retired.

Berniece had two daughters — one who is now deceased. She became an accountant and after retiring, remarried and traveled extensively with her husband who was employed overseas. Her travels included the far East, Turkey near Iran and the Russian border. She later toured several European countries, spending 18 months in Vietnam and Thailand, following which they toured the Asiatic Theater.

Wayne served in World War II after which he became a carpenter. Later he was employed as City-County Building Inspector for Stockton, California. He is now retired and has three married children.

Marcus was in service during World War II. After returning home, he worked for the Wyoming Highway Department, except for a period of time when he was self-employed. He has three daughters and a son who was lost in Vietnam. After 29½ years with the Wyoming Highway Department, he is now retired.

Virginnia moved to California during World War II and worked as a secretary for several years. After marriage, she and her husband had their own business from which she is now retired. She has two children; a son who has graduated from college and a daughter now enrolled in college.

The family homestead is still owned by the collective family.

Graves, Glenn and Lillie

Glenn Graves was born in Guilford, Missouri on Aug. 6, 1885, the son of Rufus L. and Ellen Marie Ham Graves. Twins were born to Glenn and his wife on June 4, 1906 in Binkleman, Nebraska. Glenn's wife and son died at the time of the twins' birth. The surviving twin, Stella, was raised by her grandparents, Rufus and Ellen.

Stella attended school in Kirk, Colorado. She came to Wyoming with her grandparents in 1919 when they homesteaded north of Douglas. One son, Herman, and one daughter, Ruth, were born to her marriage to Percy Howard. She married George Jackson on March 16, 1933 after she was divorced from Percy. Six sons, Albert, Richard, George, Delbert, Andre and William, and one daughter, Cora, were born to Stella and George. Stella married George's brother Bert after George's death in 1966. She taught school in many of the rural schools in the county. She died on June 21, 1971.

Glenn came to Converse County in 1922 to homestead near his parents.

In the late 1920's he married Lillie Fields Gwartney, a widow with eight children. Glenn and Lillie had two children of their own, Ellen Marie and Albert Lee.

Glenn had horses and one of the teams, Maude and Prince, was used in the State Fairs in competition in the log pulling contests, etc. They were a majestic team and well trained. Many was the time they found the way home during the blinding blizzards and return trips from town pulling the wagon full of commodities.

Gene and Colista Combs' ranch joined us on the south. They had large Angus bulls that had a habit of going on the rampage, and when they did, they wiped out fences or whatever got in their way. To the north was the Morton Ranch. They always had the beautiful stud horses that had to be respected. We used to go to an old windmill where a lot of horseradish grew. It was during those times we encountered the studs and had some frightening experiences. The Claude Thompson homestead was only a few miles to the north of us.

Times got tough and about the only thing that was plentiful, seemed to be blizzards, cactus and rattlesnakes. Many times Glenn hitched his faithful team to the wagon to take us kids to the Graves or Happy Hallow Schools only to find the roads were closed and the teacher could not get through. With freezing hands he would build a fire in the school house stove to warm us up. The teacher would be hours getting to school. Sometimes we would have to return home early as the storms worsened. Many is the night Glenn sat with us by the kerosene lamp to help us with our studies.

As the years passed Lillie managed to save a hundred dollars. She packed our belongings and the family headed to California and later to Washington where Glenn became employed at the Seattle-Tacoma shipyards. Glenn passed away in 1953 and is buried in the Sumner Cemetery at Sumner, Washington. Lillie died in 1976 and is also buried at Sumner.

Ellen became a registered nurse. She had four children, Cecil Glenn, Albert, Mary and Charlene. Ellen died in 1975 and is buried at Sumner, Washington.

Albert Lee was born on the McComb place north of Douglas. He has one daughter, Alberta. Albert lives in Tacoma, Washington.

Graves, Marcus

Marcus Graves, son of Rufus and Ellen Graves homesteaded in Converse County following his discharge from World War I in 1918.

He was born in Guilford, Missouri, July 2, 1891 and at the age of 14 moved to Kirk, Colorado with his family.

Marcus served in World War I from June 16, 1916 until April 29, 1918, and during that time was offered a candidacy for Officers Training School. He was in the 157th Inf., 40th Sunshine Division. He served on the Mexican border then was transferred to France where he spent eight months. He was proud of his association with Black Jack Pershing, and was extremely patriotic, having a great love for flag and country.

Following his discharge from the army, he followed his brother, Fred, to Wyoming and filed on his homestead. He soon 'proved' up — being allowed time towards his proving up time for his time in service. He had an unusual team — mules — Jack and Jerry, of which he was duly proud, as they were good steady workers. Much to his distress and the subject of much speculation was the fact that they disappeared — no trace of them to be found. Whether they were stolen or were inadvertently included in a wild horse roundup never was known. He spent the rest of his life in the area, where he worked on ranches in the local vicinity, as well as working with his brother Fred as a plasterer's helper.

He belonged to the Methodist Church, Odd Fellows, American Legion and V.F.W., of which he served two years as Commander. Marcus was always interested in young people, and was actively involved with the local Boy Scout troop for many years.

He was somewhat of a "character" and is remembered for his jocular manner and for his willingness to help his fellow man.

Marcus never married, but was greatly loved by nieces and nephews — not only as an Uncle, but as a beloved friend.

Marcus died July 17, 1965.

Gladys S. Graves Hill

Graves, Rufus and Ellen

Mr. and Mrs. Rufus L. Graves came to Wyoming from Kirk, Colorado and filed on their half section in 1919.

Their sons, Fred and Marcus, had already moved here and their other son, Glenn soon followed.

They had one of the few sod houses in this part of the county. Memories of this soddy reflect the coolness of summer and warmth in winter. The inside was plastered over and whitewashed. The thick window walls made a great perch for visiting grandchildren to sit on and dream in the sun.

Rufus and Ellen Graves and their soddy house.

Rufus and Ellen raised not only their own four children (daughter Bessie remained in Colorado), but took an infant granddaughter, Stella, to raise when Glenn's (their second son) wife died in childbirth. Stella was a twin, whose brother died at birth in 1906.

Ellen's descendants are proud of her heritage — her mother being one-half Powhattan Indian and her father a professor who was schooled at Yale.

Those who remember Ellen recall that her back was bent and her hands badly twisted with rheumatism. In spite of this, she managed the home. To compensate, she would put the bread dough in a large pan to raise on the oven door and since she could not stand, would pull a chair and sit to knead her bread with those almost doubled under twisted hands.

One incident of vivid memory was when Rufus was stricken with pneumonia with only Ellen to care for him. As son Fred and family approached down the lane leading to the parents home, they saw Ellen hobbling along toward the gate wildly waving her apron. She wasn't sure who was coming down the lane and had to wave in whoever it was to get Rufus to the hospital. That is the only recollection of Ellen crying; as she broke down in relief when help arrived. Rufus was unconscious for many days, but early day Douglas Doctor Hylton, pulled him through; not with fancy drugs, but with a regular dosage of 1 tablespoon of whiskey.

Rufus actively supported the organization of the first Sunday School at a community center and school called Happy Hollow. He taught the adult Sunday School class and with booming and sometimes off-key voice, led the group singing. Mrs. Nancy Jackson was the first Superintendent and Mrs. James (Goldie) Henry was organist. Flossie Graves taught the children's class. All in all, there were probably ten or twelve families and since some came as far as seven miles in horse-drawn lumber wagons, usually a lunch was brought along, and the day became a social gathering.

Rufus had been a house mover before he came to Wyoming, and that skill he had taught his sons.

Though the first trip to Wyoming was by car, Rufus made several trips back and forth to Kirk, Colorado, with team and wagon.

After granddaughter Stella married, Rufus and Ellen returned to Colorado. They lived in Wyoming for six years.

Guthlin, Max

Max O. Guthlin was born March 18, 1888 at Elmwood, Ohio to John and Emma Guthlin. He attended Elmwood schools and remained there until 1908 when he entered Baltimore Polytech. Two years later he accepted a position in the General Land Office of the United States in Washington D.C. In 1910 he was transferred to a position of clerk in the Land Office in Douglas, Wyoming.

A genial gentleman, Max made many friends in Douglas, among them members of the Jacob Jenne family, with whom he made his home for many years. He was highly respected by all who knew him. Max was especially fond of children and was known as "Uncle Max" by them.

Max resigned from the Land Office in 1916 and became associated with Charles F. Maurer, a pioneer attorney. He returned to Washington D.C. in 1917 for employment with a firm which was building gas and storage tanks for the United States in France. He continued on to France where he remained until the end of World War I.

Max returned to Douglas and became Secretary-Manager of the Douglas Water Users Association. He later became cashier at the Commercial Bank and Trust Company of Douglas. He moved from there to the Wyoming Sales Tax Division in 1933.

He moved to Los Angeles in 1943 and remained there in various accounting positions until his retirement in 1970. He lived in Sun City, Arizona; Cheyenne, Wyoming at the home of Dr. John Shaffer; and the Bel Air Manor in Mitchell, Nebraska where he passed away on November 26, 1973.

Max is buried in the Jenne family lot in the Douglas Cemetery.

Guthrie, Julian H. and Alice

Julian came to Douglas from Leon, Iowa in 1917 when ten years old with his parents, Thomas J. Guthrie and Jennie P. Guthrie (nee Cherington). They came by automobile as far as Omaha, Nebraska, where they were involved in a car wreck which delayed their progress for some time. They continued their journey by train arriving in Douglas in the late winter of 1917. His dad, Tom Guthrie, got the family settled on a homestead 28 miles north of Douglas about three-fourths of a mile west of the present highway to Gillette and one-half mile north of Box Creek where he built a house and a barn that spring.

His dad passed away July 4, 1918 and so the family's care and support was left largely to his mother and their three young sons, Frank, Julian and Willard, none of whom was yet 13 years old.

After a bout with the flu epidemic of 1918, they managed to get their land into cultivation with a horse-drawn plow in 1919. By selling cream and eggs they were able to support themselves, with God's help, and the encouragement of a few good friends, such as Mr. and Mrs. D. W. Ballard and Mr. Guy Crommett.

Their diet was often supplemented with rabbits and antelope.

By 1928, Julian had filed on a relinquished homestead of his own in Township 36, Range 71, consisting of 640 acres; which was about 32 miles north of Douglas. He was, of course, required to fence the land and build a house as were the other homesteaders of that era.

He then hired someone to drill a well, the water fortunately was drinkable.

He bought a new International tractor model 22-36 in the spring of 1929 for $1420. It was a large four-cylinder model and could pull a three-bottom plow. The tractor had iron wheels with V-shaped lugs to give it added traction.

The tractor appeared to be a good investment that spring because dryland wheat and barley had been doing well during much of the Twenties. Unfortunately for Julian and millions of other Americans the Great Depression and drought of the Nineteen Thirties lay ahead.

On February 10, 1931, Julian married, the widow of Frank Guthrie, the former Alice M. Pinkerton of Manville, Wyoming, whose son Willis A. Guthrie was then three years old having been born April 25, 1927. On their wedding day they ran over a fire hose in the Douglas street with their 1927 Model T. Ford and were fined $5.00 which was a pretty big fine in 1931.

Alice and Julian had two sons, Ralph J., born February 11, 1932, and Daniel H., born March 30, 1946.

Julian did many things during the depression years to earn a living, a few of them were as follows:

1. Farming
2. Ranching
3. Hauling coal ($5.00 a ton delivered)
4. Selling meat (11 cents a pound for hindquarter)
5. Driving school bus to Dry Creek School, 1937
6. Working for Standard Oil Co., 1936.

Lest I paint too dark a picture of the Thirties, I would like to say here that there were some good times then also, such as the Literaries at the Dry Creek Hall. The Church services were held at different locations by men such as Rev. Ervin Noyce, Paul Eiselstein and John Faulkner.

In 1939 Julian and Alice sold their homestead and bought about 2000 acres of range and irrigated land from the Metz family, on the south side of the North Platte River, 15 miles west of Douglas.

Dad hired young Jim Exley to help build fence and farm the land.

Seeing the need for a telephone line to Douglas, Julian talked to the Mountain Bell Company and with the cooperation of neighbors in the area, such as John and Robert Hildebrand and Fred Marburger, he built about seven miles of private line and then connected to the company's main line.

During those years Dad was chosen to be a Deacon in the First Baptist Church and was also on the building committee for the new church building in Douglas.

In 1945 Julian sold the ranch west of Douglas and started a welding and machine shop, on Second Street in Douglas, which he bought from Mr. Fred Cannon. Because of the scarcity of new parts caused by World War II, his shop was especially useful to those in the community who had to repair heavy equipment, well drilling bits and farm implements.

By 1949 he moved to Loveland, Colorado where he ran a larger machine shop until 1965.

His first wife, Alice M. Guthrie, passed away July 5, 1964 and was buried in the Douglas cemetery.

During 1965 he remarried and moved to Richland, Missouri where he is still in the shop business and has a small cattle ranch, both of which he is actively operating as of now (1984).

Guthrie, Silas and William

William E. and Silas Guthrie came to Wyoming in 1879 from Marion, Ohio.

An excerpt from a letter from William to Silas tells of the ranch that they bought from the Swan brothers. Dated March 11, 1879, the letter states, "The ranch is between the Laramie and the Platte Rivers on the head of a mountain stream. There aren't any cattle above but several small herds below which will have to be crowded out by whoever controls the ranch of which I speak. The natural boundaries are first class, being the Laramie River on the south, the North Platte on the north, and the Laramie Mountains on the west. I think that $38,000 will buy it but am not certain. There is 2227 head of cattle included in the price."

The ranch was located at the confluence of West Fork LaBonte and LaBonte Creeks. Frank Pexton lives here in 1985. The brothers were to expand the ranch to be one of the largest in the county. At the time of its sale in 1901 to the Gibson Livestock Company for $220,600, it controlled much of the drainage of LaBonte and Wagonhound Creeks and extended west to Downey Park.

The Guthrie record books show they owned 9083 cattle in 1882. By 1899 sheep were also part of their operation. A "Douglas Budget" edition of that year quotes the brothers as having a wool clip of 225,000 pounds with part of their range as being 60 miles north of Douglas on Antelope Creek.

In 1884 the Guthrie-Oskamp Company was formed with a capital stock of $520,000. Its shareholders were William and Silas Guthrie of LaBonte, Wyoming and Clemens Oskamp Jr., Henry Oskamp and C. S. Burkholder of Boston, Massachusetts. Later the Guthries formed a company with T. B. Hord. They named the company Guthrie-Hord and branded the trowel.

A post office was established at the ranch headquarters on West Fork LaBonte on February 23, 1895 with Mrs. Silas (Isabel) Guthrie as its postmistress. Later, on January 17, 1900, Libbie Russell served in the same capacity until June 25, 1900 when Mary Gibson was appointed. The post office was transferred to LaBonte Post Office on October 25, 1900.

The election precinct in that area was also named after the Guthrie family. It is still so identified in 1985.

The Johnson County War found William as an active participant as was also the ranch's foreman, Mike Shonsey. Silas, however, refused to take part in the invasion.

William retired upon the sale of the ranch in 1901 and died later in Bridgeport, Nebraska.

Silas married Isabel McLean. Two children were born to them, Rodney and Isabell. Rodney served as justice of the Sixth Judicial District and of the Supreme Court of Wyoming. He married Mary Belle Pemberton.

Silas was elected by a majority of one vote to the office of County Clerk of Converse County when Wyoming became a state in 1890. He served two years. Upon the sale of the ranch, he moved to Weston County where he had extensive holdings, running sheep. He died in 1923.

Gwartney, Henry and Lillie

Henry Colvin "Hank" Gwartney was born May 25, 1882 weighing a whopping 13 pounds. Born at Winchester, Kansas, the son of Ephriam and Martha Ehart Gwartney. Hank married Nan Welch; three sons were born to them, George Gerald, Leonard Eugene and Franklin Thomas. Franklin died at the age of two years. The marriage ended in divorce.

Hank and his two sons moved to Douglas, Wyoming in the early 1900s. Hank established a painting and decorating business on main street. The main line of paint was The Dutch Boy Paint.

He bought other property around Douglas and lived in the south area of town. Sam Cirby was a near-by neighbor and close friend.

Hank married Lillie Fields Holloway, who had been widowed with four young daughters. They started out with a ready-made family and added four more of their own, Thomas Henry, James Franklin, Clara Mae and Louis Edward. Hank continued running his place of business and enlarging the home.

Hank became ill with pneumonia, but would not rest properly and kept on with his work. This proved too much for him. One Saturday, he parked his Ford automobile, spoke to Paul Jones who had the Paul Jones Market near the paint store and as he stepped upon the curb an agonizing pain struck him in the chest. Henry Colvin Gwartney died at his store of a heart attack on October 31, 1930. He is buried in the Douglas Cemetery.

His sons, George and Leonard, returned to their mother in Kansas. They both served in the armed forces during World War II. After discharge George became an inspector at the Ford Motor Company in Kansas City. He had two sons, Donald and Edwin. George G. Gwartney died at age 54 of a heart attack in April 1964. He is buried in The National Cemetery at Ft. Leavenworth, Kansas.

Leonard Gwartney was born in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, Canada. He and George attended the Douglas schools. We have no current address on him.

Thomas attended the schools in and around Douglas and was active in rodeos. He worked for various ranchers, including lambing for Wade Fowler. He remained single and now lives in Sacramento, California.

James attended the South Grade, Graves and Happy Hollow Schools. He lived with the Finks for some time and also worked for various ranches in the area. James married Betty Mason, the daughter of Lewis Joseph Mason and Betsy Kaarbo Mason, who homesteaded just out of Douglas. Lewis died October 4, 1925 at Douglas and his wife Betty died December 11, 1941 there. James and Betty had four children. Joe, Patsy, Mary and Lee. Mary died at birth. She is buried in the Douglas Cemetery. Joe served in the Vietnam War and was injured. James and Betty reside in Payette, Idaho.

Clara Mae, the only daughter of Hank Gwartney was born in Douglas on September 1, 1925, with Dr. Storey attending the delivery. She attended the South Grade, Graves and Happy Hollow Schools. Leona Bartling was her first grade teacher; Mrs. Adkins the fifth grade teacher; Mr. Cleveland the seventh. Nell Mohr was the principal of the South Grade School and a very fine person who had the respect of all the children. Garnet Dixon, among others, taught at the Graves School and was also a very good teacher.

Clara Mae is married to Sylvester V. Wirtz, a retired electrician. They have four children: Deana Lyn of Reno, Nevada; her two children, Mathew Lain and RanDee Lyn Banovich; Valon Rae of Reno, Nevada and son Brandon Bishop; Douglas K. an electrician living in Folsom, California; and daughter Darla V. Wirtz of Folsom. Clara Mae Gwartney Wirtz resides in Folsom, California.

The youngest of H. C. Gwartney's children was Louis Edward, born on November 4, 1928 at Douglas. He attended the same schools as the older ones. He married Geraldine Walker. They had three children, Steven, Luanne and Rex. Rex was killed in a motorcycle accident. Luann married Frank Calafiore and has a son Jeremy living in Citrus Heights, California. Louis lives in Sacramento, California.

Haefele, Ralph and Rosalind Family

One of the eight children born to Joseph and Cora Booth Haefele was born at McKinley, Nebraska on August 10, 1897. He was named Ralph McKinley and was raised on a tree claim near Broken Bow, Nebraska.

As a young man, in 1918, Ralph came to Wyoming and homesteaded on a 640 acre claim on Sand Creek, 52 miles north of Douglas. Ralph ran a freight line for ranches between Gillette, Douglas and Casper to earn money to build his own home and prove up on his homestead.

Ralph's brothers, Charlie and Joe, and sisters, Lizzie and Ruth, followed him to Wyoming and homesteaded on neighboring claims. With help, Charlie, a lifetime bachelor, built a two-room cement cabin. Ralph and family later lived there while building their log home.

In 1924, Ralph returned to Broken Bow to earn extra money working in the fields and to find someone to share his life. Rosalind Leola Fair, one of ten children, was born January 4, 1904, to Homer and Lena Fair in Fairmont, Nebraska. Rosalind earned her teaching certificate in 1922. She was staying at the Haefele home teaching Ralph's younger brothers and sisters. This led to romance and Ralph and Rosalind were married on April 18, 1924.

In June 1924, the young married couple returned to Wyoming where they lived in the cement shack. They used a sheep wagon cook stove and hauled water from a spring. The cement shack was later used as a granary and play house for children. It still stands but is not in

The Haeefe family enjoyed many good times and good friends despite the fact that they traveled by team and buggy and lived 52 miles from the nearest town. Every Sunday they attended church at Verse which was five miles east. Verse was also where the kids attended school and Ralph drove a school bus. Later their son, Duane, also drove the bus to the Coal Mine School on Antelope Creek. Baseball games, box socials, dances, school programs and card parties were sources of entertainment. To this day, you would be entertained with a card game at any of the Haeefe homes. The family put up ice in the winter and milked cows, raised chickens, etc. so there was always a freezer of ice cream and delicious food available. On Tuesdays and Fridays, Ralph would deliver cream and milk to Verse to sell. He picked up supplies then, as the trip to Douglas was made only once a year. Ralph sheared sheep around the country for extra income. They raised hogs, turkeys, horses, cattle, later sheep and did some farming.

In 1940, the Haeefe family added on to their log house. With the help of their neighbors, they soon had a comfortable country home, with running water and power supplied by a windcharger.

Rosalind and Ralph were blessed with seven children. First born, daughter Harriet, was ready to enter high school in 1938. She worked for her room and board and attended Douglas High School. She passed a Civil Service test and worked in the Pentagon in Washington, D.C. Harriet married Felix Smith and they make their home in Whittier, California. They have three sons and seven grandchildren.

Duane, was also educated in Converse County. He served two years in the navy and the South Pacific and later attended auctioneer school. Duane tells "that he met his wife, Chloe Waggoner at a dance at Dry Creek". She is the daughter of cattleman Joe Waggoner of Jay Em, Wyoming. Duane built a new home close to the original homestead. They have four children. The oldest son, Harold, is married to Cheri Pope of Arvada, Colorado and now has Duane and Chloe's only grandchild, Tyler Duane. Harold operates the Haeefe place south of Douglas, which was originally the Bill Eastman place. Sandi, the only daughter, loves the ranch life and helps Duane on the ranch. Twin boys, Roger and Rodney are nearby to lend a hand if needed, but each have other interests. Roger recently finished a meat cutting school and Rod is a welder.

In 1951, Duane purchased his Uncle Charlie's place and in 1963, bought the holdings from his dad and mother. The outfit consists of the original homesteads of Ralph, Charlie and Joe Haeefe, Holly Swope and Elmer Johnson. Duane's youngsters attended country schools until Harold was ready for high school in 1968. Duane and Chloe purchased a home in Douglas to be with their family through those years. They presently occupy both the ranch and the home in Douglas.

Frances, the third, has dedicated her life to raising her five daughters. She lives in Reno, Nevada now where she met and married Virgil Short. Frances enjoys nine grandsons.

Ralph and Rosalind endured a loss when their son, Harold, suffered a ruptured appendix and passed away in 1940.

Robert, married a local girl. Georgia Marburger, and farm a ranch south of Douglas. Their children, Bill and Thea live at home, while Karma is married to Kellie Glouse and has two daughters.

Dale attended the University of Wyoming and received a degree in agriculture. He works at Pacific Power Plant in Glenrock and lives west of Douglas. He is married to Zora Olds and has two daughters.

When youngest, Sharon, was ready for high school, Rosalind moved to a home in Douglas to be with her. Sharon is making her home in Durango, Colorado with husband, Stan Gill, and two daughters.

Ralph joined Rosalind in town in 1965 and worked as water commissioner. Ralph passed away August 1, 1967. Rosalind was honored as Wyoming Mother of the Year in 1973. Rosalind passed away, suddenly, August 31, 1973. She was loved and missed by many.

Hageman, Art and Mabel Family

I (Mabel) was born January 7, 1906, the third child in a family of four to Bert and Anna Sanford. I had one sister, Eva the oldest; a brother Claude, 2nd; myself, 3rd; and Charles, 4th. We were all born at my grandparents' ranch at Beaver, Wyoming. My parents lived in a log house that my father built. It was located on my mother's homestead claim on Doggie Creek in the Upper LaPrele Community. As a child, I was raised on this ranch and attended school there. In 1911, my parents moved to a small farm near Roseburg, Oregon and I attended my first year of school there in 1911-1912. My first teacher, Ethel Senters Wright is still living (March 28, 1984). She is about 94 years old. I went to see her about six years ago-a lovely little lady.

My parents moved back to Wyoming in 1912 to our former home and I spent my childhood and growing-up years there until I finished high school in Glenrock, Wyoming, graduating May 14, 1925. In June 1926 I decided to teach school and went to summer school at Laramie, Wyoming. In September 1926, I started teaching my first term of school at Happy Hollow School about 15 miles northeast of Douglas, Wyoming. I had eight pupils and five grades.

In November of 1926, I met Art Hageman. Art was born June 7, 1904 in Unionville, Michigan, the fourth child in a family of nine, to German-born parents Henry and Frieda Hageman. Art spent his childhood on his parent's farm near Unionville, Michigan with the family, and when he was fifteen his parents sold the farm and moved to Wyoming to a homestead claim 22 miles northeast of Douglas, Wyoming in the Walker Creek Community. He lived there for ten years doing the farming and helping his father on the ranch. In 1926, he filed on a homestead of 320 acres four miles from his father's place.

On December 22, 1928, Art and I were married in Douglas by Rev. Ledbetter. I was still teaching school-my third term. After school was out in May, we moved to the dry farm which was our home for 23 years. Art proved up on the homestead in 1929. We had good years for a while, then came the depression in the 30's and the dust storm days. During the depression there were several dry years-no rain and crops failed, prices were low-eggs sold for 5¢ per dozen, the butter fat in cream was 8¢ per pound, shelled corn was around 50¢ a bushel. Art worked out for wages for 50¢ to $1.00 a day. The wind and dust were terrible. There were days and days we never saw the sun as the air was so full of dust, the wind blew so hard and so much, that the soil was blown from the grass and sagebrush and they were blown away. The livestock and poultry suffered from sand being blown in their eyes. Every night I had to grease their eyes with vaseline or lard so they could open them the next morning. I don't recall how long the dust storms lasted, but it was for at least one summer during the 30's.

Then came the 40's and the second World War. Times were really hard then-work was scarce, prices were still low. President Roosevelt provided many government programs for helping the people. There were work units such as WPA and CCC Camps, which gave many men and teenage boys an opportunity to work. The WPA included building dikes for livestock water, home improvement projects and many others. Art worked on many of these work units. During the war, we were rationed on food such as flour, sugar, coffee, rice, meat, clothes, gas and tires. The government delivered commodities by truck to each rural home once a month. We would get rice, cornmeal, canned goods, meat, vegetables, milk, powdered milk, beans, etc. and enough fresh meat for two days. We made mattresses-they furnished the material (cotton and ticking)-we also made quilts, the material being furnished. There were ten or twelve families that would go to the community hall to work on the mattresses and everyone helped each other until we had all the mattresses completed.

The men in the neighborhood would all go together and mine their own coal. There was a large vein of coal in the community and the men would take their horses and fresnos and scrapers and move the dirt off the coal, which would take about two weeks, then they would start removing the coal. They would fill all the wagons before anyone started home-it was usually around 10:00 at night when they would get home. Art also hauled wood from Walker Creek with the team and wagon. Usually, the whole family would help gather wood. We would take a picnic lunch and spend the whole day, which everyone enjoyed.

Living on a dry farm, we had no running water in the house, no electricity, no gas for heat or cooking. Art hauled water for drinking and cooking for several years from a well on another place about two miles from where we lived. He hauled the water in large wooden barrels with a team and wagon. Later, my father and Art dug a well just a few feet from the house-they found water 22 ft. down-it was real good, soft water. We used a bucket with a rope tied to it that was let down in the well to bring the water up. We used this method of getting water out of the well for several years, then we had the well drilled deeper by drillers and had a pump and windmill installed so we didn't have to use the bucket system anymore to get water. For livestock water, we had dikes and reservoirs, which were filled with rain water.

For lights, we used the kerosene lamps and a gas lantern. For ironing clothes, I used the old-fashioned flat irons that were heated on the cook stove. We used wood and coal both for heating and cooking. Since we had no running water in the house, we had to heat water on the stove for laundry and taking baths in the galvanized wash tub.

We raised a few hogs for our own use; also had chickens, geese, turkeys, and ducks. We had about ten milk cows and sold cream to the Judevine Creamery in Douglas. We also raised a garden every year-Art planted several acres of corn, wheat, and oats-he sold some of the corn and used the rest for feed for livestock. He did all the farming with horses. For transportation, we had an old car, or used the team and wagon.

Our home was a small three room frame house that Art had bought and moved to the homestead when he proved up on the claim. It was quite crowded, but provided shelter for the family.

Our recreation was school programs, dances, Home-makers Club, baseball games and other community affairs. We also attended rural Sunday School and church at Walker Creek School House.

We have seven children. The three oldest ones were born at my parents' (Sanford) ranch west of Douglas, Wyoming. The four youngest were born at our dry farm home 22 miles northeast of Douglas, Wyoming. The children are: Norma Jean, born April 18, 1930-after graduating from Douglas High School she taught three years in rural schools in Niobrara County. She married Frank Burrell and they had three children, Jeanne, James and Janet and five grandchildren. They owned and operated the Douglas Dairy for 15 years. Frank is employed by Converse County. They make their home in Douglas.

Lorraine Ellen, born July 14, 1931, taught twelve years in rural schools. She married Richard Broyles and they ranched for several years near Gillette. They had three children, the oldest one, a boy, William, died in infancy and Kathleen and Marilyn. She and her family live on their ranch northeast of Lusk, Wyoming where they raise cattle.

Arthur, Jr., born August 17, 1933, was in the U. S. Army and served time in Korea in 1956 to 1958. He married Linda Thomas and they had three children, Teresa, Michael and Ray. They have one granddaughter. He has had several different jobs in Wyoming. Linda is employed by the Douglas School District. They make their home in Douglas.

William (Bill), born in 1936, was in the U.S. Army from 1957 to 1959 and spent nine months in Germany. He married Judy McIntosh and they had three children, William Jr. (Billy), Danny and Leslie Ann (died in infancy). Bill worked throughout Wyoming for many years for Mtn. Bell Telephone Co. and then moved to a ranch near Lingle, Wyoming. They live on the ranch near Lingle where they raise cattle.

Joanne, born April 14, 1940, graduated from Douglas, High School in May 1958 and married Lloyd Herrod. They have five children, Sherri, Gary, David, Catherine and Caroline. Lloyd is self-employed servicing swimming pools. They live near Sonoma, California.

James, born March 26, 1942, was in the U. S. Army during 1964 to 1966 and spent time in Vietnam for five months during the beginning of the Vietnam War. He never married and works for the State Highway Department. He lives in Douglas and also has a log cabin he built in the mountains.

Doris Elaine, born July 14, 1944, graduated from high school in 1962 and she married Dick Rohrer. They have two children, Steven and Shawn Marie. Dick has his own jewelry store and they live in Evansville, Wyoming.

Our children went to rural school at Walker Creek until time for high school in Douglas. Art drove the school bus to Walker Creek School for several years. The bus route was discontinued, and our younger children were still in grade school; so we moved to Douglas in 1953

We bought property in town and Art had employment in Douglas. Art was employed by Porter's Blacksmith Shop for several years, then worked at various garages and as a filling station attendant. His greatest love and hobby was repairing and doing mechanical work on cars. He passed away while at work from a heart attack at B & B Enco Station while working on a truck on January 21, 1974. He is buried in Douglas Cemetery.

I still live in our home in Douglas, enjoying my many hobbies. I was honored for 50 years of Extension Homemakers work at the National Homemakers meeting at Laramie, Wyoming in 1983. I enjoy my 17 grandchildren and six great-grandchildren.

Even though there were many hard times while living on the dry farm and raising my family, I feel I have had a very fulfilling life and enjoyed it all.

Hageman, Henry and Freda Family

(Conrad) Henry (August) Hagemann was born on December 5, 1867 at Hohenhausen-Lippe-Detmold, Deutschland (Germany). He was the son of Conrad Heinrich Hagemann and Christine Florentine (Ernstmeier) Hagemann, who were also both born at Hohenhausen-Lippe-Detmold, Deutschland in the 1830s. Henry came with his brother, Fred, to the United States when they were both young men. They made their way to Baron County in northern Wisconsin. Henry bought 200 acres of timberland and made a farm out of it. He later sold it, doubling the original price. In 1901, he moved to Michigan where he bought a farm in Tuscola County. He improved this farm by more than doubling the yield of corn per acre. He sold this place in 1907, and bought another farm near Unionville, Michigan where he lived until 1918 when he came to Wyoming. Being an aggressive and adventurous individual, he saw the possibilities of using homestead land in Wyoming for himself and his sons for extensive farming.

Carl Hageman, 1967, in Rural Fire District truck.

Henry was married on July 3, 1897 at Cumberland, Wisconsin to Miss Frieda (Freda) Gretta Lu'ebke. (At this time Henry changed the spelling of his name from Hagemann to Hageman). Freda was born on March 28, 1879 at Stettin, Deutschland (Germany) which was in the northern part, near the East Sea, bordering Poland (now Szczecin, Germany). Freda was eight years old when her mother died, and at the age of 16 she left Germany and came to the United States to live with a sister and family. She came on the first voyage of the German ship, Kaiser-Wilhelm. She met Henry at Cumberland, Wisconsin where they were married, and their first child, Elsie, was born on January 5, 1899 but died nine days later. Their second child, Curtis Ernest Henry (Curt) was born at Rice Lake, Wisconsin January 20, 1900. After the family moved to Unionville, Michigan, seven more children were born. Juanita Louise Lydia, February 9, 1903; Arthur Ernest (Art), June 7, 1904; Henry William, March 12, 1907 (died at age six months); Karl Friedrich (Carl), January 17, 1910; Martha Frieda, October 14, 1913; Elizabeth Margaret, March 12, 1916; and Arnold Richard, August 18, 1918.

Henry and his oldest son, Curt came to Wyoming in 1918 to acquire the homestead land, build a house and establish a home for the rest of the family. Henry returned to Michigan late that year to sell his farm there and bring the family to Wyoming. In February 1919, they arrived in Douglas on the train. They were met by Curt with a team of horses and buckboard to travel the last leg of their journey, approximately 21 miles northeast of Douglas to their new home in the Walker Creek community. Among the things that were new and different to Freda were sagebrush, wide-open spaces, wind (with sand and tumbleweeds blowing) and the dry climate. She said she actually thought some of the Wyoming winds would demolish their home and literally blow them away. But she gradually became accustomed to all the new things, and being a very stern, religious and ultra-conservative German woman, she was able to cope better than most with the adversities, and find something each day to thank God for. She raised her big family with this same faith and stern determination, and was a good and respected neighbor and friend to everyone. Lack of means and distances between neighbors' homes prevented very much community activity. However, she organized the first Walker Creek Sunday School under the American Sunday School Union in the early 1920's. This Sunday School is still active today with some people coming as far as 30 miles to attend services at the old one-room Walker Creek School House. The Hageman children attended the rural school and as they reached high school age, they lived with various families in Douglas and worked for their room and board in order to go to school.

Henry, with the help of his sons, was one of the more successful dry farmers in the area. In 1925, he had a yield of 46 bushels of oats, 26 bushels of wheat and 14 bushels of beans per acre. The year before, however, he had the misfortune to lose nearly all his fine grain field to a devastating prairie fire. For a time, the fire also came dangerously close to the new barn and other farm buildings. Members of the family vividly remember how their dad turned and raised his hands, saying "Lord, save my barn". At this moment, the wind did change, and the buildings were spared from the fire. While many of Henry's neighbors gave up farming and moved away, he stayed with it, and was able to make a modest living. He was also interested in affairs of community and state. He acquired a few mineral rights in 1925 on land that was given up as farm land by some of his neighbors. These mineral rights have proven to be a worthwhile investment, only in the past few years, as lease property to oil companies interested in developing Converse County's resources. Henry was an unsuccessful Democratic candidate for State Representative from Converse County in 1926. On February 3, 1928, Henry died of a heart attack, leaving Freda a widow for her remaining 47 years. Freda continued to live on the farm until the early 1960's. She was the rural news correspondent from the Walker Creek community for many years. She later moved into Douglas and after suffering several strokes, she was a resident of Michael Manor Nursing Home in Douglas for the last nine years of her life. She passed away on December 9, 1974, at the age of 95.

Of Henry and Freda's large family, Curt, the oldest son, lived as a bachelor on a Walker Creek homestead for a number of years. He served in the U. S. Army in the Pacific in World War II. At the age of 53, he married Louise Lampman, Douglas elementary teacher. They moved to a farm in the Torrington, Wyoming area where he passed away of a heart attack in 1971, leaving his widow as his only heir.

Juanita, the oldest daughter, was a country school teacher for a time. She married Converse County dry farmer, Raymond Beaver, (now deceased) originally from Nebraska. They farmed in the Walker Creek community for many years. Juanita is now a resident of Irwin Towers in Douglas. They were the parents of three children: George Beaver of Casper, employed at Dave Johnston Power Plant in Glenrock, Don Beaver, a power company employee in California and Ramona Baker, deceased.

The second son, Arthur, worked with his father, Henry, on the farm instead of going to high school. In 1926, he acquired a relinquished homestead of 320 acres about four miles from his father's place. Later, he obtained another 320 acres of land from his father, giving him 640 acres. In 1928, Arthur married country school teacher Mabel Sanford. They lived on this 640 acre dry farm (my childhood home) for 25 years, raising a family of seven children in a three-room house. The homestead was recently purchased by their son, Bill.

Carl, Henry and Freda's third son, continued to farm and live on the original homestead for many years until he passed away of a heart attack on May 9, 1978. He married Marie Edwards, daughter of neighboring homesteaders (see Edwards story).

Martha, second daughter of Henry and Freda, married Don Porter, son of neighboring homesteaders (see Porter story).

Elizabeth, the youngest daughter, married Earl R. Johnson of Douglas, originally from Missouri. He died of a heart attack at their home in Casper in 1971. They had lived in Laramie and Douglas for a number of years, then moved to Casper where Earl was a Certified Public Accountant, one time mayor of Casper, and owner of the Gladstone Hotel in Casper. Their children are: Richard, Casper attorney; Barbara Amadio, married Charles Amadio, both are public school teachers at Lander, Wyoming; Neal, Certified Public Accountant at Casper, Wyoming, married Mary of Casper. In June of 1975, Elizabeth was remarried to Harold McFarland of Casper. She passed away of cancer on October 12, 1977.

Arnold, the youngest son, graduated from the University of Wyoming, and served with the U. S. Army in Germany and France in World War II. He lived in the Hawk Springs, Wyoming area where he farmed for several years. He now lives in Torrington, Wyoming where he is a real estate broker and continues some farming interests. He is married to Jean Kuntz. Their children are: Richard, construction worker; Charlotte, wife of Henry Klein, farmers at Wheatland, Wyoming; Roger, self-employed with a tree farm at Fort Collins, Colorado; Rodney, employed by Internal Revenue Service in Arizona; and Joe, attorney at Laramie, Wyoming.

Hakalo, John G. and Lisa Family

My mother and father, John G. Hakalo and Lisa Wilhelmina Rislakeus Hakalo, came to Glenrock from Finland in the late 1800's. There were quite a few Finnish families here then. Father came in 1891. I, Edith, do not know if his three brothers, Matthew, Ezra and Victor came with him or whether they were already in America. Matthew settled in Brookline, Massachusetts, Ezra came to Red Lodge, Montana and Victor in Ohio. Mother came in 1894. It took Father three years to earn enough money to send for her and their two children, Hilda (seven), and John (five).

I often marvelled at how she ever made the long journey with two small children, not speaking a word of English. She said that everyone was very kind to her and helped her along the way. She often told of the train crew stopping the train on the plains of Nebraska to go hunting for prairie chickens, rabbits and deer. There was no passenger train from Omaha to Glenrock, only a freight.

Father came first to Hanna, Wyoming where he worked in the coal mine there and then came on to Glenrock. He built a log house in Happy Hollow, as it is still called, near Deer Creek and Mother boarded some of the single miners and did their laundry on a wash board.

It is a wonder she survived the hard work while bearing children, never taking more than two days off after giving birth. Six children were born in Glenrock. They were: Lydia, born 1895; William, October 28, 1897; Fanne M., December 25, 1898; Olive, July 18, 1902; two others, a boy and a girl were stillborn. Matthew E. was born May 23, 1904 at Big Muddy, west of Glenrock, where Father worked in the mine there for awhile. Lydia died of mastoiditis at the age of four.

At one time there was an epidemic of typhoid fever and Mother and John both contracted it. Mother lost all of her hair, but it soon grew back. Mother sent one of the children for Dr. Rudd (Rugg), but he was out of town, so they got Mrs. Kimball from the Kimball Hotel. She was knowledgeable about medicine, and she did what she could. When she went back uptown, she put a padlock on the door of the doctor's office and when he returned, he had to go to her for the key and got a good dressing down for leaving town and leaving such sick patients.

I don't know the date, but later Father filed on a homestead at the foot of Mormon Canyon, south of town. It took him quite awhile to prove up on it. He would walk out there and clear the brush and trees, mostly by hand. Then he saved enough to buy a team of horses. He built a sod-roofed house of logs with three rooms. I do not remember much about it, although I was born there on September 6, 1908 with only Father and a neighbor from town, Mrs. Sarvey, to help.

There was a one-room building north of where we lived — I am not sure, but I think Father built it as it was used for a school house for Bill, Olive, Matt and John Lakso and his sister, Susie, who lived farther up the canyon. I can recall going with them one day to visit school. Father took us in a sled drawn by horses through the snow and I was so excited being allowed to go with them. The teacher was a man, Mr. Brinker. His wife taught a school east of us and he rode over from there every day on horseback. There couldn't have been school there more than one or two years.

Father decided to build a house there as it was closer to the mouth of the canyon and he used the school house for the kitchen. He built a two-room log house onto this with an upstairs, reached by an outside stairway. I grew up there with Olive and Matt and had a happy childhood. We didn't have much in the way of material things, but always had plenty to eat. Father always had a bag of pink or white peppermints in his pocket when he came from town.

We had school there at the ranch one winter with Adelyna Goff Smith as the teacher. She must have found me a nuisance as I was always sneaking over to the school and pestering her. I wanted to learn to read so badly and everyone told me that I would when I was six years old and went to school. All I heard was the "six year old" and on my sixth birthday I got up very early and ran for a book and was bitterly disappointed that I couldn't read a word!

Later, Mother would move into town every fall with the three of us so Olive, Matt and later I, could go to school. My older sisters and brothers; Hilda, John, and Bill had left home to go to work or school elsewhere. Dad took in a cow so we would have milk. I remember going with Olive and Matt to take buckets of milk in the evenings to a couple of families up town. I recall walking on the wooden sidewalks.

My first grade teacher was Helen Nevin from Denver, who later married William Walkinshaw and they lived on the VR Ranch on Deer Creek — he first as foreman and later as manager. In 1931 I went to this ranch and taught her three boys for three years, before marrying William Booker, whose father had been manager of the ranch before Walkinshaw. We lived on the lower VR for three years, but that is another story.

I recall many a cold trip from town to the ranch for Thanksgiving and Christmas holidays. Dad would come in a sled filled with straw and stones heated and wrapped in old blankets to keep us warm. It was only seven miles but seemed farther. Matthew did not go to high school, but stayed home to help father on the ranch. Olive graduated from high school in Glenrock. I went there through the sixth grade and then went to Douglas and stayed with my sister, Fanne Knittle and graduated from the Douglas High School.

Matthew's oldest son, Matthew Orville, lives on the home ranch now. He married Lois Mason from north of Douglas.

My mother died on October 20, 1929 and father on September 30, 1939. Both mother and father taught themselves to read English and could speak it fairly well. Father loved to read western books and magazines. He would never read aloud to me. He said I would laugh at him, but he understood most of the stories and news items and could talk about them.

Hilda married Clifford Smith, son of a pioneer family in Glenrock. They lived in Glenrock and had two children, Ernest of Casper and Ruth Parker of Cambridge, Nebraska.

John and Bill were both in World War I, Bill at Fort Douglas near Salt Lake City, Utah. He married a Utah girl and lived for a short time in Glenrock, then went back to Utah where he lived the rest of his life. They had three daughters.

John was in the navy on a transport ship and married an English girl, Bertha Bibby from Liverpool. They had one daughter, Roberta Jean Morton, who lives in Casper. Bertha died in 1934. He later married Jessie Grant.

Fanne married Thomas R. Knittle who was County Surveyor in Douglas for many years and later was drainage engineer for the Bureau of Reclamation at Pavillion and Riverton. They retired to California first and then to Sun City, Arizona. They had five children, the oldest, Tommy, died March 9, 1926, and is buried in Douglas; twins, Donald and Dorothy (McLarty). Dorothy lives in Lubbock, Texas, and Don in Seabrook, Texas; Joanne (Harrison) of Saratoga, California, and Mary (Watt) of Riverton.

Olive married Harry Crosley and they lived most of their lives in Glenrock. They had three boys: Clyde and Jimmy, both deceased and David who lives in Aurora, Colorado.

Matthew married Charlotte Vincent on the stage of the old Columbia Theater in Casper on April 1, 1926, as a publicity promotion. They received many gifts and a tour of Casper and the Midwest oil fields. They had four children: Matthew Orville, Maxine (Baughn), Robert, and Barbara (Neddenriep) who lives in Minden, Nevada.

I am the only one left in my immediate family.

Hakalo, John O. and Jesse

John Oscar Hakalo was born in Ispkyro, Finland on December 27, 1889. He was the son of John Gustave and Lisa Wilhelmina (Rislakeus) Hakalo.

When John was a teenager, the family lived for a time at Lockett where he drove a horse and cart to take the mail from the depot to the post office. His very first job was riding the horse that pulled the plow for the crippled school teacher on the farm now owned by the Brubakers. His pay was fifty cents. As he grew older, he worked on various ranches in the community, but when he was nineteen, he went up into the second range of mountains to be night boiler man at the Elkhorn copper mine. One day he heard Mrs. Heller and Mrs. Olson (the wives of the owners) talking about what an enormous appetite he had. He was so embarrassed that he quit his job and went back to town.

Many of the young men worked for the VR ranch and so did John. The log bunkhouse was so bothered with bedbugs that the boys, on sunny Sundays, took their bedding out and layed it on a big ant hill, and the ants cleaned it. At that time, the VR had cattle only, and all butter, milk and eggs came from town.

When World War I started, quite a few Glenrock boys went into the service, John and Bill Lythgoe served together in the navy. John was a fireman and shoveled coal on the troop transport Plattensburg for twenty-two crossings of the Atlantic. They shoveled the coal into wheelbarrows, pushed it to the furnace and dumped it into the firebox. When the seas were rough, they pushed uphill or sat down and pulled back. He was only sea sick once, and sea sick troops turned slightly green when the nice, healthy firemen came to the mess with heaped plates. Unfortunately, when he took his only deep-sea fishing trip, he was sick the whole day! And he loved to fish.

While in Liverpool during the war, he met his future wife, Bertha Bibby. When the war ended, she and her parents came to her sister's in Tacoma, Washington, and John and his mother joined them there for the wedding. They made their home in Parkerton, and John worked for Ohio Oil Company. After 26 years, he took early retirement because of ill health, and his retirement check was $23.09 a month. This was in 1945.

John and Bertha had one little girl, Roberta Jean. Bertha died in 1934, and the following year on March 15, 1935, John married Jessie Grant, daughter of Walter and Cora Grant. When Ohio Oil Company withdrew from the Muddy Field, John was transferred to the Lance Creek Field. At first, he and the other fellows lived together and batched, but gradually houses became available. We had three rooms — and a bath.

In the eight and one-half years we lived in Lance Creek, we helped start a PTA, an Odd Fellows and a Rebekah Lodge, and John served one term on the school board. Jessie was a part-time school nurse.

On their return from the service, John and Lloyd Huxtable took up homesteads. They leased the Howard Jackson place between them and raised hay and potatoes. The potatoes grew so large that no one wanted to buy them. When John took early retirement, he wanted to try the ranch life. We bought the Victor Lakso place at the head of Mormon Canyon to go with his homestead and the Andrew Naggadai place and moved up there, but John was not able to do the work so after one year, the ranch was sold to Ralph and Leonard Hiser. We moved to Casper, John went to the Veteran's Hospital and I went to work. When he improved, he went to work for Morrison-Knudsen at Boysen dam.

When John became 65, he wanted to find a little acreage. After making several trips around the west, we settled in Grants Pass, Oregon. We had a lovely little place with a creek running between the house and the barn, but John was sick in Oregon. After selling the place and living in town until school was out, we came back to Glenrock. We had a house built for us on South Second which is now owned by Bill Croft. John went fishing and enjoyed being back in Wyoming. He told the fellows here about the big salmon he caught in Oregon, just as he had told the fellows in Oregon about the wonderful fishing and hunting in Wyoming. He had a little Ford pickup with a canopy on it to hold his gear, but his driving habits deteriorated. One day he took Ernest Jones on a trip and when they returned Ernest got out and said, "John, you have just lost a customer. I will never ride with you again!"

Our children were grown and away from home by this time. Roberta Jean was born April 18, 1933 in the midst of the big snow storm; Marian Susan on September 10, 1941; and when they wanted a baby brother, John Merritt on December 4, 1945. Susan lives in Hollywood, California with her husband, William Chisholm. She has two grown children, Marian Eileen and Roger Alvin, who is married. Roberta lives in Casper. She married Eugene R. Morton in 1955, and they have five children: Patricia Lynn who is married to Paul Rhodes; Ann Louise who is married to Stephen Jeffrey Price, and they have two children, Emily Christine and Christopher Michael; Michael Stuart, Mark Stephen and Rebecca Joy who are still at home. John and Lynda have three children, Aaron Scott, Jessica Leanne and John Wayne.

In about 1962, John decided he would like to go back to Finland and see what he could find of his family. He flew over and came back by ship, and he said that was the nicest trip of his life. He found four cousins on his mother's side in Finland, and he really enjoyed visiting them. He went fishing on the Kermi River where there was 24 hours of daylight, but he caught no fish as nets had been put at the mouth of the river by commercial fishermen.

John's biggest interest in life, besides sports, was the Odd Fellows Lodge. He was a member for more than fifty years and seldom missed a meeting. He became Grand Master of Wyoming and was Grand Representative of the Sovereign Grand Lodge session in Des Moines, Iowa in 1941. He received the Decoration of Chivalry for his work in the order and for helping start the lodges in Lance Creek.

On January 27, 1965, John suffered a massive stroke, and he is buried in the Glenrock cemetery.

Hall, Cloyd and Minta

Cloyd Hall was born on November 23, 1876 at Elliptsburg, Pennsylvania, the son of William T. and Allena Kell Hall.

The family moved to Friend, Nebraska when he was a small child, later moving to Fairview, Nebraska where he grew to manhood.

L. to R. Jim Bowers and Cloyd Hall.

On October 24, 1906 he was united in marriage to Minta LaRue at Stockville, Nebraska. Minta was born at Stockville on August 14, 1886.

They moved to Paoli, Colorado in 1910 where they lived on a farm.

Robert, the oldest of the Hall children, was born in Ingham, Nebraska in 1907 and died in 1977. The other four were born in Paoli. They were: Blanche (born 1910, died 1983), Cloyd Jr. (born 1913), Laurence (born 1915) and Ruth (born 1918, died 1979).

On November 23, 1917 Cloyd homesteaded north of Douglas in the Dry Creek community. He moved his family there in April 1919.

Leaving Robert on the homestead, Cloyd and Minta moved to Douglas in 1937. He worked at various government jobs including the POW Camp at Douglas where he was seriously injured.

Minta died July 29, 1963; Cloyd in April 1968.

Robert married Violet Moore of Bayard, Nebraska. They had six children.

Blanche married Kenneth F. Sylvester on June 13, 1933. They have one daughter, Shirley (Williams). Kenneth worked for Pacific Power and Light Company for many years. Blanche died on Nov. 1, 1983.

Laurence married Phyllis Porter in 1952.

Hall, William and Elsie

William C. Hall, born and reared to the ranching industry, was the owner of a ranch property located 16 miles northeast of Douglas in Converse County, Wyoming. Mr. Hall's residence in Wyoming began on March 22, 1916 when he settled in Converse County. A month later he homesteaded 320 acres, gradually increasing his holdings to their present extent.

William C. Hall was born to Edward C. Hall and Elizabeth A. Hall on March 9, 1893. He was educated in the high school of St. Edwards, Nebraska. Hall was also a director of the First National Bank of Douglas, which he helped organize. He was a former Democratic State Committeeman and served as a delegate to the Democratic National Convention in 1964.

Mr. Hall and Elsie M. Virden, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry C. Virden were married on December 15, 1928 in Denver, Colorado. Elsie M. Virden was born November 2, 1910 at Ada, Oklahoma. When she was five, the family moved to the Ozarks. The family moved later to Prescott, Arkansas, where she started the first grade. She lived in and around Prescott until she married. Elsie resides in Whittier, California.

Mr. and Mrs. Hall were the parents of eight daughters; Mary Lou (Hopkins) Hovda, Billie Mae Lindberg, Doris Irene Dennis, Alice Fay Alkire, Evelyn Grace Hall, Edna Christine Reese, Mildred Jean Sparks and Carolyn Marie Templar. They had 21 grandchildren.

William C. Hall passed away on March 12, 1977 of a heart attack at his ranch. He was preceded in death by his parents and four grandchildren.

Hamilton, Scott and Millie

Winfred Scott Hamilton was born in October 1848 in New Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, the son of William R. and Anna Hamilton. William R. was a native of Scotland.

Scott lived in Pennsylvania until 1878 when he moved to Columbus, Nebraska. In 1879 he came to Wyoming where he jumped a claim of William E. Guthrie on LaBonte Creek at the mouth of Indian or Wilson Creek.

In 1885 he returned to Pennsylvania where he married Millie Q. Marshall. They returned to Wyoming in 1887 where they lived on Scott's homestead. They built a fine two-story cement house, one of the finest at that time on LaBonte. A water right was acquired in 1890 for 193 acres out of LaBonte Creek and a big irrigation canal was built. A fine apple orchard was also planted.

Scott's brother, William F., also came to Converse County.

Scott died on August 13, 1919; Millie in 1936.

C.D. Zimmerman and his Diamond Dot outfit acquired the place in the late 1920's. They operated it until Fred Manning bought it in 1944. Richard Pexton has most of the place in 1985.

John R. Pexton

Hamilton, W. F. and Mary Family

William Findley Hamilton was born on January 12, 1850 in New Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, the son of W.R. and Anna (Hamilton) Hamilton.

W. F. attended college in Scio, Ohio, after which he returned home and was employed by his father. At intervals he also taught school until 1879, when he came west to Cheyenne because of his health. He entered the employment of Hay and Thomas where he was engaged in sheep husbandry.

On October 24, 1883 he married Mary Vincent, daughter of Rev. G. C. Vincent, minister of the Presbyterian Church in New Wilmington, Pennsylvania. Their children were Martha (Caley), Artie B. (born March 30, 1888, died March 4, 1965), George R. (born September 14, 1890, died May 2, 1918), William (born May 10, 1891, died October 31, 1932) and James H. (born January 10, 1893, died March 19, 1931).

The Hamiltons moved to Fort Laramie in 1883 where W. F. was in charge of the government farm there. In 1886 they moved to Douglas where Mr. Hamilton was a representative of Henry G. Hay. He located and plotted 80 acres of land joining the townsite on the south which was known as the Hamilton Addition. He built the first brick house in central Wyoming. It still stands at 623 South Fourth Street.

In 1889 W. F. became postmaster of Douglas, a position he held until 1892.

He homesteaded on what was known as the 86 Homestead located where McKinley or Wilson, Wyoming is now. He is credited as being the first person to bring sheep across the Platte River. In 1894 he sold his belongings on the Platte to Dr. J. M. Wilson and DeForest Richards. It was to be their headquarters for their wide spread Platte Valley Sheep Company.

By 1896 the family had moved back to Douglas where they bought John Coffey's house at 211 South Fifth Street. It was to stay in the family until Artie LeBar died.

Mr. Hamilton became involved in the LaPrele Ditch and Reservoir Company along with B. J. Erwin and Dr. J. M. Wilson. He purchased the Brenning Ranch with 600 acres of irrigated land. W. F. and his sons owned the ranch where the Chamberlain brothers live today and owned at one time the Six Mile Ranch west of Douglas. He had an interest, along with B. J. Erwin and John LeBar, in the Hamilton Sheep Company. The company was incorporated in 1908 with a capital of $50,000.

Mary V. died on March 2, 1907; William F. on June 10, 1926.

Artie married John Depue LeBar on May 3, 1908. John, the son of Hiram and Elizabeth Heller LeBar, was born August 25, 1882 in Shawnee, Pennsylvania.

John D. Sr. received his franchise as a Ford dealer in 1913. The Ford headquarters in Douglas stayed in the LeBar name for 53 years.

Two sons, James W. (born May 31, 1916, died October 21, 1942) and John Jr., and one daughter, Dae (Nielsen) were born to John and Artie.

John D. Sr. died November 11, 1949 and Artie on March 4, 1965.

Hammond, George and Nellie

George Hammond, son of Milt and Clara Belle Newell Hammond was born in a dugout on LaBonte Creek on March 16, 1893.

On November 6, 1915, George and Nellie Newell, daughter of Gus and Elsie Newell, were married in Douglas with W. K. Weaver as minister and Mrs. W. K. Weaver as witness.

The couple had three children: Darr (born November 11, 1916, died October 6, 1983), Ardith (born February 24, 1924, died March 1948), and a son dying in early infancy in 1926.

Nellie was an accomplished wood carver and was known throughout the west for her work. Some of the better known works are: the Wyoming State Seal (made of cedar) hanging in the Governors Mansion in Cheyenne, a model of Buffalo Bill's Stage Coach, an Indian on a horse that was one of Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt's prized possessions and many others.

Darr went to school at the Gray Rocks School near Esterbrook with Mrs. German as one of his teachers. Other students were from the Crabb and Donald families.

The family lived at one time on the Archie Hamner ranch on Horseshoe Creek which they had purchased from Bollns in 1935. Shortly after that they moved to another part of the state.

Nellie died on July 24, 1967.

Hammond, Harve and Sarah

James Harvey "Harve" Hammond was born at Linn County, Iowa on February 23, 1850. His mother died when he was two years old and his father married again. He had five sisters, one brother and two half brothers.

Sarah was born at Smith County, Kansas on January 26, 1855 to Levi and Ann McNealy. She and Harve were married at her parents' home on January 18, 1877.

They made their home in Kansas for a time and then in Missouri where Harve had a blacksmith shop.

The Missouri climate didn't favor the family well and after much sickness, malaria and quinsy, and the death of their ten-year-old son, Levi, Sarah and Harve decided their children would be better off back in Kansas. Sarah, with the help of her oldest son Calvin, took the family and traveled to her parents' farm by wagon. Harve sold his business and followed them there a year and a half later.

They made their home at Clay Center for two or three years and Harve hauled freight from St. Louis to Denver. He told many times about the terrible grasshopper infestation of Kansas. How dark the sky would be, how they fought the "Hoppers", and how they ate everything including the fence posts. Once, when crossing Kansas, a small group of Indians followed them for miles, until they were ready to camp. One of the braver ones came to the camp and asked for "yum-yum". One of the men who knew what he was saying said, "he is asking for sweet." Granddad opened a barrel of sugar and filled everything they had that would hold sugar, and they were happy and went on their way.

Harve moved his family to Dawes County, Nebraska and once again set up a blacksmith shop. After awhile he started hauling freight into Wyoming. After many trips West, and at the urging of his half brother, Milt, he filed on a homestead south of Douglas. In 1901 he moved the family to the Wagonhound Creek home. Several members of the family took out homesteads and built their homes there. A post office was established and called "Hammond" and Sarah was appointed postmistress.

Harve worked to prove up on his homestead, developed some irrigation on parts of it. He also helped the other members of his family in developing theirs. They had the trials and tribulations that were the lot of all homesteaders. Harve had a threshing machine and threshed for many of the places on Wagonhound, LaBonte and Horseshoe Creeks. He talked of those times fondly.

In 1908 he sold his homestead to his son Cal and he and Sarah moved into Douglas with their three younger daughters, Anna, Clara, and Chloe, so that the girls might attend high school. They built a house on Sixth Street, now owned and occupied by Hazel Strock, daughter of Milt Hammond. In talking to Hazel, she told that she stayed with "Uncle Harve and Aunt Sarah" when two of her children were born in that house. Two children of Mabel's (a daughter of Harve and Sarah) were born there and also Clara's daughter Ida. Harve and Sarah raised their granddaughter Ida Malone.

Sarah died January 20, 1925, while she and Harve were at the home of their daughter, Clara, in Ogden, Utah. Her funeral was held in the house on Sixth Street in Douglas as was the custom at that time.

After Sarah's death Harve made his home with Clara for a time and then came back to Wyoming and lived with his daughter, Anna, and her husband, Jack Kirwan, until his death December 20, 1938.

He and Sarah are buried in Douglas Park Cemetery.

They were good and loving people. My grandmother, Sarah, I only know through my mother, Mabel and my aunts. Mama, in talking of her mother, Sarah, the things she had said and done, quoting her often. I came to admire her and felt love for her. My granddad, Harve, I did love. He was blind the last nine years of his life and I spent many hours reading to him. He had been an avid reader. He was also an excellent conversationalist. I loved listening to him and being with him.

Harve and Sarah had nine children and they are as follows:

Calvin W. — born March 18, 1878. He married Mary "Goldie" George on October 9, 1907, a neighboring rancher's daughter. They homesteaded on Wagonhound. Calvin died on May 23, 1916 at the age of 38 of an infected tooth and Goldie moved to Douglas to raise their children, Bob, Grace (Barry), Gladys (Hazen); and Cal, the youngest, made his home with his cousin, Gordon Fitzhugh.

Gertie — born August 6, 1879. She married Joe Francisco on July 27, 1898. They had twelve children who grew to adulthood: Clyde, Merle, twins Ruth (Scheurmann) and Ruby (Carlson), Jessie, Tony, Jack, Robert, Sarah, Ben, Betty and Verne. They also homesteaded, later moved into Douglas, and then on to Farmington, New Mexico where Joe died June 22, 1933. Gertie finished raising her family there and then moved to Ogden, Utah where she died February 12, 1948.

Levi Harrison — born June 18, 1881. Levi died on July 20, 1891.

Frederick — born March 28, 1883. He married Ruby Moody on February 3, 1910. They also homesteaded and had two children, Freda and Fred. Fred went to Canada and died there of unknown circumstances. Ruby later moved to California with her children.

Mabel — born August 26, 1885. She married John D. Smith on March 21, 1904. John was a cowboy for the Saul Company. He later homesteaded and carried the mail horseback from the Fitzhugh Ranch to Marshall. They were the parents of five daughters, Maude (Ryan), Myra (Loomer), Gertrude (Churchill), Joan (Cundall) and Betty (Bishop). John and Mabel separated in 1927. Mabel married Milton Copenhaver on October 5, 1940. He died in April 1943, and Mabel died on December 28, 1963 while at the home of her daughter, Gertrude, in Denver.

Cyrus M. — born on September 23, 1886 and died on July 4, 1888.

Anna and Clara - twins — born on January 17, 1890. Anna married Jack Kirwan on April 11, 1915, well-known saddlemaker in Douglas. Anna homesteaded and was a schoolteacher. She and Jack had no children, but they were like a second mother and father to many of their nieces and nephews. Anna died in May 1940 from an infected leg that was amputated. Jack died at Lusk, where he had started another saddleshop, from a heart attack in the fall of 1944.

Clara married Max Malone on September 9, 1908. They had one daughter, Ida (Scanlon). Clara moved to Ogden, Utah where she owned a hotel and later married Vane Morgan. Clara died on July 16, 1955. Vane had preceded her in death.

Chloe — born on February 13, 1893. She married George Brow on August 6, 1912. They homesteaded in the Wagonhound area. They were parents of twelve children growing to maturity. George Jr., Ruby (Halloway), Jack, Sue (Falk), Jean, Loss, Betty, Valerie, Ida (Jackson), Shirley (Bryson), Barbara (Read), and David. Chloe and George remained on their homestead and eventually acquired the homesteads of the other Hammond family members. Chloe taught the rural school (Benway), her children and others attended. In the mid 40's George had a stroke and was no longer able to ranch. Their son, Jack, took over the operation and Chloe and George purchased property in Douglas and moved to town. George died shortly afterward and Chloe in 1960. Their ranch is now owned by the Middletons.

Several other members of the family came to Wyoming to homestead also. Sarah Hammond Dawes and her husband, Ed, the parents of Maud Dawes, an early day County Superintendent of Schools in Converse County. Kate was married to Henry Dean who operated a butcher shop on Second Street in Douglas. Nan Marshall, whose husband had a sawmill in the Cold Springs area. A half brother, Milt, who homesteaded on Wagonhound Creek.

Hammond, Millard and Clara

Millard "Milt" Hammond was born November 13, 1856 in Jackson County, Missouri.

At the early age of 15, Milt left home and became a bullwhacker. He freighted into Oklahoma and Texas.

In 1872, the trail herds beckoned and, he trailed cattle from Texas to Fort Kearney, Nebraska. After helping on more cattle drives from 1872 to 1876, he went to the Black Hills of South Dakota to prospect. Having no luck in the gold fields, he then went to Fort Benton, Montana where he outfitted a wagon train. With two six-mule teams, he freighted into Canada and western Montana. Later he helped survey the line for the Canadian Pacific Railroad in 1881.

Coming to Wyoming in the late 1880s Milt freighted lumber from the mills near Esterbrook into Douglas.

While working in the Esterbrook area he met and married Clara Belle Newell, the daughter of George and Adelia Newell. They were married by Justice of the Peace, H.R. Mewis in Douglas on August 14, 1892 with V. S. and Mary Morton as their witnesses.

Finding work at the Guthrie Ranch on LaBonte, he worked there as a cowboy.

The first two children, George and Hazel were born in a dugout, in which Milt and Clara Belle made their home during the first years on the Guthrie Ranch. George was born on March 16, 1893, and Hazel on December 30, 1893.

The Hammonds lived for awhile at Dr. Wilson's Platte Valley Ranch where Milt was foreman for two years. The family then moved to the Barry Ranch on LaPrele Creek in order to be near a school. George and Hazel went one year to the Beaver School which was taught by their cousin, Maud Dawes.

The family then moved to Wagonhound Creek where Milt filed on a homestead. The homestead is now owned by George Wills.

Three more sons were born. One died in infancy and is buried on the ranch on Wagonhound Creek. Cecil, born December 15, 1904 died December 20, 1965, and Edward, born 1908.

Milt passed away in 1944 and Clara Belle on October 9, 1941. They are both buried at the Springhill Cemetery near Esterbrook.

Hamner Family

In 1886, Charles Hamner brought his wife, Hulda and sons Walter, Archie and two other sons (names unknown) to the Esterbrook area. The men cut ties on contract for the new railroad that the Colorado and Southern was building from Cheyenne to Orin Junction to intersect the Fremont, Elkhorn, and Missouri Valley Railroad. An excerpt from Guy Newell Sr.'s diary has this to say about the Hamners. "And, oh, such huge men, there wasn't any of them underweight of two hundred fifty-three pounds and the elder was just as broad as he was long, just as well jump over him as to walk around."

Archie Hamner was born in Long Lake, New York on August 19, 1866. His parents were Charles and Hulda Hamner.

In 1889 Archie married Mary E. "Mame" Newell. Mary was born May 17, 1864 in Cedar Falls, Iowa to George and Adelia Newell.

Archie had a homestead on Horseshoe Creek. He built a spacious two-story house that still stands. The house is being remodeled in 1984 by Dr. Kirby Kirkland who owns the property. Previous owners are George Bolln, Al Rice, Robert Sturgeon and Art Fawcett.

Mame was renowned throughout the area for her genial hospitality and the meals that she cooked. Her table was always set for several people. The ranch was a gathering place for people of the neighborhood to celebrate everything from the Fourth of July to Christmas.

After selling the holdings in their later years, Archie and Mame returned to New York. The lure of Wyoming beckoned them back, however, as they returned to Glendo where they operated a filling station.

Mary died March 18, 1943 and Archie February 2, 1952.

Walter Hamner also stayed in the area. He was married to JoHanna and died August 24, 1934 at the age of seventy-three.

Hanlin, Lewis and Alice

In early 1919 the government gave a chance to all veterans to prove up on 640 acres of homestead land in a nine month period. Charles Hanlin was greatly interested in this offer and after discussing this over with his brother, Lewis Hanlin, they decided to take a trip to Wyoming and check into the offer. They liked what they found and immediately filed on claims. They returned to Smithfield, Nebraska and made plans for returning to Douglas, Wyoming.

In the fall of 1919 they returned to Wyoming in a Model T Ford pulling a covered wagon mounted on a two wheel axle. Perhaps it was the first trailer to travel the Yellowstone Highway. They were to use this later on, until they got horses to haul lumber, fence posts and many other things. They each built a homestead house with a box car roof. Charles built a one room house and named it Hookum Bull. Lewis built a 20 foot house just across the line from Charles' house. His house was divided into three bedrooms, with the kitchen in the basement.

In June 1920 Lewis returned to Nebraska to get his family. He loaded Alice, his wife, into the front seat of the Ford and filled the back seat with his four children: James (2), Leland (6), Jack (9) and Gladys (14). Douglas was born four years later in Douglas. On the running board of the car Alice put one old hen and twelve baby chicks in a crate.

What a thrill that trip from Nebraska to Wyoming was! Large herds of cattle and sheep were grazing. This was their first look at sheep and mountains and dear old Laramie Peak. In June 1920 they reached Douglas and started north to the homestead. It had been a beautiful spring, lots of rain had filled all the water holes and the grass and wild flowers were everywhere. The kids could hardly wait for the car to stop so they could see inside their new house. Lewis had planted a garden before he came back home for his family. For dinner that day Alice went to the garden and there was lettuce, radishes and green onions. The next morning Lewis went to Douglas for supplies and furniture. Alice heard her mother hen making a fuss so she ran out to see the cause and there was a rattlesnake after the baby chicks.

One afternoon a storm came in with much lightning and thunder. The family hurried down into the basement where the kitchen was. Alice vowed that she was going back to Nebraska as soon as Lewis got home. In a few weeks there was a lightning rod on top of the house. That was all that kept her in Wyoming. What a summer that was for the kids. How they did enjoy it all. They put so many rocks in all their pockets that they could hardly walk. The boys got cactus in their feet and waded in water holes.

There were picnics on Sunday where they met their new neighbors. The famous Walker Creek Picnic, held once a year, was at one time attended by 1000 people. The kids made friends with the McCartney children: Jessie, Minnie, Flora, Albert and Gladys and Lucille Anderson Beaver. It started a friendship that has lasted 64 years. Their neighbors lived within a five mile radius of them. They were the McCartneys, Plesters, Kinders, Septors, Pounds, Whitmarshs, Lyon Thatchers, Gillespies, Andersons, Wilemans and Lores.

Their first school was located at Loretta Walker Wileman's homestead, eight miles from their home. Mable Walker Wileman taught the children of Roy Lewis, George Sheets, Lewis and Lou Hanlin. Later the school building was moved eight miles east between Willow and Lightning Creeks. John Poulson was the teacher in 1925, Gladys Hanlin taught her first term of school here in 1926-27 with Perdita and John Whitmarsh, Orin Septor, Claude Dayton, Harry Pounds and Leland and James Hanlin as her pupils. Stacia Baker taught in 1927-28 with Lucille Meisner teaching in 1928-29, the last year school was held in that location. In 1929 the schools consolidated and the pupils were all sent to Walker Creek School.

Alice died on October 19, 1962.

Gladys married William Swope in 1942. William had homesteaded in 1928 in the Verse Community. He died on June 1, 1975 after a long tenure as custodian at the North Grade School in Douglas.

Jack married Helen Schick in 1934. They have two sons, David and James.

Leland married Laurilla Hall.

James married Virginia Collier in 1946. They had three children. James died on January 19, 1967.

Douglas married Evelyn Bloomquist in 1947. They have two children.

Hanson, Olaf Helmer

Olaf's parents, Helene Borresdtr and Hans Hanson, came to America from Norway and settled in Pope County, Minn. They owned a grain farm. They had three sons and one daughter.

On Nov. 24, 1896, Olaf's father, Hans Hanson, died as a result of a threshing machine accident. The following article appeared in the Benson Times.

"A horrible accident, the worst we believe that we were ever called upon to describe, happened about twelve miles north of here Friday morning in the Township of Rolling Fork, Pope County. Hans B. Hanson, a well-to-do young farmer about 32 years of age, had the threshing machine at his house that morning, and the regular feeder not being present, he took that place himself. About 8 o'clock, and after only a few bundles had passed through, the return elevator, which brings back partly threshed grain to the cylinder, became choked up and he started forward over the cylinder, to clean it. It had been cold and snowy the night before and with snow upon his feet and ice and snow upon the machine, it was but an instant until he slipped and his left foot was drawn into the swiftly revolving cylinder, with its cruel teeth, which only stopped revolving when his leg had been drawn in almost to his hip. The engineer saw him as he started forward and realizing the danger of the step, at once turned and shut down the engine and but for this, the poor man would have gone almost, if not quite, through the machine. The right shoe was torn to pieces but the foot itself was scarcely injured. As soon as the machine was stopped the horrified spectators, commenced to do what they could for him. A man was dispatched to this place for a doctor and they went to work to get him out, which they were unable to do until they had taken the cylinder out, which took about half an hour, when he was taken to his house, about ten rods away. Dr. Scofield accompanied by Dr. Linjer, arrived in due time and after due preparation and consultation, it was decided to amputate the limb, which was done, almost at the hip, but although he had been conscious all the time until the operation and became so again after the effects of the anesthetic wore off, the shock, which naturally followed, was too much for him and he died about four o'clock that afternoon. He was the owner of his farm, which bears evidence of growing prosperity and has considerable upon it in the way of farm property. He leaves a wife and four small children, who have the sympathy of the entire community in their sudden and terrible loss."

Olaf's sister, Minnie, only five years old at the time, remembers how she wouldn't leave her father's side as he lay on the kitchen table, where he died.

Olaf's mother, Helene Borresdtr Hanson, took her four children, ages 5, 3, 1, and a baby, back to Norway to live with her parents, then decided it would be better to return to the farm to rear three boys, rather than in the city.

When Olaf was eight years old his mother died from bleeding ulcers. Olaf and his brother and sister were reared by their Uncle Lars Borreson, while the baby, Stewart, was brought up by another family.

When Olaf was old enough, he decided to take up a homestead in Douglas, Wyoming and settled in Converse County.

He raised sheep and grew grain. He branded his sheep, before he fenced in his land. He often spoke of his neighbors, and of their dependency on one another in those early days. Olaf never married. When he was unable to work anymore he sold his land. He died May 24, 1975, age 79.

The description of his Converse County land is: Township 37 North, Range 70 West, 6th PM, Section 15: E½, Recorded book 657, Page 347.

Hardesty, Harold & Maurine

Harold Franklin Hardesty was born in Elwell, Colorado in 1908, the third of six children of Homer J. and Lenora Fullerton Hardesty. Harold's great-grandfather, James Hardesty, was from Pennsylvania, and his grandfather, John, and father, Homer, were from Iowa. Harold was the first of his family to settle in Converse County, although his grandparents, John Coleman and Mary Fuller Hardesty, had lived at Dayton, Wyoming in the early 1900s, where John farmed and Mary ran a hotel. They left Dayton to homestead at Grover, Colorado. Harold remembers his Uncle Charles (one of John's sons who later became a Methodist minister in Casper, Wyoming) telling of the three-week trip when he was a child from Dayton to Grover in a covered wagon pulled by oxen. Harold's next touch with Wyoming was a trip by train to Douglas in 1924 when he was 16.

It was on that trip that he became fascinated with the West that he found in Douglas. He discovered and was entranced by the colorful old sheepherders who, faithful dogs at their heels, gathered at the Smokehouse Pool Hall a few doors north of the College Inn. Most came to town only twice a year, after lambing and after shipping stock, and they usually stayed at the Converse Hotel, which is still operating today. Harold spent many hours listening to the stories and yarns that these men and other old-timers told about their lives and experiences in the old west of this area. They were a great part of what brought him back three years later.

In 1927, when he was 19, Harold moved to Douglas from Morrill, Nebraska, where he had been a full-time farm hand since the age of 14. Having already gained a man's experience in farming, from hand picking and hoeing to field work with mules and four-horse teams, he contracted in 1928 to farm part of Bill and Sally Edwards' place south of town (now part of the Buzz Philbrick ranch). He lived in a little house for a while, but when the migrant workers arrived, they lived in it, so, for lack of better housing, he moved into an old wooden granary nearby. He laughingly recalls how he once put a pot of beans on low heat on the kerosene stove before he left for the day's work cultivating beets. He returned that evening, hungry and anticipating a hot meal, to find his beans burned to nothing but a pile of ashes and smoke. So much for cooking! Another time he, Bill and Sally Edwards headed for Laramie Peak in a 1928 Model T to do some fishing. One hill was so steep that they had to drive up it backward, for when the gas tank under the seat was lower than the motor, the car would not run; gas flowed through the lines by gravity rather than by vacuum in those days. Later that day they were peacefully fishing in Friend Creek at the foot of the peak when, suddenly, gunshots from the mountain rang out, kicking up dust all around them. They hightailed it out of there fast, after realizing they had probably gotten too close to someone's private liquor still!

1928 was the year Harold met his future wife, Maurine Bower, daughter of Clyde and Hazel Bower who lived west of Douglas. Maurine was a native of Douglas, born in 1914, and at the time they first met, was a 14 year old visiting friends south of town. They began dating a couple of years later and would be married in 1934. He always said it was her sparkling brown eyes, big smile and perennially sunny nature that made him unable to forget her once they had met.

Since Harold had always been convinced that he'd like to have lived a hundred years earlier, he again spent a great deal of time, from 1927 to 1934, visiting with many of the old-timers and cowboys, most of whom had gotten too old to work by then. However, some still lived as they always had, riding a saddle horse with a pack horse behind from one place to another; this whole area was their "home." Two who often stopped by to visit Harold while he lived south of town were Phil Housiaux and John Hartman. Housiaux told stories of his younger days as a U.S. Marshal, and Hartman passed along stories about Indian battles and Indian attacks on settlers traveling south of town. During these years Harold developed what was to become a life-long interest in and collection of relics of the early Wyoming Indians and settlers. He and Maurine were to spend many long days walking over the prairies, searching for reminders of a long-ago way of life.

He also fully enjoyed the life of the late 1920s and early 1930s. He was very proud of his early version of a hot rod, a 6-cylinder Star Coupe automobile. It was green with black fenders and top, and the exhaust was rigged with a five-tubed whistle and a cut-out, whereby when a chain was pulled there was a sound like a train whistle and a great deal of racket occurred. Maurine remembers sitting in school listening for the sound of Harold's Star coming over the hill, and the teacher chiding her for "daydreaming about that young man again!" Harold recalls that in 1931 he had 27 flat tires in one day while driving a 1930 Chevrolet up to Downey Park. The process was to patch the tire, pump it up by hand and go on, until the next flat. His philosophy of "Never give up, and when you have a job to do, do it!" served him well, for the trip was completed in one day.

From 1932 to 1934 Harold worked at the Morton Ranch. Because of his past experience at breaking and handling teams of horses, he worked with the purebred Belgian workhorses which were raised at the ranch. Their sire was a Belgian named John, who weighed over two thousand pounds. The huge Belgians were still used at that time for raking, bunching, sweeping and stacking hay. Wages were $25 a month, room and board.

During those same years Maurine had finished normal training at the University of Wyoming and had been teaching for two years. As a rural school teacher, she received room and board from one of the families who had children in school, and her salary was $75 per month, a good amount in those days. Transportation to school was to walk, often through sub-zero weather, with frost forming an inch deep on the wool scarf around her face. She taught at two different schools. At one, she was able to catch the train into town on Friday afternoons. The "depot" was a post by the railroad tracks marked "Alberta Station," where the train engineer always stopped on Fridays for the schoolmarm. Two particularly interesting things happened to her while she was teaching. The first was that two huge coyotes habitually guarded a gate on the trail to one of the schools, and she had to habitually yell and stomp and "shoo" them away in order to even get to the school. The second was the time that a parent of one of her pupils, quite inebriated and very irate at the low grade her child had received, attempted to either do away with the teacher, or scare her to death, by chasing her around the schoolyard and through the sagebrush with a dilapidated old car; the dust flew, but the teacher was quick on her feet and managed to elude her tipsy attacker!

When Harold and Maurine married in 1934, they began a period of traveling all around the nation, interspersed with working in Douglas. They always kept home base in Douglas though, no matter where they traveled. That first summer they farmed the Mitchell place at Orin. There they discovered, after kindly feeding some railroad bums, that the bums marked Xs on such places, so their buddies coming down the tracks after them would know just where to stop for food and shelter!

In 1935 Harold began building pipelines nationwide for oil companies, then graduated from the Lincoln Institute of Welding at Cleveland, Ohio in 1938. He returned to Douglas, where he built dirt dams for the Morton Ranch and he became a heavy equipment operator and foreman for Knisely-Moore Construction, a Douglas firm. During World War II he was a welder on defense contracts at Seattle, Washington, and Maurine worked in an office. When they returned to Douglas she became the secretary-bookkeeper for Woodruff Seed Company and Harold opened his own welding shop. He soon decided that construction work was his future so he returned to Knisely-Moore to become a foreman on highway and dam construction sites across Wyoming, South Dakota and Nebraska.

In 1952 Harold and Maurine realized their dream of owning their own construction company. For the next 15 years Harold ran the jobs while Maurine handled the bookkeeping. In 1966, hoping to semi-retire, they purchased the Grain and Storage Company, a feed business which had been in existence in Douglas for over 50 years. They operated the store for the next 13 years, until 1979, when they sold it and retired.

Harold has always enjoyed many hobbies, including working with horses, the complete restoration of five antique autos, and hand-carving diamond willow canes and pictures on old wood. Maurine also enjoyed many diverse activities, including her work with the Girl Scouts, china painting and gardening. She often jokingly called Harold, "Johnny Appleseed," for he still just can't resist growing a little bit of something besides their gorgeous flowers. If you look closely at the flower beds, you will always find something else growing there - perhaps a cantaloupe ripening amid the roses, or a cucumber vine happily climbing an evergreen tree, or a peach seed carefully tucked into the ground, just in case. Of course, no one ever knows just how those seeds got there!

Harold and Maurine celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary in 1984. Then, in July 1985, at age 71, Maurine passed away. Their two daughters are Chris Nachtman of Douglas (born in 1943 at Seattle, Washington) and Sue Westbrook of Spearfish, South Dakota (born in 1950 at Hastings, Nebraska). Their two grandsons are Terry Nachtman of North Palm Beach, Florida, and Shane Westbrook of Spearfish.

Hardy, Mick and Grace Family

Marion G. "Mick" Hardy was born at Thayer, Kansas on March 18, 1895. His parents later moved to a place near Carpenter, Wyoming.

After serving his country in World War I, Mick became associated with his brother, Robert M., in a ranch on Cottonwood Creek near Dwyer Junction, Wyoming. Later the two brothers came to Converse County and homesteaded near Bear Creek, northwest of Douglas.

Robert's wife, Bessie, died on January 7, 1935 and is buried in Douglas. Robert later moved to Miles City, Montana.

On June 20, 1928 I, Grace Elbourne, was united in marriage to M. G. (Mick) Hardy and the following spring we purchased the ranch owned by Harry and Fred Manning. This was to be my home for close to forty years. Memories too numerous to mention come flooding back. There are many ups and downs, years of drought, severe storms and a few floods but we both loved the ranch and through the years built up a reputation herd of Hereford cattle.

A son, Eugene, was born in February of 1930 and a daughter, Donna, in March of 1940.

Schooling was always a problem and I spent nine months in town when Gene entered first grade. Six years following there was a school (North Point) close enough to enable him to ride to and fro. Teachers changed each year but the one I recall best was Pauline Peyton. I still remember the outstanding Christmas pageant she produced with a mere handful of pupils. No fancy home for the teacher in those days. Fred Jenne gave us the use of a very nice sheep wagon which Mick moved to the school house and this was Pauline's home for nine months. I hope Pauline includes the story of her pets, the stove damper, flour bin and her proposal of marriage in her history.

When Gene reached seventh grade he went to Douglas and lived with Lloyd Bruegeman and wife during two school terms. By that time Donna was ready to enter kindergarten and we purchased a home on South Fifth Street. For the next twelve years of school I shuttled back and forth every weekend from ranch to town, and I was a very unhappy person if weather conditions prevented my trip to the ranch on Fridays. Both Gene and Donna graduated with honors and Donna went on to college. Mick was thrown from his horse and seriously injured the year Gene graduated and regardless of the four-year scholarship which was awarded him, Gene chose to remain at home and we certainly needed his help.

We were just beginning the construction of a new house at the time Pearl Harbor was bombed and in a short time Gene was called into the army. Mick and I struggled on with Donna's help during the summer months. More drought years and storms brought many hardships. In a short time Gene was united in marriage to Joy Falkenburg; and by 1964 Mick's health began to fail, and he passed away on May 16, 1967. The ranch was never home to me after this. Donna was married; and due to her husband's work, they made frequent moves. I was thankful to have the house on South Fifth and this has been my home since Mick's death. He always hoped and felt he would be the first to go and his wish was for me to be active and take part in things I enjoyed.

The Lord has blessed me with very good health and I have been privileged to enjoy several very nice trips. I have no desire to live anywhere but Douglas and I enjoy numerous activities including my yard and garden work in summer.

Many friends and good neighbors are great blessings for which I remain very thankful.

Harp, Dr. W. H.

W. H. Harp was born in Illinois in 1869. He was educated there and received his degree in dentistry. He practiced in Illinois for many years. He served in the Illinois legislature for two years.

He came to Wyoming in 1926 because of failing health and established a ranch in Downey Park where he raised sheep.

After his health improved, he turned the management of his sheep ranch over to his nephew, Lynn Harp, and began practicing his profession again, setting up his office in the Jenne Building in Douglas.

He was married but the couple had no children. He was one of the best known dentists in Wyoming.

Dr. Harp died in November 1936 and is buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Lynn Harp was born in Glenrock on August 3, 1898. His father was a teacher in Glenrock. Lynn died October 11, 1972 in California.

Harris, Ernest G. "Peck"

Peck, as all his friends knew him, was born in Elmira, New York on April 9, 1861. He was one of eight children and received the nickname of Peck when he was a youth for his reputation of being a "Peck's Bad Boy".

He left home at an early age working his way west to Wyoming. Here he prospected, worked as a round-up cook. Then with a team and wagon, Peck freighted supplies from the railroad at Laramie to Fort Fetterman in 1880. In 1882 he found employment with Tom King at the King Ranch in Deer Creek Park. Several years later he homesteaded on the West Fork of Deer Creek and from that time on he was active in the cattle business.

In 1895, Peck took in a young partner, 24-year-old Tom Martin. They ranched together until 1906 when Peck sold his interest in the ranch to Tom. Peck then bought land near the main Deer Creek and he had an additional claim near West Fork. Peck and Tom remained close friends throughout their lives.

It was about 1912, one of many occasions when Peck and Tom gathered steers to ship. They put them in a pasture overnight before driving the steers on to the railroad. During the night there was a thunderstorm and the lightning struck and killed one of the steers in the pasture gate. Peck saddled his horse with the intent of dragging the steer away but the steer was too heavy and the horse couldn't pull it. The horse reared and fell over backwards breaking Peck's hip badly as the horse fell upon him. Dr. Lathrop set the broken bones but the accident left Peck with a stiff leg. He continued in the cattle business undaunted by his handicap. Peck then trained his saddle horses to stand quietly near a rock or a corral fence so he could mount but as he did he cussed and cajoled the steed all the time he was getting on, even though the horse stood with motionless patience through the whole ordeal.

Peck never married but he was proud of his livestock. His family consisted of his two dogs, to which he fed generous plates of pancakes smothered in bacon grease; his saddle horse, which he called "Little Horse"; and his team named Dink and Bob.

After he was crippled up, Peck always carried a sizeable walking stick. About two inches in diameter and instead of having a normal stirrup for his stiff right leg, he had a stirrup tied on a strap which went from the saddle horn to the horse's shoulder to hold his leg comfortably beside the neck of Little Horse.

In the 1930s, (Peck was in his seventies) when the spring of the year would arrive, Peck would ride Little Horse across the mountains from Deer Creek Park to Bates Holes and trap beaver along the way. He would stay at the ranch with us and then go on foot with his walking stick and traps to climb Muddy Mountain and trap the beaver in the streams. He was tough, rugged and hardy; typical of the early western pioneers.

When Peck sold out in Deer Creek park in 1945, he bought a small place on the Muddy at Cow Hollow. His health was beginning to fail at that time. Peck was well-known throughout the area when he passed away at the age of 85 on January 28, 1947. Though he had been one of eight children, he was the last surviving member of the family.

Harris, Fay and Mary

An early-day resident of Douglas, Wyoming was Fayette Harvey Harris, a young man not yet of age, who hired out at an employment office on Market Street in Denver, Colorado to work on the power house that was being built for the new LaPrele Dam project southwest of Douglas in 1907.

His first job in Converse County was not a long-lasting one, however. He and the boss had an argument after a short ten days on the job. The nature of the argument was not disclosed, but Fay said "It was the only time I had the timekeeper hand me my pay with a check in his right hand and a gun in his left hand!"

The ways of the west probably seemed a little rough about that time to a lad who was born in Kansas and lived most of his early life in Michigan. Fayette Harvey Harris was born January 8, 1888 in Merriam, Johnson County, Kansas to Harvey Harris and Ellen Patrick. The first son born to Harvey and Ellen, John D. was born October 14, 1886 and died March 9, 1887 before Fay was born. His younger brother, Wilford Charles, was born December 22, 1890 and his mother lost her life the day after giving birth to his sister, Belle, born December 25, 1893. An aunt, Isabelle Wilson, came from Michigan to take Belle home with her and she was raised as their daughter. Harvey kept the two boys with him until he was able to sell the farm and then moved to Plymouth, Michigan where he opened a meat market on Mills Street. Fay's school days were in Wayne, Michigan where he finished his sophomore year, along with working for his dad in the meat market. Even though Fay learned the valuable trade of meat cutting, he tired of his dad's feeling that "boy power was cheaper than man power," so he decided to take an offer of a long-time friend in Wayne, a livestock feeder-buyer, who was moving his operation to Longmont, Colorado. This was Fay's chance to go west!!! He had his first try at being a cowboy that winter (even broke some mules for farm work). From there he went to Diamondville, Wyoming where a cousin, Mabel Stellwagon, was teaching school. He was able to land a job in the coal mines and worked there for about three years. With $100 in his pocket and the "world by the tail" he thought he would visit home and stop in Denver on the way to see what it was like! Well, that $100 didn't last too long in Denver. Next thing he knew he was plunking down $2 at the unemployment office on Market Street and he and ten or twelve other men "shipped out" on a train bound for Douglas, Wyoming and their new job.

After that job ended with such short notice he went to digging ditches for $1 a day which later turned into ranch work and even a try at farming.

Many a landmark in Converse County felt the touch of Fay's laboring hands. He helped dig the basement of the LaBonte Hotel in 1913 with a team and wheel scraper, poured the first bucket of cement into the footing of the U.S. Post Office, helped build Carey's dam with a team and worked for the General Land Office on the U.S. Survey crew that re-surveyed all the originals in Converse County.

World War I took many a man from Converse County including Fay. He was drafted in 1918 and became a Sergeant in the U.S. Army. His last assignment was in the Machine Gun Company of the 44th Infantry.

Shortly after coming home from the war he went to work for the Texas Company building a new refinery in Casper. He also worked in the Big Muddy Oil Field between Douglas and Casper. In fact, he had a chance to invest in the first well drilled in this field, but he had horses he would not let go hungry through the winter, so let the opportunity go by.

Fay homesteaded in 1922 in the northern part of the county, however, he said of himself, "I wasn't much of a dry farmer," but try he did.

Again the "call of the wild" came and he "saddled up" with the first dude outfit in Wyoming, headquartered at Brooks Lake near Dubois. Their work started by taking 172 head of saddle and pack horses from Casper to Yellowstone Park. It was a most wonderful trip, the highlight of Fay's life, breathing the fresh mountain air, working with the animals he loved, taking in the breathtaking beauty of Wyoming and enjoying the bountiful wildlife of that era. From Brooks Lake they had a 100-mile pack trail over the Continental Divide to Lewis Lake and Yellowstone. They made about 15 miles a day stopping at camps set up along the trail. The dudes were required to go through a three day school to learn to ride those "gentle" horses and then they'd take off, dudes and all. Fay made the trip a couple times then took over holding down one of the camps for the rest of the season.

Many a "bear story" was told from experiences on this trip but Fay's favorite was when his "boss-man" decided he could rope a young grizzly. This yearling grizzly had been pestering around their camp at Lewis Lake so the boss, who was an excellent roper, climbed aboard his trusty horse and barreled into him. He roped him all right, got him around the neck, and the fight was on! A grizzly is a lot different than a brown bear. A brown bear will fight the rope and try to get away. Not a grizzly. He's "rope broke." When that rope tightens he's gonna come up that rope! The horse was frightened half to death but he was a well-trained horse and scared or not, he worked. There was a lone tree standing in the middle of the park and the boss managed to get the bear wound up tight around that tree. Then they all wondered what they were going to do with him? How were they going to get him loose? They finally took another rope, hooked a hind leg and stretched him out while another cowboy climbed the tree and reached down with a hook to pull the rope loose on the neck. When they dropped that heel rope, that bear took out like greased lightning and they never saw anything of him for three whole days. But come back he did, ornier than ever!!! After hunting was over that fall the men came back through the Big Horns to Tensleep and Casper and from there Fay went to his homestead out north.

Fay sold the homestead in 1927. After selling he ranched a little for other outfits and had the disillusionment of going broke in a partnership and moved back to town. On June 1, 1939 he married Mary Helen Alberts, a widow with three children: Lila, age 13, Henry, age eight and Robert, age four. Robert was so small he could not remember his real father, so Fay legally adopted him and he became Robert Harris. Lila and Hank kept their dad's name, Alberts.

Mary had come to Douglas at the young age of 22 in 1924. She was born to Charles Rudloff and Lilly Belle Mills in Pinckneyville, Perry County, Illinois on February 10, 1902. Her doctor had recommended a drier climate and she had heard stories of Wyoming and "homesteading" so she filed for a homestead and came out by herself on a train and checked in at the LaBonte Hotel. She soon sold the homestead as it was pretty impossible for a young lady to make the necessary improvements by herself. (See Alberts story.)

When World War II started Fay tried to enlist but his age was against him this time. He was however, appointed to serve on the Fire Department Division of the U.S. Prisoner of War Camp at Douglas and served the length of the war. After being discharged from this appointment he was custodian at the LaBonte Hotel for ten years and then custodian at the U.S. Post Office for another ten years. This gave him 15 years of civil service for retirement. After retirement he said, "I became pretty handy with a lawn mower and a rake," and he still worked doing lawns for other folks as long as the doctor would allow it.

Fay left this life on June 26, 1975. He was a laboring man, sometimes working long hours, working shifts that took him away from his family and had little time for entertainment. Some people might say his pleasures were few but he would say his pleasures were many as he enjoyed the beauty of Wyoming's nature, God's creatures he truly loved and the fellowship of the people of Converse County.

Fay had a great memory and every family occasion was blessed by his lively toasts.

Harris, Ike and Jennie

Even though Isaac David Harris was born on July 2, 1872 in Lewistown, Illinois, he had always wanted to come "west" and become a cowboy. His family moved to Seward, Nebraska when he was 11 years old. They came to Fort Sidney and on to the North Platte valley in 1886 northeast of the present town of Scottsbluff. In 1900 they moved to Mitchell and built the first house there. One of his first tasks as a freighter was to help freight lumber from Alliance for the first bridge across the river at Gering. His dream was finalized when he went to Wyoming in 1892 to become one of those "cowboys", returning to Mitchell for the winter months. He loved horses and cattle so was known as a pioneer cowboy, freighter, homesteader, rancher, and a butcher all his life up until his passing on May 2, 1947 at Gering, Nebraska.

Jennie V. Pattison was born near Rockdale in Johnson County, Indiana on Oct. 14, 1878 and at the age of 6 moved with her family to eastern Nebraska, settling in Hamilton County near Aurora and Stockam. It was here my biological mother, Mary, was born. In 1893 the family moved to western Nebraska to a place 6 miles south of Gering. Grandpa had come out earlier to look the situation over and thought it a nice place with many opportunities. Aunt Jennie didn't like the idea much as there were cowboys out here and she was afraid of them. (She later married one). At the age of 16 she began her teaching career here in the North Platte valley and also serving as a bookkeeper for her father in the Burton-Pattison hardware store in Gering.

On June 2, 1901 she and Uncle Ike were married. After their marriage in Gering they took what few belongings she had and moved to Mitchell where Uncle Ike was a partner in a meat market, known then as the City Meat Mkt., with Bal Spencer. Here she kept books for the business; also took in boarders, baked bread, and made many a wedding cake. The little money she received from all this she bought a piano. When they sold the market in 1909 and later moved to Wyoming that piano went also.

My folks came to Wyoming in 1910 and homesteaded 60 miles north of Douglas near the now NERCO Coal mine, located on Antelope and bordered the Campbell County line.

I was born Oct. 29, 1911 in Gering and when I was two I came to live at that place we called the K- Ranch on Antelope. The folks had no children of their own so Aunt Jennie asked my mother, Mary Jacobs, wife of Bass Jacobs, if they could adopt us (Geneva Izetta and Clark Pattison Whipple). Papers were drawn up and signed and when my brother Clark, who had been living with my grandparents, was 10 and I was 4 we were considered their adopted children. We were never permitted to call them Mother and Father as our own parents were still living then. The prefix of "Aunt" and "Uncle" has remained since. I feel so lucky to have had parents like these folks who provided us a home with love and security; perhaps better than their own children might have had.

I remember hard times prevailed then. No modern conveniences, no day to day mail service, telephone, not a doctor within 60 miles, and a very few close neighbors. The closest school was at the George Robinson place 8 miles from us. But before they left there they did experience carbide lights and "cold" water piped into the house from a cistern on the hill. Before, we had to haul water from a spring a quarter of a mile away in 2 barrels on a sled. We put canvas over the barrels and secured that with iron bands to keep the water from sloshing out but seldom did we ever get home with a full one.

Uncle Ike freighted wool to Gillette using several head of horses. It was a good way to break in a new colt or two to the wagon. He would bring back the winter's supply of staples, canned goods, and an occasional piece of stick candy, and around the Fourth of July, he some way found the money to have a few small firecrackers. We always had our own supply of meat whether it was antelope, beef, sage chickens, rabbits, or chickens, and of course our own butter, milk, and eggs.

These people were known for their hospitality and kindness. The door was never locked and many a cowboy riding through would stop overnight and bed down their horse, fix a meal, and sleep in your bed if a bunkhouse wasn't available. They were never too busy to go help someone in need or stay with a neighbor while the man of the house was away on business. After we got the car Uncle Ike took a neighbor to Douglas to a doctor. It was cold at the time so rocks were heated and placed around the woman. No heaters then!

Aunt Jennie taught school at Wright one short term. She had five of Mr. and Mrs. R. A. Wright's: Otis, Eunice, Ruth, Willie, and Lester; two of Burt Reno's: Floyd and Everette and a boy named Vernon Dunn. This was in 1911. It was here she received the word I had arrived and my mother needed some names to choose from. She ended up with Geneva. Aunt Jennie stayed in a sheep wagon and it was nothing to wake up on a snowy morning and find a "blanket" of the white stuff called snow where it had sifted through the cracks. She would scoop off the snow with a pie tin and then start a fire in the tiny stove provided near the front of the wagon.

I remember the old log house that was built not too far from Antelope, for we never thought the creek would get as high as it did. It had a sod roof and sometimes when it rained real hard we had to put pans under the drips or sleep in a wet bed or eat on a wet table. It was in this log house we ate, slept, washed clothes, and lived until a frame one-room building was built for us to sleep in and hold that precious piano they brought from Mitchell. It was also known as a schoolroom for one year. As I said, the closest school was 8 miles away and I was too young to ride horseback that far. The folks went to Douglas and got a couple of desks, a blackboard, and some books and Aunt Jennie taught Clark and me. We put on Thanksgiving and Christmas programs. Just the two of us. We had recitations, dialogues, songs, and the works. We invited the closest neighbors, cowboys riding through, or anyone else who would listen to us. This was only for one year as we usually went to Gering and rented a house close to my grandparents.

Horses were the only means of transportation then, later buggies and finally I remember when the new Buick, with side-curtains, arrived at the K- Ranch. That was something great!

Our entertainment was of our own making. In the "frame" house Aunt Jennie would second on the piano and someone would play the harp. I especially remember Charlie Addington, who herded sheep for Lee and Spath and later at the T & Ranch, of course dances, on the Fourth of July. Later we had dances at Verse and had card parties at many different homes.

One Fourth of July we were planning to go up to the Spracklen ranch and we had our mouths all set for fried chicken. The folks went out to the hen house to get the nice roosters and there lay dead chickens all over the place. The skunks had gotten in and sucked the blood from about 60 roosters and just left them. Can't remember if we had fried chicken or not but we did go on and have "homemade" ice cream and later danced on the open-air pavillion to the fiddler's music.

I can recall so many things but due to the limited space I will mention just one more. This was the flood that happened in the early morning hours of June 2, 1929, the folk's wedding anniversary. This really took a toll on both of them and was a turning point in many of our lives. Rain had fallen way up the creek west and lots of water finally drained into Antelope. Creek beds and meadows were flooded. The home of Bass Jacobs was dashed against a group of trees. My half brother, Charles, got out with the clothes on his back and his new pair of boots, as well as the rest of the family. Coming on down in its path was the Henry Thomas house. Water rushed through the house carrying out things as it rolled along. But as the water proceeded it had to pass through a narrower place and when it hit our place two miles on it took our place in its entirety. Uncle Ike wasn't at home at the time but was down the creek looking for cattle and decided to stay at the Dorr ranch for the night. Next morning he was shocked to set his feet out in water as he got up. He went to saddle up and go home and found his saddle up high in a tree. Coming on home he would see familiar objects as he rode along and was almost afraid to come around the bend for fear of what he would see. Sure enough the place was gone. He sent a telegram to us in Gering not to come. We didn't get it until we got to Douglas but decided to come on out. I saw Aunt Jennie's hair turn white over night and it stayed white until she passed away at 94 years on Dec. 7, 1972 at Scottsbluff.

Uncle Ike built another house, a small frame one, but farther up on the hill. We lived there until ill health, following a stroke, forced him to leave the ranch, and the two of them went to live in Gering, staying with Aunt Jennie's aged father. He passed away Nov. 4, 1936 at 90 years.

Realizing they could never go back to the ranch to live they decided to sell. (We stayed until the sale was final). On Oct. 29, 1938 Mick Hardy bought the ranch.

I met my husband, Lawrence Koch, when we were youngsters. His father, Jake, would come to the coal mine, then known as the Jess Morsch mine, and one day he needed an auger so sent Lawrence down to our place for one. We were only a quarter mile away. He was so bashful that I didn't know if he was going to remember what he came for. Little did I know then he would become my husband and later work at the mine.

I finished school in Gering and later attended college at Chadron State at Chadron, Nebraska. Came back to Wyoming and taught 2 years. One term at the Rhea Tillard ranch and the other one at the Ross Owen school near Bill.

We went to Gering and were married at Scottsbluff on May 17, 1933 and came back to Wyoming to live on the ranch until 1938. We had two children, Jim and Tom, while living here. We moved back to the North Platte valley and bought an acreage two and a half miles south of Gering. Later, we built on land deeded me by my folks which is about six miles south.

After the children were old enough to leave and look after themselves I decided to go back to teaching. I put in 19 years here in the valley and received my B.S. degree from Chadron State in 1966. Can't say I miss teaching. I do miss the pay check but am thoroughly enjoying my retirement.

We had three more children after moving back. Dick, who is a varsity basketball coach and teacher at Omaha, Nebraska. Paul who is an accountant in Arcadia, California, and Martha Ann Wood who teaches physical education in the elementary schools at Crete, Nebraska. Jim and Tom, I am sure, had some of the "west" instilled in them while living there for they both liked to rodeo. Tom still ropes some but Jim has changed from horses to manhandling those big semi-trucks for the Lockwood Corporation here in Gering and has for 20 years.

Lawrence passed away on August 29, 1965 from a heart attack at the farm. I stayed on for a while but Aunt Jennie needed someone to stay with her so I turned the running of the farm over to Tom, later selling it to him in 1978.

I regret not having a tape recorder when my folks and Lawrence were still alive. I am sure I would have had enough material to have written a book myself but those days in good "Ole" Wyoming are gone forever and all we have left are the fond memories of our childhood days and later years but I treasure them and hold them dear to my heart and I will always call Wyoming MY HOME.

Hart, Ben and Adaline Family

Benjamin Hart was born in Ohio on September 12, 1852. He married Harriet Howard, daughter of James and Anna Howard, on September 12, 1877. They came to Wyoming from Iowa in 1880 with Harriet's brother, Bill Howard, and her brother-in-law, Charles Rice. The Harts lived with the Rices on Beaver Creek. They had one daughter, Nona. On November 2, 1881 Harriet died from the effects of childbirth. Ben then returned to Nebraska where he married Adaline Choan, a native of France, born December 1, 1865.

Ben and Adaline had ten children born in Randolph, Nebraska. They are: Nellie (born December 27, 1882), Charles (born January 11, 1885), Emma (born April 11, 1886), Ella (born November 29, 1888), Walter (born November 27, 1889), William (born March 9, 1891), Emanuel (born February 8, 1895), Beulah (born April 12, 1896), Henry (born March 20, 1898), and Clarence (born July 15, 1900).

In 1902 the Hart family moved back to Wyoming, living on the Bun place on Beaver Creek. They had one daughter, Ruth (born in 1902), who died at birth. She is buried on the Bill Leman ranch on Beaver Creek. They also had twins, Mildred and Willard (born March 25, 1905). Willard is also buried at the Beaver Cemetery, having died at an early age. Earl was the last to be born (April 20, 1908).

Later, needing more room, they moved to the Hank Howard place on Upper LaPrele Creek. Ben and his sons worked at the Dawes sawmill for a while. He homesteaded on Hart Draw, getting his patent in 1914. He received his water rights in 1911. His homestead was southeast of where the Windy Ridge Road starts at the Cold Springs Road.

Ben and Adaline made their home on LaPrele Creek until 1923 when they moved to Douglas. Adaline died in 1937 and Ben on September 6, 1938.

Nellie married Harry Rice. Their children were: Chester (born September 18, 1910) and Laura (Patterson). Nellie later married Charlie Paull. She is living in California.

Emma married Cornelius "Neil" Terry in Randolph, Nebraska on December 21, 1904. They came to Converse County in 1917 and settled on a place southwest of Douglas under the LaPrele Irrigation Project. Neil died in 1957 and Emma on September 23, 1970. Four children were born to them: Marcus, Donald, Verna (Mrs. Don Hildebrand) and Helen (Wilson).

Ella married Fred Howard, son of William and Georgia Howard, on December 20, 1905. They settled on a farm six miles southwest of Douglas on Little Bedtick Creek. Ella was well known for her ability to play the violin. Fred died on September 13, 1943, Ella on November 27, 1966. They had one son, Art, and two daughters, Edith (Wingert) and Blanche (Kremer).

William married Pauline O'Brian in 1950. Bill ranched on various places around Douglas. He died on October 7, 1967. He had a step-daughter, Ila Jean (Hudak).

Beulah married Homer Powell, son of William and Alice Powell. After their marriage they lived on upper LaPrele for eleven years then moved to Sage Creek where they homesteaded and later moved to a place southwest of Douglas where they were neighbors of Beulah's sister, Emma. Homer died December 16, 1965 and Beulah on May 8, 1981. Their eight children were: Dallas, Lorraine, Irma, Morris, Fred, Billy, Bobby and George.

Henry married Etta Plotner Angell on October 10, 1924. They operated the Hart Dairy west of Douglas for many years. On May 1, 1951 he married Jessie Sorbon. They lived on a small place at the west end of the LaPrele Dam Project for many years. Upon his retirement they lived in Yuma, Arizona for seven winters. He died February 25, 1969.

Mildred married Charles Poirot, son of Eugene Poirot. She is living in Roseburg, Oregon.

Earl was married to Mildred Townsend Arndt.

Hart, Homer and Ida

Homer Ellsworth Hart was born July 2, 1895 in Van Wert, Ohio to Charles and Frances Taylor Hart.

In World War I he entered the U.S. Army and served as a mule skinner and as a truck driver in France in "The Great War." After returning from the war he worked on farms in Iowa where he met his future wife, Ida. He left Iowa to go further west because he was troubled with an asthmatic condition. When first arriving in Converse County in 1924 or 1925, he was hired by the Ogalalla Ranch where he broke horses for a year and a half before homesteading on the Pine Ridge, near the Natrona County line at the head of Antelope Creek. During the first three or four years of living in Wyoming he did return to Iowa for a visit.

On the 6th of June in 1927, Ida May Montgomery arrived in Douglas by train from her home in Brooklyn, Iowa where she was met by her soon to be husband. They were married by the Baptist minister in Douglas on June 7, 1927 and left immediately in his Star touring car for the homestead. The roads were very muddy and it took them three days to make the trip, undoubtedly stopping at ranches along the way where they would have been invited to stay the night.

In a few months his homestead was "proved up." Because he was a veteran he received credit for his time in the service and thus it did not take as long to "prove" his homestead. They then moved over to Ida's homestead. In the fall she began teaching school on a neighboring ranch, riding horseback daily, even when pregnant with her first child. Her first child, a boy named Roland, was born in a maternity home in Douglas in November 1929.

The Hart family, which in 1933 consisted of two small boys, Roland, 4-years-old, Richard, 3-years-old, and a 6-week-old baby girl, Helena, moved to Ardmore, South Dakota. They had, by this time, lost their homesteads for back taxes during the depression. Because grass was hard to find in the drought and dust bowl days in Wyoming, they loaded their possessions and family into their International truck and trailed the cattle east in search of better times.

In May 1936 they returned to Converse County where they ranched in the Walker Creek area until 1943. Their fourth child and second daughter, Carol was born at Douglas in October 1937. In the fall of 1943, the family moved into Douglas to enable the older children to attend high school.

The family lived on the old Daniels' place, a few miles west of Douglas, for 10 years. During this time and soon after World War II they got their first electricity, indoor plumbing and their first telephone. Homer raised cattle and hauled livestock for Douglas area ranchers during this period.

In January 1954 they bought a home on South Adams in Douglas where they lived the rest of their lives. Homer drove a rural mail route for 25 years, retiring at the age of 74. Ida returned to teaching in Douglas for two years, in the fall of 1955, and later taught at the Walker Creek School until she retired in 1968. Homer died April 21, 1972 at the age of 77 years. Ida passed away February 25, 1974 at the age of 72 years.

Hawley, Robert and Elsie

Robert D. Hawley was born on April 27, 1889 in Edgar, Nebraska, the son of Robert E. and Crene Johnson Hawley. The Hawley family had business interests in the ice and canning industry in Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska.

Robert graduated from the University of Nebraska with a degree in law. He came to Douglas in July 1912 where he practiced law independently until November 1912, at which time he became associated with Judge Harvey. Their law firm of Harvey and Hawley later took in another partner, Joe Garst. Hawley served as County Attorney from 1914 to 1918.

On November 28, 1914 Robert married Elsie Cross, daughter of George H. Sr. and Lea Cross. One son, Robert C., was born.

Robert D. died on September 30, 1931, Elsie on October 27, 1946.

Heaton, Al and Lillian

Alvarius Heaton was born on November 6, 1856 in Racine, Wisconsin, the son of Thomas and Theresa Hennesey Heaton.

He married Lillian Mardsen in 1883 in Sabula, Iowa. Lillian was born January 26, 1863 in Geneva, Illinois, the daughter of Samuel and Mary Jane Mardsen. Their children are: Mrs. Charles Anthens, Lois (Powell, Ditzler), born January 23, 1897, and Clarence.

The Heatons came to Douglas in 1904. They built a house on the corner of Fifth and Walnut. (The house was bought by Converse County and moved in 1983.) It was not only used for a family home but also served as a community funeral parlor because Al was a mortician for two years after they arrived in Douglas.

Al sold his funeral business in 1906 to C. H. Hofmann as he didn't have time to practice his trade of plumbing.

The Heatons started the Warm Springs swimming pool south of Douglas (north of the present site of the Jackalope Plunge). They also lived at the site until it was sold to George Smull.

Lillian died on November 19, 1925; Al on July 1, 1937.

Lois married George Powell in 1917. They owned and operated a men's clothing and dry cleaning plant in Glenrock. They had one son, Robert. Upon Mr. Powell's death, Lois married Raymond Ditzler, an agent for the Northwestern Railroad in Douglas. Lois is remembered as a long time organist and music teacher. Mr. Ditzler died on March 11, 1967; Lois on November 16, 1984.

Henderson, Earl

Earl McKinley Henderson, tenth child of Joseph Alexander and Laura Bennett Henderson, was born July 20, 1894 at Coin, Iowa. At an early age, he moved with his parents to Taylor County to rural areas of Gravity and Sharpsburg. He attended rural schools in Taylor County. He served in the Army with Company D, 351st Infantry, Earl and Susie Henderson 1927.

88th Division during WWI. He left France May 9, 1919 arriving at his home in Sharpsburg, Iowa June 7, 1919. The following five years he homesteaded in Wyoming, returning to Taylor County, Iowa in 1925.

Earl met Susie Maye Fearnot in 1925 at Sharpsburg, Iowa. They were married January 26, 1928 at the Walter Henderson home in Creston, Iowa. Susie was born at Marco, Indiana, January 7, 1902, daughter of Ira William and Dorcas Whitworth Fearnot. Susie came to Osceola, Iowa on a vacation with her uncle, Charles Whitworth, during the fall of 1923. She chose to remain in Iowa doing domestic work for the Charles Lepley family near Sharpsburg. Earl and Susie made their early homes on farms in Taylor County.

Their first child, Veryla Lou, was born near Sharpsburg on December 21, 1930. The family moved to Lenox, February 1, 1931, to a home on East Temple Street where their second child, Melvin Earl, was born. The Hendersons moved to 308 East Ohio Street October 1, 1936. Earl continued doing farm work until his retirement because of his health. Earl passed away July 31, 1966 at the Veterans Hospital in Omaha, Nebraska.

Melvin Earl Henderson, born April 23, 1934, attended the Lenox School. He never married. For a time he worked for Hale's Shows of Tomorrow, later being employed in trucking. He resides in Kansas City, Missouri.

Earl was a charter member of the Sharpsburg American Legion Post. Susie was an active Auxiliary member. Earl received a citation from President Franklin Roosevelt for his work with the Boy Scouts.

Susie Henderson still resides in her home. She keeps busy with hobbies of oil painting, quilting, dressing dolls and genealogy.

Henley, George and Melissa Family

In the early spring of 1920, five of the seven sons of George and Melissa Henley ventured into Wyoming drawn by the prospect of homesteading and by the anticipation of beginning livestock operations. Four of the young men filed on land about 15 miles northeast of Bill, Wyoming. The fifth was too young to do so at the time. The Henley Brothers holdings came to be known as the HB and the land on which they homesteaded the "Henley Hills or Henley Knobs".

The love which the brothers held for the land was certainly inherited. Three generations of Henleys before them had been actively engaged in some sort of agricultural endeavor. Their great grandfather, Joseph Henley, had owned a plantation on the Arkansas River near the town of Branch, Arkansas. Joseph was a staunch supporter of Abraham Lincoln and freed more than 20 slaves during the Civil War. These blacks remained with Joseph until he sold the plantation just after the war ended. The main farm buildings were burned by the Confederates in 1864. Three men of the Henley family gave their lives fighting for the belief that "all men were created equal".

Little Berry Flander Henley was the son of Joseph Henley. He married Nancy Jennings and to this union nine children were born, the last of whom was George Washington Henley. George was born in Shannon County, Missouri, near the town of Summersville in the year 1866. He grew to manhood there. In the spring of 1886, he took a job with a cattle buyer from the Red River in Texas. He worked for the buyer for two years, saving his wages so that he might return to Summersville and marry his childhood sweetheart, Melissa Elizabeth Robinson. Melissa was born in 1871 near Summersville. Her family owned a farm there for a time, but relocated near Fort Smith later on.

George and Melissa were married in Summersville in 1888. George filed on 160 acres of land where he and Melissa built their first home. To this couple were born seven sons and one daughter. They were Jesse Oscar, Jasper Cleveland, Benjamin Franklin, Louchen N., Goldie M., Simon Peter, Christopher Columbus, and Roy Flander.

After the birth of Christopher in 1909, George sold the farm and moved to Branch, Arkansas where he bought a farm on the Arkansas River near the site of the plantation which had belonged to his great grandfather, Joseph. George's sister, Mary Ann, lived with George and Melissa to help with the children and the housework.

In 1914, Christopher, aged five and one-half years, was accidentally killed while playing on some farm machinery. Shortly after the death of their son, George and Melissa sold the farm in Arkansas and returned to Missouri. They located on a farm between Summersville and Hartshorn, Missouri. George raised grain and livestock. It became George's practice to buy a farm, clear brush, raise a good crop and sell at a profit. Thus the family would move every year or two.

After World War I, Roy, Jasper, and Frank Henley returned to Missouri where the family lived, but shortly the entire family moved to Scottsbluff, Nebraska where George had bought one of the newly developed farms in a government-sponsored reclamation project. The project was to furnish irrigation water to the farmers via canals at cheap rates. George had 320 acres in this project, but the venture was a failure due to the fact that the canals, dug in sandy soil, would not hold water. In addition, when the land on either side of the canal was plowed for planting, the wind would blow the canals full of sand. There was no future for the farmers under these conditions. George then traded this farm for one near Joplin, Missouri. It consisted of 160 acres of farm land plus 640 acres of timber claim. This venture, too, was disastrous for the Henley family. There was a thirty-two thousand dollar lien against the place. The lien had not been recorded, but it was legal. George moved his family back to Summersville. Financially, George was in very bad shape. He managed to salvage two fine spans of Missouri mules, two wagons and some household furnishings.

George heard of the silver and lead-mining booms around Cardin and Picher, Oklahoma where good Missouri mules were at a premium. Since he owned good mules, George loaded his family and possessions into two covered wagons and set out for Oklahoma. The trip took two weeks. George was able to sell the mules, wagons and equipment for a good price, and in the spring of 1922, he bought a new Model T Ford in which the family traveled to Douglas, Wyoming.

The older Henley brothers, Oscar, Jasper, Louchen and Frank, were already established between the dry fork of the Cheyenne River and Antelope Creek on their homesteads. Goldie was employed by the LeBar family of Douglas.

When the family arrived in Douglas, they were joined by Goldie who would act as guide for her family as they made their journey to the Cheyenne River. Only rough trails crossed the virgin prairie. Upon reaching the river, they found it to be in flood stage, and had to wait three hours before crossing. Their older sons awaited them on the other side of the river with a team and wagon.

Eventually the family was reunited and settled down on the land to work towards the realization of a dream they all shared — establishing their cattle ranch.

The eldest of the Henley sons, Oscar, was killed in a haying accident only a few days after the George Henleys arrived. He left his wife, Georgia, four daughters and an infant son to face the hardships of homesteading alone. The rest of the family helped Oscar's widow as much as they were able, of course, but all were struggling to wrest a meager living from their land. In 1925, two years after her husband's death, Georgia, in loneliness and despair, sold her homestead and moved to Douglas. About a year later, she married a man named VanDeventer.

The Henley families seemed to be plagued by misfortune. In October of 1933, Simon died from infection caused by a ruptured appendix. The following June, George, Melissa and Louchen were involved in an automobile accident which took the life of George. Melissa and Louchen were badly injured, but recovered.

After the death of George, the ranching business of the Henleys rapidly fell apart. There was a severe drought over most of the country. Times were hard, credit was difficult to obtain, and the future of the homesteaders gloomy indeed. Faced with the problem of no feed for the stock for the coming winter, the Henley brothers disposed of their stock, selling to the government for $12.50 per head. At the same time, there was a rumor that the government was going to pay the homesteaders a top price for their land in order to make a special Thunder Basin Reserve in the area. Most of the homesteaders signed up for the land value appraisal after being told that the government would pay a generous price. This resulted in the homesteaders trading off everything they needed to make their living, anticipating selling their land for enough capital to make a new home elsewhere.

The actual dollar-appraisal for a 640 acre homestead, house, barn, corrals and four miles of fence ranged from a low $300 (for those who had not completed their proving up) to a high of $5,000. The average price paid was $1,100. It was a meager return for the years of hard work and capital outlay which had been made by the homesteaders.

Some of the ranchers in the area who could find financial backing, took advantage of this opportunity to acquire more land, and bought directly from the homesteaders. In some cases they paid more than the Thunder Basin Project officials had offered them. So the Henley family sold their holdings, and their dreams to become ranchers were not to be realized.

The family of Henley went their separate ways. Oscar and Christopher were deceased. The second son, Jasper, married Harriet Olson from the Teapot Dome area, they had two daughters.

Benjamin married Clara Beaty of Midwest, Wyoming, to them were born three sons and two daughters.

Louchen, the fourth son, never married. He was appointed executor of the estate for his mother, Melissa. After her death in 1947, Louchen worked as a gardener and park caretaker for the City of Casper.

Goldie, the only daughter of George and Melissa, married Charles Kenneth Wyatt of Douglas. They had two sons, and are living in Clinton, Missouri.

Simon Peter was employed by the Ohio Oil Company until the refinery at Salt Creek was closed. He was never married.

Roy Flander, the youngest child, was married to Marie E. Ferbrache. To this union two children were born. Their girl died at the age of four. In 1944 Marie and Roy were divorced and in 1945, he married Grayce Lillian Roatch. They have one child and make their home in Barstow, California.

Henry, Mike & Catherine Family

One of the most colorful chapters in Wyoming history is the story of Mike Henry and the famous "88" Ranch. Located on 30,000 acres in Converse County, the Henry place is still owned and operated by descendants of its pioneer settlers. Although the original ranchland remains as part of the present operation, the headquarters have been moved three miles north of their earliest site on Brown Spring Creek to a location on the Cheyenne River.

Michael Henry was born to Thomas and Mary Pendergast Henry in Athlone, Ireland on September 20, 1840 and immigrated to America as a young child. After graduating from a military academy in New York in 1855 he began his army career serving on America's western frontiers under Generals Harney, Sumpter and Johnson. Mike spent three years at Fort Laramie, Dakota Territory, before being assigned to a California post. While he was stationed in California he met Miss Catherine Maher, also an Irish immigrant. The two were married on December 15, 1859 at Eureka, California.

At the outbreak of the Civil War, Mike returned to the east with his company where he fought with the Union Army against the Confederacy, and Catherine stayed in New York awaiting his return from war.

In July of 1863, after successful campaigns at Gettysburg and Vicksburg, Sergeant Henry's regiment was returned to the western borders to patrol the emigrant trails. The western movement was gaining momentum. Continuous travel over the Bozeman Road violated the Indian treaties and aroused the Sioux and Cheyenne to make war on wagon trains going north to the gold fields of Montana. The army was dispatched from Fort Laramie to investigate these skirmishes until protective forts could be established along the Bozeman. One such encounter, involving Mike Henry, took place in a luxurious valley nourished by Spring Creek and overlooked by a sentinel of jagged rock...the very spot where he would later locate his ranch.

On July 13, 1864, Colonel W. O. Collins, Commander at Fort Laramie, ordered two companies of the Eleventh Ohio Cavalry to the site of a reported massacre and kidnapping. According to Josiah S. Kelly, the husband of one of the kidnap victims, he and his wife, Fanny, and their adopted daughter, Mary, were traveling with the Larimer wagon train on July 12 when it was detained by Indians. The warriors tormented the small party of travelers, numbering 11. After killing four members of the wagon train they captured two women and their two small children. Mr. Kelly was one of only three who escaped, and was invited to join the two army regiments in pursuit of the war party.

Mr. Kelly led the soldiers to the Boxelder Creek area where the attack took place. Under the command of Captains Marshall and Sherman the men were assigned to small squads and ordered to search the area for the women and children. One of the patrols discovered the body of little Mary Kelly who had been killed by her captors. Mike Henry and Josiah Kelly were in another patrol being commanded by Lieutenant John R. Brown. They crossed the Platte and were following Indian sign north, from the river. They reached Spring Creek about dark and were preparing to camp when they were attacked by Indians. Mike Henry and Mr. Kelly were both spared in the battle, but a young civilian horse wrangler was killed and Lieutenant Brown was mortally wounded. Years later Mike recalled the anguish of the herder's screams and the futile attempts to save Lieutenant Brown's life. The Indians scattered and escaped into the darkness. No sign of the three remaining kidnap victims was found and the search was abandoned.

A reward was advertised for the return of Fanny Kelly, Sarah Larimer and the little boy, and through covert maneuvers by the army, Mrs. Kelly was ransomed at Fort Sully five months after her kidnapping. For months the Sioux moved her from village to village until they finally ransomed her to the Blackfeet in December 1864. The Blackfoot Tribe, in turn, traded her to the army at Fort Sully for three horses and sugar, flour and coffee equivalent to the value of 19 ponies.

The fate of Sarah Larimer was noted 22 years later when an item appeared in "Bill Barlow's Budget" announcing that she had been awarded an undisclosed amount of money in a lawsuit she had filed against the United States government for her capture by Indians.

Spring Creek was renamed Brown's Spring Creek in memory of the brave young lieutenant who gave his life there. Despite the violence that had taken place, Mike Henry was overcome by the beauty of the scenic oasis where the Bozeman Road cut through the rich grassland of forbidden Indian hunting grounds, and it remained locked in his heart for the next 14 years.

Mike Henry remained in military service until 1871, but the state of the army was a sorry one, and taking his pay in script, Mike and his family left the army life and took up farming in Kansas. But the haunting memory of a stream-fed meadow in the Powder River Country of Wyoming was not forgotten, and in 1874 Mike re-enlisted. By this time Fort Fetterman had been built, Wyoming had been granted territorial status and the territory was accessible by rail, so Catherine and the children joined Mike at Fort Laramie where he was stationed for the last time.

When Sergeant Henry was discharged in 1877 he immediately began to build a log house on land he had purchased and homesteaded just west of the meadows on Brown's Spring Creek. His family remained at Fort Laramie during the construction of the buildings. On March 8, 1878 a son, Will, was born at the fort and in June, Mike, Catherine and their six children climbed into a wagon and started their journey across the North Platte River to the ranch. The first night of the trip was spent at Fort Fetterman and John, the oldest boy in the family, wrote later of the excitement of their trip. He, his two older sisters, Elizabeth and Agnes, his younger brother Edward, younger sister, Grace Theresa, and his baby brother, Will, along with their parents, would be the first family to settle on the land north of the river. It was early the second morning when they crossed the river by ferry. Arriving at the ranch in the lingering light of the June evening, they were embraced by green meadows where a playful stream strummed the tall grass blades in a welcome song before it joined the shimmering water of a large pond near the house.

With the Indian wars over and the Bozeman open to travel the "88" added a new dimension to this already busy thoroughfare. Supplies were freighted from Cheyenne in large wooden barrels and crates and the ranch became a prairie oasis for emigrants. A stage station was established at Brown's Spring by the Patrick Brothers' line and Mike provided a blacksmith's shop and parts for wagon repairs. Catherine became the cook, nurse and innkeeper for weary travelers. Building coffins and helping with burials along the trail, the Henry family comforted many on their westward journey. Catherine and the children even made markers for the many gravesites that lay east of the house.

The Indians were friendly now and came frequently to trade. Mike secured an impressive herd of Indian ponies to add to his already famous horse herd. He purchased Morgan breeding stock to improve his herd and for more than four decades Mike Henry's reputation as a horse breeder was acknowledged on two continents. During the years between 1910 and 1914, his herd exceeded 3,000; and the Henry ranch was supplying horses to the Dutch government as well as the United States. An important by-product of this operation was the large number of bucking horses Mike was able to provide as rodeo stock.

Between 1878 and 1883 only two more ranches located in the area, one by an Englishman named Remington and the other by partners named Paxton and Gallagher. There were still no other children so the younger Henry children were tutored by Catherine and Lizzie, who was the oldest, until they were old enough to attend boarding schools in Cheyenne, Kansas and Salt Lake.

When the Henry boys returned from school they took up much of the responsibility for the ranch operation which now included a large flock of sheep in addition to the cattle and horse herds. And when the oil industry opened up in Wyoming, Mike got in on the ground floor. With his sons to look after the ranching interests on the "88" he became active in the energy boom, holding stock in the Big Muddy and the Salt Creek oil fields and presiding as president of the Popo Agie Coal Company of Hudson, Wyoming. The Popo Agie coal mines supplied coal to the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad and the company was well known for its fair wage and labor practices. Each miner received no less than five dollars per day at a time when the average pay was much less.

During his years in the energy industry Mike was also involved in banking and real estate. His many interests took him all over the state and they resided for a time in Sheridan, Cheyenne, and Casper. However, when Catherine's health failed he took her to California where they stayed until her death in March 1909 at the age of 65. Mike returned to Wyoming but tragedy again struck the family. Mike and Catherine's eldest daughter, Lizzie, and her daughter died in a fire in their home at Joliet, Illinois, and in February 1918, Edward, who was managing the ranch at the time, was shot and killed by a friend and employee, Wesley Wolfe. Edward was 44 at the time of his death.

John Henry, his wife, Cecelia, and their two sons remained in Wyoming as did Agnes and her husband, Frank L. Clark. The Clarks raised six daughters and Agnes lived in Douglas until her death in February 1959. Grace Theresa married Frank Scherck of Casper and they raised three children. Grace was living in California at the time of her death.

William M. Henry was the youngest of the six Henry children and it was he and his wife, Maude, who assumed the responsibility of managing the ranch following Edward's untimely death.

When Michael Henry came to Wyoming in 1855 as a bugler in the United States Army the state was a tiny unsettled segment of Dakota Territory. When he left it on January 25, 1924, Wyoming was one of the great ranching and energy capitols of the world and the "88" was one of the most influential ranching operations in Converse County.

Mike Henry was one of Wyoming's most resourceful and hard working pioneers. He dedicated 22 years of military service to his adopted country and for the remainder of his life he epitomized the values he had fought for. Mike's undying devotion to his wife and children kindled a diversity that enabled him to support them even when livestock prices sagged and economic disaster threatened to wipe out the ranching industry.

When Mike died in 1924 his heirs would have to face some hardships of their own, and they too would find ways and means to keep the ranch going. Will and Maude Henry were determined to rebuild the "88" after the stock market crashed in '29, leaving them with the land but scarcely a head of livestock. And rebuild they did! With the help of their son, William M. Henry, Jr. and his family the ranch grew and prospered, and when Will Henry died in 1962 at the age of 84, Bill and his wife, Pat, were operating the ranch with their three children, William Michael, III, Barbara Ann and Robert Janssen.

Bill and Pat live in Casper where Bill is head of the Life Science Department at Casper College and Pat is an elementary reading specialist in the public school system. Barbara Henry Leininger is a teacher and coach at La Junta, Colorado and Rob is in the construction business. William Michael Henry, III, Mike Henry's great grandson, is the ranch foreman at the "88".

Young William Michael, who goes by his great grandfather's nickname, Mike, married Miss Susan Gustasson in 1976. They have two children, Laurel, born in 1982, and Garrett, born in 1984. Mike and Susan live on the "88" where they conduct the ranching business and a hunting and guide service. The ranch still runs sheep and cattle, but the famous Henry horse herd has been reduced to about 20 head of good roping stock. The Henry family still gathers at the ranch for brandings and holidays, and Rob comes home during the hunting season to help out, but the everyday ranch chores are now in the capable hands of Mike and Susan Henry, the fourth generation to carry on the Mike Henry ranch at Brown's Spring in Converse County.

Hern, Henry, Faye and Frankie

Henry Hern, born in 1888 in Chadron, Nebraska, grew to manhood there. He came to Wyoming to homestead, taking land on Sand Creek west of Orin, Wyoming near a family named Wolf. He married a daughter of the Wolf family, Faye, and to this union, a daughter, Eleanor, and a son, Clem, (b. January 21, 1914 in Wallace, Idaho) were born.

In 1912, Henry purchased the local store at Orin and moved his family there to live. Their quarters were adjacent to the store. He named his business the Hern Mercantile and he handled a variety of goods; hardware, tires, meats, clothing, yard goods, and other merchantable items. The store also housed the post office with Henry serving as postmaster.

Faye and Henry were divorced in the 1920s. Henry and the children continued to make their home in Orin where the children were educated through the lower grades, later riding the bus into Douglas for their high school education.

In the late 20s Henry married for the second time to Frankie Reed. He sold the store to Leo Trenhom around 1930 and accepted the position of Secretary to the Wyoming State Fair. The family then moved to Douglas where they lived on the fairgrounds.

Frankie Reed was born in 1899 in Harrison, Nebraska, the daughter of Walter and Effie Reed, a member of a family of six children. The Reeds homesteaded on the Cheyenne River. Frankie was educated in the rural schools and later the high school in Niobrara County. After graduation, she attended a normal training college for some months but did not graduate.

The Herns returned to Orin to make their home on the Cakebread place for a while where Henry farmed with the aid of his son, Clem and the Danaher boys, Tom, Dan and Joe. Together, they developed the land into a profitable farm. During this period, the young men played on the Orin baseball team. Joe Danaher eventually married Eleanor Hern.

Frankie and Henry were the parents of one son, Bill.

Once more the Herns moved to Douglas where Henry was engaged in the automobile business with his son, Clem, and Joe Danaher. Henry purchased the two-story building across the street south of the LaBonte Hotel, handling the Chevrolet dealership. Henry died in September 1936, the victim of a heart attack. After his father's death, Clem continued to operate the business.

Frankie was elected to the office of County Superintendent of Schools in 1942, a position which she held for twelve years. In 1954 she was defeated in her bid for reelection. Since she had never received her degree in education she was determined to earn the credits she needed. She taught in the Douglas school system, taking correspondence courses and attending summer school until she was eligible in 1958 to receive her degree.

Frankie was well liked and respected in the community, capable and efficient in the capacity of County Superintendent of Schools. She understood the problems of education in the rural areas and believed that "school teachers were born, not made." Many decisions she made while in office were based on this principle.

Henry was a man of compassion and had a great interest in his fellow man and in his community. His advice and counsel were sought after by his neighbors in Orin and later in Douglas.

Frankie died in 1967 and is buried beside her husband in the Douglas cemetery. Clem, who was married to Reba Hayworth for several years, passed away in 1972.

Bill was married to Jackie Howard of Douglas in 1956, and they are the parents of three children, Mike, Bret and Cheri. Bill attended a Baptist Bible college in Watertown, Wisconsin, graduating, but never being ordained as a minister. Jackie and Bill make their home in Cheyenne.

Herrick, James L. and Dulla Family

James Leslie "Jim" Herrick was born at Underwood, Iowa, January 6, 1889. His parents were Guy Thomas Herrick and Olive Redfield Herrick, also from Underwood, Iowa.

Jim, being the oldest of thirteen children, had many responsibilities to help keep the large family running sufficiently. His first priority was to saw and haul wood for the big spacious nineteen-room family house. We recall having heard him say, "Times were rough, but we always had a good apple crop so we made plenty of cider with our press."

During World War I, Jim was drafted, serving time in England and France. Fortunately peace was made just before he was to be called for front line duty.

Dulla Hoffa was born August 11, 1900 in Underwood, Iowa, one of a family of seven. She was employed at the Underwood Post Office during her high school days. Underwood was a small and especially quiet town during war time. The spring she graduated, Jim had returned from overseas, and wedding plans were made.

Jim's folks had been planning to move to Wyoming, but were waiting first for Jim to get home. They had their farm sale selling most of the farm equipment. They still had 60-70 hogs that didn't sell, so it was a night to remember as they made three trips to Omaha in those dark hours and finally got the last load there by four a.m. The remaining personal possessions were loaded in an emigrant car on the railroad. This was mainly one milk cow, a team of mules, one mare, farm equipment and household items. So now family and all were railroading out for Campstool, Wyoming. Campstool was close to Cheyenne, which was known as a cow town in those days.

Jim's oldest brother, Pete, had previously located near Douglas, so Jim took off cross country to look over this area in the Walker Creek community. It was at this time he decided to settle here also. Dulla traveled by the railroad to Cheyenne. Jim met her there and they were married June 30, 1919.

This just so happened to be the last day before prohibition so they were quick to learn they had chosen a very noisy, rough, hot and dusty day for a wedding. After the sound of wedding bells they left Cheyenne. Anxiously, but slowly, they chugged northward on the Burlington Railroad to Douglas. Here they stayed at the Antler Hotel for several days. The dozen little chicks Jim's mother had given them survived the unsettled life real well. By just a bit of luck Bill Sims was driving his Model T Ford out Walker Creek way so the newlyweds rode out to Pete's family ranch with him.

During the time Jim built their one-room house they lived with Pete and Maggie. The two homesteads were five miles apart. The native lumber was hauled from James and Dulla Herrick.

Douglas by wagon and team which took two days for each trip. The necessary furniture was ordered from Sears, Roebuck & Co. In due time and with much anxiety, it was possible to move to their ranch and begin the new adventurous life on the open prairie.

Needless to say this era of life was extremely primitive and rough. In given time the section was completely fenced. Soil for the first time was broken with a walking plow, the changing off with two work horses and many a day of honest sweat. The work horses' names were Blacky and Roany. Later they did get a saddle horse who answered to Lady. This was the beginning of their determined try in farming.

Most of this community was open range so large herds of wild cows were seen passing through, many to die of starvation or freeze standing still from the long bitter sub-zero weather.

Parenthood began when Douglas Eugene was born July 8, 1920. At about this time the government paid a bonus to the ex-serviceman. Jim used his check to buy a Model T Ford from Carlos Miller.

March 20, 1922, Ralph Dale arrived. This same one-room house seemed to be getting smaller and smaller. Still it was after Orlee June was born June 20, 1923 before a log room was added. Their second daughter, Doris Jean, was born November 4, 1926. No conveniences were available yet. It still meant carrying in wood, water, filling kerosene lamps for light, and the family washing for six was done by hand.

School was held at the Walker Creek Community one-room school house. The teachers would live there just during the school session. Ralph remembers two of his teachers were Gladys Hanlin Swope and Ruth Numrich Whiting. In later years the school district did support a bus (car).

By plowing many a deep rut the mailcarrier most always delivered mail on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

In spite of their hardship, Jim and Dulla bought the section joining them, which was known as the Sourers place. It was their intent that more ground for farming would prove profitable.

The community formed a threshing bee to harvest the small grain. It was hard, hot work, but the best way to thresh the grain for everyone. This also meant extra work for the wives to prepare large meals two times a day. After harvesting was over, they took a wagon load of wheat and some corn to Wheatland. There it was ground into flour, some was coarsely ground for hot cereal and corn was ground for meal.

Jim's Uncle Frank came to live with the family for a short time. When Jim's father came to join the family the third bedroom was added to this little house on the prairie.

Depression and drought in the thirties raised the question many times whether to give up or try to go on. Knowing farming in these years was fruitless, they struggled with the rough decision to raise cattle. They increased the herd as they could and milked 20 morning and night. The paralyzing winter storms piled snow to the top of corral fence posts. Tunnels were dug through the snow to get the cattle to water.

The granary built for grain was now being used to hang many home cured hams, salt pork and bacon for days of curing. However, one old boar had a strong will to live. Doug recalls when his dad took his old time rifle and placed a bullet into his head. He then went to the house to let it bleed out. When he returned to butcher this critter he found only a trace of blood. Quickly he grabbed his 30-30 this time and followed the path of blood to find the wounded animal had staggered a quarter of a mile away.

It was about this time when they built a large barn for cattle and horses. A nice hen house and machine shed were also built which were good needed improvements.

For diversion to pass long evening hours they held dances in the mow of the big barn. Much preparation went into this to clear all the hay, provide some seats and plenty of lanterns for sufficient lighting. The community was blessed with much musical talent. Some who furnished music were the Lundberg brothers, Felix, Fred and Carl. Buster Goodrich was very instrumental to provide good music and others were Lewis Gillespie and Frank Fero.

During these destitute years of raising cattle the only means to market them was forming a neighborhood cattle drive. Some of the neighbor lads joined into the drive with Doug and Ralph and each, with their saddle horses, drove the cattle to Shawnee where they were loaded on the train.

During the thirties the government provided some work. Reservoirs were built to prevent soil erosion and flooding during flash floods. Jim used a team of horses and fresno but even with Doug's and Ralph's help it was slow progress. So he bought an old Heartpar tractor from Gene Payne Co. Then dikes were made at a much greater speed.

Dulla had decided to learn to drive the old truck they had purchased for ranch work and to use for deliveries to and from Douglas. Just imagine teaching yourself to learn gears, shifting and keeping a large old truck on the narrow trails across country! It did prove helpful at the time Jim became quite ill. She headed that truck to Douglas to get Jim in to see Dr. Hylton.

Regardless of their hard work and different approaches cattle raising hadn't proved to be a success. They bit the dust again and their money was about gone.

Others were raising sheep, and they were apparently doing well. This would be their last hope. Changes were again made so they could get a start with sheep. This meant close watch over the 150 sheep and old ewes they had for a start, so they needed a sheep wagon also. In the beginning Jim stayed with the wagon and flock. Each spring they were all busy with lambing, docking and shearing. Yet the profit was the best yet so things were looking good for the first time.

Now, when after many stressful years, things seemed better, it was war time — World War II. Doug enlisted in the army, serving most of the time in South America. Ralph joined the navy. Now Doris became their shepherd. She was bringing the sheep home one evening when one of those mysterious summer storms came from just nowhere. Lightning hit and killed a lamb that was following close behind Doris. She was struck down also, but the faithful sheep dog hurried home, which was message enough to know something was wrong. It was by God's grace Doris was all right.

Orlee continued to help her mother with housework, gardening and canning. Time went by and the war ended. Doug and Ralph were back to help, but soon all four of their children were married.

Jim's health failed. He had asthma and no longer could continue ranching. They sold the sheep and later sold the ranch to their neighbors, the Walt Dickaus.

Jim enjoyed town life although he was long plagued with ill health. He passed away December 10, 1955. Dulla worked for several years after they moved to town. Because of a handicap with her knees she quit her work, but devoted her time to another large project. From August to December her dining room was a complete disaster while she repaired old toys, dolls and sewed constantly to dress them to look like new. Ralph did welding on toys or bigger jobs for her. For ten years she rejuvenated many, many toys for the Converse County Welfare and made equally as many children so happy on Christmas morning.

Dulla has 14 grandchildren and 23 great-grandchildren. Doug and his wife, Margie live in Casper. Doug has retired from the Amoco Refinery. Margie is working as a purchasing agent at the Natrona County Hospital where she has been employed for twenty-eight years. Ralph lives here at Douglas and has the Big Horn Taxidermy business. Orlee is widowed and lives with her mother to help out. Doris and her husband, Jack Barclay live in Casper, close to Doug.

Jim and Dulla kept the mineral rights when they sold the ranch. A number of years after Jim's death, oil was drilled on the ranch and Dulla received oil and gas checks since 1976. Dulla died Feb. 13, 1984.

Higgins, Frederick and Eva

Frederick C. "Fred" Higgins first came to Wyoming as a youth of fourteen years in 1886 from his home in Iberia, Missouri. He worked on various ranches, among which was that of John B. Kendrick (former U.S. Senator) near Sheridan, Wyoming. He was a resident of Wyoming until his death in Douglas May 18, 1937.

He married Evangeline H. Webb in Lebanon, Missouri in 1906. She came to Missouri from Jamaica B.W.I., with her widowed father, Thomas Webb, and thirteen other children, several of whom later made their homes in Wyoming.

Fred and Eva came to Douglas a year after their marriage and four of their eight children were born here. During the years they lived in Douglas he worked for Slonaker's Dray and Storage and for Art Riker at his saloon and restaurant, among other places of employment.

From Douglas they moved to the Ogalalla Ranch at Ross. He was Postmaster and managed the store at Ross for LeRoy Moore from 1917 until 1920, during World War I. Two of their children, Martha and Mary, were born at Ross: Martha Edna on July 4, 1917 while the annual dance and party were going on.

Later the family moved to Midwest where Fred supervised the dirt moving crew of men and horses who built the well sump basins and small roads in the oil field, until the company adopted a pre-depression policy of laying off everyone over forty years of age. Jobs for old men were not available except on large ranches. The family moved to a relative's homestead, where he was able to herd sheep as needed for B. B. Brooks.

During this time, his son recalls that he and his brother shot rabbits to use one winter as their sole source of meat. (Antelope and deer were not in that area as they are now.)

Eva was an efficient and thrifty homemaker and she never relaxed her standards of cleanliness no matter how primitive her home might be. Doing the laundry for a family of seven was no small task, especially since the clothes must be boiled, starched and ironed all by hand and in all kinds of weather.

Eva died June 10, 1962.

One family story recalled by Fred's sons: Snow lay heavy at the fairgrounds one winter, and the inside track was buried under several feet, while the outside track was almost bare. Knowing this, Fred bet a cowboy one hundred dollars that he could run around the track on foot and best the other man on horseback. The rider was required to use the inside track. There were many side bets. Of course, when the race was run, he had little trouble winning, while the cowboy got his horse "bogged down" in the snow.

Higgins, John E. and Josephine

John E. Higgins was born in Manatowoc County, Wisconsin, October 21, 1857, a son of John and Nancy Higgins, his father being a native of County Connaught, Ireland, while his mother was reared in the northern part of Ireland. After their marriage, John and Nancy immigrated to America and settled in Wisconsin. When John E. was 15 years of age, he began life for himself, working in the forests of Minnesota and Wisconsin. In the winter of 1880-1881 he drifted west to Livingston, Montana where he contracted ties for the railroad companies. In 1885 he came to Nuttall, across the creek from Glenrock, where he turned his attention to merchandising.

In 1886, he was united in marriage to Josephine Williams, a daughter of Eugene Amoretti and Countess Sacadesan, a member of one of the oldest French families. She was born in Villefranche, France in 1854. Josephine's father came to Lander, Wyoming via South Pass, Wyoming where he had mined the gold fields after coming to San Francisco from South America where he had been a French Minister. Josephine acquired her education in a convent in France.

After the Nuttall mines were sold to a Nebraska company and Glenrock was founded, Higgins moved his mercantile store there.

During the late 1880s he became interested in the sheep and cattle business. He was a partner in the Glenrock Sheep Co., owning 9375 shares, along with Stuart M. Anderson, who owned the same amount, and Dr. and Mrs. Jay Smith having 625 shares. The headquarters of the Glenrock Sheep Co. was two or three miles west of Glenrock on the North Platte River. His other holdings were the Dry Creek Ranch, which lay between Lower Boxelder and Deer Creek and the mountain range on Willow and Duck Creeks, which was known as the GR Ranch.

In 1897 Mr. Higgins plotted and founded the progressive town of Thermopolis, where he also engaged in merchandising. The business interests were known as Higgins and McGrath.

The Higgins Hotel was built in 1916. It was owned and operated by Mr. Higgins until his death in 1926. The Higgins Trust sold it to Dr. Tabor in 1942. Among the owners have been Merle and Mona Dunham and Mr. and Mrs. D. Jack Doll, who today operate the hotel, along with the Paisley Shawl, which is located in the hotel.

Mr. Higgins served as a County Commissioner for eight years and two terms as a state legislator from Converse County.

Josephine died on Jan. 20, 1924 from a head concussion resulting from a car wreck 10 miles east of Casper.

On June 24, 1926 John E. died of natural causes. His will, which was a holographic will, named six nephews and nieces as beneficiaries. They were to receive $1,000 a year for 50 years. It was further his wish that all property, real and personal, shall belong to the State of Wyoming. The will stated that the state create a trust whose life shall be not less than 50 years. At the end of the 50 years all property was to be distributed in the best interest of the state.

The October 8, 1926 issue of "The Douglas Budget" stated, "One peculiarity of the situation is that the state can not take over and administer the property until some special legislation is enacted, as there is now no provision of law where it can be done. If the estate amounts to a ½ million and earns 4 per cent income it would amount to $20,000 a year, leaving $13,000 to the state after the bequests were paid."

In April of 1928 an agreement was made between the executors, Stuart Anderson and Robert D. Carey, to give cash settlements of $25,000 to all the beneficiaries except Harry Devine, Jr., who chose to receive the $1,000 per year.

The estate was then appraised and found to be worth $575,000. After expenses and the five beneficiaries paid off, the net estate in 1929 was worth $357,477.

The State of Wyoming had court action between the state elected officials and the Board of the University of Wyoming trustees to decide who was going to administer the trust. In a Supreme Court decision of 1932 it was decreed that the Governor and the State Land Board administer the trust. J. C. Underwood was appointed trustee on Nov. 21, 1932.

Most of the lands were sold in 1940. The Boyd Ranch, which lay adjacent to Glenrock on Deer Creek and was acquired by a mortgage default, was sold to the Olin Bros. for $11,750, the Dry Creek Ranch to James F. Lam for $8,300 or a little over $3.00 per acre, the GR Ranch was sold to U. S. Grant and Fred Grant for around $5.00 per acre and the Town of Glenrock took the Higgins Subdivision for back taxes.

By July 31, 1941, the trust had shrunk to $48,919 including sale of all the land, livestock and most of the stocks and bonds. All that was left was the Higgins Hotel and the Lincoln Building in Glenrock and some of the oil stock. The hotel was sold for $1500 soon after, as was the Lincoln Building for $350. The Trust was now practically worthless and so ended the epoch of John E. and Josephine Higgins.

Hildebrand, Fred W. A. and Mary

The family originated in Boden, State of Hessen, Germany, which is approximately 200 miles southwest of Berlin near the Rhine River. Fred was born March 2, 1859 in Germany and was married to Mary Wood, born July 14, 1862, also in Germany. They were married in about 1880 or 1881 before emigrating to the United States. Two children, Lena, born in 1882, and William, born in 1883, were born in Germany prior to their immigration. The exact date they came to the United States is not known but was in about 1885. Fred Jr. was born in Gladbrook, Iowa in September of 1885 and was their first child born in the United States. The route they took in their emigration is not known but it is assumed they went down the Rhine River and then took a boat to New York. One nephew came to the United States with them but was separated from the family after arriving in New York and it is not known where he settled in this country. I, James Hildebrand, assume, from talking to other people, to emigrate to this country, they needed to be sponsored by someone in this country before they could get an entrance visa, therefore someone connected with the then Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad, sponsored them.

Granddad started working for the railroad in Iowa and as the railroad progressed west they moved west. They moved from Iowa, between 1885 and 1887, and ran the section at Irvine. Needing to get their children to school, they moved to Douglas and then on to Careyhurst in about 1892. He continued working for the railroad until 1906 at which time they began ranching full time. In the time they worked for the railroad 12 children were born to the family, seven boys and five girls.

Lena was born at Boden, Germany in 1882 and died in San Diego, California in 1954. She spent her early years running a candy store in Douglas and the remainder as a housewife. William "Bill" was born at Boden, Germany in 1883 and died at Wenatchee, Washington in 1977. Bill was a rather different type of person and spent some time in life before settling down. He thought, at one time, he wanted to be a bum and would go and live in this manner until he was tired and then would get some new clothes and work for awhile. He worked for the Union Pacific Railroad for a few years and then saw a shepherd and thought this would be the life. No type of work seemed to keep his attention very long, although he was known as a very hard-working man when he did work. He married Wilhelmina Numrich on Jan. 24, 1919, at age 36, and settled into the ranching and farming business after that time along the river north of Careyhurst, then Glenrock, and finally on a fruit farm near Wenatchee, Washington. William died October 20, 1977, Wilhelmina on March 22, 1982.

Fred Jr. was born at Gladbrook, Iowa in 1885 and died at Douglas in 1970. He spent the early years of his life ranching along the north side of the Platte River between Orpha and Careyhurst at the railroad station of Alberta. This station had a section crew who lived in old wooden box cars converted for living space. On Sept. 23, 1916 he married Ada Pexton. They would sell the section workers milk, cream, butter and eggs as there was no store in the area for shopping. This station was closed and moved to Orpha in the late 1920's and was on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, north of the river, at this point. I would ride the train home while going to high school in Douglas and it cost 34 cents. They sold the ranch and moved to Douglas in 1937 and Dad worked at various jobs which included ranch hand, carpentry and painter for several years until a fall, while painting a barn roof, would not permit him to be on his feet all the time. At this time, about 1946, he started working at the pool hall and worked there for about 20 years helping a lot of people that needed financing until they could get back to work or get some type of income. After the pool hall closed he retired and did not work out any more due to his failing health. Ada died in 1984.

Carl was born at Irvine, Wyoming, a station along the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, in 1887 and died at Cheyenne in 1939. He married Zelma Winkler on Jan. 27, 1916. Carl had a ranch about 15 miles west of Bear Creek, Wyoming, now known as the Allemand Ranch. When Carl's health failed, he sold this ranch to Jack and Helen Allemand. Carl, in his younger years, did a considerable amount of rodeo performing, although none of it was professional as known today.

George was born at Irvine in 1889 and died in Douglas in 1982. He was known as the gambler of the family and was never lucky, therefore did not win the big pot. He spent all of his life either ranching for himself or working for others. He spent many years working for Dr. Hylton and working with his racing stock.

Henry J. "Johnny" was born at either Irvine or Douglas in 1891 and died as a result of a tractor accident in 1957. He married Verbel Dull on Sept. 24, 1927. Johnny spent all of his life in the ranching business at the ranch near Alberta, known as the Alberta Land Company, which is seven miles west of Orpha along the Burlington Northern Railroad. Johnny was very active in the Baptist Church of Douglas. Verbel died March 13, 1976.

Mary was born at Careyhurst in 1893 and died at Douglas in 1972. Mary married Dr. E.W. Robertson on January 4, 1922. Earl was a Doctor of Veterinary Medicine who was known as the livestockman's friend. Mary ran the ranch which was north of the Platte River near Careyhurst while Doc did his veterinary work. Doc died on June 13, 1962.

Anna was born in 1895 at Careyhurst and died at Douglas in 1971. She married Glen Pexton on Mar. 20, 1916. He died from appendicitis about six weeks after their marriage. She then married Clarence Marsh on July 14, 1920. He was a photographer. She ran the Goodwin rooms rooming house which also housed the photo shop.

Edward was born at Careyhurst in 1897 and died from childhood disease when a young boy, at about age eight, and is buried at Fort Fetterman Cemetery.

Robert "Bob" was born at Careyhurst in 1899 and died at Douglas in 1974. He married Amelia Numrich on Oct. 15, 1925.

Robert spent all of his life in the ranching business and retired to Douglas to live his latter years. He was a large powerful man in his younger years and loved to wrestle. Clarence O'Brien, a nephew, loved to try and wrestle him and would not leave him alone. One time Robert hung Clarence by his feet on a harness hanger and he nearly died before someone found him to cut him down. Amelia died Nov. 28, 1982.

Augusta was born at Careyhurst in 1901 and died at Douglas in 1964. She was a practical nurse, taking her training in Cheyenne, and spent her life as a housewife and special nurse. Augusta married Stanley Jankovsky on May 5, 1922.

Margaret was born at Careyhurst in 1904 and now lives in Antioch, California. She married Floyd Roush on Sept. 2, 1921. He was an engineer for the Torrington Ditch Company. Margaret is the only one of the children living at this writing. Their daughter, Maxine, was the first girl to graduate from the University of Wyoming School of Civil Engineering. Floyd died Nov. 21, 1959.

Granddad and several of the boys took up homesteads north of the Platte River, north and east of Careyhurst, while still working for the railroad. Granddad would live weekends on his and spend the weeks working for the railroad. If he was needed at the railroad during the weekend one of the children would go to the homestead horseback and get him. At that time there was no bridge across the North Platte River and they would swim their horses across for access to the area north of the river. As time progressed Granddad purchased land in the area of his and Fred Jr.'s homesteads and thereby gained control of most of the land that was later to fall under the Running Dutchman Canal, which at the time belonged to William Werner. These purchases were made in 1896 from Mr. T. Solmon and W. Boyer, who at that time also had an irrigation ditch which was purchased with the land. Approximately 240 acres were purchased at $25 per acre, which was a lot of money at that time. The family continued to purchase land along the north side of the now Burlington-Northern Railroad until they controlled about fifteen miles, and about five miles along the south side between the railroad and river. In this strip of land, four sons, Fred Jr., William, Henry, Robert and one daughter, Mary, lived for many years.

The Running Dutchman Ditch, which furnished water to irrigate the farming land along the river bottom, was started by William Werner in the late 1880's, but due to some bad soils along the original ditch line the water would sink and go back to the river, and the Werners abandoned working on the ditch in the 1890's. Granddad looked at the proposed ditch and possible alternate routes and decided he could make it work and purchased the ditch right from the Werner family. He made application to the State in 1903 for the ditch and completed it in 1906. The ditch was 10 miles in length, 16 feet wide at the top, 12 foot at the bottom, and carried two feet of water. In later years a considerable portion of the intake portion of the ditch was abandoned and pumps were used, thereby eliminating about five miles of ditch and several structures.

The original family, in general, remained in the Douglas - Casper area. Horse events were one of the main attractions in the period about the turn of the century from racing to rodeos. The facilities at this time were not as complete as they are today and the riders would have someone to help them hold the horses as they were saddled and then ridden to a standstill. My dad, Fred Jr., and his brother, Carl, worked as a team in these rodeos. Dad would ear the horses down and Carl would ride them.

At one rodeo at Casper, Carl had ridden his horse and was giving the bow at the grandstand when the horse changed his mind and was not ready to stop. Carl, not being prepared, was dislodged and spent a considerable time in the hospital recovering from some painful broken ribs. This did not deter their fun though; as soon as he was healed up they were at it again. George was the roper in the family and spent a considerable time at this profession, although he did not get good enough to make much money. This horse was retired and used at Carl's ranch as a wrangling horse or for children to ride. My dad and I went to help Carl round up some cattle one time when I was about 9 or 10 and I had the pleasure of riding Old Babe. As we were going we saw a coyote that acted as though he was crippled and Uncle Carl said, "You turn him and I will rope him." I took after Mr. Coyote and Babe got his nose right on the coyote's tail and away we went. He would not turn for me and if it had not been for a fence I might still be going. I need not say we did not get Mr. Coyote but I learned not to let Babe chase an animal unless you wanted a fast ride.

A lot of sheep were raised in this era because of the need for wool to make clothing and this was a double pay animal. If the lamb was lost, normally the wool would bear the cost of running the animal until the next reproduction season. The wool, though, presented quite a problem to get it to the railroad for shipping. I can still remember the freight wagons that ran together to haul the wool. Herman Werner, Mr. Eskew and Carl would get together and bring it in as a group to help each other through the tough times. This method was used up into the late 1920's. The ranchers would load the summer supplies of food items in the wagons and take them back with them to their ranches. At that time they bought flour by the ton, sugar by the 100 weight and coffee in 10 pound cans, also I believe, whole beans and dried fruit. In about 1928 they contracted to truckers to have their wool hauled.

This family, as a whole, is not a close family and did not visit too much with other members of the family except at the birthday of Mother Hildebrand. On July 14 of each year the ones in the area would gather for a little reunion and birthday party. After her death no reunions were held until 1983 at which time they gathered, through the efforts of Albert and Marge Hildebrand, at the Orpha Community and Dance Hall.

There were about 90 members at this gathering. They came from Iowa, to the east, and California, to the west, and most of the locals attended. The oldest and newest were there, including Ada Hildebrand, wife of Fred Hildebrand, Jr., who celebrated her 90th birthday and Linda A. Hildebrand, who was 3 months old and a great-great-granddaughter of Fred Hildebrand, Sr.

Mr. Hildebrand retired from the ranch in about 1916 and moved to Douglas to live, due to bad health, and died in 1927. Mary Hildebrand, his wife, lived with her son, Robert, in the summer and either her daughters, Anna or Mary, the remainder of the time and died in 1954.

For a family of this size tragedies were few. Edward died at a young age from what was believed to be scarlet fever. Henry J. was killed in a tractor accident in 1957 and his son, Donald, was killed by a bull which he was feeding in the corral at his home, and Bryce, grandson of Fred Hildebrand, Jr., died as a result of a gun accident. The remainder of their children lived full lives from 60 to 92 years of age, and all are buried in the Douglas Cemetery except William, Edward, Carl and Margaret.

Hinkle, Albert and Elizabeth Meyer, Urba Langehennig

Lena Schnitker Groh, the maternal grandmother of Elizabeth, Urba and Hyba Langehennig, immigrated to America from Germany with her two sisters in the mid 1840's to join her father, her mother and two of her brothers who had settled in northwest Missouri in 1840. The original home of the Schnitker's in what is now Atchison County is still occupied by the descendants of one of her brothers. One of the sisters who accompanied her was married on the crossing which took three months. Another sister was drowned in the Mississippi River before they reached their destination. In 1840 when the first members of the Schnitker family came to America, Missouri was still a wilderness.

The parents and grandparents of Albert Hinkle emigrated from Germany about the time of the Civil War as did Christopher and Helena Meyer, who settled in eastern Nebraska south of Lincoln, which was, at that time, named Lancaster. It was renamed Lincoln in 1867. Peter Joseph was their seventh child, and their fourth son. Frederick Langehennig also came from Germany at about the age of twelve with his parents. This was about 1850.

Albert's sister Etta Cheeseman preceded him in death.

Frederick and Anna Groh Langehennig had eight girls, four of whom died in infancy. Another sister, Lula, died at the age of 16 in 1893. The three sisters that were living were Elizabeth, Urba and Hyba.

After the wedding of Albert and Elizabeth at the rural home of Elizabeth's parents, in the summer of 1897, the young couple lived for a time in Mound City, Missouri and Weeping Water, Nebraska, before moving to Wyoming.

Albert Hinkle and Elizabeth Langehennig Hinkle arrived in Douglas, Wyoming in the fall of 1909 accompanied by Elizabeth's sister Urba Louise Langehennig. The following spring (1910), Elizabeth's parents Frederick and Anna Groh Langehennig and their youngest daughter, Hyba Leona arrived to spend the summer, bringing with them their grandson, Roy B. Hinkle who was eleven.

Urba Langehennig continued to make her home in Douglas after her parents and sister, Hyba, returned to Missouri. She enjoyed working in a local millinery shop and doing dress making in the family home. Both Urba and Elizabeth were in poor health and it was felt the change of climate would be beneficial. Elizabeth added to the family income by taking in boarders, as she was considered to be an excellent cook. The Hinkles lived at that time in a small house in the 200 block on South Third.

Their neighbors were the Frank Clarks, Hiram Daniels and the Roy Brennings. After more than a year in Douglas they moved to Casper and Lander returning to Douglas permanently about 1912 or 1913.

Urba and Hyba frequently rode horseback with their young nephew, Roy, with horses rented from a livery stable where the LaBonte Hotel was later built. The three ladies also enjoyed daily walks when the weather permitted and remembered the board sidewalks in Douglas at that time. They remembered, too, with some amusement how shocked they had been when ladies in Wyoming rode astride while in Missouri they rode only side saddle.

In the early years in Wyoming the entire family vacationed for two or more weeks each summer in the hills south of Douglas, often taking with them guests from St. Louis, their parents or Albert's sister Etta Cheeseman and her family from Parsons, Kansas. They fished, picnicked and just enjoyed camping in the out-of-doors. Some rode horseback while others of the party stayed with the team and wagon.

For most of his life Albert was employed as a meat cutter and was employed in a local Douglas market. Later, about the years 1915 to 1917 he operated the Center Street Market there. His son, Roy, made deliveries from time to time.

The homestead where Mr. and Mrs. Hinkle lived for a time, as soon as the area north of Douglas was opened for homesteading, (probably 1918 or 1919), was sold in 1942 or 1943 to Mr. and Mrs. Wallis who had rented the property for some years.

Some time prior to the unfortunate death of their son Roy in June of 1917, the Hinkles had been employed at the Careyhurst Ranch about eighteen miles from Douglas. Roy and some of his friends were on one of the Careyhurst lakes when the boating accident occurred.

Sometime during the year of 1928 Mr. and Mrs. Hinkle started a restaurant on Center Street, naming it the "Gem". Two years later in August of 1930 they purchased the Wes Wiker house at 214 South 4th Street where they quietly celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary in the summer of 1947. The restaurant which they sold in 1936 or 1937 was later known as the "Midget," and was operated by Margaret and Tom Bullene.

On May 12, 1916 Urba Langehennig and Peter Joseph Meyer were married in Steamboat Springs, Colorado. Peter Meyer had come west to Douglas from Weeping Water, Nebraska at the urging of some friends, who had moved to Douglas several years earlier. He had, for a time, been employed as a carpenter in Douglas. Two children were born to them, Donald Gregory on March 28, 1917 and Geraldine Agatha on the fifth of January 1919.

Opportunity for employment with the Rock Island Railroad necessitated another move early in the 1920's, to Herrington, Kansas, where the family resided until 1940. After the death of her husband on January 7, 1936, and at the urging of her sister, Elizabeth, Urba again moved to Douglas in the spring of 1942. She and her daughter, Geraldine, purchased some property at 621 South Fifth. Geraldine was employed at that time at the Converse County Courthouse.

Donald was selected for military duty February 1941, and saw service in the European theatre of operations. He served with the First, Third and Seventh Armies as a 635th Anti-Tank Battalion member. He was wounded twice — once in France and once in Germany.

He was employed by Mort Peters at the Converse Lumber Co. and worked there from 1946 until 1979 when he retired. Bill Armstrong and Bill Roberts were the other two managers while he was employed there.

He married Margaret Roediger Johnston January 1, 1953 in Douglas. He adopted her two children, William W. and Lola Marie. In May of that year they moved into the D. C. Fackler house at 338 South Fifth, where Don and Margaret still reside. Lola Marie Rupert presently lives in San Francisco, California with her son Mike and Gina. William "Bill" is still residing in Douglas.

Geraldine married Lawrence Nuoci. Their two children are Gerard "Jerry" Joseph (born 1952) and Gloria Marie (born 1954).

While Hyba Langehennig had lived for a time with the Hinkles in Lander, Wyoming and Weeping Water, Nebraska, she did not make her home permanently in Douglas until 1950, upon her retirement after thirty-six years as postmaster at Nishnabotna, Missouri. She had held the job as postmaster from 1914 and her commission was signed by President Woodrow Wilson.

In the later years after their retirement Albert and Elizabeth Hinkle were always a busy active couple, looking after their apartment house, enjoying a few close friends and their frequent fishing and hunting trips. Their fishing trips were always made more enjoyable because they invited friends or neighbors to go with them. There was always room at their dinner table for an occasional drop-in friend or out-of-town guests.

Urba Meyer enjoyed her large yard and garden, canning and preserving and looking after two apartments. Her large yard contained many kinds of fruits, including raspberries, currants and gooseberries. Urba had a keen sense of humor which was much enjoyed by those who knew her best.

Albert Hinkle died at age 80 on December 3, 1951 and Elizabeth died on October 12, 1959 at the age of 84. Urba Meyer preceeded her sister in death on March 4, 1957 at the age of 77. After the death of her sister, Elizabeth, Hyba continued to live at 214 South 4th Street. She lived with her niece, Geraldine in Cheyenne for several years, just prior to her death there on December 12th, 1980 at the age of 98. At her request, she is buried in Douglas near her sisters.

Hinton, Lewis and Ina Mae

Lewis N. Hinton was born at Stockville, Nebraska, on September 25, 1908, the son of Irvin and Ida Mae Conklin Hinton. He was the next to the youngest of seven children. His folks had a farm and his dad was also a blacksmith. Lewis learned a lot about his trade of blacksmithing and mechanic work, that he followed most of his life, from helping his father in the blacksmith shop.

Lewie's older brothers, William and Bert and sister, Lenora, came out to Wyoming and filed on homesteads on Indian Creek, south of Orin, in 1917. Lewie's mother, Ida Mae, took sick and died from the influenza that was so prevalent during World War I. His brother, Bert, who was serving in the army, also had the influenza and was very sick but he recovered.

Vera and Bert Hinton were married the 24th of June, 1919. Their daughter, Ruth, was born in Nebraska in June 1920. Roberta was born June 1922; and daughter, June, in June of 1921, all on the homestead. They went back to Nebraska after they proved up on their homestead because of sicknesses and other troubles. They sold their homestead to Lenora "Nora" and her husband Harry Isaac.

In March 1921 when William and Bert visited in Nebraska, Grandpa Hinton drove back with them to the homestead in a Model T. In April of 1921 Lewie, Earl, Vera and Ruth Hinton came out on a train. Bert met them in Glendo and they went out to the homestead in a horse-drawn wagon. They stayed there all summer. Vera and Bert Hinton, and sister, Lenora (Nora), and William Hinton remained there on the homesteads and proved up on them. Their dad and the younger boys, Lewie and Earl, went back to Nebraska.

Nora met Harry Isaac, a widower, who also had a homestead. They were married December 18, 1927, and settled on the Isaac place.

Lewie and Earl came back to Wyoming in 1927. Lewie worked for Dr. Hylton, one of the early doctors of Douglas, on one of his ranches building fence, driving trucks, putting up hay and so on. Then he went to work for Harry Isaac, his brother-in-law, who was the foreman for Zimmerman's Diamond Dot Sheep Company at that time.

Lewie filed on a homestead in 1932 in LaBonte Canyon. His brother, Earl, also filed on a homestead close to there, but they later gave them up.

Earl and Lewie were called back to Stockville, Nebraska in November of 1931 when their dad was very sick. He died about a week later. They remained there until March 1932, when they started back to Wyoming. They had a terrible car accident in Nebraska on the way back. It was a very foggy night and they ran into a big truck with no lights as they were coming over a hill. Then another car rammed into the back of them. Lewie was not seriously injured, but Earl was hurt very badly. His leg was crushed in the car door and he had other severe injuries. The doctor in the hospital where they took Earl said that no way could Earl live, so there wasn't any use sewing him up. But Lewie said, "Like hell will he die! I'll get old Doc Hylton from Douglas to come out and patch him up." So Lewie called Doc Hylton and he came clear out to Scottsbluff and helped set Earl's leg and helped sew up his injuries. Lewie went on to Wyoming when he found Earl was going to live. Earl was months in the hospital but finally did recover enough so he could go on to Wyoming. There he stayed with his sister and family, Nora and Harry Isaac until he was well enough to work again.

Ina Mae Wiggains was born February 19, 1909 in Emerson, Nebraska, the daughter of Tillman Denton and Eveline Jones Wiggains. She was the youngest of five children. She spent her early childhood in Wakefield, Nebraska and then moved to Merna, Nebraska where she graduated from high school in 1928. She went on to Kearney State Teacher's College for two years. She taught school in Merna, Nebraska for one year.

She came out to visit her sister, Ethel Westwick, at Sam Carothers' ranch near Douglas. She decided to move out and got a job teaching at the Matt Carothers' School in 1931-33. In 1934 she started teaching at the White School and taught there through 1939.

When Ina Mae was teaching at White School, she boarded at Harry Isaac's ranch. The Isaacs were putting in modern facilities in their home and Lewie was doing the work on the bathroom. Ina Mae came home from school one night (September of 1934) and little Joe Isaac (about three years old) wanted the teacher to see the new bathroom. Lewie was sitting there putting in the faucets in the bathroom at the time. That was the way they met when Nora introduced them to each other in the bathroom. There was many an eyebrow raised when the question was asked of Lewie and Ina Mae on how they met and the reply was, "In the bathroom!"

The other shearers and workers of the Diamond Dot Sheep Company began to tease Lewie about getting a date with the new school marm. He tried real hard to get a date but Ina Mae was playing hard to get and it was several weeks before he finally got a date. The shearers promised to get them a new stove and a roaster for a wedding present if Lewie could get Ina Mae to say "yes", which she finally did. They were married November 29, 1935 at her sister's place, Vallie and Pierce Bressler's in Gordon, Nebraska. Her little niece, Elaine (Vallie and Pierce's daughter), clapped her hands when the wedding was over and said, "That was lots of fun. Now, Mommie and Daddy, you get married."

Lewie and Ina Mae came back to Douglas to live and lived first at the Edward's place, south of where Frank Pexton's place is now.

On the way back to Wyoming, a black cat was sitting in the road. Lewie stopped the car and said, "I'm not going to start married life with a black cat crossing my path!" The cat stopped, looked, turned, and went back, then they proceeded on their way.

When they set up housekeeping, Lewie's friends of the sheep company came through on their promises and got them the best kitchen stove they could find from the Montgomery Ward Catalog and also a roaster. They kept the stove and used it many years.

They lived at the Edward's place about a year and then moved to the Isaac ranch, where they lived in the bunk house.

Eddie Gibb was hired to manage the Diamond Dot Sheep Company after Harry's untimely and tragic death in 1938.

Ina Mae and Lewie moved to the Foxton place (where the Grant place is now near Esterbrook). Lewie continued to work for the sheep company until school was out in 1939, then moved to town and rented the Hofmann place, south of Douglas. Their first child, a son, Lewis Roy, (called Roy) was born on August 21, 1939 while they were living there.

Their daughter, Judie Mae, was born June 29, 1943, when they lived at the home at 903 South Fourth Street. Lewie built this home himself with the help of Ernie Norton.

Lewie first built sheep wagons for the Florence Lumber Company to sell, then he built his own welder and shop and went into business for himself as a mechanic and welder. Lewie was also an avid gardener and raised vegetables for his own family and sold to many families around town. This was one of his most loved hobbies and he was often reported as being one of the best gardeners in Douglas. He also enjoyed fishing, hunting and sports, especially those ballgames Roy played in.

When Lewie became ill in 1981, he decided to make knives for all of his five granddaughters. Some of the knives have bone handles made of deer antlers. The granddaughters each have their knives in their hope chests except for Beckie Hinton who used one of her knives to cut her wedding cake when she was married to Richard Hensley, September 4, 1982, and now uses them in her kitchen. Besides knives, he made spatulas, meat forks, and splatter covers for Ina Mae and family.

Lewie died on February 13, 1982 at the age of 76.

Lewie and Ina Mae were active members of the Pioneer Association, as Ina Mae is still. Ina Mae has been an active member of North Platte Homemakers since 1951.

Their son, Lewis Roy, married Loretta (Lorie) Ann Melcher, of Douglas, on September 5, 1961. They have three daughters, Rebecca (Beckie) Ann Hinton Hensley of Casper, Cheryl (Cherie) Lynn, and Deana (Dede) Louise of Glenrock, Wyoming.

Their daughter, Judie, married Jess Langston of Glenrock, Wyoming on September 23, 1961. They have two daughters, Cynthia (Cindie) Mae and Michelle (Shellie) Kae, all of Casper, Wyoming.

Ina Mae has some interesting ancestors on her side of the family: Josiah Bartlett, a doctor, her great-great-grandfather on her mother's side who signed the Declaration of Independence.

Another great-great-grandfather on her father's side was Ute Perkins, who was a private in the Revolutionary War.

Hiser, Elias and Mary

Elias Hiser was born on July 19, 1869 in Huntington, Indiana. The son of Gottlieb and Christina Hiser, he was one of seven children.

In 1886 Gottlieb moved his family from Huntington, Indiana to Litchfield, Nebraska.

In 1887 Elias hired out to help trail horses to Wyoming. He spent the winter of 1887 in Guernsey. In the spring of 1888 he came to the Douglas area. He worked for the Macey Horse Ranch which was located on Boxelder Creek below the big canyon and above the present Bixby Ranch. Elias served as Deputy Sheriff for two years (1892 and 1893) under Frank Virden. In 1893 he homesteaded on land in upper Boxelder which became the nucleus of a ranch which grew to be over 9,000 acres. The original homestead started with the purchase of Wylie's squatters rights. These were not a legal holding document so Elias then filed on the land as a homestead.

On February 28, 1894 Elias married Mary Clausen. Mary was born in Hamburg, Germany on June 28, 1873. Her mother died when she was six years old. When she was nine she came to the United States to live with her grandmother who lived in Iowa. At the time she and Elias were married she was helping her sister cook for miners at the Inez mines.

On December 7, 1894 the first son, Frank Verdus, was born at the homestead.

Wylie had a small house and a dugout. The Hisers lived in this house until after the birth of their second son, Willard Ulysses, born February 15, 1896.

After Willard was born they moved into a larger house that Elias had been building.

The Hisers continued to add to their land holdings by filing additional homesteads and purchasing adjacent homesteads from others.

As the ranch grew, so did the family. On July 21, 1898 the first daughter, Georgianna Christina, was born; April 20, 1900 a son, Ralph Gottlieb; February 15, 1902 a daughter, Mary Margaret; August 21, 1904 a daughter, Maud Sophie; July 20, 1906 a son, Elias Edward; June 27, 1908 a son, Robert Jerry.

In the fall of 1909 the Hisers purchased a threshing machine and horsepower from Bill Howard. They threshed for people on LaPrele, Boxelder and Deer Creek.

On May 8, 1910 a daughter, Edna Mae, was welcomed to the family.

In the winter of 1910 Elias started a freighting business. He hauled feed to the Ogalalla Ranch and in the spring he hauled wool to Douglas. He continued to haul wool for the Ogalalla and Morton Ranches until 1921 when the hauling was taken over by trucks.

During the time that he freighted he was known to have the best walking teams in the area. He used small horses weighing 1,000 to 1,200 pounds and many were spoiled saddle horses from Mortons and Careys. He was the only one driving at that time that could make a U-turn in the street with a six-horse string team without getting the lead team on the sidewalk.

In 1912 another daughter was added to the family with the September 4th birth of Louise Bertha.

They purchased a sawmill from Marshalls which was powered with a steam engine. Leonard Bartshe was the first engineer. With the first lumber sawed they built a big new barn on the original homestead.

In 1914 the youngest daughter, Mary Bell, was born on February 16.

In 1918, during the First World War, Willard served 13 months in France as a blacksmith and horseshoer. Frank got as far as the east coast and Ralph was in Douglas to go when the Armistice was signed.

In 1921 Elias turned the threshing over to Frank and Willard to run. In 1926 Willard bought the first tractor to replace the "horsepower." They continued to thresh on Boxelder and Deer Creek until the early 1950s.

In 1921 the Hisers purchased the adjacent ranch from Billy Kimball and moved their family to the larger house there.

Mary took over as Postmistress of the Boxelder Post Office, a job which she continued holding until 1943. When she retired the post office was discontinued.

Elias Hiser died on September 29, 1933 at the age of 64. Mary and three of the boys continued to run the ranch. In 1943 Mary turned the ranch over to the boys and moved to Douglas where she resided until her death on January 19, 1954 at the age of 81.

The Hisers had eleven children, five sons and six daughters. All except one have lived their entire life in Wyoming, five of these in Converse County.

Georgianna Christina married Vance Horton on August 15, 1920. They had six children, Edith, Glenn, Norma, Alva, Lucille and Forrest. Georgianna died on March 29, 1966, Vance in October 1975.

Maud Sophie married Harvey T. Conner on November 28, 1922. They have four children, Alva, Harvey "Bud," John and Roy.

Ralph Gottlieb married Mabel Gonsalves June 25, 1923. They have three children, Leonard, Mildred and Dick. Ralph died on January 24, 1977, Mabel on April 4, 1982.

Mary Margaret married Edward Virden on January 25, 1925. They have two children, Raymond and Edward.

Edward Sr. died on June 17, 1930.

Louise Bertha and Warren Cromwell were married December 3, 1930. They have three children, Dale, Sadie and Selma.

Robert Jerry married Zelma Grant on March 6, 1932. They have three children, Wayne, James and Mary. Robert died May 25, 1984, Zelma in August 1985.

Edna Mae and Walter Davies were married on November 1, 1933. They had five children, Harry, Irwin, Mary Ellen, Melvin and Charles.

Mary Bell married Kenneth Mikesell on May 20, 1937. They have four children, Barbara, Marjorie, Larry and Alice.

Elias Edward (Ed) and Bessie Grant were married on August 19, 1942. They have 16 children, Helen, Joy, Eugene, Patricia, Donna, Hugh, Ramona, Charles, Fred, Wynell, Margaret, Darlene, Bruce, Wanenna, Melissa and Tony.

In 1944 Frank married Florence Srivens who had three children, Eileen, Edna and Charlotte. They had four children, Robert, Frank, Margaret and Joanne.

Willard married Gladys James on June 2, 1948. She had a daughter, Blyth, but they had no children. Willard died on March 16, 1961, Gladys on January 14, 1967.

Hiteshew, George W. and Mattie

George Washington Hiteshew was born on August 2, 1849 at Tipton, Cedar County, Iowa. His parents were Jacob and Catherine Hiteshew. His wife described him later as having no beard and being a strong and healthy man with blue eyes and medium dark hair.

George Hiteshew came in 1872 to Cheyenne, a town barely five years old. According to Wyoming historian T. A. Larson in History of Wyoming page 30, "Before July 1867, Wyoming had been virtually unoccupied Indian country except for transient travel on the trails."

George lived near Cheyenne for nine years before marrying. At the age of 32, Mr. Hiteshew decided it was time to get married. He wrote to his sister in Rockwood, Tennessee, and said he had decided to get married. He gave the description of the type of girl he wanted. He wanted a girl that was in her teens and said if there was one that filled the description, he would come after her. She replied that there was one that filled the description exactly, but if he wanted her he would have to hurry as there were others and one in particular that was trying to get her. George went to Tennessee and spent Christmas with his sister.

Mattie Dayton Hiteshew wrote, "I lived 20 miles from his sister's place. She sent for me to come and spend Christmas with her...We were well acquainted with his sister..."

"My father, Calvin Dayton, immigrated from New York to Crossville, Tennessee in Cumberland County, with an ox team. After landing there, his wife and five children died within four weeks with black diphtheria. He bought a big farm and married my mother, MaLissa Jane Naramore. They had five boys and me. My father died when I was ten. I married George Hiteshew when I was 17 and came to Cheyenne in January, 1881." (Mattie Dayton Hiteshew)

George Hiteshew and Mattie Dayton were married at four o'clock on the evening of January 5, 1881, by the Justice of the Peace at his sister's home. Mattie said, "He wore a dark gray suit and I wore a white dress. I spent a few days at home before coming West to the ranch 25 miles west of Cheyenne and two miles south of Buford Station."

George and Mattie Hiteshew arrived at Buford Station in the late afternoon on a day in the latter part of January 1881. They walked out to his ranch which was two miles south. His cabin was only 14' by 16'. George had a couple of bachelors living in it while he was gone and according to Mattie, "The place was a terrible mess!" He had no furniture and the bedstead was made of rough lumber nailed up. The mattress was a gunny sack filled with hay. He used old fashioned apple crates for seats and the table was made of rough boards." Their first three of six children were born there: Charles Fielding Hiteshew on December 13, 1881; Clara Hiteshew on December 26, 1882; and Retta Hiteshew on March 5, 1884. "When the children were born, my mother-in-law took care of me", related Mattie.

"We lived there six years and had two family neighbors, Haygoods and Robins", Mattie said.

In 1886, before Wyoming had become a state, George, Mattie and children migrated by team, from Cheyenne to Keeline. The trip took 14 days. The family settled on a ranch, where they used the K brand, six miles north of Keeline on August 8th. There, two more children were born. Ethel was born on September 18, 1889 and Oliver on January 18, 1891. Hazel was born several years later in Manville on October 4, 1901.

In the area, the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad (which soon became a part of the Chicago and Northwestern system) came out of Nebraska to reach Lusk and Douglas in 1886. There were still roving bands of Indians.

In later years Mattie wrote, "When we landed there, the country was unsettled and full of Indians. When Retta was two years old, a squaw picked her up and was going to take her away..."

Retta Hiteshew, University of Wyoming graduate, 1905.

Of this same period, Mattie's daughter, Ethel Hiteshew Dern, a younger sister of Retta's, wrote, "The most excitement was when the Indians came through. We were afraid of them. One time Mother took us up on the hill east of the house, but we got back before they had left. One old buck says, 'Fraid, heap afraid.' One time they came and Mother was cooking tomato preserves. Those crazy Indians took that pan of preserves out by the well and ate them. One time they got Retta and were carrying her to their camp. Mother's brother Bill was there and he went and got her. I hid behind the dining room door and was I scared. We had country school out there for a while, Sothmans and us. The Indians would pass the school house, Bill Sothman went out and talked to them. They had a white woman in one wagon and she was sure crying."

The Claus Sothmans were from Germany and neighbors and good friends of George and Mattie Hiteshew. The Sothmans lived in a grout house on what was known as the Sodie Ranch. Mattie Hiteshew became community nurse and widow to the Sothmans and other neighbors. When called upon she would grab her five pound and gallon syrup pails of medicines and be on her way. She delivered Emma Sothman on a blizzarding day in April with the help of young Katie Sothman.

The following was told by Mrs. Emma (Sothman) Pray: "My mother nearly died of Erysipelas when I was about six. I wouldn't stay out of her room so I got it too and nearly died. The doctor had to come from Lusk, 35 miles away. After one visit he stopped at George Hiteshew's and told them I wouldn't live through the night. Mattie H. came over and bathed me in soda water all night and here I am..." Erysipelas is an acute contagious disease of the skin. Eruptions appear as a spreading, rose-red patch that is slightly raised, owing to swelling of the underlying tissues. The patient feels very feverish and ill and suffers a burning pain and itching in the affected parts.

Emma (Sothman) Pray also recalled, "The Indians use to come to our house when we lived on the ranch and would demand food. They especially wanted sugar, flour and meat. They would wait until the men left the house and come and say, 'Men gone, we want food'. Mother and us kids were scared to death of them. If we saw them coming in time, we kids would run and hide under the barn and leave our mother alone in the house. They would come right in the house and if food was cooking on the stove, they would take the lid off to see what was cooking.

"My mother had a large dog, Prince, she would call in the house and hold onto, or he would attack them. They wanted her to put the dog out, but she knew they would shoot the dog. They came by every once in a while.

"But once, some negro soldiers from Ft. Laramie came by. The dog ran after them and they shot and killed him. That was such a sad experience, we all cried. The soldiers were on horseback."

Art Joss, son of Clara Hiteshew Joss and grandson of George and Mattie Hiteshew, related, "Twice a year George Hiteshew would be gone for two weeks at a time (fall and winter). He went to Cheyenne for supplies. The Indians were fairly friendly but about the time he'd get ready to leave, one would see Indians peeking over the ridge. It was said that they would steal anything that wasn't tacked down when the men folks were gone. Clara would hide under the bed.

The following was told by Mattie Hiteshew, "When the Indians would go through they would stop and ask for milk, they called it 'Suk, Suk'."

Of George and Mattie's ranch house, their daughter Retta (Hiteshew) Woody wrote on the back of a picture of the house, "My father built this house in 1888 on his ranch at Lance Creek, Manville, Wyoming. Here is where I spent my childhood days and lived until I went to Laramie to school." Of the same house, Art and Peggy Joss said, "The house north of Keeline was made of rock and cement and has 13" to 16" walls." (The original house is still part of the present day house owned by George's grandson, Arthur "Art" Joss.) This house along with much of the aforementioned land was in what was Converse County until 1911, when the borders of Converse County were changed and it became Niobrara County. Much of the land owned by George and Mattie Hiteshew, their children and heirs, falls in range 66 and 67 and is therefore in Converse and Niobrara Counties. However, at the time it was all Converse County.

In about 1894 Mattie began moving to Manville, Wyoming, Converse County, for three months during the winter so the children could attend school. This gave them six months schooling with the three they received on the ranch. Charles attended school in Manville as did Retta and Ethel. Mattie said, "Clara attended high school in Omaha, Nebraska." Ethel went to the Grand Island Business and Normal College in Grand Island, Nebraska for two years. It is thought that Charles went there, too.

Retta's formal secondary education was received at the University of Wyoming Prep School from 1899-1902. From 1902-1905, she took Normal Training at the University of Wyoming. (In 1902 there were 202 students enrolled and in 1905 there were 227 students enrolled at the University of Wyoming.)

Retta received a teacher's First Grade Certificate for Wyoming Public Schools which was good for a period of four years in the county of its issuance in 1905. She later received a Professional Second Class Certificate which entitled the holder to teach in the Public School of the state for life, unless revoked for cause, in 1911.

One of Retta's first teaching jobs was at the Gillespie School in Converse County. It became one of her most memorable jobs when a bull came to the school house and some of the students teased him. Consequently, the teacher and students either spent the rest of the day in the outdoor toilet or on top of the school house while the bull "raised the dickens" in the school house.

Retta deserves a small niche in the history of Wyoming education, not only because she was a "pioneer" teacher, as were her sisters, but because it is safe to assume that she taught under conditions that could seldom be compared. The major part of her teaching career was spent in a wheel chair in Converse, Niobrara, and Platte Counties, since she became paralyzed from the waist down in 1909. Most of the schools were in remote areas which required that she live in the school during the week. She continued to teach until the early 1930's.

When Retta was teaching at the Gillespies, she met a young man by the name of James Monroe Woody. According to an account written by Vic White, his cousin, James was a cleancut man who bore the earmark of refinement, so scarce in those days. He was induced to come west by Vic's father, J. F. White (also known as Sam White), who came to Tie Siding in 1874 from Georgia. James was also from Morganton, Georgia, near the Blue Ridge Mountain. When he first arrived in the country, he worked for the Toltec Livestock Company.

The Toltec Livestock Company, also known as the Bar M Outfit, ran cattle, horses and sheep on their holding. They branched out into a large concern according to an account in Wyoming's Pioneer Ranches. Perhaps at one time they had around 75,000 acres of land. L.

L. Laughlin was their manager. Their brand was a bar over M on the left side of cattle, left shoulder on horses and back of sheep. They ran a roundup wagon jointly with Smith and Moore. The summer round-up was for horses and the fall roundup for cattle. Much of the Toltec Livestock Company's land was adjacent to land of the Swan Land and Cattle Company. James rode with the outfit in the summer season and at one time was a foreman.

He worked as a fireman in Grand Junction, Colorado. Also, James worked one summer haying for Ellen Amanda McFarlane Prager's father, John McFarlane, on his ranch in the mountains near Laramie Peak. In 1906 and 1907 his mailing address was Garrett or Rock River, Wyoming. He often shipped cattle out of Orin, Wyoming. According to "Mandy" Prager, Jim Woody also worked at the Howe place after he was married.

Retta Hiteshew and James Monroe Woody were married November 28, 1907 at the Methodist Church in Manville, Wyoming. Sometime during the summer of 1908, James and Retta moved to a ranch owned by her father, seven miles west of Marsland, Nebraska, in Dawes County. They had two children. Stella Mattie Woody was born on July 2, 1908 at the ranch at Marsland and Laura Blanche Woody was born February 11, 1910 (Laura died seven months later.) In 1914, they purchased and settled on a ranch on Horseshoe Creek at Glendo, Wyoming.

Clara M. Hiteshew married Samuel Joss on May 5, 1901, at the Congregational Church in Manville, Wyoming, Converse County. Sam had met Clara at her home. She was about 18 and he was about 29 years of age. It is thought that Sam worked at one time for her father, George Hiteshew. Sam and Clara went to Lost Springs and homesteaded near Horny Hills. Their first child, George Samuel, was reputed to have been born out there in a sheep wagon in February 1902. They had two other children: Blanche Mattie and Arthur Gerald.

Charles Fielding Hiteshew married Lillian Howard on October 1, 1903. They had four children and homesteaded some three miles northeast of Lost Springs. (See story by their daughter Alice Hiteshew Randolph.)

Oliver Hiteshew married Mary Minerva Hatten on September 12, 1912. They were the parents of four children. Oliver and Mary homesteaded and built a log cabin in 1913. (See story by their daughter Wilma Hiteshew Wright-Mrs. Kenneth Wright.)

Minnie Ethel Hiteshew, better known as Ethel, married Clinton E. Dern. They had two children: Donna Mildred Dern was born November 17, 1912 and Oliver C. Dern, "Bud", was born February 12, 1915. They lived on Twenty-Mile. Young Oliver died January 2, 1928. Donna Mildred Dern married Arthur D. Keller in Hot Springs, South Dakota. They adopted a son, Kenneth. Kenneth now lives with his wife and family in Lusk. Kenneth's father, Art, served in the TEC4 Engineers in World War II. Art died December 5, 1961 and Donna died June 12, 1973.

Hazel MaLissa Hiteshew attended Converse County High School from 1916 to 1920. She was one of 20 members in the graduating class of 1920. Hazel and Florence Musch played the piano duet "Czardas" at the graduating ceremony. Mattie Hiteshew had moved to a house in Douglas which was located on the street behind the LaBonte Hotel so her daughter, Hazel and her grandchildren could attend school. Some of the grandchildren were: Alice Hiteshew, Stella Woody, Donna Dern and Blanche Joss. Hazel substitute taught kindergarten in Douglas. Hazel married more than once, but she never had any children. For the major part of her life she was married to Charles Milhoan and lived in Bossier City, Louisiana.

This has been an attempt to tell the partial history of the Hiteshew families' years in Wyoming since 1872. George and Mattie Hiteshew, their six children and their spouses, and many of their grand-children are no longer part of this life.

Janette Martindale Chambers

Hiteshew graduated from high school and when Retta, his sister, attended college she had Hiteshew on the records but used HitsheW on her signature.)

Elva Hiteshew Costin, a daughter of Katie and "Sherd" Hiteshew and a sister to Juliana Hiteshew Saul, wrote that they (George's parents, Jacob and Catherine Hiteshew) had a very nice farm in Iowa. "Evidently Grandpa Hiteshew (Jacob) was a person who liked to change locations for some reason, as he traded his farm for land in Tennessee, sight unseen. It proved to be a very poor piece of land and just where it was I don't know. Guess they couldn't make a living there so the family migrated to Wyoming. They settled on Lone Pine Creek." In what year we are uncertain. However, we know it was prior to the end of 1881 that Jacob Hiteshew, a Pennsylvania Dutchman, moved with his family to Wyoming.

Jacob and Catherine Hiteshew and most of their family apparently came to the Lance Creek area in 1886. They are thought to have had seven children; George Washington Hiteshew, Ulysses Grant Hiteshew (Grant), William Sheridan Hiteshew (Sherd), Joe Hiteshew, "Jake" Hiteshew, Emma Hiteshew and Annie or Anna Hiteshew.

Jacob homesteaded a place approximately three or four miles from Keeline and his son William Sheridan "Sherd" Hiteshew homesteaded a place closer to Keeline, which is where the headwaters of the Lance Creek begins. When Jacob Hiteshew homesteaded the ranch, his boys were all single, except George, and he and Mattie homesteaded the original ranch which has stayed in the family through the years. It is now part of the lands owned by George's grandson, Art Joss.

Hitshe, Charles & Lillian Family

Charles F. Hitshe was born in Wyoming Territory December 13, 1881 at Buford Station west of Cheyenne to George and Mattie Hitshe, ranchers. In 1886, the family moved from Buford by team and wagon to a ranch north of Keeline where George and Mattie lived until they retired to their home in Manville.

Charles married Lillian Howard of Lost Springs in October 1903. She was the daughter of Robert and Prudence Howard who were in the cattle business in the Lost Springs area. Charles and Lillian lived at the Hitshe ranch north of Keeline until 1910, when they homesteaded some three miles northeast of Lost Springs and by planning and hard work increased their holdings. They originally raised sheep but subsequently changed to cattle. In the early spring of 1912 a very severe winter storm killed many sheep in the area and several sheepherders froze to death, including one employed by the Hitshes.

Mr. and Mrs. Hitshe are the parents of four children, Edith (1904), Alice (1905), Charles "Tobie" (1908) and Leonard (1912). When the girls were old enough to go to school the family moved to town and eventually built a home there where they lived until they moved to Douglas in 1940. Charles died in 1968, Lillian in 1971.

Charles Hitshe donated the land and laid out the plot for the town of Lost Springs. At the time there were not enough electors to incorporate so ranchers within a given area were included and the town incorporated in July 1911. The ironic part of this is that when the limits were finally established the Hitshe home was across the street from town.

In the immediate area of Lost Springs there were three homes, all built in the early 1900's, that had hot and cold running water, indoor plumbing including bathrooms and central heating. They were the Charles Bright, Johnny Howard and Charles Hitshe homes. Two are still there. The Hitshe home was moved to Lusk. To provide hot water, coils were placed in the side of the fire box of the kitchen range for the water to circulate through. Having hot water for the "Saturday night" baths resulted in a very warm kitchen.

For many years Mr. Hitshe carried the rural mail. The early day roads were far different from now, especially in winter months, it often took two days to make the trip to "20-mile" and back. Charles constructed an enclosure on a light wagon, and even installed a small wood burning stove, which made the trek much more comfortable during cold blustery weather.

The first school in the area, a one room building constructed in about 1895 was located about a half mile southwest of Lost Springs on the Bob Howard place. About 1910 another one room school was constructed a short distance west of town. Later the original building was moved to the new school site in the north end of town. When the new building was completed the old one was purchased by the Hitshes, moved to their place across the street and became the combination milk and wash house. Not only did Lillian Hitshe attend school in that building, so did her daughters. The most vivid memories of that old building are the gallons and gallons of milk that went through the hand operated cream separator, and the amount of laundry done each week. One wonders how the present generation would cope with heating the water in a boiler on a wood fired stove, operating the machine and clothes wringers by hand. At that time it was customary to carefully sort the clothes by color and put them through the washer a "load" at a time, boil the whites, then run all through the washer a second time, followed by two rinses and finally hanging on outside lines to dry, even in winter.

With the advent of ice boxes came the need to store ice. Some built ice caves, others above ground storage. In either case ice was harvested during the coldest part of winter and packed in sawdust in the storages. In the Lost Springs area most people obtained the ice from the Platte River which meant leaving home by team and wagon very early, sawing out the blocks of ice, loading them and returning home - a long hard very cold day's work.

Edith Hitsheiw married Roy Condray, formerly of Kansas, in 1922. Except for about four years they lived in the Lost Springs area. Roy drilled water wells in addition to ranching until in the early 1940's when they purchased the Airport Court in Douglas and operated the business until retirement. Roy died in April 1969 and Edith in December 1981. They had four children. Ernest Lee was born in 1925. He married Frances Aldrich of Sheridan, Wyoming and they have two children. "Ernie" was employed in highway construction and water well drilling in Converse County until August 1950 when they moved to Kennewick, Washington where the family now resides. Roberta Condray, born 1929, married Kenneth E. Martin. Roberta lived in the Lost Springs and Douglas areas until about 1974 and now resides in Sundance, Wyoming. They have two children. Robert Condray, born 1935, worked in various jobs in Wyoming until the late 1950s when the family moved to Idaho City, Idaho. He was married to Georgia Lee, and they have seven children. Robert died in 1980. Lenora Condray, born 1937, married Charles McChesney of Douglas. They have four children. Lenora still resides in Douglas.

Alice Hitsheiw moved to Casper in 1923 to complete high school after which she was employed by the Burlington Railroad as secretary. She married Joseph Guy Randolph of Casper. They left Casper in 1941 and worked on various wartime construction projects until 1944 when they were employed by the Hanford Atomic Project in Richland, Washington where they lived until retirement (1962). After living six years in Douglas and six in Arizona, they returned to Richland where Mr. Randolph died in 1976. Alice now lives in Olympia, Washington.

Alice and Joe had two sons. Dr. Philip L. Randolph, a research physicist employed by the Illinois Institute of Technology, Chicago, Illinois, was born in Casper, Wyoming (1931). He married Lillian Louise Larson of Spokane, Washington. They have two sons.

Dr. Gerald G. Randolph, a practicing physician in Olympia, Washington, was born in Casper Wyoming (1935). He married Mary Louise Green of Bellevue, Washington and they have three children.

Charles F. "Tobie" Hitsheiw at the age of two and one half, while the family was still living at the homestead, was stricken with spinal meningitis which resulted in a complete loss of hearing. At the age of six he was enrolled in the Nebraska School for the Deaf in Omaha, Nebraska where he completed high school and at the age of 19 married a school mate, Evelyn Fairfield of Valley, Nebraska. They have two children. After graduation Tobie worked for some three years for the School for the Deaf, then returned to Lost Springs, but due to lack of employment in his field-cabinet making and furniture repairing-moved to Casper where he was employed by Cornell's Furniture. When Mr. Cornell sold the business and purchased another in California he arranged for Tobie and family to move there also. Tobie continued to work at the same furniture store until retirement even though the business changed ownership at the time Mr. Cornell was forced to retire due to ill health. They now live in Auburn, California as does their daughter Jean and husband George Shaver who have four children. George is in the carpet laying business. Son, William "Bill", and wife live in Fremont, California. They have three daughters and two sons.

Leonard Hitsheiw married Frances Koseck of Florence, Colorado in 1933. They have three sons, seven grandsons and three great grandsons (note - no girls!). Nothing like perpetuating the Hitsheiw name. Leonard has engaged in various activities, first working in the strip coal mines north of Lost Springs, then operating heavy equipment for highway construction in Converse and Natrona Counties. He worked out of Cheyenne for five years as heavy equipment repairman for the Worthington Machinery Co. In 1946, Leonard organized the Great Northern Equipment Co. and did seismograph work and drilling for the Standard Oil Co. for eleven years, then drilled water wells throughout Wyoming and Colorado until retirement. The family finally settled in Lander where they presently live. Their three sons and families also live in the Lander area. Melvin operates an automotive repair business in Hudson, Donald is owner-manager of the Sinks Canyon Construction Co. and Claude has a cattle ranch south of Lander.

Mary Alice Hitsheiw Randolph

Hitsheiw, Oliver and Mary

It is believed that the Hitsheiw heritage began in Holland and then to the U. S. where we will continue from Tipton, Cedar County, Iowa where Jacob and Catherine Hitsheiw lived and several children were born. George Washington Hitsheiw was one of the children and father of Oliver Hitsheiw. (See stories of other Hitsheiw elsewhere in this issue.)

Oliver Hitsheiw was born at the ranch six miles north of Keeline, Converse County, Wyoming on January 13, 1891. He received his elementary education at Manville, Converse County, Wyoming and college at Grand Island, Nebraska. In September 1912 he married Mary Minerva Hatten from Merriman, Cherry County, Nebraska. In 1913, they built a log cabin at the home ranch six miles north of Keeline. The cabin is still standing. There were four children.

When Converse County was divided into Converse and Niobrara Counties this put the Hitsheiw properties into both counties.

Oliver helped his parents to operate the ranch where they raised cattle, sheep, hogs, mules and horses. On one occasion, 700 head of Texas longhorns had just arrived from Texas when a blizzard hit (1912), and afterwards steers were found dead for miles in every direction.

Hogs were also raised. Herds of hogs were driven to Keeline by horseback and shipped to market. On one occasion, July 1923, Oliver and George Hitsheiw shipped 82 head of hogs to Casper. They began trailing the hogs in from the ranch at 7:00 p.m. the night before and arriving in town at 5:00 a.m. without the loss of an animal. One of the jobs of Oliver's children was to keep the hogs out of the cornfields at the ranch.

After the death of his father in 1927, Oliver and his mother continued to operate the ranch. Oliver purchased other lands, some of which were in Converse County in and near Lost Springs.

In past years, friends and neighbors would gather for Fourth of July picnics at the ranch north of Keeline. Also, the Hitsheiw raised large gardens and would give produce to friends and neighbors. Many came to pick chokecherries along the creek.

Some of the employees of the Hitsheiw ranch in past years were: Lewis Lee (1912); Frank Mahnke (1912); "Shorty" Shaw; Clint Dern (1922); Walter Scott; Floyd

Wilkinson "Alkali Pete" (1923); Kenneth Rood (1924); Oscar Rood (1924); William "Bill" Sothman (1925); Lyle Fullerton (1925); Lyle Bacon (1925); J. C. Hout (1925); Donald McDonald (1925); Matt Rogina (1925); Don Hull (1925); Fred Runser (1926); George Fenton (1926); Tom Lee (1926); Homer Hughes (1926); Otis Hughes (1926); LeGrande Lee "Dick" Lee; W. Knittle (1926); O. C. Jones (1923); Bud Kidder (1927); W. Hatfield (1923); C. W. Baughn (1923); Carl Hahn (1923); Roy Condray (1923); Gus Dietchler; R. T. "Curly" Thorton; Lee Swickhamer; William "Bill" Nuttall; Sherman, Kenneth and George Wright; Kenneth Martin; Dale McGuire; Arkansas Jack (1923); Blister (1923); Sideburns (1923); George Syvester; Roy Waggoner; Howard Pebbles; Ed Wilson (1923); Carl Severson; Frank Boardman; _____ White; _____ Sheperd (1925); A. I. Martin (1921-1923); _____ Irvine (1922); George Grant (1922); Buck _____ (1922); _____ Garhart (1922); Ole Man "Hump" Tipton and son (1924); Harley Wolfe (1922). Many cowboys went by nicknames but they didn't hold true from one area to another. Oliver had the custom of nicknaming the men or nicknames were attached by other hands. Two of the hired girls were: Dorothy "Euche" Baker and Lolo Ruhl Bartos. Many of the employees were residents of Converse and Niobrara Counties.

In 1942-1945 Oliver and Mary moved to California and were employed in the Defense Program. Oliver was employed as a Machinist at the U.S. Navy Supply Depot of Oakland, California and the U.S. Navy Yard at Mare Island, California. Mary was employed as a welder in Shipyard No. 2 at the Permanente Metal Corporation of Richmond, California. The shipyard built Liberty Ships during the war. Oliver and Mary returned from California in 1943 and held a public sale, and then returned to California and resumed their jobs there. They continued to lease the ranches until Oliver's death in 1945. Most of the lands owned by the pioneer Hitsheiw families are still owned and operated by Hitsheiw relatives.

Oliver and Mary were the parents of four children: Ruth Hitsheiw (1914); Harold "Dub" (1917); Wilma Irene (1922); William Oliver "Bump" (1927). Oliver died in 1945 and Mary in 1977.

Ruth Hitsheiw attended school at the Chalk Butte and Manville schools. She married Dale McGuire of Keeline in 1935. They were the parents of two children; James Dale (1935, dec.), who married Betty Joyce Sissel of Torrington and have three children; Leona Margaret (1936), married Alvert Eugene Kirby of Ventura, California and they have three children. Ruth died in 1937.

Harold "Dub" Hitsheiw was born at the ranch home and attended the Chalk Butte and Manville schools. He married Bernice Martin of Harrison, Nebraska in 1939 and they are the parents of ten children; Norman Harold (1940) dec.; Dwane Fullen (1942); Karen Elaine (1943); Karmen Kay (1944) dec.; Kenneth Eugene (1945); Dianne Lynn (1949); Harold Dean (1953) at Douglas; Donna Jean and Debra Joan, twins, (1954) at Douglas; David Allen (1955) at Douglas.

Harold lived in Converse County for several years at Lost Springs and Douglas. Harold "Dub" was sort of a Jack-of-all-trades, working in construction, ranching, water well drilling, as an oil well driller, roughneck, did landscaping, etc.

Wilma Irene Hitshew was born in 1922 at the ranch. Raised at the ranch and attended elementary school at the Chalk Butte, Keeline, and Manville schools. Graduated from Manville and attended Colorado Women's College in Denver. Taught school at the Eddy and Keeline schools in Niobrara County. Also a 4-H Leader, Director, and voted 4-H Outstanding Woman Leader of Niobrara County in 1967. Wilma married Kenneth Eugene Wright in 1940, and they have one son, Nyle Keith, born at Douglas (1949). Nyle is presently employed by Mountain Bell and living at Worland, Wyoming. He is married to Kerry Lou Lungren of Worland. They have four children.

William Oliver Hitshew was born at the ranch in 1927, the youngest child of Oliver and Mary Hatten Hitshew. At an early age, his father nicknamed him "Bump", a name he is still known by. He lived on the ranch north of Keeline, Wyoming and attended grade school in Keeline and high school in Manville until joining his parents in California in 1942. There he attended Machinist School at Mare Island Shipyard at Vallejo, California. Returning to Wyoming in 1943, he worked on various ranches until being drafted into the military service in August 1945. He was in the Military Police in Germany for 18 months and was discharged in 1947.

Bill and Maybel Thomson were married April 1948 at Douglas, Wyoming. Maybel was the daughter of Rod "Zip" Thomson, who was the first white baby born in Chadron, Nebraska in 1885, and Catherine Gentry Thomson who was born in Auburn, Nebraska in 1910. Maybel lived on the family ranch on Big Lightning in Niobrara County.

Bill and Maybel were the parents of three children: Linda Denise, born 1952 at Douglas; Kirby Oliver born 1954 at Douglas (deceased); and Tracie Catherine born 1962 at Lander, Wyoming (deceased). Linda married Gerald Aldrich and is presently living in Alameda, California. She has two children, David and Dustin.

Bill was engaged in ranching at the home ranch north of Keeline from 1948-1950, moving then to the Thomson Ranch until 1954. Moved to Douglas and operated the Texaco Station on Richards Street for a time. In 1959 the family moved to Crowheart in Fremont County and ranched there until 1966 when he then worked in the oil field and timber for about two years, before getting into highway construction, his present occupation. The family has lived in Riverton since 1966.

In the 1930's Oliver had a patented invention for highway bridge and vehicle reflectors, or markers. Mary also had two patented inventions.

Oliver was a Niobrara County Commissioner in 1933 and 1934. He was elected for a two year term.

Hitshew, Wm. Sheridan "Sherd" and Catherine Family

Catherine "Katie" Hitshew was born in Germany March 16, 1877 to Claus and Margaret Sothman. She died July 21, 1959 in Lusk, Wyoming.

William Sheridan "Sherd" Hitshew, the son of Jacob Hitshew was born October 6, 1864 at Tipton, Iowa. He died September 26, 1949 at Lusk, Wyoming.

Sherd Hitshew left home at the age of 16. He was then living in Tennessee with his parents. He rode the Union Pacific train to the end of its run - Cheyenne, Wyoming. From there he walked with Bill Dayton and Col. Flemming to what is now known as Virginia Dale, Colorado. His brother George Hitshew and family lived there. Sherd helped his brother farm. They raised potatoes which they took to Laramie City to sell. They also took wild meat there to sell.

Sherd's next move was to Buffalo, Wyoming. There he set up a blacksmith shop near the little stream that flows through Buffalo. May 11, 1886 Sherd again joined his brother George who had moved to a location six miles north of Keeline, Wyoming, on Lance Creek.

July 5, 1894 Sherd and a neighbor girl, Katie Sothman, rode horseback into Manville, Wyoming and were married by H.L. Higby. They returned to the home ranch of Jacob Hitshew, four miles north of Keeline, Wyoming. In a few years they purchased the ranch from his father. I believe in 1899.

Sherd was in the sheep business with John Mills for a time, later he sold out and went into the cattle business for himself.

When Sherd moved his family to Manville, so Ida and Stella could enter school, he also built a blacksmith shop. As a hobby he enjoyed doing silver enlay using silver coins. He made and enlaid many silver bits and spurs. He was often called upon to survey land.

In 1910 the Sherd Hitshew family moved to Lusk, Wyoming. A two story house was purchased not far from a new school building that had just been completed to accommodate grades one through 12. Sherd set up a blacksmith shop in Lusk and worked in it during his spare time. The ranch was leased to Knute Dupes as Sherd was appointed marshal of Lusk. When electricity was put in Lusk, Sherd not only acted as marshal but took care of the light plant. He made many trips to and from the plant each day.

Later Sherd and his brother Grant purchased a small brick garage from John Wesley Wolff. They operated the garage and repair shop until Grant decided he wanted to move to Tennessee. So the property was leased.

Sherd and Katie had five children: four daughters and one son.

Ida Catherine Hitshew was born on the ranch, four miles north of Keeline, Converse County, Wyoming, December 26, 1895. She lived there with her parents until she was ready to enter the third grade of school. Up to that time her mother taught her.

A four room log house was built in Manville, Wyoming in order that Ida and Stella could go to school there and associate with other children. The house was not far from the school house. It was a good warm and well built house being of log, then lathed, plastered and wall papered, later the logs were covered with siding and painted white. They lived in this house during the school months and moved back to the ranch each spring.

In 1910 the Sherd Hitshew family purchased a house in Lusk, Wyoming and moved there so the children could further their education. All five of Sherd's children graduated from the Lusk High School and all five attended the University of Wyoming.

Ida played both the piano and violin. She played marches for the school children to march into and out of the school building.

During the summer months she clerked in the H.C. Snyder Mercantile Store. In the winter months she attended the University of Wyoming. She taught one year at the Lohrer School north of Lusk and one year at Keeline. When she taught at Keeline she lived with her father on the ranch and rode horseback the four miles twice a day. She gave up her school at Keeline to marry.

March 12, 1917 Ida and Oscar Vernon Siegle were married in the Hitsheew home in Lusk. Elva, her sister, played the wedding march and Rev. O. E. Blenkarn performed the wedding ceremony. After a delicious dinner served by Ida's mother the couple left by train for a honeymoon in Salt Lake City and on to Nevada where they made their home. Oscar drove pieces of heavy equipment at the copper mines in the Ely vicinity and Ida taught school. They built a lovely home in Ely, Nevada and lived in it until the passing of Oscar in 1968 and Ida's passing in 1982. Ida was very active in civic affairs and was a 50 year member of the P.E.O. Sisterhood. The Siegles had no children.

Stella Margaret Hitsheew was born at the ranch, four miles north of Keeline, Converse County, Wyoming, September 16, 1899. She started to school in Manville, Wyoming and graduated from the Lusk High School in 1914.

In high school she was introduced to both shorthand and typing. These subjects seemed to be her favorites as she was excellent in both. D. E. Goddard, Land Commissioner, often called her from school to help him in his office. Stella attended the University of Wyoming. She worked for County Superintendent of Schools, Amy E. Christian and was later appointed Deputy County Clerk by E. M. Phillips. In 1923 she resigned to marry a young attorney, Harold Irving Bacheller.

Stella and Harold had two children; Jean Elizabeth, born in Lusk and Harold Irving, born in Casper.

Jean married a Casper boy, William "Bill" Desch in Casper. They had two children, Ann and David. After a divorce, Jean married J. E. "Pat" Mitchell and have made their home in Hayward, California.

Harold Irving married a Pinedale girl whom he met while attending law school at the University of Wyoming. Her name, Bertie Luman whose parents have a cattle ranch out of Pinedale, Wyoming.

Bertie and Irving "Bud" Bacheller have four children: Buddy, Chuck, Susan and Linda.

Stella and Harold moved to Casper in 1925 or 1926 where Harold opened a law office. Later they moved to Cheyenne as Harold was appointed Deputy Attorney General with Mr. Kerr. When his term there expired he again returned to Casper to practice law. He passed away in Casper in 1965 or 1966, and was buried in the cemetery in Lusk.

Elva Anita Hitsheew was born at the ranch, four miles north of Keeline, Converse County, Wyoming, October 6, 1902. She attended school in Manville and graduated from the Lusk High School in 1914 at the age of 16. Her parents thought her too young to go to the University of Wyoming so she took a post graduate course in the Lusk High School. She, like her sister Stella, was very good at typing and shorthand and was often called out of school to do secretarial work for attorneys and oil men who were in Lusk during the oil boom. One summer she worked for Attorney John F. Harkin.

At the age of 17 she entered the University of Wyoming. She did part time work for A. E. Bowman, Director of Extension. Later she accepted a position as his secretary. She was with Mr. Bowman until she married a native boy of Laramie, Jerry T. Costin, August 26, 1924. The following year they moved to California where Jerry was Supervisor of Purity Grocery Stores. Upon retirement they moved to Sun City, Arizona. They had no children.

Juliana Hitsheew was born in Manville, Converse County, Wyoming, February 6, 1906. The family moved to Lusk in 1910 so she attended all twelve grades in the Lusk Schools, graduating in the class of 1923. She attended the University of Wyoming where she received her degree in the Department of Education. Her first school was in the Node Consolidated School - the first five grades. This school started in the spring and dismissed in December for three months. The weather was too severe and the roads too bad to bus the children to school during the winter months.

Juliana did not complete her second year at the Node School. She accepted a position in the Douglas School system - a fifth grade in the Old North Grade School Building. Her mother had gone to school in this building when her parents lived at Keeline.

Juliana taught two years in Douglas and then accepted a position in Thermopolis one year. The following two years she taught the fifth grade in the Lusk School System.

June 6, 1931, Juliana and Veldon Harold Saul were married in Scottsbluff, Nebraska. Veldon, known by his many friends as "Pep", was engaged in the jewelry and hardware business with his father Willard A. Saul. Within a few years Veldon purchased the store from his father.

Veldon was a watch maker, repaired jewelry, as well as being a locksmith. He had many hobbies but his first love was for his gun collection which was started by his father and handed down to Veldon. The outstanding gun collection hung in his store many years for all to see and enjoy. The collection consisted of rifles, shot guns, pistols and some Indian artifacts. Veldon won many prizes when shown at various gun shows.

Veldon passed away of a heart attack November 2, 1967. The store closed its doors the following year.

Veldon and Juliana had one son born February 2, 1938 - Richard Harold Saul. He attended all twelve grades in Douglas, graduating from the Douglas High School and from the University of Wyoming with a Masters Degree in the field of science. Richard married Marselle Werre of Sundance, Wyoming. They have two children - Boyd Calvin and David Veldon. Their home is on a small acreage two miles south of Lingle, Wyoming. Richard is one of the bird biologists for the State of Wyoming.

John Wesley Hitsheew was born in Lusk, Niobrara County, Wyoming, July 1, 1912. He attended all twelve grades in the Lusk schools, graduating from the Lusk High School and attended the University of Wyoming. He taught school north of Lusk one year and one school term at a school north of Lost Springs, Wyoming. He was a hotel clerk in a hotel in Thermopolis where he met Lily Santavicca. They were married in Lusk November 2, 1935. They moved to California where he owned and operated a shoe store known as "The Hiteshew Bootery" in Antioch, California. After selling the store he was a mail carrier for the U.S. Post Office of Walnut Creek, California for ten years. He retired in 1973.

John Wesley served in both the U.S. Army and the U.S. Navy during World War II.

John Wesley passed away at Antioch, California, of a heart attack, January 4, 1982.

John Wesley and Lily had no children.

Hoffman, Harry and Etta

Born in Nuckolls County, Nebraska on November 14, 1893 to Fred and Millie Templin Hoffman, Harry came to Converse County to homestead north of Flattop in 1917. His sister, Lillian, along with her husband, Walter Dickau, homesteaded close by to the north.

After serving in World War I he returned to the homestead. On October 16, 1919 he married Etta Reed, daughter of neighbor Jacob and Nancy Reed. A 12' x 14' homestead shack was their home when they were first married.

During the early years of their marriage a chicken house was built that housed 1000 chickens. A cistern was built using run-off water of the barn to furnish water for the birds. Some of the fowl were slaughtered and sold to restaurants in Douglas, including the LaBonte Hotel. Etta tells about the time when the young chicks contracted a disease. "Dulla Herrick and I worked very hard trying to save them but most of them died. We were very disheartened."

Shirley and Alyce Rankin bought the Hoffman Ranch in 1946. Harry and Etta moved to Douglas. Harry did custom combining for a few years following the wheat crop from Kansas to Montana. He then operated the Texaco service station by the State Fairgrounds.

Harry passed away December 3, 1971.

as told by Etta Reed Hoffman

Hofmann, C. H. and Effie

C. H. Hofmann came to Wyoming in 1901, to supervise the undertaking department of the F. O. Warren Mercantile Company of Cheyenne.

He was born in Indianapolis, Indiana, on February 6, 1879, the son of William P. and Sophia (Runner) Hofmann. His father was one of the early pioneers of Wyoming, when he homesteaded on land in Thermopolis, Wyoming. William Hofmann later returned to Indiana where he spent his remaining years.

Chris Hofmann attended school in Goshen, Indiana, and Chicago, Illinois, graduating from Chicago's United States School of Embalming in 1900.

On May 14, 1902, he married Effie Alice Hubbard, the daughter of Joseph Hubbard. She was born in North Judson, Indiana in 1880.

In 1905, Chris and Effie Hofmann and Effie's father, Joseph Hubbard, traveled from Cheyenne to Douglas in a covered wagon. The Hofmanns stopped in front of the Gus Johnson home to water their team of horses; and quoting Esther Bruegeman, from Peg Layton Leonard's book, West of Yesteryear, "their acquaintance began at my dad's horse tank! Dad was impressed to discover that the Hofmanns had come to Wyoming in a covered wagon!" said Mrs. Bruegeman. "My folks invited them for supper and to spend the night - and, through their hospitality, the Hofmanns decided to make Douglas their home."

Hofmann started an upholstery business, as well as selling new and used furniture. Being an enterprising young man, he bought the undertaking business from Al Heaton in 1906 and expanded his business and building continuously.

A farm was owned by C. H., south of Douglas by the Platte River bridge.

C. H. Hofmann was the Converse County Coroner for many years and is remembered as one of the most progressive merchants of early Douglas. He died on November 30, 1947. Effie died on March 18, 1930.

Hoge, August Charles and Ida

August Charles Hoge was born in the province of East Prussia on July 13, 1848 and came to the United States in about 1860. He was married in the early 1880's and they were the parents of four children, Albert Lee, (who homesteaded north of Shawnee, Wyoming), Adaline, Frank and Burley M. At one time August worked in a brewery at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, later coming to McCook, Nebraska where he took a homestead and farmed. Here his wife died and is buried. He sold the farm and came to Encampment, Wyoming and worked in the smelter at the copper mines. Here he met Ida Isabelle Snook Combs whose first husband, Ross Combs, had suffocated from an accident and fire at the mine. Ida was born at Haviland, Kansas on July 20, 1877 and was a cook at the mine camp when they met. She had a son Ernest R. Combs.

Ida and August were married in 1904 at Encampment and soon afterwards came to Ft. Laramie, Wyoming where August worked on the construction of the Ft. Laramie Canal driving horses on a wheeler (wheel slip). Their daughter Frances was born at Ft. Laramie on February 4, 1906. From Ft. Laramie they moved to the Rainsford Ranch south of Chugwater where their son Walter Edwin was born on April 13, 1907. It was on the Rainsford Ranch where Ida's son Ernest was bitten by a rattlesnake and died. He is buried at Wheatland, Wyoming.

Moving from the Rainsford Ranch, August then cut ties at Sawmill Canyon and from there moved to Lost Springs, Wyoming and August ran the pump station which was located about 1/2 mile west of town, the water being used at the Rosin Mine. The mine had a big steam power plant that generated electricity to operate the mine. They had electric cutting machines for cutting the coal, also electric drills and electric motors to pull the cars from the mine and onto the tippie where the coal was dumped into waiting railroad cars.

Walter remembers standing by the house at the Lost Springs pump station and watching the C & NW rotary snow plow remove snow from the cuts along the track the winter of 1912. In the spring of 1912 the Hoges moved out to the Rosin Mine where August was caretaker when the mine was shut down. The mine started up again in about 1914 but the coal wasn't too good a grade so the mine was discontinued again about 1915. This was when August took a 160 acre homestead 7 1/2 miles north of Lost Springs. August had relinquished his homestead at McCook, Nebraska so was entitled to take 160 acres here plus an additional 320 acres had he wanted it. They built a log house of two rooms on the homestead and later added another two rooms in about 1916, living here until about 1933 when they moved to the Walter Case place about one-half mile north of Lost Springs.

Frances and Walter attended school at the Sunset Mine school which was about one mile north of the Rosin Mine, for two or three years. Their first teacher for two terms was a Mrs. Edith Stark. Their second teacher was Miss Lillian Meinzer for one term. They went two terms to Mrs. Anna Buffington at the school which was about one mile south of their homestead, then one more term at the Spellman school with Miss Lillian Meinzer again their teacher. Frances attended high school in Lusk for several years and boarded at the George Parks home. She then attended her senior year at Lost Springs where she boarded with the William Davies family. She graduated from the Lost Springs High School with the first graduating class from there in 1927. Other graduating classmates were Mildred Bowell, Wayne McGrew, Herbert Rogers and Wilbur F. Wright.

Walter didn't attend school after going through the eighth grade at the Spellman School. From here Walter worked away from home at ranches in and around the Lost Springs area.

Frances taught school at the Jim Stewart school south of Lost Springs. Later that year she met and married Albert Hahn (1928) and they made their home at Mesa, Colorado. Albert and Frances were the parents of two children, Charles and Ida May. Frances and children visited her parents often at Lost Springs. Frances suffered a malignant brain tumor and died in 1966. She is buried at Grand Junction, Colorado.

After living on the Walter Case place for a time, August and Ida moved into Lost Springs and made their home there for many years; they were fondly called Dad and Grandma Hoge by all the children of the community. August lost his eyesight when about 95 years of age and Ida lovingly took care of him until his death May 19, 1948 at the age of almost 100 years. He is buried at Douglas, Wyoming. Ida continued making her home in the Lost Springs area until 1960 when she went to live at the nursing home in Douglas where she died January 16, 1961. She too, is buried at Douglas.

On March 21, 1942 Walter was inducted into the Army at Ft. Leavenworth, Kansas and was sent to California for basic training at various camps, then at the Blackstone Air Base in Virginia and at Camp Stewart in Georgia. From there he was sent to New York and on to England and France with the invasion forces, where he served during World War II, returning home in January of 1946 and going back to work at the Otto Bible ranch at Lost Springs.

On June 13, 1955 Walter was married to Bertha L. Wampler at Rapid City, South Dakota. They took a trip through Yellowstone Park and returned to the Otto Bible ranch to make their first home together. Bertha is the daughter of the late Earl and Hattie Freeman, 1914 homesteaders in the Hat Creek area of Niobrara County, Wyoming. Mr. Bible sold the ranch at Lost Springs and bought another in Nebraska where Walter continued to work for him until that ranch sold and Walter and Bertha again made their home in Wyoming on the Groves ranch between Lost Springs and Keeline. From here Walter and Bertha moved to Torrington, Wyoming where Walter worked for a machinery company at Henry, Nebraska and later for the John Deere Farm Equipment Co. at Torrington until he retired. Walter and Bertha still make their home in Torrington where Walter and Bertha keep busy around their small acreage, helping neighbors and working for their church.

Holloway, Francis and Lillie

Lillie Fields was born in Beattyville, Kentucky. She married Francis Holloway of Kansas and they moved with their three young daughters to Douglas, Wyoming in the early 1900's. They worked on the Harry Isaac ranch and lived in one of their ranch homes. They also worked for the Soden Ranch and there the fourth daughter, Ruth, was born in 1918.

Mr. Holloway caught the dreaded flu that hit during World War I and died on March 1, 1919 from complications. His remains were sent to Hoisington, Kansas for burial. Lillie was left with four young girls. She moved to the south end of Douglas and took in washings, house cleaning, ironings, etc. It was during this time she married Hank Gwartney. After adding four more children to their marriage, several years passed and Hank got pneumonia and died on November 1, 1930. Again Lillie worked for various households in the community. She met and married Glenn Graves. They loaded a wagon filled with the essentials to make it through the weekend at the homestead and headed out with the team and wagon. Before returning to town for the rest of the belongings, Lillie's home burned to the ground. Everything was destroyed - except the outhouse, so that was loaded on the wagon and taken to the farm.

Sylvia, the oldest of the Holloway girls, went to work for Doctor Hylton at his office and for Mrs. Hylton in the home.

Janettia, the second girl, went through the Douglas schools and met and married Lester Montgomery. He and his family were western musicians around the area. After the birth of LeRoy and a daughter that died at birth, they divorced and Janettia went to Casper to take normal training for teaching. She taught school at Kaycee, Wyoming. She met Herman O'Connor who worked for the ranches there and was also a bronc buster. They married and moved west to Washington State.

Mildred, the third of Lillie's daughters, went through Douglas schools. She was active in the Free Methodist Church with Anna Marsh. She worked for Mrs. Marsh's boarding house in Douglas. Later Mildred also went west and now lives in Washington State.

Ruth was the youngest of the Holloway girls. She was born out on the Soden's ranch near LaPrele Creek. In her teen years she spent some time with an aunt in Cody, Wyoming and returned to Douglas to marry Russell Ashmead, son of Jim and Clara Hull Ashmead.

Jim and Clara Ashmead brought their children Howard and Madeleine to Converse County early in the twentieth century from Iowa. In 1909 they decided to go back to Iowa. Having little money or transportation they made a boat, put it into the Platte River and headed east.

In 1917, after another son, Russell, was born, Jim and Clara Ashmead returned to the Douglas area to homestead on upper LaBonte Creek.

After Ruth Holloway and Russell Ashmead were married, Russell worked for the Cross family ranch on Cold Springs Road, drove a truck for Doc Hylton, worked in the oil fields, at the O. P. Skaggs Store and the Northwestern Railroad. He was also with the cavalry in Douglas. Lou Miller, Floyd Hogmire, Roy Bunning and Marty Price were his buddies.

Two sons were born to Russ and Ruth, Kenneth was born on the McCombs ranch north of Douglas and Russell Jr. was born at one of Doc Hylton's rentals on Sixth Street in Douglas.

Russell now lives in Folsom, California and Ruth lives in Oak Harbor, Washington.

Several of Lillie Fields' brothers and sisters also settled and homesteaded about the Douglas area. Before Lillie arrived in the area, her sister, Rebecca Cowles, and husband, Art, came to homestead. They rented a car on a freight train and loaded it with used lumber, hay, hundreds of Osage posts, a couple of horses, some chickens and a cart that Art had used in Nebraska to deliver mail on his route there. The car was side-tracked at Orpha, Wyoming, the closest place to the homestead claim near the LaBonte Creek. Art worked for ranchers in the area and in the Big Muddy oil fields. They built a four-room home with a sandstone fireplace.

Hiram Fields, a brother of Rebecca also homesteaded the area nearby. He built a nice two-story home on his land. Shortly after World War I broke out Hiram went into the service. He was wounded in the war and after his return was unable to homestead and lost his claim.

Brothers Harrison and George also worked in the area.

The Buchanan family had adopted Jesse Fields and they staked a claim. As years passed they moved out of the area and to other states.

Hornbeck, Carl and Edna Family

The family name was Hornback. Six brothers were divided in the Civil War, and three changed the name to Hornbeck. John Franklin Hornbeck married Mollie Elizabeth Bradshaw of Kentucky; they lived near Decatur, Illinois where Carl William was born in 1884. They also had a daughter Olive and a son Cecil. The family moved to a farm near Holdrege, Nebraska.

William Fuqua and Emma Prather Fuqua, both of Missouri, moved to a farm near Lamar, Nebraska where Edna was born in a sod hut in 1891.

Carl Hornbeck and Edna Fuqua were married in 1908 at Holdrege, Nebraska. They moved to a farm near Trenton, Nebraska where I, Beryl Louise, was born in 1909. They then moved to a farm near Holdrege, where Edna Pearl was born in 1912 and Clark Woodrow was born in 1914. In 1920, Dad and several men from Holdrege decided to go to South Dakota for a land drawing, but none of them were lucky. Then Dad, Mom, and her brother Harry Fuqua came to Converse County checking out homesteads. In 1921, the folks and we kids came to live on a homestead 30 miles north of Douglas on the Ross Road.

Edna Hornbeck

As there was no school, we went to Lyman, Nebraska for the winter where Dad found work. He returned during the May 10-12, 1922 blizzard. We camped in a tent where Michael Manor now stands.

Our first house was a one-room dugout, later another room was added. Mother would dig the eyes out of the potatoes; and each day she would spade a hill of ground to plant them. We had potatoes to last all winter. It rained almost every afternoon that year.

Again there was no school, so we moved into Orpha where classes were held in a small house. About Thanksgiving, a new one-room school was finished and I graduated from eighth grade. That building later burned and a two-room school was built in the same place.

On the homestead in the spring, we were busy with gardening; baby chicks; walking the hills; carrying water one-fourth mile from a spring; joining 4-H; and walking ten miles one way to the Hyland-Vollman School for meetings. There was now a school between the Lon Waltons and the folks, called Sage Creek School, which Pearl and Clark attended.

In 1923 Pearl and I were Converse County 4-H Champions with our mother being the leader. We stayed at the 4-H Club Camp on the state fairgrounds in tents. In 1924 I was club champion in sewing, going to the 4-H annual Round-Up at Laramie, along with Curtis Cody, Louie Meinzer and Elward Jagers. Art Hyde, the County Agent took us up through LaBonte Canyon, having a picnic lunch and let us try fishing, coming back home the same way. We had a full week of meetings and fun. Then I won the trip to Chicago given by the Northwestern Railroad and Converse County Girls 4-H, along with Fritz Nielsen winner of the boys 4-H. We left by train on November 27, 1925. It was a wonderful and interesting trip, also a full and busy week.

Pearl and I came to Douglas and worked for our board and room in order to go to high school.

The Ross Road cut the homestead in half, so Dad turned back the east half for another half section to the north, making it one half mile wide and two miles long. In 1924 he put another house, one mile north, at the cross roads of Ross, Badger Coal Mine, and Hyland on Blizzard Heights Divide. One survey map marked it "Hornbeck Flats."

Our sister, Ruby Rosalie, was born in 1926 at Glenrock. Dad worked at the Tank Farm at Glenrock. In 1928 the folks moved to Sand Creek near Orin. Rosalie and Clark attended school in Douglas. Clark finished high school and joined the Civilian Conservation Corps in 1933. Dad became a foreman for the C.C.C. and was sent to Moran and Dubois in the summers and returned to Douglas. Then, in 1935, decided to stay and lived in Shoshoni, Wyoming where in a few years Dad was appointed Postmaster, with mother as Assistant Postmaster for ten years. Then they retired and moved to Riverton. Mother died in 1967 and Dad in 1977.

Pearl taught school in 1929-1930 west of the Bear Creek Store and Post Office. There she met Otto Hart and they were married in 1930. Otto came to Converse County when he was 18 years old, working on different ranches; and when he was 21, he filed on a homestead and that was in 1928, near Ross. He lived there until 1932, moving to a farm south of Douglas. Five of their six children were born there: Donna, Frances, Robert, John, and Joan who died in 1936 and was buried in Douglas; and last was Jerry who was born in Riverton. They moved to Shoshoni, Wyoming in 1937.

Clark and his family lived in the Riverton-Lander area and then to Cody where he was working in the tunnel and was killed January 31, 1957. He and Mary Harnden had five children; Beverly, Gerald, Edna Lee, Samuel and Cheryl Diane who died in 1972.

Rosalie moved with the folks to Shoshoni, finishing school there and married Lloyd Clapp, having five children: LeRoy, Judy, Billie, Carla and Lloyd. They all live in the Idaho Falls, Idaho area. She worked several years as a bookkeeper for the Sears store. Then Rosalie married Lynn Field in 1965. Lynn died in 1971.

I married Floyd Turner in 1928.

Beryl L. Turner

Hornbuckle, Richard Q. "Dick" and Bessie Family

Richard Quay "Dick" Hornbuckle was born on New Years 1893, Callaway County, Missouri; being the great-great-grandson of William L. of North Carolina, of 1748. He moved to Littleton, Colorado with his parents and brother Phil prior to 1900. Phil Hornbuckle, later a tap dancer in Barnum and Bailey Circus, is mentioned in Ralph Moody's book, "Little Britches", setting being Littleton, Colorado in early 1900s. Phil, Dick and Moody, when small children, helped with trail herds, through streets of Littleton.

The death of Dick's mother resulted in his leaving home and going to work at Ray Montague's ranch near Littleton, when about 11 years of age. This young boy, Dick, began breaking horses in Colorado, claiming his ambition was to be a Cowboy in Wyoming. He went to Cheyenne and broke remounts for the U.S. Cavalry, at approximate age of 12 or 13.

When near 15 years of age, Dick, with $50.00 in his pocket, an old .45 with broken trigger and a saddle; hopped a boxcar to Gillette, Wyoming in 1908. He told of protecting himself on this journey with the old .45.

Upon arriving in Gillette, he took a job freighting for Jake Jenne from Gillette to Sand Creek in northern Converse County. He is believed to have been one of the youngest string team drivers in the west.

Dick then started his cowboy career in earnest. He broke horses and rode with round up wagons for the next decade. Among the many old ranches he worked for in and near Converse County were; Keeline, Reno, Taylor, Knighten, EB, CY, 88, Grieves (Casper), and McGinnis (Lusk).

Dick acquired a reputation as bronc rider not only in Converse County, but all over the West. Dick admitted being banned from the town of Lusk for six months for riding a bucking bronc through the old refinery there which evidently caused some damage. Dick seemed to have been riding with another cowboy down a street in Torrington when the horse jumped through a plate glass window and fell onto a dance floor occupied by startled dancers.

Dick acquired a famous string of bucking horses while working at the 88 Ranch and would ride and drive the horses from northern Converse County to Cheyenne Frontier Days and other rodeos.

In 1911, 1914, 15, and 16, Dick won the saddle bronc riding championship at the Wyoming State Fair in Douglas. He was awarded saddles and spurs which he still retained at the time of his death.

Dick rode broncs and roped steers in many major rodeos throughout the states, and won many championships. He appeared with Wm. F. Cody's (Buffalo Bill) Wild West Show and with Teddy Roosevelt in what is now Madison Square Garden in New York City. Going into the finals in the New York show as high point rider, Dick broke his leg while climbing aboard the bronc in the chute. He had never ridden out of a chute before his New York appearance. Even so, he almost completed the ride, and was so popular with the crowd, that a considerable sum of money was taken up by his admirers. Perhaps this is where he obtained the title, "The Little Daredevil."

Besides the accident at New York City, Dick had the other leg broken twice with horses falling on him, but I have never heard of him being thrown from a bucking horse.

Mrs. Harve Allen told of transporting Dick to Douglas from the Bear Creek area in back of her buckboard to get his leg set by a doctor.

Dick was also a friend of and appeared on shows with Tim McCoy and Will Rogers and with Pawnee Bill's Wild West Show. It was at one of these shows that he rode a bucking horse, equipped with rubber shoes, on the stage of the Denham Theater in Denver.

"Stub" Farlow, an early day bronc rider, and the man purported to be the bronc rider on the Wyoming license plate; was a friend of Dick's. He gave Dick's daughter, Elaine, an old time picture of him riding a bronc. She still has the picture.

Dick was a rodeo director for the "Casper Stampede" in Casper, along with several other towns in Wyoming and adjoining states.

After his retirement from rodeo Dick homesteaded near Sand Creek on what is now known as Hornbuckle Draw. He then joined Billie Marchant on the Curt Sears ranch on Bear Creek; eventually resulted in a partnership with Sears' horse ranch known as the EB Ranch. He later married Curt Sears' daughter Leona. To this union a son was born, Richard Curtis, September 23, 1921 at Douglas, Wyoming. Richard Curtis died in Casper, January 15, 1923 and is interred in the Douglas cemetery.

Curt Sears built a large mansion on Bear Creek with two foot thick walls built of stone shipped from Colorado by rail to Douglas, and then freighted by team and wagon to Bear Creek. Eli Peterson worked on the project. It is rumored that Curt hired "Dutch Henry," local Douglas pugilist, to come to the ranch as a sparring partner but

Dick Hornbuckle

Dutch quit the job in three days. Curt, while recuperating from an appendicitis operation, joined in a horse race with George W. Pike and Billie Marchant on the Bear Creek meadows. Sears' horse stepped in a badger hole and Pike ran over him which resulted in Sears' death.

On January 1, 1927, Dick Hornbuckle was united in marriage to Miss Bessie Turner, a school teacher, in Audubon, Iowa. Since 1919 Bessie had been making annual visits to her brothers' homesteads in the area of the present Hornbuckle ranch.

To this union, three children were born, a son Richard Thomas, while at the stone house on Bear Creek, and twin daughters, Evelyn Ruth and Mary Elaine, after moving to the log cabin on the Cheyenne River, at the present ranch site. This log cabin was built by the Young family, who arrived earlier in a covered wagon. The daughter of the Youngs married Harve Stevens and lived on Sand Creek and their daughter Helen later married Bert Kimball and ranched on Walker Creek.

Dick purchased part of the present ranch site from Youngs and adjoining ranch MSBar from Mrs. Frank Clark, daughter of old Mike Henry. This ranch was originally settled prior to 1883 by an Englishman by the name of Warner and the ranch was referred to as O-O. Warner and Andrews came over together from England prior to 1883 and one settled at the Cheyenne River location and the other at the Duck Creek where Walt and Jeff Reynolds now headquarter. These two ranches along with the Henry 88 Ranch are the only ones shown in the area on the first 1883 survey map. This map also illustrates the wagon trails to the Rock Creek, Fort Custer stage road which followed the old Bozeman Trail.

Malcolm Campbell, famous old time sheriff, tells in his autobiography of Dick, being a very rugged individual himself, spoke of being reprimanded by Malcolm a few times for settling arguments in the old western way; and commented that "One didn't argue with Malcolm".

Dick, with his family continued ranching on the Cheyenne River until the time of his death, January 6, 1959 at the age of 66. He was buried in Douglas Park Cemetery. The many rugged years of living outdoors on the roundups along with the constant pounding of riding a bucking bronc almost every day for a couple decades finally took their toll and he paid the price for realizing his ambition of being a "Cowboy in Wyoming".

Richard Thomas Hornbuckle; great, great, great grandson of William L. Hornbuckle born 1748 in North Carolina and the grandson of Thomas Henry Turner born in Iowa, July 14, 1856, was born in Douglas December 28, 1928, the son of Richard Q. and Bessie Turner Hornbuckle, while his parents still lived at the old Curt Sears Ranch on Bear Creek.

When Richard T. was about a year old the family moved to where Malcolm Campbell had wintered by the old O-O- Bar and eventually to the log cabin at the old Young homestead, where the headquarters still exist on the Cheyenne River. Dick Jr. remembers starting riding at the age of three following his parents and uncle, the late Glen Turner, on wild horse roundups and trail drives, following the Bozeman Trail, to the railroad along the Platte River.

After attending Douglas schools and the University of Wyoming, Dick Jr. returned to ranch with his father on the Cheyenne River. He became involved in the first uranium boom in Converse County; resulting in the Spook Uranium Mill and a successful ten year mining operation in the 1950's and 1960's known as B and H Mines; with neighbor Roy Baker. Dick Jr. was a pioneer director in the Wyoming Mining Association and later served on the Douglas school board and has been an active crusader to conserve water resources in northern Converse County.

Richard T. Hornbuckle married Rose Taylor in Glenrock in 1949 and to this union three sons were born, Richard Quay, Kirkwood Thomas, and Brent Bary. Dick Jr. and his wife both were pilots, and commuted by air until June 15, 1965 when a tornado destroyed a major portion of the dense growth of trees for a mile along the Cheyenne River and around the ranch headquarters, resulting in disposing of the plane.

Richard T. Hornbuckle married Pearl St. John in Cheyenne May 18, 1968, and they and the three sons and their families carry on the traditions of the family ranching operations along with contracting and other business interests. In 1974 a portion of the late Herman Werner 55 ranch was added to the family operation. A major portion of this had originally been established and operated for years by Carl Judson and his sister Ruth and husband, Les Osburn. Their ranch headquarters was located on Philips Creek named for Portugese Phillips who rode through this area on his ride for help against an Indian attack at Fort Phil Kearney near Story. Also a portion of this 55 ranch had been operated by Wheeler Eskew who had been foreman for one of the coal mines in the early days of Glenrock.

Some of the early 1900s homesteaders whose lands are now included in the Hornbuckle ranch operation were Claude Young, Blink Young, Ray French, Frank Clark, Mike and Dean Harris, Shirley Call, Harvey Benjamin, Clarence Turner, Charles Schmuck, Ada Fleetwood, Elsie Judson, Carl Judson, Fred Stray, Eva Turner, Richard Russell, Charles Secord, and others.

Richard Quay Hornbuckle, third generation Converse County, born October 29, 1950 in Douglas attended Converse County rural schools, NCHS, Casper College, New Mexico State University. Quay married Vicki Lea Forson August 7, 1970, and three children were born; Jackie Michelle, December 1, 1972, Richard Todd, January 8, 1975, both in Las Cruces, New Mexico. Rhonda Danielle was born February 20, 1977 in Casper, Wyoming. Quay worked on ranches near Lusk and Casper before completing his education. Quay worked for Lockheed at White Sands Missile Range and Steers Tank Lines in Las Cruces, New Mexico, and since 1976 has been technical supervisor for Exxon Minerals at their Highland Mine in Converse County. Quay also assists in family ranching operation and participates in local country western bands.

Quay married Jeanie R. Hill, February 12, 1983 at Douglas, Wyoming and they and their children reside at Glenrock, Wyoming.

Kirkwood Thomas Hornbuckle, born August 4, 1953 in Douglas, attended local schools in Converse and Natrona Counties. Kirk worked for various local ranches in Converse County before moving to the family ranch. Janice Kay Garvin, born in Casper May 23, 1958, was united in marriage with Kirk, August 7, 1976 at Glenrock, Wyoming. A son, Scott Thomas, was born in Douglas January 28, 1979 and a daughter Stacy Colette, February 10, 1982.

They are full time managers at the family ranch on the Cheyenne River, and quite active in rodeo functions, having acquired trophies from this sport, as did Kirk's grandfather. Both Kirk and his wife are members of the Converse County Team Ropers Association.

Brent Bary Hornbuckle was born July 23, 1955 in Douglas and attended school in Converse and Natrona Counties and the university at Laramie. Vicki Ann Lewis, born April 28, 1959 in Eureka, Kansas, was united in marriage with Brent, May 27, 1978 at Glenrock, Wyoming. Two children were born in Douglas, a son, Chadwick Bary, November 20, 1979 and daughter, Chasity Danelle, January 16, 1981.

They reside on the portion of the family ranch near the old Bozeman Trail on Brown Springs which was named for Lt. Brown, killed in an Indian massacre along this creek in 1876. Brent manages Hornbuckle Contracting and also assists in the family ranching. He and his wife also participate in the local roping activities.

Mary Elaine Hornbuckle was born September 19, 1936; twin daughter of Dick Hornbuckle, Sr. Elaine attended Converse County schools, Colorado Women's College in Denver and assisted on the family ranch until her marriage.

When Elaine and her twin sister reached high school age her parents purchased a residence from Mrs. Bill Dorr, the widow of the late Bill Dorr who had a horse ranch near the junction of Antelope Creek and the Cheyenne River in the early 1900s. Dick Sr. purchased the N-A brand from Bill Dorr in 1921 and this brand is still retained in the family operation. The brand now used by Elaine and her family is supposed to have been owned by an old cowboy in eastern Converse County, called Roady Adams, was acquired in 1938. Dick T. Jr. still uses the old original Fitzhugh brand bought from the Fitzhugh Estate in 1938.

Larry Crummer, born July 6, 1934, married Elaine Hornbuckle May 24, 1956 at Douglas, and three children were born, Laurie Laine, Montey Eugene, and Deidre Lyn, all in Douglas, Wyoming.

Elaine, Larry and son, Montey and family operate their ranch near lower LaPrele Creek near Douglas, and also operate a bulk plant and service station in Douglas. Larry has been active in Douglas civic affairs.

Larry, Elaine, Montey and Deidre participate in local western music.

Their ranch was originally homesteaded by the late Judge C.O. Brown, and his brother, Frank, of Douglas, and later purchased by Fred England. Fred disclosed that an unmarked grave exists on the ranch. During the smallpox epidemic in the early 1900s, a lone rider by the name of Smith rode into Douglas with the disease. The town would not allow him to stay so he managed to ride to the area where the grave is now located and the coroner came out from Douglas and buried him where he had fallen in death.

Laurie Laine Crummer, born March 31, 1957, attended schools in Douglas, Chadron State College and the University of Wyoming. Randy Royal married Laurie at Douglas June 17, 1978 and they reside in Greybull, Wyoming where Randy is a prominent attorney.

Montey Eugene Crummer was born August 9, 1960 at Douglas, attended local schools and worked on local ranches before going into business with his father. Montey married Sharie Lewis in Douglas on May 31, 1980 and they have two daughters, born in Douglas, Callista Lee, January 21, 1982 and Cassie May, December 11, 1983. They reside at the family ranch.

Deidre Lyn Crummer was born in Douglas January 12, 1962. Deidre attended local schools in Douglas; later assisting in the family operation, Deidre is now attending Chadron State College. She married Christopher B. Tedford in August of 1984. They make their home in Casper. Chris Tedford's maternal grandmother was the first white child born at Inez, Wyoming, Converse County. Her name, Inez Veitch, born May 12, 1889. The daughter of Archibald and Agnes Veitch.

Evelyn Ruth Hornbuckle was born September 19, 1936 in Douglas, twin daughter of Dick Hornbuckle Sr. Evelyn was educated at the Converse County schools and Colorado Women's College.

Julius E. Stellmach, born July 29, 1930, married Evelyn September 19, 1955 in Douglas and they have three children, Julie Ann, Randal Kurt, Kirby Michael, born in Minnesota. They have a home in Babbitt, Minnesota and operate a family farm near Foley, Minnesota. Julie Ann Stellmach, born July 25, 1957, married Murray Richard Lubberda at Morrill, Minnesota, October 13, 1979 and they reside at Champlin, Minnesota.

Randal Kurt Stellmach, born October 9, 1958, married Deborah K. Frank at Sauk Rapids, Minnesota on March 4, 1979. They have two children; Kurtis James, born in 1979 and Michael Enoch, born in 1983. Randy is in the service in Korea.

Kirby Michael Stellmach was born February 21, 1964 and assists in the family farm operation at Foley, Minnesota.

It has been noted that each generation of Hornbuckles was mainly involved in farming or ranching, since 1748 in America.

Horr, Charles and Uree Family

A son, Charles, was born to Recellus R. and Alena (Townsend) Horr, May 28, 1864 near Parkersburg, Butler County, Iowa. The paternal grandfather was of old New England heritage. He had moved from Massachusetts to New York where Recellus was born. The maternal grandfather, Nathan Townsend, of English lineage was born in Pennsylvania. The Townsend ancestors migrated from Pennsylvania to Ohio in the early days being among the first to settle in the state.

Charlie was the oldest of five children, there being three brothers: Charlie, Art and Harry and twin sisters, Lena and Irene.

In 1881, after his school life in Iowa ended, Charlie headed west in a covered wagon with the Curtis family for Colorado. He worked a year in ranching on the Cache la Poudre River. Then in March of 1883 he came to Wyoming and was employed by J. H. Kennedy on the Umbrella Ranch located on the LaPrele Creek. In 1886, while still working for Mr. Kennedy, Charlie purchased the homestead relinquishments of a LaPrele settler named Crazy Horse, which today constitutes the Horr's home ranch. Charlie remained on the Umbrella Ranch from 1883 to 1889. He rode on the roundups from Buffalo, Wyoming to Ogallala, Nebraska. He also trailed beef herds to Cheyenne and Pine Bluffs in the fall where they were loaded on trains and sent to market.

He used to tell of a saying of Mr. Kennedy's that went like this: "Eat dried apples for breakfast, drink water for lunch and let them swell up for supper."

On February 20, 1889 Uree Delphina Adamson became the bride of Charles Horr in Iowa.

Uree was born December 28, 1863 near Iowa Falls, Hardin County, Iowa to Samuel and Lydia Ann (Cobbs) Adamson. Samuel died when Uree was two years old, leaving four small children. Lydia married a second time to John Caldwell.

Uree's parental ancestors came to America with Sir William Penn. Her maternal ancestors were of English descent tracing to the early New England families of Cobb and Hale, also to some of Virginia's "first families."

Approximately two weeks after the wedding the couple returned to Douglas and the next day continued the trip to the ranch on LaPrele Creek.

Charlie and Uree started housekeeping in a one room house, which later was turned into a granary when they built their permanent home. The house has been remodeled several times but the original ranch house built in the early 1900s remains a part of the home that stands today.

Six children were born to this marriage:

Seth A., born January 3, 1891, died at about five months of age and was buried on the ranch.

Bessie Allena was born March 14, 1892 and married Frank Dudley Ferbrache in 1916. They lived on a ranch near her parents. She died on February 14, 1955.

Stewart Cobbs was born August 30, 1894. He never married and lost his life in a hunting accident in 1935.

Ruth Etta, born October 23, 1901, married David Ulysses Roush in 1924. She lived in Grand Island, Nebraska until her death in July 1979.

Ester Louise, born August 5, 1903, married Bill Kirkman in 1934. She is now widowed and lives in Hermosa Beach, California.

Joseph Arthur, born February 18, 1905, married Ruby Chryst in 1936. Both are still living in Converse County, Douglas, Wyoming.

Charlie, looking forward to the children's high school years, built a brick house at 627 South Fifth Street in Douglas which remained the family's town residence from 1919 until after Uree's death in November of 1931. Charley died on November 16, 1950.

Art Horr attended college at the University of Nebraska from 1925 to 1926. During the summer of 1926 he sold books riding a bicycle to farmers and ranchers in eastern Colorado to help pay his way in school. In January of 1927 he and his brother, Stewart, leased the ranch from their father. At this time the operation consisted of 150 head of Hereford cows and 6,000 acres of land with some of the land in hay production. But Art had bigger plans for the ranch and set his goal to someday run 500 head of Hereford cows and have more land to run them on.

In the winter of 1934 and 1935 he and a friend, Stan Lass, had a 150 mile trap line in Converse County.

Art was a member of a band called the "Rhythm

1937 Art Horr with his catch of five coyotes and one badger Rompers" playing the accordion. The other members were Stan Lass and Dana Browning. They played at many all night dances for as little as fifty cents a piece.

In 1935 when his brother, Stewart, was killed, Art had to put all of his time into running the ranch.

On May 10, 1936 in Alliance, Nebraska, Miss Ruby Chryst became the bride of Art. Ruby was born May 2, 1914 in Glennwood, Utah to Lee and Dora (Moore) Johnston. She was raised by her aunt and uncle, Percy and Margaret Chryst. There were seven children in her family: Inez, Charlie, Grover, Jimmy, Ruby, Lexie and Hazel.

She had been teaching at the Beaver School now known as the Moss Agate School. She had only dated Art twice when they decided to get married.

Art began expanding his ranch on the LaPrele and from 1937 to 1944 as his cow herd was growing, he decided to look around for more land. His searching took him to Miles City, Montana where he purchased 50,000 acres. In the spring of 1945 he and his family moved to Montana. He ran stock on this ranch as well as the home ranch in Wyoming. Ronald Coe managed the ranch in Wyoming while Art was in Montana. The summer of 1947 they moved back to the home ranch. In 1948 he sold his holdings in Montana and began expanding the home ranch by buying the Doc Hylton place in 1951, some of Roy Combs land in 1955, the Harp land in 1959 and the Rasmussen place in 1960. This made his ranch 30,000 acres where he ran 500 head of cows. His goal had been reached with his wife's help.

Art and Ruby have one daughter, Betty, born December 18, 1936. She became the bride of Donald R.

Sullivan on March 17, 1957. To this marriage one daughter, Tamala "Tami" Jean, was born On May 22, 1958. Don and Betty were later divorced. She now lives in Fort Collins, Colorado and is working in the hospital there as an x-ray technician.

Tami Sullivan became the bride of James B. Nachtman on September 2, 1978. They live 60 miles northeast of Douglas on the family ranch helping his parents. They run a few sheep and cattle of their own. To this marriage one son, John Harvey, was born May 21, 1983.

Art and Ruby had one son, Arthur Charles "Bud", born March 4, 1939.

In the fall of 1969 Art and Ruby moved into town but continued to run the ranch. Art has been an active member of Stock Growers since 1928, serving on the executive board for 30 years. He was active in Farm Bureau, his local school board and he ran for the legislature in the 1950s. He has been on the County Planning Board, City Council and Crime Stoppers Committee.

Bud attended Beaver School and graduated from Douglas High School in 1958. He then went to Casper College. On August 21, 1960 he married Suzanne Johnston, daughter of Harry and Rachel Johnston. They made their home at the Deadwood Ranch working for Art.

In 1973 Bud started leasing parts of the ranch from Art. Bud continued to run the ranch and at one point started raising Simmental cattle and breeding and raising quarter horses. Bud and Suzanne have three children: Lynn Ann, Dean Arthur and Mark Alan.

Bud earned his real estate license in 1978 and worked for Johnston Realty besides running the ranch.

On November 29, 1983 Bud was killed in an airplane accident in Downey Park while checking on the cattle in the mountains.

He served many years helping with the 4-H and FFA. He also served on the Converse County School Board.

Lynn Ann Horr became the bride of Vere Alan Cooper on June 17, 1983. They lived in Buffalo, South Dakota until the death of Lynn's father. Then they moved back to help run the ranch.

To this marriage one son, Joshua, was born October 13, 1984.

Rikki Rae Hamilton married Dean Horr July 7, 1984.

The home ranch is now being run by Suzanne Horr with the help of the fourth generation Dean and Rikki Horr, Vere and Lynn (Horr) Cooper and Mark Horr.

Horton, David C. "Dave" and Lottie

David C. Horton and Laura "Lottie" Canfield Horton came to Douglas from Ewing, Nebraska around 1906, with their sons, David Vance Horton and Edward Joy Horton, settling on the place about three miles west of Douglas. The large two-story house was located where Myrtle Miles now lives. Grandfather and Grandmother both worked at the Douglas Mercantile. In 1907 Victoria Faye was born.

Dave Horton took a high-spirited team of horses to town against Vance and Lottie's wishes. The team spooked and ran, when frightened, turning the wagon over and killing Dave because he wasn't strong enough to control the team. This happened in late 1915 just west of the old Platte River bridge.

David Vance Horton joined the army from Douglas, Wyoming in 1917. He never got to go overseas because of the flu.

In late 1921 Vance went to Kansas City, Missouri. He worked as a mechanic and a night watchman in a Ford garage.

Georgianna Hiser, daughter of Elias and Mary Pauline Anna K. Hiser of Boxelder, Wyoming, followed Vance to Kansas City where they were married on August 22, 1922.

To this union were born four children while living in Kansas City: Peale Mae, 1923, died 1923 of what we now know as crib death; Edith Victoria, Feb. 2, 1924; Glenn David, Apr. 12, 1926; and Norma Jean, Apr. 16, 1928.

The family moved back to Douglas in March 1932, taking over the Horton home place which had been rented out since about the time Vance went to Kansas City, Missouri.

While on the home place two more children were born: Alva Shirley, Mar. 26, 1935; and Forrest Edward, Jan. 26, 1937.

The place was lost in 1938 due to the depression and resettlement. The family then moved into town where Lucille Irene was born May 14, 1939. Vance was away from home a lot working at anything he could find to do. He ran a Raleigh route for about a year, mined coal at the Taggart Coal Mine out of Glenrock, Wyoming and in 1941 he went to work at Seminole Dam as a power house operator. He later worked at Kortess Dam and Alcova Dam in the same job. He was forced to retire from the Bureau of Reclamation because of his age in late 1964.

He lived in Mills, Wyoming until his death in 1975.

Georgianna died in March 1966.

Hoskovec, Stanley J. Sr. and Helen

It is with some difficulty and hesitation that I will attempt to write the events concerning my parents' and family's arrival in Wyoming. Since I was not born until 1927, my sister, Anna Domsalla, helped me considerably in writing this article.

My father, Stanley James Hoskovec, Sr., was a bookkeeper for Cudahy Meat Packing Company in Omaha, Nebraska in the early years of his life. Later he bought into a farm implement business with a partner in Omaha, Nebraska. After several years of association with a partner who was too prone to constantly imbibe in liquor, my father sold his half of the partnership.

With his sister, Emily Smith, and her husband, Stanley S. Smith, a decision was made in the fall of 1917 to come to Wyoming and file on two homesteads. They were initially directed to a parcel of land located about 35 miles northwest of Douglas, and they filed on two sections of land, but bad weather and roads caused them all to go back to Nebraska. In the summer and fall of 1918 they returned to Wyoming and were directed to homesteads available north of Glenrock, and on this trip they were eligible to apply for three sections as homesteads, as Mr. Smith's widowed mother accompanied them. They cancelled their previous applications and instead took three adjacent sections near the Red Butte — specifically Sections 4 and 9 in T35N R75W and Section 34 T36N R75W.

During the next two years, several trips were made back to Nebraska, shipping back horses, farm machinery and household goods to Glenrock by train. Also during this time three homestead shacks, sheds, fences, corrals, roads and bridges were built, also cellars and a well were dug.

Stanley J. Hoskovec and Helen Pavelka were married in Omaha, Nebraska on January 10, 1917. Helen, my mother, remained in Bladen, Nebraska where son Stanley James Jr. was born on February 17, 1918, and she and young son traveled to Glenrock in late November of 1920. Since it was a very cold winter, a house in Glenrock was rented. It was here that Annastasia was born, later changed to Anna Stazie, on January 7, 1921. Mrs. Hoskovec and children moved to the homestead in June of 1921. Trips to Glenrock were made by wagon and team for all supplies and groceries, but usually Helen and children stayed home. The following children were all delivered by Dr. Leonard Tabor at the ranch near the Red Butte where strip mining for coal by the Dave Johnston Power Plant is now taking place: Emily Helen born on August 10, 1922; James Joseph on March 24, 1927; and William Bernard born on November 19, 1928.

I, James J., was born prematurely and was very small, weighing around four pounds. I caused my parents many anxieties. Several times they rushed me to town thinking I had died, only to be revived. That was not an easy trip over 15 miles of two-rut road in the spring months of 1927, even though my parents owned a Model T Ford by then.

The Smiths moved to Midwest, Wyoming in 1927 or 1928 where Mr. Smith was a baker. "Grandma" Smith returned to Nebraska. My father and mother now had a three-section ranch. As the years passed, my father acquired from other homesteaders who relinquished their homesteads back to the state additional rented land or purchased other homestead land after they were "proved upon", as the homesteaders returned to their native states, primarily Nebraska, deciding Wyoming wasn't really suited to dry land farming as they had anticipated. As the homesteaders left Wyoming, my father purchased their livestock — cattle, sheep, horses, chickens and whatever — a few head at a time. Many times my father said a departing homesteader in a wagon with his family leading a cow or horse would stop by and ask if he could buy their spare animals.

In the mid 1920's, about 1926, my father developed a producing coal mine in Section 16 T36N R75W. He did this to supplement his growing family's income in the winter, by hauling coal to Glenrock and surrounding ranches. Much grief was attached to this mine, as it resulted in jealousy with neighbors who couldn't seem to tolerate his additional income. Although he dug all of the coal by hand and had only one coal car to extract the coal from the mine, he made this mine quite an operation. People with trucks and wagons came from miles around and some of this coal was used in the Wyoming towns of Torrington, Guernsey, Uva, Orin Junction, Glendo, Glenrock, Douglas, Casper, Wheatland and Lusk, and even into the western Nebraska towns of Scottsbluff, North Platte, Kimball, Bushnell and Gering.

By this time my father had purchased a truck, I believe it was a 1928 model. The Stanley Smith's homestead house was approximately 1/8 mile from my parents' house, and that is where he kept the truck, as a garage was attached to the house. A school teacher, Miss Danis Alsup, lived in this two-room house with attached lean-to garage. Early in the morning hours of a November day in 1928 while still very dark, this house was set afire by an arsonist or arsonists, who wanted to destroy my father's new truck so as to deprive him of his coal income. After the fire was set, a man yelled to the school teacher to get out of the place as it was afire. Terrified, she chose to stay in the house, and the man threw a part of a brick or rock through the window, again ordering her out. At this time, dressed only in a nightgown, she ran out of the burning house to my parents' house, jumping into their bed to awaken them. My father ran up the hill to find the entire premises ablaze. Thinking he could possibly save the truck, he ran into the garage, opened the left truck door, reached into the burning cab and with his hand pushed in the clutch and managed to back the truck manually out of the garage. Just as the truck emerged from the garage it exploded — as the seats had been saturated with gasoline and the gas tank was directly beneath the seats. The truck, the house, and of course, all the teacher's possessions were lost. The banker in Glenrock helped him refinance the purchase of a new truck. The perpetrators of this deed were never caught and prosecuted, even though the teacher recognized one man's voice as that of a neighbor. It was shortly after this that my father's helper at the mine, Roy Carson, was killed by a cave-in.

Another incident I can vividly recall my father telling about occurred in 1933 before the banks were closed by President Roosevelt. My father had a dream that the banks would go broke. He related that dream to my mother and she insisted he go to Glenrock and withdraw their lives' savings of $2,400, which was a lot of money in those days. Upon her insistence, he went to Glenrock but the banker would not let him withdraw all of his money, just half of it. The next day the banks closed and he lost $1,200 which he never regained.

The spring of 1933 was terrible with a deep snowstorm which I can recall occurring in April while my folks were in Nebraska seeking medical aid for my sister Emily. Brother Bill, being the youngest, was taken along. The blizzard blew snow into the ranch yard with drifts between 12 and 14 feet high between buildings. I recall seeing our dogs walk up to the top of our two-story barn. Stanley, Anna and I, and our school teacher, Joy Ash, were left to care for the ranch while they were gone. Stanley was only 15 that year but he dug tunnels to the barn, sheds and out-buildings so the cattle could be fed and coal and wood be brought into the house. I remember, as a six-year-old, trying to walk across one of the tunnels he dug after the snow hardened and it collapsed under my weight.

The summer of 1933 was a terribly dry year; although my father was a farmer at heart, all crops failed. That year all of us went into the fields with our corn knives and cut Russian thistles while they were young, tender and green. We made a huge stack of these thistles, packing them with salt. That winter our cattle survived on thistles.

Shortly after this, my brother, Stanley, convinced my father to go into sheep business. Coal mining and farming were basically dropped, used only to supply family needs, and it seems things went much better.

Stanley Sr. died March 21, 1969, Helen on March 26, 1945.

Yes, our parents were pioneers — striving and praying, working constantly and with much optimism, they succeeded in making the ranch an enjoyable and profitable venture. As all of the pioneers were, my father was a rancher, farmer, blacksmith, carpenter, mechanic, coal miner, shoemaker, toy maker and whatever was necessary; my mother was his helpmate and homemaker.

Our ranch was sold to Pacific Power & Light Company for the stripping of coal, which even today plays a vital role in the life of Converse County and will into the future. I still regret to go there and see how the topography has changed in the course of mining; and though not visible to the naked eye, I can still see our old one-room schoolhouse and the ranch — all pleasant memories of my growing-up years.

Housiaux, John and Sylvia Family

Housiauxs brought a proud history to Wyoming when they came in 1869, John, John Jr., Philip and of course, that remarkable woman, Sylvia.

Before his marriage to Sylvia, John entered Wyoming history with his appearance in the U.S. Army at Fort Laramie. Previous sketchy information showed he also served in the Indian territory and in Texas. During the turbulent period of the Civil War, according to army discharge papers, he was a telegrapher and dispatch carrier, often between the War Office and the White House.

John Housiaux's early life, according to sketchy records, was spent in Texas at about the time of admission of Texas to the Union. Sylvia Concepcion Watson was married to John Housiaux January 8, 1850 in Houston, Texas. Sylvia was born December 8, 1836 in Mexico City, Mexico. Within five years of his marriage, John was enlisted with the U.S. Army, probably for protection of the trails from the southwest to California under General Harney. At some time in his military career, he was orderly to General Harney during the Indian campaigns.

The outbreak of the Civil War saw the troops recalled to the eastern U.S. and John became a telegrapher and dispatch bearer for the Lincoln White House and wife Sylvia was head nurse in one of the military hospitals in the capital. At this time, Sylvia performed some nursing capacity in the White House itself, receiving in return, personal gifts from the wife of Abraham Lincoln.

John transferred to the Fifth Cavalry in 1869 and, upon re-enlistment, was sent toward the western Indian frontier. The family made the journey down the Ohio River in a flatboat, suffering loss of possessions in the overturning of the boat. They completed the journey to Wyoming on the Union Pacific Railroad landing at Camp Carlin and Ft. D.A. Russell near Cheyenne.

In 1871 John left the army to take charge of a stock ranch for Gen. King and other officers near Ft. Sanders. In the great Sioux uprising of 1876 he was a civilian attached to the packtrain of Gen. George Crook.

A son, John, was born at Ft. Kearney, Nebraska on August 24, 1859. Phil was born October 17, 1865, Rose was born May 27, 1867, Frances was born January 2, 1871 in Washington D.C. and Mary Magdalene was born on March 27, 1875 in Cheyenne.

The family spent time in various army posts until the 1880's. In 1885 John filed on a homestead on the upper LaPrele and engaged in stock raising.

Philip worked as a cowboy for several large outfits in the area, among them the Jim Shaw, Douglas-Willian and Guthrie ranches. He was married January 14, 1890 to Mamie O. Dolan. In 1893 they homesteaded on Upper LaPrele where all seven children were born; Mrs. Andrew Johnson, Mrs. Margaret O'Brien Jackson, Philip, Leo and John. Two daughters, Sylvia and Bessie, died in early life. Bessie was married to Bert Jackson and died in 1933.

In 1917 Philip received an appointment as U.S. Marshal on the Rosebud Indian Reservation in South Dakota, remaining there until being transferred to the reservation at Fort Washakie, Wyoming. He was Chief of Police of the Western Navajo Reservation near Tuba City, Arizona from 1924 to 1927. He then returned to Douglas and for the next 15 years he worked for the CY and other ranches in the area.

Philip's wife died in 1941 in South Dakota and Philip died March 25, 1954 in Douglas. His three sons preceded him in death. Death came to John Housiaux Sr. in August 1902 and Sylvia in February 1930.

John Housiaux Jr. married Elzora Phillips in November 1889. Six children were born to them; Victor R., Stanley T., Floyd R. "Jake," John B., Rena and Grace.

John Jr. homesteaded close to his father and brother, Philip, on LaPrele in 1893. By 1915 the homesteads of the family had been sold to the Sullivan family and the remaining Housiaux family members moved to Douglas. John Jr. died in July 1941 after long years of working for the Carmin and Hylton ranches.

Howard, Harry

Captain Harry Howard was born February 9, 1844 at Baltimore, Maryland, the son of a wealthy and distinguished old southern family which, prior to the Civil War was one of the large plantation owners of that section.

Coming to Cheyenne, Wyoming in 1867 he worked in a hotel there before coming to Fort Fetterman in 1886. When the new town of Douglas was started Harry was to have the distinction of having the first tent in town.

A metal miner by avocation he located in 1897 at Hazenville, twelve miles southwest of Douglas and in 1899 opened the Oriole Mine near Cold Springs. The Oriole Mine was later sold for $125,000 to the Miami Copper Company. A fortune was spent in the development of the property. United States Senator Clarence D. Clark was associated with Howard in developing the mine. In 1904 water inundated the mine and it was abandoned. Howard died on August 7, 1930.

Howard, Robert "Bob" and Prudence Family

Robert "Bob" Howard, born in Stanley, England January 8, 1859, and Prudence Fenwick, born in Stanley, April 18, 1859, were married in England in 1879 and immigrated to the United States in 1882. Their first two children were born in England. They settled first in Cable, Illinois then moved to Cimarron, Kansas via wagon and team and lived there five years. In Kansas the family lived in a sod house, and Prudence related many times about having to go out and pick up "cow chips" for stove fuel, a very distasteful task said she. They would perhaps have stayed longer in Kansas had there not been a "herd" law. One day while two of the girls were tending the cattle, one was bitten by a rattlesnake. The other rushed to the house for help but by the time they returned it was too late to save her. So the family moved on by covered wagon to Glenrock, Wyoming in 1892. In Glenrock the family lived in a "dugout" built in the side of a hill in the area where Glenrock City Park was eventually located. At this time they had six children living, and one more was born in Glenrock. They were; William, born in Stanley, England, July 17, 1880, Belle, born in Cable, Illinois, January 11, 1884, Lillian born in Cable, Illinois, April 10, 1885, Laura, born in Cable, Illinois in 1886, Daisy, born in Cimarron, Kansas on July 10, 1888 and Elizabeth, born in Cimarron, March 10, 1890. Thomason May was born in Glenrock on August 22, 1892 and passed away in Douglas, Wyoming on October 6, 1909. One daughter, born in England, died at the age of seven in Kansas.

Mr. and Mrs. Johnny Howard

Robert Howard worked in the coal mines near Glenrock for four years, then went as "Drover" with a shipment of cattle to Omaha where he purchased cattle and shipped them to Lost Springs, where there was open range. The family then moved to Lost Springs in 1896. There he bought a homestead relinquishment southwest of town and built a log house on the property. Over the years, Bob acquired a great deal more land not only in the Lost Springs area, but around Shawnee and south of Douglas, however the family continued to live in the log house until the children had all grown up and left home. During this time he had continued to be very successful in animal husbandry. In 1920 Mr. and Mrs. Howard moved in to Lost Springs at which time their daughter and son-in-law, Daisy and Cody Shippen, moved to the ranch. Eventually the original property was purchased by their granddaughter Ruth Mason and husband, who lived there until retirement, then moved to Manville where they now reside. While living on the ranch, Ruth and her husband dismantled the old log house.

Except for about three years when they lived in Douglas, Mr. and Mrs. Howard lived the rest of their lives in Lost Springs. He died in 1935 and she in 1945.

William Howard (known as Johnny Bull, a nickname given him because he came from England), was born in Stanley, England, July 17, 1880 and immigrated with his parents to America in 1882. Johnny worked on various ranches for a few years when he, his father, Robert Howard, and brother-in-law, Charles Bright, entered into a partnership in the cattle business. When the partnership was eventually dissolved he purchased a ranch north of Lost Springs and continued cattle husbandry until ill health forced him to retire. In the meantime, he had acquired a great deal more land, since open range was becoming more scarce as people started homesteading in the area. Many of them stayed only long enough to "prove up", then sold out and left. Dry farming just wasn't very profitable. Johnny's ranch became one of the larger ones in the area.

Mr. Howard married Mabel Bosworth of West Virginia in 1914 at the ranch of friends, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Hahn of Keeline. They lived in their home in Lost Springs part of the time, making the ranch their headquarters. After retirement in 1951 they moved to Douglas. There were no children. Mabel died in 1956 and Johnny in 1964.

Johnny Howard and three of his sisters, Belle (Mrs. Charles Bright), Lillian (Mrs. Charles F. Hitshew), and Daisy (Mrs. Cody Shippen) remained in Converse County the rest of their lives. Laura (Mrs. Grant McComb) eventually settled in Glendo. Elizabeth (Mrs. Milton Pratt) moved to Casper in 1916 and remained there the rest of her life.

Hunter, Ed

George Edward "Ed" Hunter was born September 4, 1874 in Iowa City, Iowa, the son of Colonel and Mrs. George Hunter. At the age of three he came with his family to Laramie, Wyoming. Later the family moved to Fetterman and later still into Douglas. While Edward was still quite young, his mother died, after which his father decided to sell his property in Douglas and take his young son to the country to live. They went to the Lower LaPrele community where George Hunter pitched his tent on the E.C. Smith ranch and engaged in the trapping business. Ed was educated in the Pleasant Valley School which was located on the Smith ranch. Ed developed an enduring love of the great outdoors, enjoying both fishing and hunting during his lifetime. He found employment on various ranches in the valley and worked as a ranch rider for both sheep and cattlemen.

In 1905 he was married to Cora Florence Thayer and to this union three children were born. The family lived in South Dakota for a number of years where Ed was employed as a peace officer. He preferred Wyoming to South Dakota and eventually returned to work at the refinery in Glenrock. He also served as town marshal there.

Cora Hunter died in 1939 after which Ed was united in marriage with Anna Pfiefer. Ed died December 6, 1957.

Hunter, Tom and Eva

Thomas Berry Hunter was born near Bodarc, Nebraska, August 31, 1896. He was the youngest child of John William and Caroline Dixon Hunter, ranchers in the Hat Creek Valley. Tom's father served as the first judge of that community.

Because of his mother's illness when Tom was an infant, his sister, Abigale, who had a baby the same age, served as wet nurse to both babies. Tom was orphaned when his mother died in 1902 and his father in 1903. His sister, Margaret, took him into her home and became his first teacher.

Much of Tom's childhood was spent with different neighbors. He began to earn his own way at the age of nine, following a walking plow pulled by three horses from three a.m. to dark.

Tom began roping cattle, breaking horses and riding bucking broncs. The latter giving him questionable fame as a rider. His cowboy days were spent on ranches in Montana, South Dakota, Nebraska and Wyoming. Tom never knew a stranger and was quick to make friends wherever he went. He enjoyed relating incidents of his wanderlust and always saw the funny side of them.

An incident happened when Mike Jordan was gathering horses and Tom was driving the grub wagon. The crew went to Ardmore, South Dakota where "Doc" Middleton was running a saloon. Tom was too young to drink so Doc gave him a sack of candy, a rare treat for a wandering boy. Unfortunately Doc had a pet coyote who fancied the candy for himself. Needless to say Tom had a dislike for coyotes. Then to add insult to injury, no beds could be found, so Tom and Mike had to sleep on the pool table.

Tom joined the army, December 2, 1917. His World War I outfit, Company A, 20th Engineers landed on February 17, 1918 for an 18 month stretch in France. Upon returning from the war, Tom homesteaded near the Bob Jordan ranch on Indian Creek, Wyoming. It was here that he brought his bride, Eva Hutchinson Hunter, a teacher whom he had married at Harrison, Nebraska on May 31, 1927. The first visitor to their one room homestead was a large, unfriendly rattlesnake.

Depression years forced both Tom and Eva to work. Tom on nearby ranches and Eva teaching school. At one time Tom dug 999 post holes and set the posts for 10¢ a post. This was one of his lucky times, for he got paid for an even one thousand. It was here at the homestead that their daughter, Delores was born.

In 1939, Joe Dunn (who was married to Tom's sister, Margaret) and Tom formed a partnership and bought a dairy farm west of Douglas. Later the partnership dissolved and Tom took over as sole owner. Tom developed tick fever which put him in the veterans hospital in Cheyenne. Eva and Delores milked 22 cows by hand morning and night. A neighbor, Clarence Hill would stop by on his way to and from his construction job and help them milk. When Clarence could no longer help, the county agent talked them into getting an automatic milking machine. The summer of Tom's illness, he was still too weak to do anything, so Eva and Delores decided to try to put up the first cutting of hay. The county agent came out and hooked up the mower. Eva mowed, Delores raked and Fred Powell stacked. They also used the help of the German Prisoners of War, who were kept near Douglas. Irrigating became just too much so they let the second cutting go. While on the dairy farm their second daughter, Valerie was born.

After they sold the dairy farm in 1947 they moved into Douglas where Tom worked as a policeman and undertaker's helper. Both Eva and Tom were active in the Douglas community. Tom also served as unit commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. They were actively involved in the social life of the LaPrele community. Both were lifetime members of the Wyoming Pioneer Association in Douglas. When school let out in the spring they headed for Oregon, but Tom had heard about a possible job in the oil field west of Casper. Tom got the job and remained with the Pure Oil Company until he retired in 1959.

Upon retirement Tom worked as custodian at the new Poison Spider School where Eva taught. After her retirement they moved to Mills, Wyoming, where Eva still resides. Tom passed away May 22, 1977. He is buried in Memorial Gardens at Casper, Wyoming. Both Delores Hunter Meek and Valerie Hunter Christman live in Casper.

Huntzinger, Charles and Ruth Family

Charles was born September 3, 1892, the son of Thomas J. Huntzinger, a mile east of Thurman, Colorado. In April 1900 the family moved to a place twelve miles northeast of Flagler. Our first school was four miles south and two miles west from our home. The teacher boarded at our house during the week. This teacher later became County Superintendent of Kit Carson County and he told our dad how to get a school nearby. When the school was built we had four school age children and the neighboring sheep ranch had two ready for school. This school house was about 14' square. When the wind blew, the floor went up and down and we couldn't write very well. Each family had to carry their own water. My brother, Sidney, carried our bottle of water and Charles carried the basket or bucket with lunch for all of us. In 1906 we had a teacher who knew music. She tried her best to teach us kids music. Charles was old enough, and that is where he got his musical education. She helped Charles with his music and we all learned the notes. We had five months of school that year. A lot of people moved into the country in about 1920 and they needed more room so they made the school twice as big with a coal house on the front.

We had neighbors by the name of Eckert who had a threshing machine. They threshed out west of Thurman and Charles hauled water for the steam engine. It had a big Huber engine with separator - good crops. When they got through threshing they came back to Eckert's ranch and put up a little millet hay. Charles came home awhile, then went with the Jordon boys to Walt Hill, Nebraska to pick corn. This was late October 1913. Before too long, Charles had his thumb sprained so he decided to visit a cousin in Garretson, South Dakota. He had earned a little money picking corn so he went to South Dakota and got work there. There was a lot of building going on, barns and houses. Charles carried lumber about a year. The boss thought he could learn to be a carpenter, which he did. Pretty soon a lot of boys from Dakota, including Charles, went to Luverne, Minnesota to join the National Guard. This was maybe 20 miles away. He trained regularly but still kept his carpenter job.

There was trouble starting in Europe so his unit was sent to Texas. Charles had to quit his carpenter work. It was hot in Texas where he was in the National Guard. The Guard was put in the Army and they were sent to Great Britain first. The British fed them but U.S. paid for it. They were sent to France and Germany. He wasn't close enough to hear the big guns. He built fences and big wooden water pressure tanks with stays. Pretty soon the war was over, new officers from the U.S. arrived, and his unit was sent home. On July 4, 1918 Charles was on the ocean going to France, and on July 4, 1919 he was on the ocean on his way home.

Charles had a big tool box with carpenter tools and it was at our house while he was in the Army. His fiddle was at home too. It was the latter part of August 1919 when he left and went to Douglas, Wyoming to visit his aunt, Mrs. L.C. Bishop. He got a job right away with Fred Cannon. Charles thought he would start work on Monday and Fred said "you start right now," so he did. He had his carpenter tools and violin with him and that was probably about the first of September. Fred Cannon had a shop and did all kinds of carpenter work. He made furniture and built houses. Charles filed on a homestead 25 miles northwest of Douglas. He worked for Fred Cannon several years.

In the spring of 1920 I, Harvey Huntzinger, went up there. At that time, Charles was working on a water tunnel. They didn't tell me where the tunnel was. I got a job out on that same road and I saw pickups going back and forth with men. They took the men to town to stay overnight. The man I worked for gave me a job of plowing some ground right next to the road so I was about 50' from them and didn't know who they were.

There was another tunnel Charles and I and Teddy Hanson and some more folks helped on. We put a cement floor in that one. It was about 400' long. We used wheelbarrows to wheel the cement. We worked about a week there. I was a new hand. They had a cement mixer outside and dumped it down a chute to the wheelbarrows another guy and I ran. Teddy Hanson and Charles handled the cement after we got it in there. It was just wide enough in there so we could pass once in a while so we could get back out and get some more cement. I think we got $5 a day and the carpenters maybe $1 an hour.

Charles, Teddy Hanson and Joe Woodard built Clark Bishop's barn. It was a real barn with a haymow and stalls for eight head of horses. It had a place for a cow and a little blacksmith shop in one corner and a bin for some oats. When they got that finished, Teddy Hanson had some lots for sale up near the South Grade School. Charles and I bought one lot and we built a shack where we batched. The shack was big enough for all the things we needed. I finally dug a cave and fixed it up so we could keep things down there. Then I started working the same places Charles did. We spent quite a bit of time together but we didn't always work on the same job. There were quite a few houses being built and plastering to be done. I got a job with Oscar Fredell, a plasterer. I didn't plaster but I packed a lot of mud. I packed the mud for the South Grade School near where we had our shack. It had ten class rooms, an office and a place for the janitor to live in the basement. Then I worked on other houses with Fredell, some houses in the country and in town.

Charles married Ruth Blomquist, the oldest daughter of Charles and Anna Blomquist on June 3, 1925. Their children are; Carl of Menlo Park, California, Doris Hoff of Bellvue, Colorado, Joyce Maurer and John.

Charles played the violin by ear. He spent many happy hours with his violin giving pleasure to others as well as himself.

The Huntzingers made their home on the hill by the water tank west of Douglas until their deaths. Charles died on April 4, 1962. Ruth died in August 1964.

Harvey Huntzinger

Huntzinger, Harvey

I, Harvey Huntzinger, was born on January 10, 1899 at Thurman, Colorado, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas J. Huntzinger. I came to Douglas on March 17, 1920 to find work. My brother, Charles Huntzinger, was already there.

A man told me where I could go and file on a homestead. About a year passed before the government recognized my application for a homestead. Then I hauled some lumber out for a shack big enough to live in with tarpaper all around. The roof was what we call a car roof, rounding on top. Charles and another fellow helped one day when we worked on that. Then I built a barn big enough for four head of horses. I finally got some horses and borrowed a plow to plow some ground. I bought a dollar's worth of beans the first year but I didn't get them planted. I had a barrel in the shack where I kept coal. When I went to plant the beans the next year I couldn't find them. I discovered we had mice that packed things around like the rats do. I found that the mice had carried every one of those beans and put them in the coal barrel. I had to separate the beans from the coal when I got ready to plant beans. From that dollar's worth of beans I raised 963 pounds and sold $61.93 worth of beans.

My homestead was on Lightning Creek and Charles' homestead was seven or eight miles down the creek. The homesteaders didn't have to stay on their land all year and I didn't stay out there much in the winter. We were supposed to have 40 acres of plowed ground. I had a nice spring. I filed a water right on it and Clark Bishop surveyed it. It is named the "Harvey Spring" on the map of Wyoming.

When I came into Douglas from my homestead, I noticed a lot of men working down by the Platte River. This was about October and they were putting the city water line under the river. The water was piped 18 miles from the Hamilton Spring. That was a wood stay pipe with iron bands all around. When they got to the river it had to be cast iron pipe which weighed 1200 pounds each. Charles and I worked on the water line for some time. About 50 men worked there. The city furnished hip boots and I got the last pair with a belly band to hold the boots up. We got down in the ditch and used a length of gas pipe with caps on both ends to tap the dirt down. They had two Fordson tractors to pump the water out before the dirt was dug out for the pipe. They plugged the river off about half way across. The pipes fit together and a ratchet was used, then the plumbers put on some molten babbitt. When they got half way across they tested the pipe with 80 pounds pressure. They had to watch out for the ice that would come and break out all the work already done. Sometimes they used dynamite to break up the ice so it wouldn't get down to where we were working. There was a big sand bar on the east side of the river so most of the water ran on the west side. When the ice went, we had it all finished, then big sheets of ice went down. A million gallon water tank was being built west of Douglas. The floor, a couple hundred feet across, and one ring around the side was up on saw horses. One morning it was cold and there was frost all over the bottom of it, so another man and I had the job of getting little sticks to make little fires all around under that floor to melt the frost. Then three coats of paint were put on.

On the morning of September 27, 1923 I went out to Teddy Hanson's place before I went out to my homestead. I had some seed grain out there. I told Teddy that it was a strange morning, voices carried from the neighbors. You could hear them talking to members of their family like you were in the same house. He said he didn't like it either. I left Teddy's place to go out to my homestead. It was kind of cloudy and foggy. I went by the way of Fort Fetterman, crossed a bridge across the North Platte River. It was old and shaky. I had two head of Percheron horses hitched to my wagon with seed grain and things to eat. It commenced to rain a little heavier. There was an underpass where the Burlington Railroad went over so I stopped under there and put on some more clothes and covered up the sacks of grain a little better so they wouldn't get wet. It was about nine miles from there out to my homestead. There were gullies where water was running and some was up to the horses bellies. I unhitched the horses and put them in the barn. Then I unloaded the groceries and put the seed grain in the shack where it would stay dry. I went to bed that night and it rained and thundered but no lightning, the earth just shook. By morning it had quit raining. About three days later I went to some neighbors who lived southeast and they had some company who told of the flood that washed out the Burlington railroad tracks on Cole Creek.

After I got everything planted and my horses situated I worked in Douglas for a plumber so I could get some money. Then I went to Glenrock to work with the bridge crew. I went on the railroad, but since the railroad bridge was washed out, the taxi came and took people from the train into Glenrock. We stayed in a rooming house in Glenrock and took lunch out with us to where we were working on the bridges. When the Glenrock bridge was finished, sometime in January, we went out to Deer Creek and built a bridge. We had some little shacks out there that we lived in and cooked in. I remember the time of year because I had my 25th birthday, January 10th, during that time.

The next bridge was at the Tank Farm where the flood lifted a nearly new bridge and floated it down the river. The Tank Farm was where they built all those tanks to hold the oil from Tea Pot Dome. There were 50 tanks holding millions of gallons of oil. They dug a pit for each tank with a dike big enough to hold the oil in the tank. The river froze over there, so some people from the Tank Farm tested the ice by jumping up and down and then drove their Model Ts or other vehicles across on the ice. There were four rows of piling, each row about 40' apart. We sharpened the end of the timber and put a metal plate on the tip and bands so the timber wouldn't split when the hammer came down. The hammer weighed 2000 pounds and came down about 25'. They had two teams of horses. When the team pulled the block and tackle, that pulled the hammer clear up to the top. When it got up there high enough it tripped two little irons and that let the hammer down and it hit on top of this piling. It would bounce up a few feet, up and down. Another fellow and I had the duty to stay there and if it got out of line we had a couple of sticks we would stick in there to pry the piling back over this way or that way so it was in the middle all the while. One man had the duty to get that block and tackle stretched out there so when the horses hitched onto it they had plenty of room to pull the hammer clear up to the top of this head where the irons were. Sometimes they had to turn the team around on that bridge and sometimes they could turn around on the ground, depending on which way they were going.

The next bridge we worked on, which was at Fort Fetterman, we would have a new pile driver made up in Fred Cannon's carpenter shop. Charles helped build this pile driver, and others who worked on it were Fred Cannon, Bill VanDine and Archie Bruce. It was hauled around with a Fordson tractor. The one we were using had to be taken apart to be moved so this was much better. We first used this new pile driver at Old Fort Fetterman. Slim Powell from the Ford Motor Company ran the new Fordson tractor with a winch on it and a large amount of cable to pull the hammer up. The old bridge was a truss bridge. Archie Bruce was head boss for the bridges.

We started the row of pilings on the north side, about 30' apart. We put a big cap on top of each piling and drove pins down through. Then we laid a lot of timbers across up edgeways and fastened them down to the cap on the piling. Then we got a lot of planks to make a platform for the bridge. Somebody set the 8" nails with a big hammer. Then some boys came with seven to eight pound sledge hammers to drive those nails in. I liked that nail business. It took about three licks to drive one of those nails down if you did it right. It took half a day to lay some planks between those two rows of piling and nail them down. When the bridge was done, Charles' job was to saw and nail all those railings on both sides of the bridge. All this lumber was sawed by hand and we built a lot of bridges. That took a lot of work, one man sawing all those timbers, all hand work.

Someone dug a ditch out north of Douglas to get the water out of the Platte River. They did a lot of work but for some reason the ditch never had a bridge so we put one there, just one span.

After we were done we built another bridge on the Cheyenne River about 20 or 30 miles down the river. We had to leave a wide space for big trees and things to run under. The next bridge was over a deep gulch or draw. There was no sand or water, but people went down in there with their vehicles, straight down and straight up. We built a bridge there with about three spans of piling.

Next we went to Box Creek. It was a wide creek and had steep banks. When the creek got up a lot of water ran down there. It was a nice place to work, level ground on both sides. There was a homesteader out there and he helped the bridge crew a few days. There was a school up the creek. He said he had a little girl about seven and one day, while he was waiting for her, he looked up the river and saw all this water coming. He rescued her, otherwise she would have drowned.

There was another bridge on the Cheyenne River, a bridge that spanned the whole gulch, maybe 30 or more feet deep. We drove eight pilings on each side and had to get extra long pine. We had to do a lot of digging around there and worked a long time building the side boards to hold the dirt next to the bridge. The whole bridge set on two pedestals, with pilings on both sides. Teamsters piled dirt up at the end of the bridge when we got through building the bridge.

A bridge at Walker Creek, about 35 miles northeast of Douglas, was the last bridge I helped build.

The cook for our bridge crew had come with his family from some place in Iowa. That was back when they had oxen to drive and work. He said the grass in Iowa came up to his chin, when he was about 13 years old. At night, the grass got all wet and the oxen laid down so who ever hunted the oxen in the morning got all wet getting the oxen. His dad sent him after the oxen one morning. It was foggy and wet and he hunted and hunted and got all wet but he couldn't find the oxen. He went back and told his dad he couldn't find the oxen. His dad gave him a skinning and told him "now you go get the oxen and when you get back I'll give you the rest of it." He knew how to drive oxen and people were driving to the Rocky Mountains then with ox trains. I don't know how long he was gone from home but he was 13 years old at that time. Finally he grew up and went back home. He told his dad "Now I came back for the rest of the lickin'." He said his dad turned white.

We had twelve men one time and extras now and then. We had extra teamsters to put the dirt up to the bridges. Our cook, Bill, said, "I am going to quit." We lacked about two weeks of being through. Archie Bruce, our straw boss, said, "Harvey, you are the cook." The cook got the breakfast and I got the dinner. Fred Cannon, who was boss of the whole outfit, came along and looked in the kitchen. I was slicing bread and he said, "How are you getting along?" I said "Pretty good, if there is any kicking being done, I am going to do it." He had a kind of funny smile and you could always tell by his smile when he was tickled. He must have passed the word because there never was a word said. I had the job of cooking for about the last two weeks, until we got through there.

The little shacks we slept in and cooked in were put on trucks when we moved from place to place. There was another boy from Nebraska and myself who didn't have any vehicles of our own so whenever we moved to another place, we were put on top of the load. Those old trucks were way up in the air and they would lap way over this way and then that way and looked like they would upset. When it was going to raise up and upset on one side we were supposed to rush over there and hold it down and when it got over the other way we rushed over to the other side.

The last time I went back to Douglas was in 1974. My nephew, John Huntzinger, took me out north of Douglas to see that country again. I didn't find my plowed furrow on my homestead but I did find my spring and had a drink of water there.

Hutchison, Thomas P. and Georgie Maud Family

Thomas Payne Hutchison, son of George and Margaret Hutchison, was born near Dayton, Iowa, January 23, 1872. He was a teenager when he moved to Nebraska with his family. His first work in Nebraska was helping to lay the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railway tracks westward from Chadron, Nebraska to Wyoming. Tom worked with the laying of the tracks until they reached Douglas, Wyoming. He operated a pile driver. He arrived in Douglas in 1886 along with the railroad. Tom then worked in the mines at Glenrock for a while and then worked on the bridge across the Platte River at Douglas.

On September 23, 1897 he was united in marriage to

Thomas Payne Hutchison 1924

Maud Powell Hutchison 1951

Georgie Maud Powell, daughter of George and Margaret Powell. Maud was born in an adobe house on LaPrele Creek on September 6, 1879. At that time it was Albany County. She was the first white baby born in this region south of the Platte River.

Maud was one of the first students to attend the Pleasant Valley School. Her father had sawed and donated the lumber for the school and others in the district worked and helped furnish the school. The building is now on the fairgrounds as a mute testimony to the past.

Until Maud was old enough for school she did not have many playmates except a little Indian girl whose father was a driver for Maud's father. (The little girl's name was Ann Hornback I believe.) Maud was a very good student. Her first teacher was Mae Baird, a much loved teacher. Later, Professor Edwards taught the school and Maud told a story about a girlfriend who was visiting her, helping to starch his night shirts in cold starch and then ironed them so stiff they stood by themselves. Both were severely reprimanded for their prank.

Maud Powell and Ida and Jesse Schlichter became very good friends and they rode horseback to many country dances and affairs of entertainment.

Maud was a very good shot with a rifle and her father always had her shoot the chickens' heads off when they wanted chicken for dinner. After finishing country school, Maud came to town to finish her education. During this time, she directed the Methodist Choir as well as singing in it. She received the first scholarship to the University of Wyoming that was given by the County Commissioners. However, she wasn't able to complete her college education because of hard times.

When Maud and Thomas Hutchison were married they first settled on a ranch on Alkali Creek west of Douglas where Tom built a log house. Maud had a black horse named Billy she had ridden as a girl and she could also hitch him to a two-wheel cart. She would put the babies in a box on the floor of the cart in front of her and go to town with butter, cottage cheese and eggs to make enough money to buy a desk and to help with other expenses.

After Tom settled up on his and Maud's homesteads, they lived in Douglas for a few years where Tom worked at carpentering. He worked on the Unity Temple Building and built a house on North Fifth Street for George and Margaret Powell. He built the house at 332 North Third Street where they lived until the Temple Building was finished and the construction business had slowed down. He then worked on the tunnel carrying water from LaPrele Dam to the ditch and he also worked on drilling rigs in the area. While living in Douglas, Tom was a member of the Fire Hose Company.

The family moved back to the ranch where they lived for a number of years. To them were born five sons and three daughters, the youngest daughter dying when just a few days old. She is buried on the ranch. The sons were Miles M., Richard T., George P., Peter and Charles W. The daughters were Agnes M. and Susie. One son and one daughter are still living; Charles in Broomfield, Colorado and Agnes Wiker of Douglas, Wyoming.

Miles married Lelia Johnston — one son and three daughters

Richard married Wanda Harry — one daughter

George married Verna Hylton — two sons

Peter married Mary McWhinnie — one son and three daughters

Charles married Bernita Price — three sons

Agnes married Wesley K. Wiker — two daughters

Susie married Roland LaPerriere — one son

I, Agnes, was born Thanksgiving evening, November 26, 1903, in the house my father built at 332 North Third Street. I grew up on the ranch of my parents amidst five brothers and one sister. I was the only girl in our immediate neighborhood until my sister was born and the homesteaders came in.

When six years old, I started to school in the building where my mother had gone to school. My first year at school wasn't a good one. My two older brothers took me to school but didn't give the teacher any history, so when the teacher asked me my name I told her Sis or Sister as that was what I was called by everyone, and to my knowledge, I had never heard my given name mentioned. The teacher thought I was being smart, I guess, and she never had any use for me after that. She made school miserable for me and when I began to have nightmares every night I was taken to Dr. Bodine. He looked me over and talked to me, then shook his finger at my mother and told her to take me out of school and never send me back to that teacher. The next year my folks brought us to town to school. I was soon promoted into the second grade. The following year we were brought back to the Pleasant Valley School until I completed the eighth grade.

There were Literary Society meetings at our country school and many spelling bees, mathematics contests, debates and just a lot of good times.

When I was nine years old, my father and mother started taking us to country dances. The first dance I ever went to was at the S.A. Bishop home on LaPrele. The young men would teach the young girls how to dance. Fred Hildebrand taught me to dance. When we went to the Hildebrands we either had to cross the river on ice or ford it. They usually had lanterns out so we could see just where the crossing was.

In the fall of 1918 the folks sent me to town to start high school. I stayed with my grandmother for a while. It was the year of the flu epidemic so school was closed for three months. During the flu epidemic I took care of many people. I wasn't afraid of it so I went from one house to another, where needed. All of my family had the flu except me. The end of World War I also came the fall of 1918. After school started up again in 1919 I rode horseback to school from the Henry Bolln place up the river. I left my school clothes at Mrs. Horton's house each evening and put on the riding skirt to ride home. The horse was left at the livery stable. School started at 8:00 a.m. with 45 minutes for noon and continuing until 5 p.m. at night to make up the three months lost by the flu epidemic.

I had started working in the Superintendent's Office helping Mrs. Albert Urban with the book work. Late in 1921, Mrs. Urban died and since I was familiar with the work, I was hired to be the secretary. At that time the one office did everything. Teachers from many rural schools would come into town on Saturdays and the secretary would take them to the North Grade School to pick up books and other supplies. Saturdays were not days off for office help. I worked for District 17 and the high school until June 1925. We did not have electric typewriters and if we wanted an adding machine we had to rent or borrow one. At that time, a top teacher's salary was $166.66. The teachers stayed in private homes or in boarding houses, paying $35 or $40 a month for board and room. Mrs. W.F. Mecum kept teachers and so did Mrs. Brownfield.

On June 3, 1925 I married Wesley K. Wiker at my parents' home in Douglas.

Tom was a member of IOOF Lodge in Douglas and Maud was a charter member of Mountain Valley Rebekah Lodge #15, a member of Woodbine Chapter #18 Order of Eastern Star and a member of the Auxiliary of the VFW.

Thomas Payne Hutchison died June 4, 1945 and is buried in the Odd Fellows Plot in Douglas Park Cemetery. Maud died March 12, 1952 and is also buried in the Douglas cemetery.

Huxtable, Lloyd & Najma Family

Lloyd S. Huxtable first settled in Platte County in 1910 and moved to Converse County in 1913. The brand of the Huxtable Ranch was "T" one of the oldest brands of the State of Wyoming, and given to Mr. Huxtable by Bill Booker, manager of the VR Ranch. His ranch was homesteaded by Captain White in 1893. Mr. Huxtable managed the place on shares. When Mr. White died in 1929, Mr. Huxtable bought 900 acres of the ranch and then continued to enlarge and improve on it. He erected nearly all of the buildings which are at present on the place.

Warren and Lloyd Huxtable

Lloyd S. Huxtable was born in Kearney, Nebraska, on December 25, 1889, the son of Mr. and Mrs. William Huxtable. His mother's maiden name was Miss Sarah Ison. She was a native of England. His father was born at Niagara Falls, New York. His paternal grand-uncle was a lieutenant in the Civil War. Mr. Huxtable's educational background was the schools of his native state, Nebraska. He worked for various outfits as a cowboy, among them the Swan Land and Cattle Company, VR Ranch, and John Higgins. He then entered the U.S. Army and was sent overseas for a year, being stationed with Veterans Hospital Number Nine. He held grade of corporal when he was discharged at Fort Russell in 1919. He then was employed by U. S. Grant, and later worked for John Higgins until Mr. Higgins' death in 1926, at which time he started in the ranching business for himself.

Mr. Huxtable married Miss Najma Olin, daughter of Erich and Bertha Olin, on September 7, 1921, in Douglas, Wyoming. Mrs. Huxtable was born on May 8, 1893 in Ogallala, Nebraska. Her mother's native country was Sweden. Mr. and Mrs. Huxtable have four children: Chester, Charles, Myrtle (now Mrs. Robert Bruce Rawdon), and Howard. Chester served four years in the Engineering Division of the U.S. Air Corps during the first invasion of the Philippines, spending three years in active duty overseas with the grade of corporal when discharged in California. Chester has five children, Joan, Warren, Larry, Rita and William. He resides in Dillon, Montana. Charles also served in World War II with the infantry stationed at Little Rock, Arkansas, and Fort Ord, Oregon. Charles has two children, John and May Kay. He resides in Glenrock, Wyoming. Myrtle's husband Bruce, spent three years during World War II as a member of the U.S. Navy. Bruce and Myrtle have four children, Robert, Katherine, Richard and Mary A. They make their home in Glenrock, Wyoming. Howard served in the 20th Infantry Division of the U.S. Army stationed in Germany, with a grade of Specialist 3rd Class at discharge. Howard has four children, Howard L., Gary, Dixie and James. Howard now resides on his ranch near Douglas, Wyoming.

Lloyd was a county commissioner for eight years, elected in 1948. His main interest was ranching. Najma has been noted as a fine hunter and trapper, and once bagged a black bear weighing 250 pounds. This feat was written up in a magazine, "Sports Afield". She is a member of the Lutheran Church and now resides in Douglas, Wyoming.

Lloyd died August 26, 1976.

Hylton, Joseph M.D. and Ara

Joseph Roy Hylton was born on January 30, 1883, in Grenola, Chautauqua County, Kansas, the son of Tazewell Wesley and Mattie Moore Hylton. He had one brother, Floyd, a veterinarian who practiced in Longmont, Colorado, where he lived with his mother, who later died and is buried in the Longmont Cemetery. He was a graduate of Bennett-Loyola Medical School, Chicago, Illinois, class of 1906. Soon after graduation Dr. Hylton came to Glenrock, Wyoming and became associated with Dr. Jay Smith. The following year, or early 1908, Dr. Hylton opened an office in Douglas. He married Ara Louise Davis (born April 11, 1883) a student nurse. From this union three children were born: Roy Hollis Hylton, Helen Louise Hylton (Mrs. John D. Goodloe III, of Atlanta, Georgia), and Janyce Hylton (Mrs. Mike Sullivan of Cheyenne, Wyoming).

Dr. Hylton became well-known and highly regarded throughout the state, his skill and ability as a physician and surgeon even coming to the notice of the Mayo Clinic, Rochester, Minnesota. He was totally dedicated to his profession, worked hard and long hours, always on call no matter what the time of day or night, or the weather. He was often called to make long trips to the country, sometimes a distance of fifty or sixty miles and having to perform emergency surgery right there, on a kitchen table, under a lamp or lantern light. Mrs. Hylton, on many occasions, accompanied the doctor on these trips and assisted him. Such trips for many years were made by horse and buggy.

Dr. Hylton was a real humanitarian, loved and cared for people. He always had time to listen to the complaints, woes, and problems of people, from the lowliest sheepherder to troubled people from all walks of life who were suffering, discouraged, needing advice or reassurance about their problems.

Often, while working with Dr. Hylton, taking dictation or discussing some business matters, he would pause awhile and we would chat. I, Antoinette P. Stoddard, would ask him to talk about his family, parents, his childhood, his hopes and ambitions, and he would tell me that he always wanted to be a doctor and help people. He would tell me, that as a youngster he would follow the local doctor around, asking him all sorts of questions, asking if he could go along with him and watch him work, treat people, set broken bones, and even watch him operate. He wanted to learn all he could. He said he and his brother, Floyd, when they were teenagers, would go out to farms and buy herniated hogs, then they would operate and repair the hernias, and sell the hogs, earning money for their schooling. They both knew from an early age what they wanted to do, that medicine and surgery was their aim and ambition. Dr. Hylton also had a very keen legal mind and could have been a successful and fine attorney.

Dr. Hylton was interested and active in local and state affairs. He had a wide acquaintance with many political people; governors, senators, people in public office and business. He was a close friend of Governor Ross and Mrs. Nellie Tayloe Ross; also Senator Joseph C. O'Mahoney. He served for many years as Democratic State Chairman, and Democratic National Committeeman for Wyoming. He also served as one of the directors of the Federal Land Bank of Omaha, Nebraska.

He worked long and hard with Senator O'Mahoney to have the prisoner of war camp located in Douglas during World War II, which involved numerous long distance telephone calls, letters and telegrams, all at his own expense.

Through a mutual friend, Dr. Glaister H. Ashley (who was head of the Mount Airy Sanitarium, in Denver, Colorado), Dr. Hylton became acquainted with Charles A. Guenther, a petroleum engineer, who came to Douglas about 1916 or 1917 from Chicago, Illinois. They became associated in several business ventures, acquiring oil and gas leases and other properties, until Mr. Guenther's death, September 27, 1923. He perished in the Burlington train wreck, Cole Creek, Lockett, Wyoming.

In addition to his medical practice, Dr. Hylton had a love and appreciation of music, art, paintings, antiques, silver, beautiful china and linens. On his travels away from home he visited museums, art galleries, antique shops. While on a trip to Europe Dr. Hylton attended a seminar on goiter surgery, and visited hospitals in Vienna, Austria, and became acquainted with several well-known physicians and surgeons. Also, he met a fine Austrian artist, Hans Larvin, in Vienna, who later had a showing of his paintings in the Art Institute in Chicago. They corresponded for years until his death during the war. Dr. Hylton was fortunate in acquiring several of Hans Larvin's paintings. He was especially noted for his portraits of Gypsy life.

The Hylton family owned and operated several ranches in Converse and Albany Counties, raising thoroughbred horses (Jockey Club Registration), also quarter horses, cattle, and sheep. The famous "Sir Barton", derby winner, was one of the thoroughbred horses on the Hylton Ranch. His statue is in the Washington Park in Douglas.

August 22, 1946, Dr. Hylton was flown by chartered plane from Douglas to Rochester, Minnesota, to the Mayo Clinic, suffering from what was later diagnosed as a liver ailment. He died in St. Mary's Hospital, August 31, 1946. His body was brought back to Douglas for burial in the Douglas Cemetery.

At this writing Mrs. Hylton, Roy, Helen, and Janyce, all are deceased. Roy was married twice and had no children. Helen had three children, John (Choppy) Goodloe IV, Susan Goodloe, and Peter Goodloe, all living in Atlanta, Georgia. Janyce Hylton Sullivan had two daughters, Linda Louise Sullivan, and Gay Sullivan.

This history and information is furnished by Antoinette Pecukaitis Stoddard who came to Douglas, May 27, 1918, from Chicago, Illinois, to work for Charles A. Guenther, manager of the Mike Henry Oil Company, and after his death she was employed by Dr. Joseph Roy Hylton as secretary and office manager from September 1923 until Dr. Hylton's death August 31, 1946. Mrs. Stoddard was named executrix of Dr. Hylton's estate and continued to work for the Hylton family until after the estate was settled in 1949. She was closely associated with the Hylton family.

Ireton, Robert K. and Elizabeth

Robert Kelly Ireton was born April 5, 1878 at Scotts, Michigan, the son of Samuel Kelly and Altana (Sager) Ireton. Besides his parents Robert had one sister, Mrs. Jessie (Ireton) Selby of Hazel Park, Michigan. Samuel was born at Kalamazoo, Michigan on October 4, 1855, and died November 11, 1913. Altana (Sager) Ireton was born at Kalamazoo, Michigan January 29, 1858 and died May 15, 1936.

Samuel's grandfather, a descendant of Irish blood, married an Irish lady, whose last name was Kelly. From that time the name Kelly has been carried down to the present generation.

Samuel was a carpenter by trade. At one time he ran a tavern on the Missouri River.

Robert Kelly Ireton married Elizabeth Maria

L. to r. Ralph, Fred, James and Ernest Ireton 1970

Bullard on June 8, 1898 at Preston, Missouri. Elizabeth was born at Marshalltown, Minnesota on November 8, 1879. She had one brother, two half brothers and a half sister. To Robert and Elizabeth five sons were born: Ernest, born August 18, 1899 at Lyons, Kansas, James, born August 6, 1901 at Elk Point, South Dakota, Ralph, born October 24, 1905 at Livingston, Montana, Russell, who died when a small child, and Fred, born July 1, 1926 at Mullen, Nebraska.

The family first came to Nebraska in a covered wagon and settled near Mullen. In 1905 they moved on in their covered wagon to Livingston, Montana. In 1913 they returned to Mullen and lived until 1922, when once again the family traveled by covered wagon to Wyoming. The father and his two eldest sons homesteaded on joining land in Converse County, fifty miles north of Douglas. They brought with them cattle, horses, machinery, household furniture and other supplies.

It took about a month to trail their livestock from Mullen, Nebraska to their homestead location in Wyoming. Ralph also took a homestead joining his brother as soon as he became of age.

They lived in a tent the first summer, while Robert and sons built a sod house about 20' X 24'. A few years later two more sod rooms were added on to the main house. In 1940 Robert purchased a frame, six-room house and moved it east of the soddy a few feet. The frame home then became their permanent home.

Robert operated a farm and ranch operation for 26 years. His son, James, made his home with them for many years. They drilled water wells and moved buildings for people who needed a well drilled or a building moved to earn money for many other needed things.

Elizabeth was a member of the Verse Women's Club, and the family attended Sunday School and church, when it was held at Verse or the Dry Creek Hall. Travel in early days depended on the weather and roads.

Robert and Elizabeth celebrated their golden anniversary on June 8, 1948 at their new frame home, with relatives and friends attending. The Verse Women's Club members presented them with a complete set of dinnerware trimmed in gold.

Robert sold their place in the fall of 1948, and moved to Douglas. He died following a short illness on August 27, 1949. Elizabeth continued living in Douglas. She celebrated her 89th birthday on November 8, 1968 at the home of her son and daughter-in-law, Ernest and Opal Ireton, with her family and long-time friends attending. Elizabeth's youngest son, Fred, of Kelso, Washington was unable to attend.

Elizabeth passed away September 2, 1970 at Michael Manor Nursing Home, where she had been a patient for several years. Both Robert and Elizabeth rest in the family plot in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

James Ireton tells about his life in the following story: "I started shearing in 1940, shearing for four or five years with a blade crew. We called ourselves the "Verse" crew. Some of the crew were Lou Steckley, Ralph Haefele and Eddie, Elmer and Arthur Johnson. I also worked at the Antelope Coal Mine for five winters. After my folks moved to Douglas in about 1947, I didn't like living alone so I sold out and moved to Douglas where

I lived with my mother.

"In 1955 I married Ruby Templar (born Feb. 23, 1900). We moved to Casper on an irrigated farm. In August 1980 we moved back to Douglas. On Feb. 17, 1981 Ruby died in Douglas. I married Ellen Dunn later; we live in Douglas at the present time."

Irvine, W. C. "Billy" and Carolyn

W. C. Irvine was born March 3, 1852 at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, the son of Dr. James R. and Jane Morrow Irvine. The Irvines were early settlers in the United States and their family served in every major war from the Indian conflicts through the Revolutionary War to the present.

Mr. Irvine attended school at Carlisle and no doubt attended Dickinson College where their roster of alumni include many Irvines. He was well educated and had a good scholastic background, which served him well throughout his life.

Billy first came West as a boy of 18 in 1870 with a wagon train belonging to Berard, Pipphen, Irvine and Company. It is believed the Irvine of this company was an uncle. He was accompanied on this trip by a friend, Jim Sullivan, Both boys, being adventurous, partook of all activities, as evidenced by a diary kept by W. C. Irvine, the flyleaf inscription reading: "May 23, 1870. Safe out of Indian Country and very glad of it. W. C. Irvine." However, they were not safely out of Indian territory because on May 25, 1870, he wrote that while out hunting fresh meat, they saw Buffalo being driven by Indians, and on June 1 he wrote that they were told 150 Indians had killed three men at a ranch about 30 miles ahead of them.

It is presumed that Billy returned home after this trip; however, he was back in the West in 1873 and went to the sandhills of Nebraska where he was employed by Bosler Brothers, a company owned by men in Carlisle. Irvine was 21 years old at this time, and evidence of his interest, adaptability, and management is shown by the fact he was made foreman in 1874. It was about this time he branched out with cattle of his own, running 4,000 head north of Fort Fetterman, which herd soon increased to 8,000 head. He formed a partnership with Thomas Lawrence, and later about 1881, helped form the Converse Cattle Company.

In 1876, at Cheyenne, he married Carolyn Sparhawk. According to the newspaper report of the wedding, his address at that time was Ogallala, Nebraska, and he was in partnership at that time with Thomas Lawrence. From that time on, however, he spent his time in Wyoming and became very active in the Stock Growers Association and community and political affairs. He belonged to the select Cheyenne Club, whose members were prominent Wyoming citizens, and managed his ranching interests as well. He became manager for the Ogallala Land and Cattle Company whose headquarters were at Ogallala, Nebraska, but whose herds ranged well into Wyoming, with the Wyoming headquarters at the present day Ross. He was manager of this company at the time of the Johnson County War, and it is probably in connection with his part in this uprising that his name most often crops up in history books. It is said that he was the organizer behind the group of cattlemen who went into Johnson County with the avowed purpose of wiping out the "rustlers". It is known that he accompanied the group from the time they left Cheyenne to the time they were "captured" at the TA Ranch and taken to Cheyenne for trial. Feelings at that time ran high and it is ironic that his daughter and one of his sons married the children of one of the "rustlers" they set out to eradicate! At the time it must have been a hard pill to swallow.

In 1900 John T. Williams and W. C. Irvine bought the Ogallala Cattle Company and operated as partners. Mr. Williams owned 250 shares, Mr. Irvine 249 shares, and William A. Paxton, one of the former owners and a close friend of Mr. Irvine's, owned one share, which a few years later he gave Mrs. W. C. Irvine. (He also gave Mrs. Irvine his brand, the Spur). Mr. Irvine and his family lived at the Ogallala and about this time, Mr. Irvine built a large home there, always called the "Big House", a rambling structure with six large bedrooms, bath, living room, dining room, and kitchen, complete with butler's pantry. Each room was heated with a round oak coal and wood stove. It is said that Mrs. Irvine employed a Japanese servant, mainly because he made such excellent pound cake. This "Big House" burned to the ground in March 1937 and along with it went many priceless records and accounts of this historic ranch.

Mr. Irvine and Mr. Williams operated this ranch together until Mr. Williams' death in 1914. In 1916 the Williams Estate sold their share of the company to Leroy Moore, who then assumed the management.

W. C. Irvine kept meticulous records of all his transactions, and while many records burned in the fire in 1937, those which remain show he went to great lengths to be honest and above-board in his management. That he was a shrewd operator is shown that despite terrible losses from severe winters (18,500 sheep lost during two bad years), the average profit per year came to 19%. He meticulously deducted from his share any pasture or feed used by any of his children's livestock.

In the DOUGLAS BUDGET column "When Douglas was Young" in 1966 was this story: June 24, 1891: "Hon. W. C. Irvine got in on the Monday's train from the toughest trip he has had, so he says, for ten years. He was after a bunch of eleven Ogalalla company horses, brought from Idaho, who had gotten away and were believed to be headed for home. He took the stage from Casper to Riverton, and from there the saddle, finally finding the stock on the Big Sandy. He brought them back as far as Casper alone, a distance of over 100 miles. He was in the saddle eleven days, riding hard all the time and naturally was pretty nearly used up when he got back to Casper. It might be remarked, incidentally, that when Billy goes after anything he usually gets it."

This seems to sum up the general opinion given by old timers that Billy Irvine was not only tenacious but tough. He was a good friend to those he liked but is said to have been unrelenting to those he considered enemies. That he had a deep affection for John T. Williams is shown in the many letters he wrote him, but also his character and traits are shown.

Admittedly, Mr. Irvine was a good manager with his money, but his family said that when anything important came up, he was most generous. During the First World War, he was State Director of War Finance, and he wrote his daughter that he was mailing her children War Savings Certificates and Thrift Stamp Certificates, which he told her to have the children add to whenever they got a nickel or dime, with this advice: "My idea in sending them certificates is to teach them to save and at the same time raise money for the government. You may not think so, but it will teach the children thrift and economy and be of great benefit to them."

Mr. Irvine's love for children and family show up through his correspondence. When his daughter was expecting her first baby, he insisted she go to Chicago for the most modern hospital care there was, and he accompanied her there and stayed the whole time. When his son Robert was injured badly in a fight in Gillette, his concern was evident in the letters he wrote Mr. Williams; and when his son "Mickey" was missing in action in France, he tried every method possible to try to locate him either as a possible prisoner of war or to find the remains. Senator Warren did all he could but nothing was ever found. He and Mrs. Irvine never accepted the fact their son was really dead, and it was possible that this, along with other tragedies such as their daughter's death in 1918, led Mr. Irvine to complete retirement. He moved to Santa Monica, California in 1920 where he died on July 27, 1924. He is buried in Cheyenne.

In the 54 years Mr. Irvine spent in the West, he saw the country develop from a raw frontier to a settled prosperous country. He had a great deal to do with that development. Marie H. Erwin wrote in 1943 in the WYOMING HISTORICAL BLUEBOOK, the following about William C. Irvine: He served as Treasurer of the Wyoming Stock Growers Association, in early life he was a Democrat but changed his political affiliation to the Republican Party. He was appointed State Treasurer to fill a vacancy in that office, serving from September 19, 1903 until January 2, 1905. He was elected to the same office November 1904, serving from January 2, 1905 until January 7, 1907. He served as a member of the Constitutional Convention, and a signer of the Constitution, a State Senator in the Twelfth and Thirteenth State Legislature in 1913 and 1915. He served as a director of the first company that was organized to build the Cheyenne Northern Railroad and was one of the promoters of the Wheatland Irrigation Project.

Quoting from a bulletin put out by the Wyoming Stock Growers Association in 1944: "William C. Irvine was one of the West's outstanding cattlemen of the pioneer days of Wyoming. He was intrepid, was outstanding for law and order and the rights of all honest men in the range cattle wars."

Irwin, Charles and Ruth

Charles G. Irwin was born to John and Jessica Irwin on November 20, 1892 in Belvidere, Nebraska. He was educated in the Nebraska public schools. After completing his education he became an operator and agent in western Nebraska for the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad. He joined the army during World War I and served with the 355th Infantry, 89th Division in the European Theater.

Charles' father, John, was of English-Scotch ancestry. His parents had operated linen mills in Ulster. When John was seven years old the family emigrated to Wells, Vermont where they engaged in the dairy business, shipping milk to New York City. John trained as a telegrapher in his youth. After his marriage to Jessica he migrated first into Iowa and later into Nebraska.

Jessie was a niece of John Purdue, the founder of Purdue University at Valparaiso, Indiana, as well as being a cousin of Jubal Early, a General in the Confederate Army.

After his discharge from the army, Charles Irwin moved to Wyoming to file on a homestead claim on Lightning Creek. In 1919 he went into partnership with Byard Mills, founding the Irwin-Mills Furniture Business. The business eventually expanded to include hardware and farm implements.

Mr. Irwin was married on October 12, 1920 to Ruth Leman, the daughter of D. W. and Bessie Leman. Bessie Leman was a sister of Byard Mills, Charles' business partner. Ruth received her education in the public schools in Douglas.

In 1947 Mr. Irwin bought the William J. Brown ranch, which had originated in 1919. The property was extensive in acreage, located about 50 miles north and 15 miles east of Douglas and did business under the name of the Irwin Livestock Company.

The Irwins were the parents of two sons, Dennis L. and C. Donald. Dennis married Lucille Edwards, assuming the management of the Irwin Livestock Company and making the ranch their home. Dennis and Lucille had four children, Douglas, Denise, Diana and Terry. Lucille died in 1979 after which Dennis married Jane Harrop in 1980.

Donald was married to Carolyn Maguire. They are the parents of two children, Anita and Mike.

Charles Irwin continued to operate the Irwin-Mills establishment for many years, eventually handing the management of the store over to his second son, Donald.

Charles Irwin served as Republican Representative to the Wyoming State House for four terms, acting as Speaker during his last term. He was a member of the Wyoming State Senate for eight terms and served as President of that body.

Charles served as a member of the school board, past President of the American Legion. He was one of the prime movers in the erection of a low-rent development for retired citizens. This building bears his name, the Irwin Towers.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Irwin were members of the Episcopal Church. Charles died on May 16, 1984 and is buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery. Mrs. Irwin still makes her home on North Fourth Street in Douglas.

Isaac, Fred and Helen Family

Fred Isaac was born in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, Canada on January 1, 1881. His mother was a French Canadian and his father, John, was English and Jewish. They went to England for a while, then came back to Chicago where his father, John, worked in a meat market. They later bought a little place near Brush, Colorado. Soon they gave this up and moved to LaJunta, Colorado. Fred came north with a trail herd to Montana when he was about fifteen or sixteen years old. He went to work on ranches around Wheatland and Glendo and eventually was employed as a ranch hand at Tom Bruner's.

Helen Susan Woodruff was born at Dennison, Iowa, April 9, 1879. She had two older brothers; Jay and Robert. Shortly after her mother died in 1900 she came to Wyoming and spent some time with the Tom Bruners. Mrs. Tom (Martha) Bruner was Helen's mother's sister. She met Fred Isaac at Bruners.

Fred Isaac and Helen Susan Woodruff were married Thanksgiving Day in 1908 at a ranch on LaBonte Creek now known as the Eggleston ranch. It was then owned by Tom Bruner and leased by Fred Isaac.

They spent their first years of married life living at the Bruner ranch and at the homestead they proved up on that was located on Sand Creek. They rode horses back and forth about ten miles each way. It is now part of the Clausen Ranch's summer range which is made up of several sections of land Fred and Helen and James and I, Dorothy, bought from people that had homesteaded surrounding sections.

About 1910 Fred Isaac's father, mother, one of his three brothers, Harry, and two of his five sisters, Ruth and Grace, came here and lived on the Foxton place that John Pexton now owns. All the family soon returned to LaJunta except Fred, Harry and their father, John. He had a little chicken ranch on Wagonhound Creek where he lived until his death in 1917. He wanted to have the chicken ranch "to get away from the 'pups' (people)". He is buried in the Douglas Cemetery.

Fred Isaac

Helen Woodruff Isaac

Fred and Helen lived for a short time on a ranch on Wagonhound Creek that is now owned by Dennis Daly.

In 1912, Fred and Helen traded their farm near Dow City, Iowa to Lewis Darale for the original Kern ranch on LaBonte Creek which they leased to Leechs for a short time. This ranch has been owned by our family for 72 years.

They had a new home built in a beautiful spot on the west side of LaBonte Creek and meadow and moved into it, but after having several wells drilled and finding no good water, they moved to the east side of the creek into the original house that John Kern had built about 1890.

Fred died August 6, 1935. Pneumonia was the cause of death. A neighbor of his said: "I never knew a more honest man than Fred Isaac nor a better neighbor. He was a good husband and father, and in his passing, Converse County has lost a splendid citizen."

Mother, Helen, died in 1954. She and I had many good years together.

Two children were born to Fred and Helen Isaac: Dorothy in 1920 and John in 1921. John served in the navy overseas in the second World War. He came home and graduated from college. John and his wife, Ginger, live in Fremont, Ohio. He is the engineer for a gas processing plant there. They have two children - Belinda and Michael.

Dorothy graduated from high school as salutatorian, attended college and taught school for eight years. In 1947 she married James Clausen and moved back onto the ranch on LaBonte and into the original house which is now about 100 years old. A few years ago, we moved into a nice home built in 1973 where we still live. We had two sons, Fred and Robert.

Fred married Sharon Davies and has two adopted sons. They have two daughters, Christina and Anita. He is an oil well consultant and owns Bumper to Bumper Parts Store. He owns his home in Douglas.

Robert is married to Kellie Naron. They have three children; Aaron, AuBrie and Aiden. He ranches here with us and has a backhoe business. He is president of Converse County Farm Bureau.

James and Dorothy have been very active in their community. Both have held offices in Farm Bureau. Dorothy has held many offices in the Homemakers Club, both in club and county. She was also a state chairman for about four years. In 1984 she was awarded the Quealy Award.

Both are very active in church. James is a Deacon in the First Southern Baptist Church.

Dorothy Isaac Clausen

James and Elizabeth Shaw.

Irene was born on September 29, 1886 in Fort Laramie. She graduated from Saint Martin Academy in Sturgis, South Dakota. Later, she taught school in the LaBonte area.

Harry and Irene had two children, Elizabeth (born on July 14, 1921) and James (born on September 4, 1926.) James died in a fire in Douglas on February 16, 1932. Irene died from the effect of giving birth to her son, James, on September 9, 1926.

In 1927 Harry married Lenora Hinton. They had two children, Ida Mae (born on March 14, 1929) and Joe (born on November 16, 1931.)

The Isaacs lived for many years on the Goodwin place on LaBonte.

As a young man, Harry contracted polio which left him paralyzed in his hand and leg. In spite of his handicap he ran a successful sheep and cattle operation. He was a foreman for C.D. Zimmerman's wide spread Diamond Dot Ranch for many years.

On April 15, 1938 Harry drowned in the flood waters of LaBonte Creek. Harry, with Arnold Braae and Rody Brow, was dislodging the driftwood and heavy logs that were threatening to cause a bridge at the ranch house to wash out. He was prying on one log, but to no avail. He reversed the procedure, throwing his weight against the log. The swift waters carried another timber against the one he was attempting to push away from the bridge and he was thrown into the creek. He was last seen about 300 yards below the bridge, his head and shoulders and one hand above water carried swiftly downstream.

A search party consisting of men from nearby ranches and the local WPA searched for several days for the body but to no avail. It wasn't until one week later that it was found lodged against a fence near the O.P. Johnson ranch buildings.

Elizabeth married Rody Brow in 1940.

Isaac, Harry, Irene and Lenora

Harry Isaac was born in Chicago, Illinois in 1884 where his father worked as a meat cutter. The family moved to LaJunta, Colorado where Harry grew to early manhood. He came to Wyoming shortly after the turn of the century to be near his brother, Fred.

In 1915 he was married to Irene Shaw, daughter of

Ivester, Joseph Clyde and Blanche

Joseph Clyde Ivester was born Dec. 8, 1888 in Mountain Rest, South Carolina, the son of Joe and Clara Pell Ivester and came to Wyoming in 1910 to make his home around the Shawnee and Douglas areas.

When Clyde (as he was better known) came to this area, he worked at several ranches, including the B. J. Erwin, Mortons and the Fiddleback. For a short time he farmed, south of Shawnee, then moved into Shawnee and with his wife Blanche managed the Shawnee Hotel. Also at this time, he worked as a carpenter and at other jobs, that were available. Clyde served 25 years, in various capacities, as a law enforcement officer. He served as Deputy Sheriff for four years at Shawnee and eight years in Douglas as Deputy under Sheriff Albert Peyton and ten years as Douglas Chief of Police. In 1942 he was elected Sheriff of Converse County, taking over this office in 1943 and served in this capacity, until the time of his death May 19, 1946.

Clyde married Blanche Marie Elgin on Jan. 23, 1915, at Lost Springs, Wyoming. Blanche was born in Bates County, Missouri, Dec. 22, 1895, to Charles Lee and Lucy Ann Elgin and came to Wyoming in 1908 with her father and made her home in this vicinity until her death July 25, 1934. She was a devoted wife, mother, and homemaker and active in the First Baptist Church.

Blanche and Clyde were the parents of two sons, Willard and Kenneth Ivester of Douglas and three daughters: Eva Ivester Quinn of Prosser, Washington; Peggy Ivester Quinn of Pendleton, Oregon; and Virginia Bennett Lenzen deceased 3-30-1976.

Jackson, Andrew and Cora Family

Andrew Jackson was born in Denmark on March 28, 1842, growing to manhood there. At the age of 22, Andrew, in the company of a friend, Bill Holden, decided to emigrate to the United States, lured by the promise of open land available for homesteading and intrigued with the stories they had heard of the great cattle ranches, wild Indians and outlaws and the forts and soldiers in the vast and untamed country lying west of the Mississippi River.

Andrew and Bill arrived in New York in April of 1864. From there they traveled to the Wyoming Territory where they found employment with the Union Pacific Railroad. At that time the tracks had been completed as far as Omaha, Nebraska and the company was in the process of extending their road westward to join the Central Pacific Railroad which had originated at Sacramento, California. Bill and Andrew hired on to help lay track. The job was completed on May 10, 1869, when the presidents of the two railroad companies met at Promintory Point in Utah to drive the golden spike with a silver hammer, joining the two sets of tracks which spanned the United States. Bill and Andrew, along with many other laborers, were given the opportunity to tap the golden spike.

Shortly after the ceremony in Utah, Andrew and Bill boarded a stage bound for Rock Creek, Wyoming Territory. Two days later they arrived at the small settlement where Andy purchased a team of horses, a team of mules, a saddle horse, a freight wagon, and harnesses; Bill purchased a freight wagon and two spans of mules. In this manner they began their freighting business.

Mary Stoner Yeisley

They traveled from Rock Creek to Cheyenne, on to Sheridan, back to Rock Creek and on to Laramie. At first they were associated in business with two other freighters, Frank Hardy and Hank Wells. Their first trip as freighters was made in September of 1869; their destination, Laramie, was reached three and a half days later.

After two years of working at their freighting business, Andy and Bill filed on homesteads. Bill filed near Rock Creek and Andy filed in the north end of Downey Park near the Downey family for which the park was named. The two men continued freighting during the time they weren't required to be on the land.

Andy married Cora Yeisley, daughter of Henry and Mary Stoner Yeisley, on June 23, 1885 at the Jackson ranch in Downey Park with Mrs. Yeisley and her son, John, in attendance.

Cora was born in Lucas, Ohio on January 22, 1869. She had one brother, John and six sisters, Mary, Susan, Amanda, Katie, Reanie and Lena. Her father was born aboard the ship bringing the family to America from Europe.

After her husband's death in Ohio in 1869, Mary and her family decided to come west to Colorado to find free land. They came by way of wagon in a company of 15 wagons and 64 people. After an arduous trip which included many long remembered events such as a fight with the Indians, they arrived at their destination.

In 1884 the family came to Wyoming where Mary Yeisley accepted a position at the Cheyenne Stage Station as a cook and housekeeper. She died shortly after as a result of pneumonia which she contracted while hiding in a willow grove from the Indians which were attacking the station.

John Yeisley worked for Andy for a period of time before taking a job as stage driver between Rock Creek and Fort Fetterman. He later homesteaded on upper LaPrele Creek where he remained until his death on December 20, 1928.

Cora's longtime companion on the ranch while Andy was away freighting was Donna Hays. She married and moved away when Andy came back to the ranch to stay.

One son, Henry Martin (b. 1886), and one daughter, Lena (b. 1888), were born while Andy and Cora lived in Downey Park. Lena died in 1890 and is buried at the homestead in the park.

Shortly after Lena's death the Jacksons purchased Samuel Slaymaker's place on upper LaPrele Creek. Slaymaker had operated it as a stage stop on the Fort Fetterman-Rock Creek Trail. It is located immediately north of where Rory Cross lives in 1985.

Three sons; Bert (b. January 1891), George (b. December 1894) and Peter (b. February 29, 1896) and one daughter, Mattie Marie (b. July 1898) were born on the ranch on LaPrele.

Andy's brother, Peter, came to live with the family after they moved to LaPrele Creek. He was to live with them until his death on March 29, 1917.

Andy died on May 7, 1921 from the effects of a tragic accident a few days earlier. He had left the house to go and repair a wagon. After several hours of absence, Cora became worried and sent George to find him. George found Andy lying face down near a dead ewe. Indications were that Andy had found the dead ewe and decided to skin her. He was in the process of doing so when a ram which was penned a short distance away broke out of his enclosure and butted Andy in the head. Unconscious, he was rushed to the Douglas hospital but died a few days later without ever gaining consciousness.

Cora and her son, George, managed the home ranch until her death on May 7, 1928. The ranch was then sold to William Cross.

Some of the teachers of the Jackson children were Lillian M. Bratt, Mary Cross, Marion Browning, Alzire Cross and Maud Dawes. Mattie remembers one school incident very well. It seems that someone wanted to play a joke on Mary so they stuffed a pair of overalls in the chimney. Smoke poured into the room, Mary became frightened and rode to Jacksons for help. John Yeisley grabbed a sheep hook and climbed to the roof upon reaching the school house and pulled the overalls out. Needless to say there was no school for the rest of the day.

Pete Jackson worked for the Hylton ranch for 30 years. He was foreman for many of those years. In 1943 he married Margaret Housiaux O'Brien. He died on February 26, 1956.

George homesteaded in 1916 near his parent's place on LaPrele Creek. On March 16, 1933 he married Stella Graves Howard in Harrison, Nebraska. Children born to them were: Cora (Johnson), James Richard, George, William, Andrew and Delbert. After becoming seriously ill in 1949 he spent most of the rest of his life in the Sheridan Veteran's Hospital. He died on December 15, 1966.

Albert "Bert" married Bessie Housiaux. They had one son, Albert Jr. Bessie died May 25, 1933. Bert married George's widow, Stella. He died in 1979.

Mattie Marie married Ed Carlon. (See Carlon story.)

Jackson, T. B. "Bert" and Angie

The Jackson family, Bert and Angie and their seven children, ranging in age from the eldest son, then 18 years old, to the youngest girl, who was six, left Kansas in June of 1919. They were bound for Wyoming, making the trip in two horse-drawn covered wagons. They arrived at the homestead site about two and one-half months later on August 12 at four in the afternoon. The family lived in the two wagons until they could complete their house.

The dwelling was very large compared to most homestead houses in the area. It was a two-storied affair, having five rooms and a full basement. Even the younger children helped with the digging of the basement, carrying buckets of dirt from the excavation. It was difficult work. The Jacksons wore out a pole axe and a pick digging in the sandstone.

The Jackson children studied at home that first year, using books they had brought with them from Kansas. The second year they attended the newly completed Leper-Nagley School. The Jackson children walked over two miles to attend this school. Their first teacher was a very young lady with only a high school education, but the following year, and older, more experienced teacher was hired.

At the age of eleven, Joe, the second son, hauled coal. He used four head of horses, making a round trip of 44 miles. The Jacksons farmed, raised chickens and sheep. The oldest boy worked away from home most of the time so Joe was obliged to do much of the heavy farm work.

After spending three years on the homestead the Jacksons moved to Orpha, Wyoming where they operated a store. Joe continued to work in the country for various ranchers in the area.

In 1925 Mrs. Jackson's health failed. The high altitude of Wyoming aggravated her condition; therefore the Jacksons sold their property and returned to Kansas.

Jacobs, Bass and Mabel

Bass Jacobs was born in Franklin, North Carolina in 1886, son of Jules and Rachel Jacobs. His grandfather, Gaither Jacobs, came to the United States from Holland. Basil Pinckney Jacobs, known as "Bass" arrived in Converse County, Wyoming in 1903 at the age of 17, after having worked his way West from North Carolina in order to join his older brother, Jesse Jacobs, and his uncle, both of whom were then employed by the Jake Jenne Ranch in northern Converse County. He relates that he arrived in Douglas with exactly 3 cents in his pocket, with which he bought 3 doughnuts; and then hired a livery driver to take him to the Jenne Ranch fervently hoping his brother would have the $15 to pay the hire. Jesse Jacobs died within a few years (date unknown) of Rocky Mountain Spotted Fever, and his uncle returned with Jesse to North Carolina for burial and did not return to Wyoming. Bass, however, stayed on, eventually working up to the job of foreman, formerly held by his brother.

Bass was a skilled driver of horses; this skill having been acquired at an early age as an apprentice to his father, Jules Jacobs. Jules was a stage coach driver for 42 years in the Blue Ridge Mountains of North Carolina, with a 20-mile run every day over steep winding mountain trails from Franklin to Dillsboro, North Carolina and back, and he trained his son, Bass, to be an expert driver. This training stood him in good stead when called upon to drive a freight wagon with six horses in order to supply a ranch needs 60 miles from Douglas. Mrs. Charles Reid recalls an incident when Bass, driving six horses on a freight wagon with trailer wagon attached, managed to turn the rig around at the corner of the present Golden Rule Store with great skill, and so won a wager offered by onlookers.

Bass Jacobs was united in marriage with Mary Etta Pattison Whipple in 1916 to whom one son was born, Charles Alfred Jacobs. Mary Jacobs died in 1920 of pneumonia.

In June 1922, Bass was married to Mabel Schuman. Mabel Schuman was born in Putnam, Nebraska, daughter of Bert and Rosina Hoefling Schuman. Her father, Bert Schuman, came to this country from Germany as a small boy. Mabel attended schools in Kansas, and came west as a young woman, teaching schools in Colorado and Wyoming. Mabel was an accomplished musician, providing piano accompaniment for school, church and community gatherings throughout her lifetime in Wyoming. In 1926, Bass and Mabel bid farewell to the Jenne Ranch and began a small ranching business of their own on Antelope Creek near the Campbell County line. To them were born three children: Evelyn Rose in 1924; Dorothy Rae in 1927; and Donald B. in 1929.

They had just finished their home, and were getting settled in when disaster struck in the form of a flood of tremendous proportions. In the spring of 1929, a widespread storm system did an unusual and devastating thing. In three separate cloudbursts at the head of three separate creeks, an unheard amount of water was channeled toward the unsuspecting residents along Antelope Creek. The three streams converged about a half mile above the Jacobs' ranch home. Bass had been away for several days attending to lambing chores. If he had not arrived home that evening no doubt the family would have drowned. In the night, Mabel heard a hen and chicks begin to chirp. Thinking some animal was molesting them, she urged her husband to investigate. Upon opening the door, he was greeted by a sea of water as far as the eye could see and it was rising rapidly. Hurriedly he woke Charles in the bunkhouse, put the babies in the car and moved it to a bluff overlooking the creek. Then Bass and Mabel, holding hands, waded out with the water now up to their shoulders. Evelyn was perched on her father's shoulders clutching her clothing which she managed to hold on to, with the exception of one shoe. When they reached the safety of the bluff, perhaps 300 yards away, they turned to look. It was a beautiful moonlight night, the storm clouds had dissipated, and they watched their log house leave the foundation and float down the creek. The house lodged in a grove of trees at a bend, one side gave way, and nearly everything washed out. Some of these things were found in the tops of the tallest cottonwoods when the water receded.

Although they had lost home, belongings and a large share of the livestock, giving up was not even considered. The family moved into a tent for the summer and work was started immediately on a new log house on higher, safer ground. This house still stands with various remodelings, was home for them the rest of their lives, and is still part of the home ranch buildings of son, Donald Jacobs.

During the blizzard of 1949, which brought such hardship to the livestock growers of Converse County, Bass Jacobs gambled with his life and won. In the midst of the storm when it became apparent that the sheep would perish by piling against the fences, he put on his warmest clothing, put as much food in his pockets as he could carry, took his wire cutters, and went ahead of his herd of sheep, cutting fences and allowing them to drift with the wind. Several days later when the storm cleared, he was many miles from home, but alive and so were his sheep. He was sighted by a rescue helicopter, he trucked his livestock home, paid his neighbors for the damages, and thus managed to retain his herd.

Such hardships were not uncommon to all the early settlers, and Bass was intensely proud of being a pioneer.

He and Mabel surmounted many difficulties to establish a successful ranching operation, and he remained active in the business until his illness which preceded his death September 26, 1966.

Mabel Jacobs enjoyed gardening and cooking and continued to teach in the various local schools in northern Converse County, as well as in Campbell County, in a period of time extending from before her marriage until 1956 at which time her grandchildren were among her pupils. Her special pleasure was in the musical programs she helped to present. Mabel Jacobs died November 8, 1972. Donald Jacobs now owns and operates the Jacobs Ranch on Antelope Creek.

Jenne, Jacob and Annabelle Family

Jacob Jenne was born July 1, 1870 in DeKalb County, Illinois. His parents, John M. and Rosianna (Schmidt) Jenne had come from Germany to New York November 18, 1867 and arrived in DeKalb County, Illinois in 1869. Three of Jacob's brothers died during a diphtheria epidemic in Illinois in 1879, and so, leaving these sad times behind, the family moved to Adrian, Bates County, Missouri in 1882 and purchased 160 acres of land for $2,520.00. Young Jacob went to school and worked the land in Missouri until 1891 when he came to Wyoming to be associated with his brother, John Morton, in the Morton-Jenne Sheep Company.

In 1897, John's wife was in need of a companion during her pregnancy. It was arranged through a family friend that Anna Elrod, visiting family friends in Chadron, Nebraska, would come to Douglas to be with Mrs. Morton. Annabelle was the daughter of Thomas Benton and Kathryn Ann (Bowers) Elrod of Loyd and Washington Counties, Indiana. She was born June 10, 1870 and grew up in Indiana.

Jacob's and Anna's first meeting came when he returned from a sheep camp; and they were married October 18, 1898. Their honeymoon was spent in Omaha, and the first part of their married lives was spent in a sheep wagon. Anna often remarked "those were the happiest days of my life."

Anna spent a great deal of time sewing, handstitching the linens in anticipation of the time when they would have a home. In February 1899, Jacob purchased two lots on Center and Sixth Streets and the Jenne home was built at 107 North Sixth. The family can remember large Christmas gatherings — at least three turkeys were roasted for the holidays. Bullberry picking and a picnic along the creeks in Converse County was a treat for young and old alike.

The Jennes loved to travel on vacation. Many of the lovely pieces of furniture, pictures, glassware, china, and bric-a-brac came from the auctions and stores in the various cities they visited.

Jacob built the Jenne Block on Center and Third Streets in Douglas. The basement for the old Douglas Enterprise newspaper was especially built with heavy floors to accommodate the heavy printing presses and other machinery required.

Anna was a hard worker in the Methodist Church — her chicken noodle dinners for church affairs became very well known. She gave unselfishly of both her time and money.

Anna decided to rent out a spare room for $10 per month giving the income to the church. This decision brought Max O. Guthlin into the Jennes life to remain close to their hearts and part of their family his entire life.

Anna and Jake Jenne were active in the affairs of Douglas. In addition to her church work, Anna belonged to the Eastern Star and Afternoon Whist-Bridge Club. On February 16, 1915, Anna was appointed by the Governor of Wyoming as Vice President of Wyoming State Fair for three years — "One of five outstanding women of Wyoming." Jake was president of the Douglas Mercantile Company which literally sold everything from "nuts to bolts." He served as Converse County Commissioner and Councilman for the City of Douglas. He belonged to the Elks, Woodman of the World, and was a Thirty-Second Degree Mason, Royal Arch Mason, and a Shriner. They both enjoyed playing bridge and a night out with the Couples Dinner and Dance Club.

The Jennes family consisted of: Jacob Fred born July 29, 1900 in Douglas; and Kathryn born December 23, 1902 in Douglas. Later, Robert Roderick came to the family (born July 25, 1917) and all three grew up in Douglas and enjoying vacations in sunny California during the winter months. Fred married Lucille Lois Nohe, Kathryn married Dr. Foster Clarke Shaffer, and Robert married Kathryn Rankin.

Both Jacob and Anna became ill in 1935. Anna passed away August 7, and Jacob followed October 15, 1935. They are buried in the family plot in Douglas Park Cemetery.

Anna and Jacob Jenne enjoyed many friends throughout Wyoming, and were, in turn, loved by our Wyoming Pioneers.

Jesurun, Mortimer, M.D.

Among the early settlers and pioneers in Fetterman country was Mortimer Jesurun. He was born on July 18, 1860 on Curacao Island off the north coast of South America where his father was U. S. Consul at the port of Curacao from 1857-1864.

He could trace his ancestry back in an unbroken line to the twelfth century period to a distinguished prime minister of the King of Spain thru his mother Luna Peixotto Jesurun. His father, M. Jesurun, was born in Venezuela, South America.

In 1864 his father made his home in New York City. He became a shipowner and had large shipping interests with which he was identified until his death in 1880.

Dr. Jesurun received his early literary education from special tutors at his own home in New York City, at eleven years going to Germany to continue his studies.

In 1878 he became a resident of Fetterman, Wyoming, and embarked in the stock industry. To this he gave his personal attention and services in the summer seasons, returning to New York for the winters and there devoting himself to the study of medicine at the University of the city of New York, being graduated in March 1892 with the degree of M.D.

Mortimer "Four Eyes" Jesurun, M.D.

The Doctor was one of the original settlers of the Town of Douglas and served as mayor at one time.

During the Spanish American War he served as major chief surgeon of the Second U.S. Volunteer Cavalry under Col. J. L. Torrey and as chief surgeon of the hospital of the Third Division of the Seventh Army Corp. under Gen. Fitzhugh Lee.

On Nov. 7, 1900 he formed the Fetterman Hereford Co. along with Fred W. and Ruby Eva Rimington. The capital was $50,000 with the three being directors. Some of the lands owned were in T. 33, R. 72, Sec. 21, which was bought from Lydia Clelland, wife of Lester Clelland. (These lands were later sold in 1905 to Martin Madsen and is where Dick and Catherine Strock live on LaPrele Creek now). Other lands were T. 37, R. 73, Sec. 22 etc., which were bought from the Rimingtons. (These lands were sold to John T. Williams Sheep and Land Co. for $7,000 in 1909. It is where Walter and Evelyn Reynolds live on Duck Creek now).

On Sunday Feb. 19, 1905 Dr. Jesurun disappeared from sight. He was last seen at the Union Pacific station near Council Bluffs, Iowa after wiring his mother that he was enroute home. Three thousand circulars were distributed around the country with the following description:

"Dr. Mortimer Jesurun is missing from Douglas,

Wyo. was last seen at the U. P. Transfer Depot at Council Bluffs, Iowa. on Sun. Feb. 19, 1905. Is about 48 years old, 5'8", very bald, prominent nose, dark brown eyes, somewhat crooked, wears glasses, wt. 170#, wore #8 shoes, has full short vandike beard, moustache light brown and not very thick, carried his head to one side when walking or talking. His mouth when it can be seen had large gold crowns and bridge work around double teeth. Wore a large emerald ring on third finger of left hand. Wore pair of elk tooth cuff buttons. John Morton and John T. Williams who refer to the 1st National Bank at Douglas will pay $1,000 reward for Dr. Mortimer Jesurun anywhere in U.S.A."

"Bill Barlow's Budget" (later, "The Douglas Budget") made note of Dr. Jesurun's disappearance in its March 12, 1905 issue, as follows:

"Seventeen days have elapsed since Dr. Jesurun of this city dropped out of sight at the U. P. near Council Bluffs, after wiring his mother that he was enroute home. Mr. John Morton, who has spent the past ten days in trying to pick up the trail of the missing man in the vicinity of Omaha returned Monday; but Mr. Williams who left Wed. to assist in the search has gone south in the hope of discovering some clues.

"From the fact that the doctor had plenty of money when he left Douglas and drew an additional $600 on the day he started for home, it is believed that whatever the condition of his mind might have been he knew all the time what he was doing and where he was going, and that he is not likely to ever return. His financial affairs are said to be in bad shape — his debts aggregating near $30,000 which while it does not fully explain, it does tend to throw some light upon his mysterious disappearance."

In the July 1, 1937 issue of the Douglas Budget, the obituary of Mrs. L. P. Jesurun tells of the final chapters of the life of Dr. Jesurun.

"Word has been received here of the death in Los Angeles of Mrs. L. P. Jesurun, who was an early resident of Douglas. Her death recalls a tragic episode in the career of her son, Dr. Mortimer Jesurun.

"Dr. Jesurun was one of the pioneer physicians of Douglas. About 35 years ago he left for the east, ostensibly to raise some money to tide him over an urgent need. He reached Des Moines on this trip and then dropped out of sight. An intensive search was made for him but no trace was found.

"Some years later the secretary of Ashlar Lodge of Masons received a query from Chanute, Kansas, to locate the owner of a Masonic charm that had been found there with Jesurun's name and that of Ashlar Lodge. Jesurun had changed his name and was engaged in the commission business in Chanute. Learning of the finding of the Masonic charm he hurriedly disposed of his business there and disappeared again.

"Nothing further was heard from him by Douglas friends until, about twenty years ago, he appeared in Los Angeles under his own name. he engaged in the drug business in that city and died a few years ago."

Jewell, George A. and Bertha Family

George A. Jewell was born March 4, 1876 in Tucarawas County, Gnadenhutten, Ohio. His wife, Bertha I. Hesket, was born in Missouri, December 18, 1882. They were united in marriage June 23, 1901.

George and Bertha had three children, Faye Jewell, born May 3, 1901, George S. Jewell, nicknamed "Bud", born July 5, 1904 and Margurite Jewell born August 4, 1908. Each of them were born in Brown County, Indiana.

In the spring of 1909, the George Jewell family, including mother, Martha, sister, Ella Thursday Shaffer, a widow and her three sons, went to Mitchell, South Dakota. There they stayed with a brother in a two room apartment until they could find homes of their own. Bud said that ten people in a two room apartment made lots of noise and confusion.

The children started school in South Dakota. It was Bud's first year of school at the age of six and his sister, Faye, was eight and entered the third grade.

George A. Jewell's friend, Clarence Ford, from Indiana, came to Wyoming first and found the land that he wanted to file on as his homestead.

In 1911 George ventured to Douglas, Wyoming to file the claims for himself, his mother, Martha and his sister Ella. After filing, George then returned to his job in Mitchell, South Dakota, because he did not have to establish their residence at the homestead until October. He then returned to Douglas, with his family, his mother, sister and her children. They arrived by train the first part of October, camping at the mouth of Antelope Creek in a tent, below the Northwestern Railroad Bridge in a campground. The Wyoming State Fair was on at that time and the Roosevelt Colored Guard "The Fighting Thirteen" was the main attraction. Bud can remember watching their performance and the fair from a high place close to the tracks.

While camping at Antelope Creek, George hired Zimmerman, who had a team and wagon and was camped at the campground, to move all their household items and enough lumber to build three cabins on Smith Creek. They lived in tents until the cabins were finished.

The first experience that Bud Jewell can remember on the claim, was his encounter with the prickly pear cactus. George's father warned Bud to be careful but Bud and his cousin Arnold were being typical boys and rough housing a bit and Bud tried to escape his cousin and, of course, fell right into the prickly pear cactus. So his father had to spend quite a bit of time pulling the stickers out.

The first cabin to be built by George and Clarence was the one for George's mother. When it was completed, Bertha, Ella, Faye, Margurite and Ella's youngest son, stayed in it. George, his son, his two nephews and Clarence Ford remained in the tent and were welcomed by the first snow storm of the year. They soon learned why you should dig trenches and ditches around your tent. They didn't and the snow melted and got the tent soaking wet, all their bedding and them. They only had an oil cook stove to keep them warm so they spent a very cold, wet night.

George and Clarence built George's cabin next and he and his family moved into it right away and then built

Ella's for her and her boys. Ella continued to stay with her mother until hers was completed.

Ella worked as a cook at the Table Mountain Sheep Ranch that winter, for a short time. Her youngest son stayed with her there, and the two oldest stayed with her mother.

The year 1912 is remembered by Bud Jewell very clearly as he, his father and his sister picked up cow chips for fuel on New Year's Day, and his sister, Faye's comment was that would be how they would spend all their days in the year 1912.

George had to walk to Orin Junction or to Douglas to get any supplies that were needed by their families. Once in a great while he was lucky and caught a ride with a camp mover. When George was not able to go it was up to Bud and Faye to walk to Douglas. One trip, George, Arnold and Edward had to get flour and kerosene. They took the toy wagon to carry the supplies, there were no roads and the trip was rough and the kerosene got on the flour. At the prices of supplies and the hard times, when money was very short, needless to say they were in trouble when they returned home.

George worked on Casper Mountain, building fences on ranches and working for Eastman. He had his nephew, Edward, clearing sagebrush and cutting cottonwood trees. When George returned, he and Clarence Ford planned to use Clarence's horse and a homemade rig of an axle and two buggy wheels to haul the cottonwood from the divide at Herny the Preacher's homestead, but the horse refused to work and the kids had to haul it in their toy wagon.

That fall, George and Clarence found a sheepherder's dog caught in a trap. The sheepherder was there too. He had tried to get the dog released from the trap and had been badly bitten. George managed to get the dog free and then took the sheepherder to Douglas to be treated by the doctor. The sheepherder was so grateful and gave George a mutton to butcher and eat. This was the toughest meat Bud could ever remember eating. That first winter all they had to eat was rabbit. They were plentiful and one time they cooked 25 of them in a week's time. They ate bread and gravy, as eggs and potatoes were too expensive.

On April 15, 1912 Douglas was hit with a treacherous blizzard. George was away working so Edward gathered sagebrush for them to burn. Bud doesn't remember how they kept warm and survived that one. The Table Mountain Sheep Company had their sheep by Ella Shaffer's homestead and the sheep drifted out across the flat and died. This is one of the events that later caused the sheep company to go broke. George returned after the blizzard and skinned sheep for 10¢ a head, until they got too ripe. At this same time, other disasters were happening around the country, the Titanic had gone down. This was also a sad time for the family. Bertha's mother had passed away in South Dakota and she was unable to go because of no money.

That summer George planted a garden at Smith Creek, close to his mother's home. Ella's sons were to care for it while George was away. But being typical boys, they didn't do as they were supposed to and they didn't have much of a crop.

Ella married Ivan Miller who worked at the Table Mountain Sheep Co. They moved into Douglas in the fall. Due to the illness of George's mother, he and Bertha and the children moved in with her. Later they took her to Douglas and admitted her into the hospital. It was then that they discovered she was starting to go blind. After they harvested, they went into town to be near Martha and the children went to school. George worked and bought a team of horses.

The Table Mountain Sheep Co. wanted to get rid of the homesteaders, so they could reclaim their range land. They told Bertha they would pay her and the children's way back to South Dakota for a visit with her family. She took the money and bought tickets for them and they left but George stayed in Wyoming and their plan failed.

Bertha divorced George while she was in South Dakota and worked as a housekeeper to support herself and the children. She then married Henry Sambo. Bud had a very hard time, his life was miserable with a very mean stepfather. In 1917 Bud wrote to his father asking for a train ticket back to Wyoming. Bud returned to Douglas and the girls remained in South Dakota with their mother.

George talked his brother into coming to Wyoming. Edward A. Jewell filed for a homestead and tried farming. They also took land for their son, Robert Jewell, who was in the navy. After serving in WWI, he returned to Douglas and tried farming but this didn't work out. They bought a tractor and would plow for neighboring farmers and ranchers. Edward also worked in the office for an oil company but that also failed. He then ran the Wyoming Hotel that was located just north of the library. Eventually the owners sold the hotel and it was torn down. He went on to manage the apartment house on the corner of Fifth and Walnut. This apartment house has since been moved and is now the Ice Cream Parlor at the Plains Motel complex. Edward died and is buried in the Douglas Cemetery.

They passed a law that year that you could homestead another 320 acres, so George and Ella filed on another 160 acres. He tried to make a living farming potatoes, but due to the dry weather condition, it wasn't a very good crop.

In 1917 when Bud returned to Wyoming, his father did raise a fair crop of potatoes. They cut their grain late in the season and took it to Shawnee to the elevator to sell. George never invested in livestock, except for horses. In 1919 there was an April blizzard. It snowed for five days and nights. George had four horses at that time. He fed them every day but the weather conditions were so severe that three of his horses died. He purchased another team. That summer, George's mother passed away at the age of 72. She was buried in the Douglas Cemetery. The records have since been lost and no one knows where her grave is located.

The fall of 1922 George and Bud dug potatoes, then Bud left to work for Ed Fenneman building fences. He went to work for the county building a bridge for a few days, then left for Nebraska, working for a rancher during the summer and later worked for the Coffee Cattle Co.

In the year 1924 Bud came back to Douglas and worked the winter. He wrecked his car before Christmas and spent the holidays in the Douglas hospital. He spent nine days there. He later went to work for Cakebread at Orin Junction, building a water wheel and then he went back to Nebraska. He stayed for a short period of time and came back to the Platte Valley Co. He worked there for a short time, quit and went to Montana but didn't stay there very long before he left and went back to the Platte Valley Ranch where he finally stayed for two years. He later went to Pinedale, Wyoming and worked on a dam until the fall. He went to Idaho to dig potatoes then to Nebraska to shuck corn. He finally went back to work for the Platte Valley Ranch Co.

George, in the meantime, stayed on the homestead and tried to farm it. It didn't do any good so he went to work on an oil well for Cortane, as a night watchman, but never did get paid. He lost part of the land at this time due to failure to pay the mortgage.

In the year 1931 Bud met his wife to be, Pearl Kindig, at the Platte Valley Ranch. She was from Nebraska. Pearl was with her sister on their way to the state of California. After meeting Bud that night she told everyone that she was staying to marry Bud, which they thought was a big joke, as Bud was 27 and a confirmed bachelor. Bud and Pearl were married March 2, 1932 in Gering, Nebraska. They had two children, Mary Louise and Patricia Ann.

In 1933 George had a good crop of potatoes on his place. Bud went to work for the government on the WPA for a couple of years. They did work on the highways and different government projects.

In 1936 Bud went to work for the Stanolind Pipe Line Co. at the Clayton Tank Farm by Glenrock, Wyoming.

In 1938 George ran a filling station at Torrence's. The guy who owned it died and it was put up for sale. George bought 40 acres of land outside of Douglas and built his own station which he ran until he died.

This same year Bud was laid off from the pipeline. He and his family moved to Mitchell, Nebraska for a short time. He went to work in Fort Laramie, then they called him for work near Douglas that fall on the river crossing, but he was laid off again in November. In March they called him back and he stayed with them until he retired. George died in February 1948. He was known by all as the fiddler who danced a jig. He entertained his customers. After his death, Bud sold the station building and the gas pumps but still owns the 40 acres.

In 1950 Bud and his daughter Patricia built a house, shed and garage on his father's land.

In 1958 Bud was transferred to Kirby, Wyoming for eleven months and then to Casper where Pearl worked at the Ben Franklin store for ten years. Bud slipped on a fire wall while gauging tanks and was off for eleven weeks during the winter time. He spent several days in the hospital.

Bud retired November 1, 1965 after 29 years, three months service. They stayed in Casper until 1968 and then moved back to Douglas to make their home.

Bud's mother Bertha passed away in Mill Port, New York in 1970. She was 88 years old.

On March 2, 1982 Bud and Pearl celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary with a big get together with family and friends.

Pearl passed away after a very short illness on October 5, 1983. Bud's daughter, Mary Louise is married to Don Henry and has six grown and married children and six grandchildren. Patricia Ann is married to Jack Garner and has three children and two grandchildren. Mary Louise lives at Commerce City, Colorado and Pat lives in Casper, Wyoming.

Bud died on July 20, 1985.

His sister Faye is a retired school teacher and lives in Sanford, Florida. His sister Margurite passed away in Florida and is buried there.

Johnson, A. "Humpy" and Caroline

Alexander Gus "Humpy" Johnson came to the United States from Sweden at the age of 12, in search of his brother, whom he was unable to locate. Gus had been born in Falun, Sweden in 1874.

Gus first located in the Bates Hole country, prior to coming to Douglas in 1900. He was employed as a freight wagon driver on a route between Douglas and Gillette for a time after his arrival. Later he worked for John Morton, and still later, he acted as foreman for the John Flynn Sheep Company. It was said of Gus that he could shear 200 sheep in one day.

In 1903, Gus went to Chicago where he met and married Caroline A. Anderson. With his wife, he returned to Douglas. There were four children born to this union, two boys and two girls. Three of the children died in infancy, but the fourth, Esther, survived.

Gus' first homestead, which was located west of Douglas, is now owed by the Rothleutners. He sold this homestead in 1916, after which he and his family returned to Sweden. Mine sweepers preceded the vessel on which the Johnson family sailed, pushing mines out of the path of the ship, since the first World War had begun.

The Johnsons remained in Sweden for a year, where Gus was involved in settling an estate. They returned to the United States in 1917.

Gus, or "Humpy", as some folks called him, intended to remain on the East coast, but for some unknown reason, he returned to Douglas with his family, and once more, took a homestead west of Douglas.

In the middle twenties, he sold his homestead and moved to town where he eventually became a director in the First National Bank.

At the time of Gus' death in 1947, he had one grandson, the only child of Esther E. Johnson and Lloyd Bruegeman. Since then, Benjamin W. Bruegeman has been born. He is the son of Harold, Gus' grandson. These descendants of Alexander Johnson reside in the city of Douglas, Wyoming.

Johnson, Carl and Alice Nason Family

Isaac Newton Nason, a farmer of French Canadian ancestry, was born November 18, 1852. Mary Alice Hahn Nason, of Dutch extraction, was born February 11, 1860. Both Isaac and Mary Alice were born in Pennsylvania, grew to adulthood and were married there on January 23, 1876. They migrated to Nebraska to engage in farming shortly after their marriage.

To this union eight children were born, two of whom died before reaching maturity. Alice Lorena, born in Marquette, Hamilton County, Nebraska on October 16, 1878, was the second child in the family. Alice received her common school education in Hamilton County. Alice and her older sister were obliged to work in the fields with their father, using oxen to plow and plant the crops. They were accustomed to hard manual labor.

Alice was married for the first time to a Nebraska farmer, Henry Johnson. Henry was born in Nebraska in 1868, of Swedish ancestry. He was a veteran of the Spanish American War and died in 1914 after a lengthy period of ill health, a result of disabilities suffered in the service. Alice and Henry were the parents of one daughter, Lorena, born in Nebraska in 1911.

In 1915 Isaac brought his wife and children to Wyoming to find land to homestead. His widowed daughter, Alice, and her four-year-old child accompanied them. The trip was made in emigrant cars, filled with household goods, furniture, farm animals, farming equipment and tools. An employee of Mr. Nason, Carl Johnson, came with the family. He, too, sought a homestead claim.

Carl Johnson, born in Nebraska, was no relation to Henry Johnson. His parents were Danish immigrants whose name was Jensen. For some reason they changed the spelling of the name to Johnson. Carl was one of four children, three boys and a girl. At the time of their arrival in Wyoming, Carl and Alice had fallen in love with one another. They filed on adjoining homesteads north of Shawnee and were married in 1916 in Douglas, Wyoming.

The Johnsons raised hogs, a few cattle and farmed to make a living. They milked cows and sold cream to earn enough to buy staple groceries. Each of them filed on additional homesteads. They worked long, hard hours, managing to wrest from the land a meager living.

Alice gave birth to her second daughter, Florence, on

April 7, 1918. Lorena, Alice's older daughter, spent much of her early life living with her grandmother and grandfather on their farm south of Shawnee. Florence, however, lived with her parents on the homestead, and from the time she was old enough to perform small tasks, she was required to work.

In 1924 Carl, hoping to improve the quality of his life and that of his family, decided to enroll in the Sweeney Automobile Mechanic's School which was located in Kansas City, Missouri. He was there only a short time when he contracted scarlet fever which took his life. He was buried in Aurora, Nebraska the same year.

Now Alice was faced with a choice. She could give up the homestead, or continue to operate alone with the help of her six year old daughter. She chose to do the latter.

Mrs. Johnson was a short woman, about 5'2" tall of medium build. Though cumbersome for field work, she always wore dresses or skirts. She was well versed in all aspects of farming, having done a man's work from the time she was old enough to do so. After Carl's death, she planted and harvested her crops and tended her stock with little or no help. Stockmen who owned large numbers of cattle or sheep and who had used the open range for years, resented all homesteaders but made it particularly difficult for a widow. Alice became a hard-shelled woman, always on the defensive, fighting to protect her rights and her property. She sacrificed her comfort and that of her daughter, Florence, in order to save money to buy up parcels of land belonging to other homesteaders who left the area to seek a more profitable and more comfortable way to make a living. Some of the land she bought for as little as 50¢ per acre.

Alice was a rigid disciplinarian, restricting the activities of her daughter to helping work the ranch. The only respite Florence enjoyed were the months in which she attended school in Shawnee. Florence aspired to go to secretarial school after her graduation but her dream was never realized.

At the age of twelve, Florence spent much of her time herding sheep for her mother, staying away from home for days at a time. Her mother bought a .25 automatic pistol for Florence to protect herself against two or four-legged varmints. It was a lonely, hard life for a young girl.

Alice had few close friends except the Spencer Moore family. She had neither the time nor the energy to go visiting, nor was she receptive to callers at her home.

Florence and her half-sister, Lorena, graduated from the Shawnee High School; Lorene graduated in 1928, Florence in 1935. In 1937 Florence was united in marriage to Leonard Eddy in Hot Springs, South Dakota. After their marriage, they returned to her mother's home where they worked for Alice. Leonard and Florence were the parents of two children, Carol Marie and Joseph Carl.

In 1945, Florence's aunt on her father's side, Caroline Johnson, died, leaving her niece $5,000. With this money, Florence arranged to buy the ranch from her mother. Leonard worked part of the time on the ranch and part of the time as a section hand on the railroad.

Alice's health finally failed in 1951 when she suffered a stroke and was confined for six months in the hospital in Douglas before she died. She is buried in the Douglas cemetery.

When Carol was ready for high school, Florence bought a house in Douglas and found employment at the Kandy Koop. She kept her small herd of cattle, but she and Leonard leased out the rest of the ranch land. On weekends and holidays, Florence worked at the ranch, keeping the fences repaired and the windmills in working order.

In 1959 Florence's marriage ended in divorce. She managed to keep her ranch and give her children an education. Leonard died in 1971.

Florence improved the quality of her cattle over the years and, in addition, started her herd of fine registered Appaloosa horses. In 1979 she sold all but three sections of her land and most of her cattle, but she kept her beloved horses. She has been very successful with them, winning many trophies and much recognition.

Florence's home, the Whispering Pines, is situated among the pines along Shawnee Creek north of Shawnee, where she lives alone. Though her life has not been easy, she has been successful due to much hard work, always being a conscientious caretaker of her land.

Florence has four grandchildren, Robert Lee, Dena Kay, and David Joe Russell and Dana Marie Eddy and two step-grandchildren, Fred and Sandy Sickler and three great grandchildren.

Johnson, Jake and Iva

Jake Johnson and his wife, Iva, came to Douglas, Wyoming in December of 1944 when they purchased the part of the old Fiddleback Ranch owned by Carroll Mohr, 26 miles north of Douglas, Wyoming.

Jake was an early day cowboy on the roundup wagons having started his roundup days at the early age of 14. He was no stranger to Douglas as his father, K. T. Johnson, had bought cattle from Billy Irvine on the old Ogalalla Ranch, about 65 miles northwest of Douglas in 1898. It was at that time that his father had the "mess box" built for Jake to carry on the back of his roundup wagon which held his supply of groceries, or "grub" as it was called in those days. Jake and his cowboys trailed the steers to Gillette where they were loaded onto railroad cars and shipped to Antioch, Nebraska. At the same time Jake was on his way with his "outfit" across Wyoming to Antioch. He was there waiting when the steers arrived. They trailed the cattle from Antioch to K. T. Johnson's ranch northwest of Cody, Nebraska. That same ranch was later the first home of Jake and Iva Johnson.

The area around Douglas must never have left Jake's mind as a good many pictures of the State Fair were found among his possessions after his death. At one time he retired to the Valley of Texas but he was too restless for that so he began to look for a ranch where there would be less work to raise good cattle and some registered quarter horses. There would be less hay to put up in Wyoming and there would be less hay to have to be fed out in the winter months as Jake knew the grass was a "stronger" grass. So Jake left Texas and started looking around in Wyoming for that ranch where he could raise cattle and horses. The part of the old Fiddleback seemed to fit his plans so he purchased it.

Jake was a charter member of the Tri-State Old Time Cowboy's Association composed of cowboys from Wyoming, Nebraska and South Dakota. After he became acquainted he persuaded some of his friends to join the group. They were: Joe Reynolds, Ralph Scott, Jack Esau and Ross Barnes of Douglas and Peach Shaw of Jay Em, Wyoming. Each year Jake looked forward to being with his old friends and visiting about the old Roundup Days.

Jake's parents both came from Norway at the age of sixteen. Both of their families homesteaded in Iowa where they met each other. They were married at Marion, Iowa and later came west and homesteaded three miles north of Rushville, Nebraska, where Jake grew up.

Iva's parents came from Kansas and located three miles south of Pine Ridge, South Dakota. Even though Rushville and Pine Ridge are only 23 miles apart it was in the Sandhills of Nebraska and South Dakota where Jake and Iva met each other after they had grown up.

Jake and Iva were married on June 1, 1913 in the Sacristy of St. Francis Mission, a few miles south of Rosebud Agency, South Dakota where Jake had done a lot of his "cowboying" on the Roundup Wagons.

They had four children, Clara Eldean, born June 6, 1914. She married Clifford Thorberg and lived on Jake's ranch north of Douglas in 1944 until Jake could get all of his cattle, horses, machinery and household items moved up from his ranch north of Cody, Nebraska. Eldean passed away in April 1967 at the age of 52.

The second daughter, Pearl, was born November 29, 1915 at their ranch northwest of Cody, Nebraska. She married Frank Eathorne and still lives at Douglas, Wyoming.

Their only son, Samuel Lee, "Bud" was born August 22, 1920 in Gordon, Nebraska. He married Dorothy Robbins from the Boxelder area after his return from the service in the air force. Bud and his father operated the ranch north of Douglas but he only lived three months after his father, passing away at the early age of 53 in December of 1973.

"Bud" had four children. Charles Jake Johnson still lives at Douglas. A daughter, Marlene, lives at Billings, Montana and a daughter, Dorothy Lee, who is married to Larry Abbott lives at Sidney, Montana. His son, Mike, works for W. A. Stoddard, north of Lusk, Wyoming.

Jake and Iva's youngest daughter, Opal Lorraine, was born at Valentine, Nebraska on July 7, 1923. She married John R. Janelle and lives in Aurora, Colorado. They have three sons and two daughters, none of whom live in Wyoming.

Jake Johnson passed away on September 10, 1973 at the age of 89. Iva passed away December 28, 1983.

John Federle, owner of the sale ring in Douglas, Wyoming published the following article in the "Livestock Market Digest" after Jake's death.

"The Cattle Industry lost a 4-square pioneer recently with the death of Douglas rancher, Jake Johnson. A very good friend of mine. Some of my fondest memories of Jake are the hair-raising rides he and I took across the prairies in his mechanical old "Ford Horse" mixed in with some pleasant hours of just sittin' and talkin'. He was one of the old-time breed of REAL MEN. Outspoken, but 100 percent honest and sincere."

Johnson, Millard and Caroline

Millard Johnson, born on January 12, 1870 in Crawfordville, and Caroline Johnson, born in 1880, came to Douglas from Nebraska in 1918. They owned and operated the only dairy in Douglas (located north of town) at that time. They lived in the north end of town, on Fourth Street. The Johnsons ran their milk route making the deliveries in a horse drawn cart.

After two years in this location they moved two and a half miles west of Douglas. There was a large barn located on the Johnson Farm. Many dances were held here. The Tom Hunters later acquired the ranch.

After Millard's death and burial in Douglas in 1927, Caroline and her eldest son, Marshall, continued the dairy operation until 1936.

Marshall married Doris L. Fiddymont on January 1, 1934 in Hot Springs South Dakota. Their children are Sharlene, Carol, Gail and Stephen.

Caroline passed away in 1969 in Yuba City, California at the age of 89. She was living with the Marshall Johnson family at the time.

Daniel Kirk, Marshall's only brother, was born in 1918. He died in 1978, leaving no descendants.

Johnson, Swan and Hazel Family

Swan P. Johnson (Sven Patrick Johansson) was the third child of Johan Eelof Johansson and Sofia Persdotter Johansson of Falkenburg, Sweden. He was born in 1886, receiving his education in Falkenburg. He immigrated to the United States at the age of 17 in the company of his brother, Oscar. The brothers parted company, however, Oscar going to Minneapolis and Swan going to Boston. There he spent his first winter milking cows, bottling milk and doing barn chores. The following spring, the Phelan Lumber Yard, located in Omaha, Nebraska, was searching for workers of either Swedish or Norwegian descent. Swan left Boston, traveling on an emigrant train. He went to work for Mr. Phelan upon his arrival in Omaha. He lived in a small room at the end of a building owned by Phelan, taking his meals with the Phelan family. At the end of his first month's work, the train fare from Boston to Omaha, as well as his board was deducted from his wages. Swan continued to work for the lumber yard for a period of ten years.

Leaving the lumber yard, he worked on a farm for a year, and then rented a small farm at Benson, Nebraska. He farmed, kept a few cows and some chickens. He sold cream and eggs, and in addition, cut and sold firewood during the fall and winter months.

On March 30, 1918, he enlisted in the armed forces to serve in World War I. He was sent overseas, to serve in both France and in Germany. Upon his return to the United States, he was sent to Kansas where he was honorably discharged in 1919.

Swan received his citizenship papers on May 9, 1918, at the age of 32. It is probable that the spelling of his name was changed at that time.

Swan came west to Douglas, Wyoming where he was employed by an oil company engaged in drilling south of Douglas, near Irvine. He became acquainted with some Swedish families, the Carlsons and the Humpy Johnsons. It was during this time that he learned that land was available for those who wished to homestead. As a result, he filed on land 45 miles northwest of Douglas on the Cheyenne River.

To stock his homestead, Swan purchased some Hereford cattle, eleven cows and a bull from Humpy Johnson's daughter, Esther. He was also able to buy Esther's brand, the "Sheep Shears."

In 1924 Swan Johnson and Hazel Scott were married in Council Bluffs, Iowa. Hazel, daughter of Arthur and Mary Scott, lived with her family on a homestead about two miles south of Swan's. Hazel was a member of a family of nine children. She received part of her elementary education at home, with her mother acting as teacher. Later she was enrolled in a school in which Angeline Tillard taught. Six of the Scott children attended this school besides the children of neighbors. Hazel had met Swan Johnson but had not dated him since at that time young folks went in groups to parties and dances, not just couples.

In the summer of 1923, on July 4th, a large group of neighbors were gathered at a lake for a picnic and swimming party. The party broke up when the clouds began to gather and threaten rain. The group decided to go to Mrs. Huff's home, less than a mile away. Some of the people had come on foot to the gathering, but the Scotts had come on a hay wagon. Just as the Scott wagon was about to depart, lightning struck, killing Art Scott, Hazel's father and Harry Stone, Mrs. Huff's son. Two of Hazel's sisters, already on the wagon, had the hair burned off their heads on one side. Hazel, who was at the rear of the hayrack suffered only a "flash burn" which ran down the side of her body and one leg.

Art Scott's body was returned to the cemetery at Avoca, Iowa, for interment. After the services, a disheartened, dejected Mary decided that she should move back to Iowa to live. In September of 1923, Mary Scott sold everything she owned in Wyoming except her land and returned to Avoca.

The following year, Swan shipped his cattle to Omaha to sell and afterward came over to Avoca to claim Hazel as his bride. They returned to Douglas by train, the trip lasting about two days. They laid in a supply of groceries and engaged a friend to drive them out to Swan's homestead. So began the married life of Swan and Hazel Johnson.

In the later part of September that first year, a group of neighbors took five wagons to Antelope Creek to get coal for the coming winter. They had black powder, fuses and a hand auger with which they gained access to coal located in the creek bank. They camped there for the night, returning home with their loads the following day. The coal had to be kept in a cave to prevent it from slacking.

Hazel and Swan needed a barn for their milk cow and horses. They hauled flat rocks for a foundation, sawed dead cottonwood trees which they used for the walls. For the roof, they used poles. Chinking was easy to make, using gumbo mud and grass mixed together. In this fashion, they constructed serviceable shelter for their animals, at very little expense.

All the wives of the homesteaders baked their bread using what was called a "starter". If the starter went flat, the bread would not rise. When this occurred, the housewife must go off to a neighboring lady and borrow a "start".

Hazel learned to milk the day that Swan handed her the milk bucket, telling her to milk the cow or go without. Hazel milked! They also had a dozen chickens so their eggs, milk, butter and cream were produced on the homestead.

In their first home, the Johnsons had only two small rooms--a kitchen and a bedroom. Their furniture consisted of a homemade table and one chair, a bed and an ancient cookstove. Someone gave them another chair and a rocker later on. The bed was very narrow for two people, but there were two mattresses on it, one narrow and one wide. The wide one hung over the side of the bed. When Hazel was pregnant she placed an apple box at the head and foot of the bed with a plank laid across the boxes. This arrangement held up the large mattress and made sleeping much more comfortable.

It was a red letter day when Hazel got her wash boiler. Prior to that time, she had only a wash tub and a washboard. She had ordered a boiler from the catalog. The Johnsons had to go about four miles for their mail, sometimes making the trip in the wagon and sometimes horseback. The day the boiler arrived, Hazel had gone for the mail on horseback. Her horse objected to carrying the boiler and Hazel besides, so she finally walked home, leading the horse with the shiny new boiler tied on the saddle.

When her first child, Ruth, was born on December 4, 1925, Hazel had to make a bed in a trunk for the infant. She fashioned a big pillow to serve as a mattress; she hemmed flour sacks for diapers; thin underwear was used to make baby shirts; and she gave up one of her few slips to make little dresses. Trips to town were few and made only when absolutely necessary.

Finally, the Johnsons had made enough improvements on the homestead so that they could make their final proof on the land. They had increased their herd of cattle. They raised a larger garden than they had previously, and Hazel was able to can vegetables for the winter months.

Swan and Hazel bought her mother's homestead and in addition, purchased three more sections of land from a man named Amos Stone. The house on the Stone land was a nice big house with three bedrooms, a big living room, kitchen and a bathroom (which was empty of bath fixtures and plumbing). In the basement of the house was a washing machine. It was made of wood with a handle, which, when pushed back and forth, caused the dasher in the tub to go up and down. It was hard work, but a fine improvement over the washboard.

Then came the days of drought and depression. The drought caused the water level to drop in the water wells. Two big lakes on the Johnson's property went dry. The stock had to be moved to winter pasture along the river where they could be turned to water at a big spring once a day. The river was no longer running and the only water available was at the springs. Swan finally had to go to work for the WPA, helping to build stockwater dams in order to make a living.

Under another government program, the Johnsons sold three sections of land to the government with the understanding that they could lease the land back from the government. It was supposed to be cheaper to lease the land than it was to own it. Under the program the owners were to move all buildings off. Two of the sections which Swan sold were given to others, but Swan was allowed to have the third. This was a severe setback to his operation. The government also bought cattle and hogs from the Johnsons, who were obliged to sell lest the animals die of starvation.

When he sold the land to the government, Swan had moved the big house back to his original homestead, and located it in a hollow south of the river. It was a monumental job to move a house of that size. It required the use of eight head of horses, a tractor, and a school bus to accomplish the task. At the new location, water was no problem due to the fact that the well that Swan had drilled proved to be an artesian well, flowing at the rate of six gallons per minute. Now it was possible to have plumbing in the house. Johnsons drilled three more wells for water for the stock. These wells, also, proved to be artesian. Swan constructed dikes near each well to hold the water.

During the years which followed, the Johnsons were able to make improvements on their land, establish hay meadows and increase their numbers of livestock. Besides their cattle, they had a small bunch of sheep.

The Johnsons decided to take a trip back to Sweden to Swan's homeland in 1949. The arrangements were made, the passports in order and Swan and Hazel looked forward with enthusiasm to the trip. The trip was never made however, because Swan had to have surgery and died the very day they were to leave.

Hazel continued to run the place until 1953. At that time she decided to sell and divide the proceeds with her children. She later moved into Douglas to live. In 1957 she was married to Clyde Reeves. Six years later, Clyde died. Since then, Hazel has continued to make her home in Douglas. She has busied herself with the activities of the Senior Citizen's Organization.

Ruth, the eldest child of Swan and Hazel Johnson, was born in 1925 at the home of Doctor and Mrs. H. G. Lynch in Dry Creek, Wyoming. She received her education in the Dry Creek Community. During the last two years of her high school she attended the Converse County High School in Douglas. After her graduation in 1944, she accompanied June Pellatz to Carlsbad, New Mexico to attend the ceremony in which Lincoln Pellatz was awarded his Air Force Wings. Lincoln and Ruth were married in 1944. He was stationed both in California and in Nevada. Ruth accompanied him to these states, but returned home when he was sent overseas. Then she was employed at the Prisoner of War Camp located west of Douglas. The couple has three children.

Frances Johnson was born July 29, 1929 in Douglas. She was the second daughter of the Johnsons and received her education in the Verse school, later the Dry Creek school and finally in the Converse County High School during her final two years. After graduation she was employed by the Douglas Budget for a time and later by Mountain Bell Telephone Company. In 1948 she married Edwin Tschacher of Manville, Wyoming. To this couple seven children were born.

Elsie Irene Johnson was born in 1932 at the family home on the Cheyenne River. She attended the Dry Creek school for ten years, finishing her high school in Douglas. She was married to Billy Miller in 1951, and to this union, two children were born. Bill died in 1975, but Elsie continued living on their ranch located near Guernsey where she and her son are engaged in raising cattle.

Ida Mae Johnson was born in 1940 in the old Douglas Hospital. She weighed only 3 lbs. 11 oz. at birth and spent the first three months of her life in an incubator. As did the other children, she received her common schooling at Dry Creek, later entering the high school in Douglas. Ida is the mother of five children. Her present husband, Robert Fowlkes, comes from Hulett, Wyoming. He is employed as an oil field technician for Nucorp Energy in Douglas.

One son, Daniel Eugene, died in infancy in 1936. Another son, John Donald, passed away as a result of an accident.

Johnstone, Dave

David Johnstone was born in Freelon, Wentworth Township, Ontario, Canada in 1890, one of two sons belonging to John R. Johnstone and Hannah Brown Johnstone. David's brother, Gordon, was born there in 1888.

John R. Johnstone, son of William and Mary Johnstone, was born in Freelon in 1859. He was the eldest child in a large family, having six sisters and one brother.

Hannah, David's mother, was born on a farm half a mile from the town in 1864. She was the fourth child in a family of five born to David and Rosalie Brown. Grandmother Rosalie passed away before either Gordon or David was born and Hannah was in charge of the home after Rosalie's death until she married John Johnstone. Grandfather David married his first wife's sister, Millie, becoming David's step-grandmother.

Miss Elizabeth Dickson, a registered nurse, had owned the Douglas Hospital since November 1903. In 1908 Miss Dickson engaged the services of another nurse from the Chicago area to come to tend the hospital while she went on a much-needed vacation. This nurse, Janet Adams, was one of three girls who trained and graduated in the class of 1902 from the Presbyterian and Cook County Hospitals in Chicago. The other two girls were Mary Brown and Grace Galbraith. Mary Brown was the younger sister of Hannah Brown Johnstone.

An article from the "Douglas Budget" on November 3, 1903 states the following about Miss Dickson's new hospital. "Miss Dickson's rates are as reasonable as obtained in any similar institution anywhere. She issues certificates to those who desire them at $15 which entitles the holder to 25 weeks care, including board, room nurse, medicines and the attendance of a physician, during the year for which the same is issued. A payment of $10 covers a term of six months and a twelve weeks stay in the hospital as above. Parties who do not hold certificates are charged by the week during their stay and may be attended by any reputable physician they choose to call in."

In the fall of 1908 Hannah moved to Douglas, Wyoming with her sons, summoned there by Mary Brown and Grace Galbraith. Together, Mary and Grace had purchased the Douglas Hospital from Miss Dickson. Hannah was to hold the position of manager of the establishment.

The hospital was located about a block and one half north of Center Street on Sixth. Across the street to the east was the Douglas School. It combined both elementary and high school grades. Close by was the home of Tom Rowley and the fine brick home of John T. Williams, stockman and banker.

The hospital had a four bed ward on the first floor as well as two rooms for the nurses. The staff slept on the second floor. Staff and nurses alike worked and ate their meals together.

Many doctors had practiced in the Douglas area prior to 1908, namely Doctors Jesurun, Wilson and Bodine. After 1908, Doctors Cantril, Pestel, Hylton, Storey and Keller practiced. A few nurses I remember well were Mrs. Frank Paul, nee Miss Larr, Mrs. Gus Nylen, nee Clanahan, and Mrs. LeRoy Moore. The citizens were blessed with good doctors and nurses. Patients came to Douglas for hospitalization from as far east as Chadron, Nebraska and as far west as Lander, Wyoming. Those having access to the railroad came in by train, but most of the patients arrived by horseback or in a buckboard. Persons who anticipated an operation, or expected a baby, would rent a room in the hospital well in advance of their confinement. Among the notable persons who died in the hospital was the infamous George W. Pike.

It was the custom for the engine crew on the railroad to stop at Orin Junction to have their noon meal. Once, a young man who was subject to epileptic seizures was walking along the track. He had a seizure directly below the steam blow-off valve. The crew, finished with their meal, returned to the engine where they blew off the condensed water and steam. Later, they found the man badly scalded. He was rushed to the hospital where the staff treated him, constructing a frame to hold the bedding off his raw flesh. The man survived and later the doctors performed skin grafts.

Many accident cases and illnesses of all kinds were treated at the hospital. Once, during a period of severe drought in which the springs, streams and water holes became stagnant, there was an outbreak of typhoid fever, and on another occasion, there was an epidemic of measles.

The "house of ill repute" in Douglas was owned and operated by Maggie Wheelock. One of Maggie's "girls" was a patient in the hospital for several days. Her bill amounted to $80.00. When Maggie came to take the girl home, she opened her purse and counted out 80 silver dollars, a small fortune in those days.

Maggie enjoyed driving in the country on fine days. She and her female driver once visited a homestead which belonged to the family of a child who was quite ill. Maggie had learned that the family could not afford to have the doctor come to the homestead. When Maggie returned to Douglas after her visit, she instructed the doctor to make the call at her expense.

David's education had been interrupted for about five years after he had completed his eighth year in school in Canada. After his arrival in Douglas, he enrolled in school in 1910, graduating in the class of 1913. Since he had been out of school for such a long time, he was considerably older than his classmates. This accounts for the fact that by the time he had completed high school, he had become a naturalized citizen and had proved up on 160 acres of land as well.

David's homestead property was located south of Douglas. The government offered two options to the homesteader. He could build a cabin and establish residence for at least six months of each year for a period of three years or he could build a cabin and establish residence for twelve consecutive months, plow up 20 acres of prairie land and, in addition, pay a fee of $200. David chose the latter option. He built a 14 by 14 foot shack with shanty Irish roof. On the outside, he put narrow strips of wood (battling) over the cracks between the sheeting and on the inside he insulated with five thicknesses of "Denver Post" newspaper. He had one four-pane window besides the door. David laid a wooden floor in his house and for heat, he used a small sheep wagon stove. It was really quite comfortable.

It had been David's dream to attend Ontario Agricultural College in Canada and it was toward this end that he spent his time doing any sort of work he could find. He worked as a shepherd, helped shear, lamb, and so forth. He was employed at Nowood, a ranch at the foot of the Big Horn Mountains, building an earthen dam. Here he worked a team on a wheel scraper. He had jobs as far west as Nowood and Shoshoni, Casper, Moneta, and Lost Cabin. At one time he even found work running a washing machine of the push-pull type for the wife of a Mexican bartender in Lost Cabin.

Finally, he had saved enough money to enroll in the Agricultural College. In the fall of 1914, he returned to Douglas where he bade his mother and brother farewell before he left.

Eventually, David returned to Wyoming. His life was full of interesting events. He met the challenges of each day with vigor and always maintained a fine sense of humor. David worked hard to achieve the goals which he set for himself and was successful.

Hannah married Frank Virden in 1916. David was married to Rose Fitzhugh first, then to Mrs. Newt Wilkinson. He lives today in Ft. Collins, Colorado.

Keenan, Henry and Goldie Family

Just 64 years ago this month, March 20, 1920, my family and I came to Wyoming to make our home. I was a six-month old baby and my brother, Bob, was two and one-half years old. My dad had come up here from Nebraska a few months before and built a one-room shack on his homestead, which is about 10 miles north-east of Glenrock. In the spring he loaded his two horses, one cow, a few chickens, his wagon, an old walking plow and a few odds and ends in an emigrant car at the railroad in Lewellen, Nebraska and headed for Wyoming. He put us two boys and my mother on the passenger train, our destination "Glenrock". Somehow the railroad raised the fee on the emigrant car and Dad either didn't have the extra money or his Irish temper took over and he wouldn't pay it, so the railroad just put him off on the siding, till he had to change his mind. When Mom got off at the Glenrock depot there was no one there to meet her and she didn't know what had happened to Dad. She asked around and finally another homesteader by the name of John Welty said he thought he knew where Dad's homestead was and offered to take her there.

Henry and Goldie Keenan farming in the Nebraska sandhills just before coming to their Wyoming homestead, about 1917.

Bob, Betty, Joe and Dick Keenan on homestead shack porch, 1927.

When Mom arrived at her new "home" there were no groceries, no water, no fuel, no nothing and Welty saw he couldn't leave her and her two small kids there all alone, so he took us over to another neighbor's place, (Sophia Negley), which is about two miles farther east. We stayed there with the Negleys till Dad finally paid the difference on the emigrant car and showed up a few days later. That is how we started our life in Wyoming.

When Dad helped build "The Dry Farm" school house, he told his neighbors that although he didn't mind helping build the school his kids would never go there, cause he was going back to the sandhills of Nebraska cause he sure as hell didn't like it up here in Wyoming. Well, us kids all went to that little old school house and Bob and I graduated from the 8th grade there. When Dad died on Jan. 30, 1972 just four days short of his 78th birthday, he was the only homesteader in this area who was still living on his original homestead.

The big cowmen and sheepmen hated the fences the homesteaders put up. Dad and one of R. D. Carey's cow foremen got into an argument about them one day and Dad told him that he would be damn glad when there were a lot more fences around. The foreman asked him what he would do for meat when Carey's cattle weren't around and Dad told him, "I haven't eaten any of your cattle yet." "Well what do you do for meat then?" the cowboy asked. "I eat pork if I got it and if I don't have it I go without," my dad replied.

We used to have a lot of real bad spring storms in those days and Bob tells us about one day in early May when a neighbor, by the name of Ralph Lepper, brought over some cottonwood trees he had dug up down by the Platte River (they were the first trees on this place). It was pretty late when he finally got ready to go home so Dad said, "Why don't you just stay all night and go home in the morning", so Ralph agreed. That night came one of those spring blizzards and Bob said it snowed and blew so hard that the next morning there was a drift as high as the house and he and I were walking up the drift and standing on top of our little house. After breakfast when Ralph got ready to go home his horses wouldn't even pull his wagon out of the drift and they either had to shovel it out or Dad had to hitch his team "Charley and Roamie" up and pull him out.

The CY Ranch had turned their cows and calves out in this north country already and they died by the hundreds. Bob said everywhere you looked there were dead cattle. The cows, in their weakened condition, died first and the little calves would nurse on their dead mothers till they also died. A lot of cattle died that spring.

My younger brother, Dick, was born out at our homestead on July 9, 1922. Our sister, Betty, was also born here on January 24, 1926. Pauline Swisher, my first grade teacher, was boarding here when Betty was born and she stayed with Mom while Dad jumped in his old Model T. Ford and hurried to Glenrock to get Dr. Leonard Tabor. We were probably a little late for school that day.

In those days there were just wagon trails around the country and the old road from the Hyland country up north went right by our barn and angled through our corn field. Dad always had shocks of corn fodder there and he said once in awhile he could see where some homesteader would help himself to a couple of bundles of corn fodder to feed his horses while he was doing business in town.

There were about six or eight gates to open to get to town, which wasn't too bad when you drove a team. You just got out and opened the gate and the team would walk through and you would close the gate without getting back in the wagon. But when Dad got his first Model T. Ford in 1923 for the sum of $25.00 it didn't have an emergency brake on it and you had to shut it off and put it in gear so it wouldn't run through the gate. Then you had to crank it up again to get through and shut it off again to close the gate. Quite a complicated process when you were by yourself that took a lot of time. Dad worked in town a lot, mostly at the refineries, and had to make the trip twice a day, so he got two of his neighbors, Seth Negley and Frank Shockey to help him build a sort of a graded road and put in car gates where the gates were. Those little old car gates were only about six feet wide, just barely wide enough to let a car through and you had to slow way down, but it sure beat opening a gate.

Dad furnished four head of horses and Seth and Frank each had a team. They got an old horse grader and with eight head of horses pulling it they made the first graded road from Glenrock out north. Today it is Highway 95. Some places they had to have a lane (fences on both sides) and the homesteaders had to set their fences back and sometimes build a whole new fence. This work was all done free of charge plus giving the right-of-way for the road. The grading that Dad and Seth and Frank did was also done free. They put the road on section lines wherever possible and that is why those two right angle turns are by the Negley place. People wonder about those turns to this day. They had to angle into the crossing at Big Sand Creek and had to cross a guy's section and he didn't want that. He had a three-wire fence up and Dad told his neighbors "Well fellas, we got to get to that creek crossing and we got to go through his section." He took a pair of wire cutters and he said, "We got to make a gate here and there are three wires and there are three of us, so we will each cut a wire and if he shoots one of us he will have to shoot all three cause we all cut his fence." The highway still runs where they cut the fence that day.

In about 1928 when they were putting the finishing touches on the new road they were filling in the approaches at the new Sand Creek bridge. Eva, Seth's wife, had sent him some fresh fruit in a glass jar for his lunch and when Seth finished his lunch and dessert he noticed a bunch of broken glass pieces in the jar. He was sorta worried that he might have eaten some glass so he drove into town to see Dr. Tabor. Doc said, "Go up to the drug store and get yourself a pint of castor oil and then go over to the grocery store and get a quarters worth of your favorite cookies. When you get home tonight drink all the castor oil and eat all those cookies and you'll be alright!" Seth did as he was told and the other day up in Casper I was talking to his sister Mary Layton and she said Seth was still okay and going strong down in Arizona at the age of 80 years. So Doc's advice must have worked.

For filling in the approaches of the Sand Creek bridge they got paid so much for moving a yard of dirt. That is the only pay they got for building the whole road. They didn't get paid much but it was a lot better than working for nothing. Davie Smyth (father of Pete Smyth of the KOA radio station of Denver) was county commissioner at that time and he hired them to make the fill on the new bridge.

When the depression hit in 1929 and a bad drought followed a year or two later, the average homesteader couldn't grow any crops or raise any stock to speak of and he just couldn't survive without some other kind of income. Most sold their places to their more prosperous neighbors or bigger ranchers. Then they took off again, still trying to find something better for themselves and their families.

Like the old cowboy song says, "Time Changes Everything." In 64 years it has really changed the way of life on "The Old Homestead." If someone would have told us in the 30's that we would someday have electric lights, refrigerators, telephones, and indoor plumbing and a paved highway running by the gate we would have thought they were crazy. That is the way it is these days, however, and its pretty nice, too!

In my old neighborhood, there are only two people living on their homesteads. Jake Negley lives on his mother's place and I live on my dad's. Everyone else has left, died, moved to town or something. Most of the land in my area was homesteaded. That means at one time someone lived on nearly every square mile. That was all the land one person could get from the government, 640 acres. A few wives took a homestead close to their husbands and that worked pretty well; they got two sections that way. A lot of people from the eastern states thought 640 acres was a lot of land. They didn't realize that in this country you need several sections to make a decent living.

My mother, Goldie, died Feb. 21, 1967 in California at the age of 66 years. My little sister, Betty, was killed in a car accident just a little east of Big Sand Creek Feb. 9, 1941 on the road to Glenrock that Dad helped build. She was just 15 years old.

My older brother, Bob, owns a ranch on County Line Hill, on the west edge of Converse County. His ranch is the old Myron Spencer place. He married Anna Mae Hildebrand and they have four children, three girls, Maryon, Betty and Roberta, and a son, Robert Jr. Maryon married Carroll Carr and has three daughters, Colleen, Conna and Carla, Betty married Don Dungan and they have two sons, Darin and Danny. Roberta married Ernest Scholtz. Robert Jr. and wife, Nell "Tex" have a daughter, Jan and a son, Robert III.

My younger brother, Dick, has been living for several years about four miles north of Keeline, Wyoming on the Beryl Fullerton Ranch. He is married to Dorothy Carpenter and has two children by a previous marriage. A daughter, Delores, who lives near Denver, and a son, Kenny, who has his own welding business and lives west of Casper. Kenny and wife, Becky, have one daughter, Valerie.

Me, I still live on Dad's old homestead. I have called it "Home" for 64 years, except for four years in the navy during World War II. Uncle Sam taught me to weld and I used to weld on and help repair our submarines over in Pearl Harbor, Hawaii. Besides taking care of my ranch, etc. I write a story now and then or maybe a poem or two. Also do a little steel sculpture work. I have samples of my work in several states and quite a little around Converse County. I have several jobs I am proud of, but my best work is my little steel cowboy that I call "The Bronc Rider." He took me almost a year to make and when I look at him I sometimes can't believe I made him. Right now he is on display at the Pioneer Memorial Museum in Douglas, Wyoming for all to see.

Kellogg, Henry and Matilda

Treadwell, New York was the birthplace of Henry W. Kellogg who was born there November 8, 1856. He came to the Wyoming Territory about 1876 where he was engaged in various activities, drilling both oil and water wells, and driving both horses and oxen to haul freight. He was employed by John Hunton freight line in 1878, receiving $54.36 in the month of December as wages for "bull-whacking."

In 1879 Henry Kellogg and S. A. Bishop went into a partnership to buy a freight outfit. They hauled for the government and under sub-contract from Rock Creek to Fort Fetterman and from Cheyenne to Fort Laramie.

S.A. Bishop and Henry Kellogg in front of their ranch house on LaPrele 1883

They sold their outfit in 1882 and entered the ranching business together as partners, purchasing a squatter's right claim from Noel Seminoe, a halfbreed, for the amount of $75. The claim was located on lower LaPrele Creek.

George Powell, who had a claim of his own on LaPrele, urged Kellogg and Bishop to buy the claim since he, George, wanted some white neighbors. George was instrumental in convincing Ed Smith to homestead in the area as well.

The Kellogg-Bishop ranch was joined on the west by the Ed Smith place and on the east by Pat Tobin's ranch. Bishop and Kellogg built one of the first frame houses in that locality and Bishop, who married in 1884, brought his wife to that house to live. The Bishops later engaged the services of Matilda Schmidt to help Mrs. Bishop with her housekeeping. In 1893 Henry Kellogg married Matilda.

After Henry and Matilda were married, the partnership of Kellogg and Bishop was dissolved and the ranch was divided. The Kelloggs took the upper or Sand Creek portion and the Bishops took the lower part on LaPrele Creek.

The Kelloggs were the parents of six children: Lucy, Stella, John, William, Lester and Edward. In 1902 the family moved to Douglas to live, and there all the children were educated.

Henry Kellogg was always proud of being a Wyoming pioneer and gloried in the progress of his beloved state. He died on February 19, 1942 in Tacoma, Washington.

Kennedy, Joseph and Josie Family

Joseph "Joe" H. Kennedy was born on January 12, 1847 in Virginia, where his ancestors on both paternal and maternal sides had lived for generations. He was the son of John and Jane E. Kennedy. His mother moved to Marshall County, Iowa in 1856 after her husband died at an early age.

Joe remained on the family farm in Iowa until 1872 when he decided to seek his fortunes in the west. He located in Larimer County, Colorado where he became involved in the livestock industry.

In 1877 he moved his cattle operations to upper Ranch home of J. H. Kennedy

LaPrele Creek where he purchased a ranch belonging to "Speed" Stagner and others. Some of Joe's associates and cowboys were Dennis Leman, Charlie Horr and George H. Cross Sr. These men were later to have their own outfits in the area.

Mr. Kennedy entered married life on January 8, 1896, being united with Josie Shockley, a native of Kansas and daughter of A. D. Shockley.

They became the parents of two sons, John (b. 1898) and Wayne (b. November 10, 1904).

The Kennedys built a splendid three story house on LaPrele. The architect who designed it was from the east; he also designed the Jacob Jenne residence at 107 North Sixth Street in Douglas in 1900.

When open range became a thing of the past Joe bought the Chamberlin property on Little LaPrele Creek for summer range.

Josie died on October 12, 1915; Joseph on January 10, 1925.

My brother, Wayne, and I, John, attended school in the Beaver Creek School House about one and one half miles west of home. Both of us finished the eighth grade there and then attended high school in Douglas.

After graduating from high school I attended college in Oberlin, Ohio, 1916 through 1919, and helped with the ranch work during the summer months. Upon finishing high school, Wayne helped at home and drove the car for our aged father, who boarded and roomed in Douglas.

I met Ottie Lee Weaver in the summer of 1923 and married her in October of the same year.

With Dad's guidance, Wayne and I ran the ranch until Dad's death in 1925. Shortly after, in the summer of 1926, we sold the land and the cattle.

After the sale of the ranch, Ottie and I purchased a car and took a trip to the west coast stopping at all the scenic places and visiting with some of the relatives on the way. On our return we learned that Wayne had married Gertrude Smith.

In the fall of 1926 Oattie and I moved to Denver where I enrolled at Barnes Commercial School, pursuing clerical and secretarial knowledge.

Two daughters, Mary Josephine (b. June 14, 1927) and Betty Jean (b. April 1, 1929), were born to Oattie and myself while we lived in Englewood, a suburb of Denver, Colorado.

Moving back to Douglas in the spring of 1929, I went to work for the Wyoming State Fair and on January 1, 1930 took a position as assistant cashier in the Converse County Bank. In May 1941 I obtained a position as an assistant to State Examiner Norris Hartwell in Cheyenne.

I was appointed to office of Converse County Assessor in January 1944 by the County Commissioners to fill out the term of the incumbent who had passed away. In 1946 I was duly elected to the office and served until 1949 when I resigned to take a job with the Examiner's Office in Cheyenne again. I remained there until my retirement in 1968.

My daughter, Mary Jo (Shaw), attended the University of Wyoming for a year after which she worked in Casper as a secretary until her marriage. She lives in Billings, Montana at the present time.

Betty Jean (Durr), my youngest daughter, attended Wyoming University also and later attended St. Luke's in Denver, graduating there in 1950 as a nurse. After nursing for a time she returned to Cheyenne to get married. She lives in Wheatland at the time of this writing.

My wife, Oattie, died in 1980.

After Wayne's divorce from Gertrude he married Frances Borchardt on September 11, 1934. He worked at various jobs in and around Douglas until his death on September 24, 1961 due to a ditch cave-in while working for the town of Douglas. Frances died in 1971.

Kenyon, Arthur and Agnes

Arthur W. Kenyon was born on November 23, 1868 in England.

Arthur came to America as a result of a program being offered to young English men to study ranching in the United States. All he learned was how to build fences and dig ditches. Discouraged with this, he returned to England only to return to buy a ranch on a tributary of upper Horseshoe Creek. His homestead was later sold to Tom Shepard. The small creek by his homestead is still known as Kenyon Creek.

In 1900 Arthur was married to Agnes Elizabeth Rutherford, the daughter of Alford Rutherford. She was born in Roxburghshire, Scotland on October 26, 1874. Agnes came to the United States in 1899 to visit her brothers, Malcolm and Archie who owned a ranch on Rutherford Creek, 30 miles south of Douglas.

After selling the mountain place to Shepard they bought the George Foxton Ranch on Indian Creek. It was here that Mary Patricia "Bunte" was born on May 18, 1908.

Later they sold their belongings to Mills and moved to a small place at the head of North Horseshoe Creek.

Bunte married Bill Morton, the son of Alexander Morton.

Agnes died on March 25, 1937; Arthur in 1944.

Kimball, Col. E.H. and Lizzie Family

The following story of the Kimball family is written by J. R. Slaughter, grandson of E. H. and Lizzie Kimball and son of Emma Kimball Slaughter.

Emerson H. Kimball was born in Center Sandwich, New Hampshire on October 21, 1842, where the Kimball family had resided for many generations.

He enlisted in the 13th Maine Regiment during the Civil War, under Colonel Dow, while he was teaching in Maine. After three years in the service, he re-enlisted for another three years or for the duration of the war. The conflict ended shortly after his enlistment and Col. Kimball returned to Center Sandwich, New Hampshire. On April 18, 1865 he married Lizzie Mary Smith in Meredith, New Hampshire. Lizzie Smith was born in Center Sandwich on July 26, 1849, one of three children of Lorenda and Isaac Smith.

Colonel and Mrs. Kimball lived in New Hampshire until 1869 when, with their two children, Wilson S., born July 22, 1866 and Edna J., born February 2, 1869, they moved to Audubon County, Iowa. There they bought Iowa land with soldier's script for $1.25 an acre. They homesteaded in Iowa and were engaged principally in the newspaper business. Col. Kimball became editor and publisher of the Exira (Iowa) Defender, a weekly newspaper in 1875. Afterwards he published papers in Guthrie Center and Audubon, Iowa. It was while they were publishing the Audubon Times that an article in the Davenport (Iowa) Daily Gazette carried this item: "A cradle containing a sleeping child is one of the sights in the Audubon Times office. It's mother, the wife of the proprietor is an old hand in a printing office and thus combines domestic with newspaper duties." This item led to the publishing in the New York Police Gazette, of her picture showing her setting type and rocking the cradle with one foot.

In 1871 Colonel Kimball was admitted to the practice of law in Carroll County, Iowa.

Five more children were born, Lizzie H., Glidden, Iowa, July 14, 1871; James E., Exira, Iowa, June 24, 1876; Emma L., Audubon, Iowa, October 19, 1881; Mary E., Audubon, Iowa, September 22, 1883; and Allan R., Glidden, Iowa, May 8, 1889.

In 1886 they sold their property and business and moved to the Wyoming Territory where they again engaged in the newspaper business in Fort Fetterman, Douglas, Glenrock and Casper, Wyoming. They published the "Rowdy West" at Douglas in 1886 and the Glenrock Graphic in 1890.

Soon after coming to Wyoming they homesteaded in Boxelder Park on what they called the Circle K Ranch. Their brand was later registered as a "K within a circle." In 1895 they moved to Glenrock. Their son, Jim Kimball, took over the old homestead and it is still known as the "Kimball Ranch". Grandmother Kimball used to tell us stories about living on the ranch. Some winters there was no feed at all for the cows and the snow was so deep they couldn't get out of the cabin. One winter, Grandfather Kimball came to town to help out a man that had been accused of rustling. Grandfather had been admitted to practice law in the Territory of Wyoming in 1888 and was the only one available for law cases. A bad winter storm came up and he was unable to get back to the ranch for almost three weeks. Grandmother said, "they kept the fires going to keep warm but the food almost ran out". They cooked up some kind of a mush and put sorghum and water on it. Uncle Allan was about three or four years old and got really sick. She said she was never so glad to see anyone in her life as when Grandfather came riding horseback through the snow with some "provisions" from town. It was soon after that they moved to Glenrock.

They built the "Kimball Hotel" and Grandmother rented out rooms. Her New England cooking was so good, however, that more and more people came to the dining room to eat. Usually it was on a Sunday evening that the travelers and the townspeople came to the dining room. Mom said that lots of times people were standing clear out on the sidewalk waiting for the dinner bell to ring. One summer they kept track and served over five thousand trout dinners. Grandfather loved to fish and provided the trout from the Boxelder Ranch. The dining room closed down in 1917, during the oil boom when many other eating places opened up.

Grandmother Kimball was the town doctor, pharmacist, notary public and the confidant of many people. She was appointed Glenrock Postmistress in 1896. If anyone was sick or hurt they came to Mrs. Kimball. Mom said she set many a broken arm or leg. Her pharmacy was located where the Commerce Building is now. When they started building the commerce block they jacked up the pharmacy and moved it out in what is now the center of the street and put it up on blocks.

Aunt Lizzie married Jasper Sumner who was one of Dad's old cowboy buddies and they had a big general store located just north across the street from the Commerce Building.

Aunt Edna was a city clerk, notary public, insurance agent and all around business woman. She married a man by the name of Charles Rollins. Mom told us the story about the time during the "Cattleman's War" when they needed someone to eavesdrop on the messages coming in on the teletype, so the men could be warned of the attacks. Uncle Charlie volunteered. He was a very fastidious man and he was truly giving his all to sneak down to the depot and crawl under the board platform, where he could hear the morse code being sent in. It was one of these nights that one of the men from inside the depot had the urge to urinate...and stepped to the door. That was one of the stories told many times around the town...how mad Charlie was and there was nothing he could do but stay there and not give away his hiding place. However, many nights he did intercept the messages and was able to relay them to the men.

Col. E. H. Kimball family, 1913: Back row: 1. to r. Joe Slaughter, Jap Sumner, Lizzie Kimball, E. H. Kimball, Wilson Kimball Jr., Edna Rollins, Wilson Kimball Sr., Jim Kimball, Allan Kimball, Nell Kimball Grieves. Front row: 1. to r. Russell Slaughter, Ruth Kimball Bylund, J. R. Slaughter Jr., Edith Sumner Morgan, Minnie Kimball, Ozra Sumner, Bea Rollins Gardner, Wren Kimball Slaughter, Lizzie Kimball Sumner.

In 1915 Grandmother and Grandfather Kimball celebrated their golden wedding anniversary. This was an occasion for all of the children, grandchildren and great grandchildren to get together. One of the remarkable things about the Kimball family was the fact that though they had emigrated so far, yet all of the children lived within a radius of 25 miles or so. We used to have Kimball family gatherings every Thanksgiving. It was truly something we all looked forward to and enjoyed, going back to the old hotel and hearing the year's happenings, both funny and sad, from aunts, uncles and cousins.

Uncle Will Kimball owned and operated the Kimball Drug Store in Casper for many years and when he came down to visit he always brought Grandmother and Mom and the other sisters a surprise present.

Uncle Allan was the manager at the O. L. Walker Lumber Company. One time, Vern Griffith came into the store and when Allan had to go to the back room for something, Vern set all of the alarm clocks to go off at the same hour. Just as some of the company officers and inspectors came in to make their official visit the alarms started ringing...I guess that really caused a commotion.

Grandmother slipped and fell at the bakery in town. A piece of tin had been nailed over a rough spot in the floor and she slipped on the tin, fell and broke her hip. She was bedfast for two or three weeks and then slipped into a coma and died on September 20, 1920. The funeral service was held at the hotel and graveside services were conducted by the Eastern Star Chapter of Casper, of which she was a member.

Grandfather Kimball continued practicing law until about 1921, almost a period of 50 years as a lawyer.

In 1926 he presented to the city of Glenrock a plot of ground, comprised of seven lots, which had been the Kimball garden plot for many years. He donated this land in his words "in memory of my wife, one of the best known and loved women who ever lived in Glenrock." It was to be used and improved as a park for the public, for recreation and especially for the young children and their mothers. It was to be always known as Kimball Park. I remember all of the ice cream socials they used to have there and the city band concerts on Friday evenings.

Grandfather Kimball died in his sleep at the Kimball Hotel in 1932 in his bed that had the American flag hung at its head for as long as any of us could remember.

The Masonic Lodge #15 of Casper, Wyoming conducted the services at the Masonic Hall and also at the graveside. The Jesse Martin post of the Glenrock American Legion fired a salute to Colonel Kimball and "Taps" were played by the Boy Scouts. He was buried beside Grandmother Kimball in the Glenrock Cemetery.

Kimball, Susan Robbins Family

The birth of Susan Stephenson took place in Capetown, South Africa in 1864. Susan's father, an officer in an army engineering corps in South Africa was also a big game hunter. He guided the hunting team which led Sir Henry Stanley out of Africa.

Susan was one of a family of ten children. She received her education in France. She was united in marriage with Frank Robbins and the two made their home on Boxelder, south of Glenrock. There were two girls and several boys born to this union, among them Frank Robbins, Jr., and C. J. "Doc" Robbins.

Frank Robbins died as a result of a freak accident involving a bunch of horses which had been corralled. One of the horses jumped over the fence, knocking loose the top pole which struck Frank in the head, killing him instantly.

After the death of her first husband, Susan married William C. Kimball. William had been born in 1864 in Portland, Maine. He came to Douglas, Wyoming in 1886 on the first train into the town. He homesteaded 160 acres at Boxelder.

There were two sons born to William and Susan Kimball, Bert and Bill. Bert was born at Boxelder, Wyoming on January 17, 1897. He received his education in the rural school at Boxelder. His first employment came with the North Central Gas Company in 1934, working as a pipefitter. After two and one half years with the gas company, Kimball worked in construction for Converse County for seven years. He took a homestead on Deer Creek in 1930. In 1943 he bought his Peaked Hill Ranch, consisting of 1,040 acres from Roy Elder. This property, located northeast of Douglas, was expanded by purchasing additional land. His brand, the Lazy R T connected, was recorded in the late 1880s, one of the first brands to be recorded in the state of Wyoming.

Bert was married to Ruby Pryor Dee on February 12, 1934. She had come to Wyoming in 1917, a widow with two children. She had received nurses training in Alliance, Nebraska and supported herself while she homesteaded on land north of Douglas. Ruby was born in Crawford, Missouri, the daughter of John S. and Marilla Kight Pryor. Her father was a native of Kentucky; her mother a native of Missouri. Bert and Ruby had no children born to them. She died November 25, 1971.

Bert married Helen Stephens Dykes in 1972. Helen died January 26, 1978.

Mr. Kimball raised purebred Angus cattle and was one of the pioneers of the Wyoming Aberdeen Angus Association founded in 1948. He was a member of the board of directors of the First National Bank of Douglas and was considered to be one of Converse County's outstanding stockman. He died on March 21, 1975.

Kirn, Matt and Mary Family

Makronog, Dolenska, Austria was the birthplace of Mathias "Matt" Kirn on February 20, 1873, the youngest child and only son. His parents' names are unknown, but they were of Slovene German descent. The father apparently was a government trapper; he and his wife both died when Matt was but a young boy. Matt was reared by his four sisters, Theresa, Frances, Anna, and Cecelia with the help of an uncle, the father's brother.

Little is known of Matt's childhood. When he reached military age, he served in the army for a specified period of time, after which he had to continue to receive training on a scheduled basis for a number of years.

It should be noted that World War I changed the face of Europe, and names of towns used in this story cannot be verified as to spelling or location; they are not found on present day maps. Spellings used are as written by Mary Kirn. The area of Austria in which they lived is presently northwestern Yugoslavia.

Matt began working as a miner in the coal mines near Trbovlje, Austria. It was here that he met Mary Anna Scobe who worked unloading the coal cars at the same mine.

Mary Anna was the only child of Tony and Maria Brienner Scobe. She was born March 12, 1876 in Lagvrje ob Save, Capital of Ljubljana, Austria. The family was also of Slovene German descent.

Her father died when Mary was about nine years of age. Mary's schooling ended in the third grade, and she had to go to work for local farmers herding cows. Maria married a Mr. Jakob and the family moved to Trbovlje where Mary, at age 15, went to work in the coal mines.

Matt and Mary were married September 25, 1898 assumedly in Trbovlje but possibly Makronog.

After a period of time, Matt and Mary moved to Germany where Matt continued to work in the coal mines, and they started a family. Martin was born in November 1900; Matheas "Matt" born February 5, 1901; and Mary born May 7, 1902. All of the children were born in Makronog as Mary's mother and stepfather had moved there, and Mary would go home to her mother who was a midwife.

Mary liked living in Germany as it was so clean. It was here that she had her first stove to cook on; in Austria, their homes were only equipped with fireplaces which were also used for cooking.

In 1903, a group of the miners Matt worked with began to prepare to go to the United States. Matt and Mary decided that he should go with them. Mary and the children returned to Makronog to live until Matt could send for them. It was here that Stephanie Frances "Betty" was born September 18, 1903.

Matt went to Sheboygan, Wisconsin where he worked on the docks unloading ships. He then worked in a foundry making bathtubs and lavatories. The pay was small; he paid only 35 cents per day for board and room.

Somehow he learned of the coal mines in Rock Springs, Wyoming where the pay was much better. Again he and some of his friends decided to go west to make a better living. In 1904, the men arrived in Rock Springs and began work as coal miners.

By 1905, Matt had saved enough money to send for Mary and the four children. Because the children were all under five years of age, Matt hoped that his niece Meetsie could come with Mary to help with the children. Tickets were purchased, and the two ladies and the children traveled to Paris. It was here that they discovered that not only did one need tickets but also an additional $200. Meetsie did not have the $200, and she was not allowed to go further; she had to return home.

Mary and the children traveled 21 days on the ship Lorraine and arrived in New York City on May 17, 1905. Even though young Matt was only four, he was a big help to his mother by keeping track of various smaller items and his younger sisters. Mary always said that Matt kept the crowds from walking over them by putting up his hands to push people out of their way by the seat of their pants.

They then traveled by train. In Buffalo, New York, one of the family's trunks containing papers, keepsakes, and clothing was lost. Mary did not have time enough to get the children and all of the luggage on the train before it began to move. The trunk had to be left on the platform and was never recovered.

At 10 p.m. on May 21, 1905, the Kirn family was reunited in Rock Springs. Mary being used to the lush green lands of Austria and Germany didn't like the barren area of Rock Springs and spent the first few days in tears wondering just what kind of life she would have in this strange new land. The family lived in the coal company's Number 4 Camp.

To earn extra money, Mary took in boarders, many of whom were bachelors. They liked the food as it was delicious and there was plenty of it; Mary was an excellent cook and seldom used a cookbook.

The Kirn family continued to grow with Joseph "Joe" arriving on February 21, 1906 and Anna "Ann" on July 20, 1907.

Matt went to night school to further his education. Mary learned to read and write English on her own but with assistance from Matt's books.

The family pronounced Kirn as if it were spelled Kearn; this led to the name being improperly spelled Kern. Today the family pronounces Kirn and Kern as though they were spelled Kurn. The Matheas Kern family continues to use Kern as the spelling.

Martin, the oldest child, died of a kidney infection in the fall of 1909 and is buried in Rock Springs. Sophie, the youngest daughter, was born February 27, 1910.

In the spring of 1910, Matt went to Oklahoma where he purchased a farm near Wilburton. The family joined him soon after. It was not long before Matt, Mary, and Joe came down with a fever and became bedfast for a period of time. The three young children Matt, Mary, and Betty had to do all the chores and take care of the sick and their two baby sisters. The doctor told the Kirns that the fever could reoccur each spring. Knowing they did not want to be sick every year, they sold the farm and boarded the train for Rock Springs. The further north they came, the better they felt; by the time they arrived in Rock Springs, they were cured and had regained their appetites.

On May 6, 1912, the Kirn family became citizens of the United States.

Frank, the last of the 11 children, arrived on February 16, 1913. Three of the children died shortly after birth; dates and places are unknown.

During the mine strike in 1914, Mary read in the newspaper that land was available for homesteading near Douglas. Matt and young Matt came to Douglas to look at the land. Matt filed on it in the early spring. Together Father and son built a small three room house (sided and painted white) on the homestead located about five miles east of Douglas (on the present County Road 52). In July, Mary and the six children arrived by train. Matt met them at the station with William Winslow who drove them to their new home in his Model T. Anna remembers the land as containing lots of tall sagebrush, which was used for firewood, and cactus.

At the time of their arrival, there were only three places between Douglas and the Kirn homestead -Matthew McCrillis (used only for livestock), Charles L. Esmay, and Hans H. Bakken. The nearest neighbor to the east was James Trainer who lived about ten miles away. About once a month, the Trainers would go to Douglas for supplies and stop to visit the Kirns. The main trail went by the Kirn house making it a stopping place for most of the homesteaders.

A wagon and team of big horses were purchased so that supplies could be hauled, and they would have transportation. Water was hauled the three miles from the Bakken place until a water well was drilled by H.C. Anderson in the late fall.

Matt and young Matt returned to Rock Springs that fall to work in the mines during the winter so that the family would have money on which to live.

The first winter was pretty bleak. Meals consisted mostly of beans and cornbread. The next year things looked brighter as Matt purchased a walking plow, disc, and harrow. (This was all the machinery he had for the first few years.) All kinds of vegetables were planted and a bumper crop was produced. That fall Mary bought their first cow for $15 from Walter E. Titterington who lived about six miles northeast. Now the family had fresh foods and milk to add to their diet.

Homesteaders and neighbors coming into the area to file their claims every half mile and most to build their one room tar paper homes during the next six years were: Lafe Burnett; Charles "Charlie" Caffee, Jessie Roberts; Charles Waterman; Chester and Arthur Sims; William M. "Mack" Johnson; Joe Orth; Sadie Bersheer and her son and daughter Roy and Odetta Hamilton; Mr. and Mrs. Fred Wickwire and Fred, Leland, Mamie, and Rosie; Tom and Anna McCarty; Frank and Cora Severin; the Gustavus Bentleys; the Charles Reubhars and their seven children (while here the family spelled their name ReBar); the Sigfred Nielsen family, his brother Chris, and his sister Abalone Nielsen McKay; Mr. and Mrs. John F. Murphy; Carl and Marie Giehm and Rudy, Albert, and Herman; Clem and Maggie Jagers and Elward "Mike," Delbert "Pete," Nellie Una May, and Robert "Bobby;" Vinson and Hettie Merritt; the Walter Titterington family; the Charles Sprittles; and the Hugh Conner family.

Matheas, Mary, Betty, and Joe had all attended school in Rock Springs, but it was not until the fall of 1917 that a school was provided on the homestead. Matt built the building on Kirn property just over the hill north of the Kirn home. It was here that Anna, Sophie, and Frank (in 1920) started to school. The first teacher was Mary Ryan, the eldest of the John Ryans' seven children. She would stay with the Kirns when the weather was so that she could not ride horseback to and from Douglas each day.

Besides the six Kirn children (Matheas was the only one who did not attend this school), other pupils during the school's five year duration were: Odetta Hamilton; Pete and Mike Jagers; Rudy and Albert Giehm; Mabel, Mary, and Johnny Reubhar; Cecil Conner; Fritz, Lewis, and Lloyd Nielsen; and Charles Sprittles' daughter. Teachers included Bill Featherston, Elizabeth Dunn, Lydia Haas, and a roly-poly Spanish lady who crocheted almost constantly.

When the school closed, Sophie and Frank attended the old North Grade School in Douglas. The first bus driver was a Mr. Hess (or Hesson) who drove a Reo speedwagon. Mrs. Hess would go along for the ride but mostly to keep the children in line. The next year Charles Reubhar took over the route which he kept until 1926. He had a Model T Ford truck outfitted with wooden benches along both sides. If the children sat still and weren't jolted about, they didn't get splinters; but if they weren't careful, watch out! In the cold winters, they would sit and try to keep their feet warm on the exhaust pipe which ran the length of the truck. When the snow was deep, Reubhar would hitch up his team and wagon and take to the ridges. Frank Kirn said of those trips, "The only ones who kept warm were the two Old Dobbins; I walked more than I ever rode in that wagon." Sophie graduated from North Grade in 1926. A Mr. Willey operated the bus for the next two years until Frank graduated in 1928. This completed the formal schooling for the Kirn children.

The Kirn school house today is a part of one of the houses on the south side of the 800 block of East Center Street in Douglas.

In the spring of 1917, Matt began building a larger home which was completed in 1918. On February 18, 1918, Matt received the patent to his homestead lands.

One day in 1919 when the house was not quite a year old, the four younger children were home alone. Joe was always fascinated with Matt's guns. Since Matt and Mary were both in the field working, Joe took out a shotgun and playfully pulled the trigger. The gun was loaded, and the blast knocked Joe to the floor and a hole through the outside wall of Matt and Mary's bedroom. Anna, who was ironing in the kitchen, heard the blast and Joe's screams, ran into the bedroom, and saw Joe rolling on the floor; she thought he had been shot. When things calmed down, the children saw the hole in the wall and surveyed the damage. Because Anna was wearing a light colored dress, which wouldn't be noticed by their parents if they should look toward the house, Joe told her to go outside and tack down all the splinters and paint the boards so that they would match the rest of the wall. Inside Joe stuffed the hole and plastered over it.

The shell in the shotgun was the last one Matt had. Frank was given a nickle, and he ran all the way to Clem Jagers, who had the same type of gun, to buy a shell. Clem asked Frank, "Are you going to shoot a beef?" Frank didn't dare tell him that Joe had just shot a house. When Frank delivered the shell, Joe took and whittled it to fit the gun, placed it in the gun, and put the gun away. Anna placed newly ironed pillowcases over the bed's headboard to hide the fresh plaster - thus they successfully repaired the hole temporarily.

The first time that both Matt and Mary went with the team and wagon to Douglas, a trip which took all day, Joe and Anna busied themselves and replaced outside boards and painted them, replastered inside, and fit a small piece of wood in the woodwork and stained it. The wall is repaired that way to this day. It was not until years later that Mary noticed the notch in the woodwork; she and Matt were then told the story.

The neighbors provided stories which are still told. One bachelor was quite a drinker, and every time he went to town, he would get drunk. Anna relates: "It was a good thing that the horses knew where to go as he was not able to drive them. One time as he went by the house, Mother noticed he was especially drunk. After awhile she sent us kids to his place to be sure that he had made it home. When we got to the top of the hill, we could see that he had fallen from the wagon and was lying on the ground. Being little, we had to go for help to get him into the house."

A few of the neighbors were very poor. One family had a child die, and they could not afford a funeral so the child was buried on the homestead. Another family made the rounds of all the neighbors about noon so they would be assured of having one meal a day. The Kirns living close by fed them about twice a week.

Dr. Hylton declared one family "the dirtiest people in the state." Chickens roosted on the bedsteads; the plates from which they ate were never washed, just turned over from one meal to the next. One time the Kirn children were visiting. During the course of the visit, the family's baby needed changing. The Mother cleaned him and washed his bottom in a pan of water. Then she invited the children to stay for supper. Because she was having guests, she decided she would wash the plates. Wash them she did - in the same pan of water in which she had washed the baby. The Kirns hightailed it for home in a hurry.

One time during threshing season, the youngest daughter of this same family, a toddler, was playing outside in the dirt where she unearthed a pig's foot which had been cut off during butchering. Wanting to "help," she brought it into the house and tossed it into the pot of beans cooking on the stove for the threshers' dinner. Afterward all the Mother could say was, "They ate it anyway."

The area in which the Kirns lived was not like other areas of the county; there were no community halls, dances, socials, Sunday schools, mail routes, etc. It was not until the 1970s that mail was delivered. Prior to this, the residents had a box in the Douglas Post Office.

Sadie Bersheer would hold weekly box socials and dances in her home in the late teens. The only reason she held them was in hopes of finding a husband for her daughter; when this proved unsuccessful, the dances were discontinued. The only other remembered dance was one held at the Charles Sprittles' residence.

When asked what the family did for entertainment, Frank answered: "We pitched horseshoes on the hill north of the house. We walked to the neighbors to visit. Of course, we had a saddle horse; but it was closer to walk to the neighbors than it was to walk after that horse to catch it to ride to the neighbors."

Except for Betty, the children were given only one name. When they chose their confirmation name, this name then became their middle name: Mary Elizabeth, Joseph Bernard, Anna Catherine, Sophie Josephine, and Frank Theodore. For some unknown reason, Matt added a J to his name; no one knew what this initial represented.

Matheas left home in 1917 working first for ranchers west of Douglas. He then returned to Rock Springs to work in the mines. He had quit school to work in the mines prior to coming to Douglas; now he went to night school to continue his education. When he was 21, Matheas went to western Kansas to work in the wheat fields. From there he went to Raton, New Mexico where he again worked in the mines.

It was in Raton that Matheas married Thelma (last name is unknown) whom he met while boarding at her home. Early in 1925, about two months after they were married, Thelma died of a kidney infection, the result of swallowing a pin; she was only 17. Matheas continued to work in the mines in New Mexico and southern Colorado.

Daughters Mary and Betty left home in the early '20s for California. Mary married William E. Coleman; their sons are William Edward Jr. born December 15, 1925 and Donald DeWayne born January 9, 1929. Mary and her family lived in Los Angeles where her husband died October 12, 1952, and Mary died March 12, 1975.

Betty married William S. Chamberlain and had two daughters Nellie Louise (Selvage) born June 22, 1925 and Ella Mae (Wilkinson) born May 6, 1927. She and her family returned to Wyoming in the 1930s living in Cheyenne and Casper before going back to California permanently. Betty died in Eureka on January 6, 1965.

One day in the early '20s, the four younger children found a rattler coiled up not far from the house. Joe started throwing rocks at it hoping to kill it. The rocks only made the snake angry; and before they knew it, the rattler was coming after them. Run for the house they did with the snake chasing them in leaping bounds. They barely all got on the porch and the door shut when the five foot snake landed on the steps with a loud thud. The rattler then crawled under the porch where it remained until that evening when Matt shot it.

The first car was purchased in 1923 from Joe Orth - it was a 1914 Model T. All of the Kirns remaining at home except Mary learned how to drive that car. Joe tried to teach his mother how to drive, but she didn't want to learn.

Mary had become sick in 1915. A mattress was put in the wagon for her to lie on while being brought to the Douglas hospital. Dr Cantril performed surgery and removed a large tumor. She recovered completely. Again in 1924, Mary became ill. Dr. Keller diagnosed the problem as diabetes. Mary started taking insulin in early 1925.

Until 1939, Matt continued to work in the coal mines during the winter months - first in Rock Springs, then in the Shawnee area, and in latter years in the Casper area.

During the summer he would farm; the four younger children took charge in the winter months.

The dairy herd was gradually increased until they were milking 20 cows. In 1926 and 1927, Matt had the feedlot for George Arnold, who ran a butcher shop in Douglas. The animals would be trailed from Douglas to the feedlot where they were fattened and later butchered. The carcass was then trucked to the shop to be sold.

In February 1928, Matt purchased his first tractor from Irwin Mills - a brand new McCormick-Deering 10-20. New ground was broken west of the house increasing his farm land.

Sophie married William McKinley "Mack" Johnson in Douglas on July 21, 1928. Mack was born in McKinley, Missouri, the son of Loney Johnson, on August 6, 1899. He came to Wyoming in 1910 and served in the navy from 1918 to 1921. He homesteaded about four miles east of the Kirns. He sold his place to Mortons. The Johnsons lived in Casper where Mack worked at the Standard Oil Refinery from which he retired. He and Sophie had two children: a girl Jean Marie born in November 1929 and died in March 1931, and a son Thomas Milton born January 18, 1939. Mack died May 20, 1973, and Sophie died April 8, 1982.

In the fall of 1928, Matheas returned to Douglas; he operated the Kern Coal Mine on federal land near Shawnee Creek. Matt worked in the mine also. Joe and Frank delivered coal to Lusk; and Charles and George Poirot, who each had a truck, delivered coal to Douglas. The Kirns worked this mine until 1930 when the coal supply and the customers both ran out at about the same time. During the 1930s, Matheas worked mostly on tunnel construction which took him to many parts of the United States. He often spoke about living in Baltimore.

The years prior to the '30s were mostly excellent years for growing agriculture products. Crops were planted in April and harvested in October or November. During the spring and summer, weekly rains would come to water the dryland fields. Corn grew 12 feet high and grains grew over six feet high. Prospective homesteaders were shown the Kirn homestead so that they would know what kind of crops they could expect to produce. One year Matt grew eight foot tall brome grass. He cut it for hay leaving a block for seed; people stopped to ask about it.

Sugar beets were so large they had to be dug with crow bars. Watermelon and cantaloupe seeds were planted in the corn fields. Clem Jaggers grew watermelons averaging over 20 pounds by the wagon loads. Visitors were each given a half of the best melons to eat; the other melons were fed to the hogs.

During the late '20s and early '30s, most of the homesteaders moved from the area, many returning to their original homes. An exception to this trend was the arrival of Robert J. "Bob" Blotz who purchased the McCrillis place in 1928. Bob arrived in a 1924 Model T Ford which he was to drive for the next 40 years. A camper was built on the back; Bob lived in the camper until he could fix up the one room rock building which McCrillis had used for storage.

Blotz was born September 11, 1892 in Dodgeville, Wisconsin. He served in the army during World War I and was wounded in France. After returning from the service, he moved to Randolph, Nebraska in 1919. His wife Alma Geneva "Eva" Webster Blotz was also born in Dodgeville, Wisconsin the daughter of Edward and Sarah Webster. In 1920, Eva traveled to Randolph where she and Bob were married on September 29.

Because Bob had tuberculosis, he had to leave Nebraska for a drier climate. Eva returned to Wisconsin while Bob came to Wyoming. Eva arrived in Douglas in 1930, and they continued to live in the rock building.

Bob had to repair the McCrillis house before they could live in it. It was not until 1931 that they moved into the two room house. The house was never modernized, and the Blotzs had the same style of living in the 1960s as they did when they first came to Douglas.

As long as Eva's mother was alive, Eva would return to Wisconsin every winter to help her.

In the 1960s, Bob purchased a used late model pickup. Eva would not ride in it as she did not "want to be hauled around like cattle." She rode in the Model T until Bob got a 1936 model car which was only driven to church.

The Blotzs raised cattle, and Eva had a few chickens to provide eggs which she sold. Bob was a carpenter; he would take jobs as they pleased him.

Eva died May 12, 1968, and Bob died March 27, 1980; both are buried in Douglas.

By the 1940s, the only other permanent residents remaining were the Sigfred Nielsen and Tom McCarty families.

Anna married Miles J. Larkin in Glenrock on April 19, 1933. Their daughter Catherine Ida "Kati" (Pexton) was born in Casper on August 16, 1936. Miles passed away on March 15, 1963, and Ann presently lives in Douglas.

Matheas returned to the Douglas area in 1938. He worked at various jobs including the Swaggart Coal Mine northeast of Casper (along with Matt and Joe) in 1939. In 1940, he and Frank worked for their brother-in-law Miles Larkin in drilling an oil well on the George Beaver property in the Walker Creek area. It was here that the brothers were introduced to the occupation which they would follow for the remainder of their lives.

On April 27, 1940 in Guernsey, Matheas married Louise Edna Daily, the only child of Jacob Sumner "Jake" Daily and Katherine Pauline "Katie" Daily. Louise was born March 17, 1910 in Saranac Lake, New York.

Katie Daily, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas McMan was born at Keene Valley, New York on September 13, 1892. Following the death of her father, she was adopted by Charley and Louise Stevens of Saranac Lake, New York. On May 13, 1909, she married Jake Daily, a cousin of Archie Hamner, who was born February 7, 1888 in Storm Lake, Iowa. The family moved to Aurora, Illinois in 1911 and to Guernsey in 1916 where they farmed.

Matt and Louise moved to Kamas, Utah where they lived while Matt worked as a roughneck. It was in Utah that their two children were born: a daughter Marie Ann was born and died on the same day in April 1941, and a son Charles Joseph "Chuck" was born March 6, 1942 in Coalville.

The Kern family returned to Douglas shortly thereafter. Matt worked on the construction of the P.O.W. Camp; he then worked in the Lance Creek oil field, and they lived in Lusk. Following this, the family moved back to Douglas where they continued to reside. Matt worked in the oil fields as a roughneck and became a driller.

Louise's mother Katie Daily came to live with them after the death of her husband Jake on July 16, 1947. Louise passed away on August 30, 1950. Katie continued to live with Matt and Charles until she passed away on September 26, 1953. All three are buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Frank served with the U.S. Army Ordinance in the South Pacific during World War II. He continued to work in the oil patch after he returned from service and eventually became a driller. In September 1947, Frank married Dorothy Jean House of Basin, and they had two daughters, Mary Ellen (Werner) born November 22, 1948 in Casper and Alice Jean born January 31, 1953 in Douglas. Frank was injured on a rig north of Gillette in the 1960s; after that, he started working for himself drilling water wells. Frank and Dorothy were divorced. Frank continues to work and to reside in Douglas.

Matt and Joe farmed until Matt's death on April 28, 1953. Joe, who never married, remained on the homestead with his mother. In latter years, Joe worked for Florence Lumber Company and did some farming. Mary passed away on July 10, 1965. Joe died in Evanston on April 25, 1981.

Matheas' son Charles served in the U.S. Navy from 1961 to 1965; he then reenlisted in 1968 and served until 1969 and saw action in the Vietnam Conflict. In 1971, Charles purchased most of the homestead from his aunts and uncles. Frank kept a portion on the west side; Bob and Mary Ellen Kirn Werner built their home on this land.

At Esterbrook on August 21, 1971, Charles married Jeanne Louise Bradshaw, the daughter of William W. "Bill" and Eva Bradshaw. Their children are Kimberly Ann born January 7, 1977 and Cassidy Renee born April 8, 1979. Chuck and Jeanne were divorced, and Chuck married Marion Frances Mason Houk on July 23, 1983 in Douglas. Marion was born in Cheyenne on November 28, 1944, the daughter of Thomas Francis and Doris Gillis Mason. Marion's daughter Misti Dawn was born April 25, 1975 and has been adopted by Chuck.

In the mid-1970s, Matheas sold his house in Douglas and moved into a mobile home on the homestead. He resided there and helped raise his granddaughters while their parents were working. Matheas passed away in Casper on June 13, 1985.

In the area of this story, the Kirn homestead is the only one on which members of the homesteader's family still live.

Knisely, Vern and Edith

Vern's father, Aara Jay Knisely, was born in Mt. Zion, Missouri in 1875. He rode a bicycle from Missouri to northern Wyoming and took up a homestead near Lovell in 1900. In 1906 he married Mabel Florence Howard of a pioneer Lovell family. Vern, the third of six children, was born in 1911. He was the only son.

In 1917 Aara bought a cattle ranch on the Wood River where Vern went to a one room school until high school when the family moved to Worland. Vern's first piece of business was trading his string of horses (two ponies) for a bicycle - this was promptly squashed by his father. Vern graduated from Worland High School and attended the University of Wyoming from 1929 to 1933. He lettered in tennis three years and said he never won a match. By 1935 he was employed as an engineer for the Resettlement Administration Land Purchase Program with his home in Douglas.

Vern's start in construction was by accident. A rancher wanted some stock water dams built and asked Vern if he would do the engineering for him and find a contractor to do the work. Vern couldn't find a builder at the price offered so he and Bill Moore, son of LeRoy Moore, organized the Knisely-Moore Company. The initial capital was $2,000.00 which they borrowed. The company was to become one of the biggest highway and heavy construction companies in the mountain west states. The company was sold in 1970.

Garetson-Knisely (a drilling company) was organized with Vern serving as president from 1939 to 1946. He recalls the time an oil well was discovered in Nebraska but by the time some of the backers were through celebrating, it was salt water.

In 1943-44, Floyd Bartling and Vern started a timbering operation near Esterbrook and a post-treating plant in south Douglas between the tracks west of where Judy Gibb lives in 1985. The operation employed German prisoners of war. One night, sparks from the incinerator ignited the post plant and it burned to the ground. The Douglas Volunteer Fire Department performed well, and "Bart" and Vern were not discouraged so they rebuilt the plant; and to show their appreciation to the fire fighters, they had a fireman banquet at the LaBonte Hotel. While they were dining the plant burned down again. That finished it.

Vern has served community and state in many capacities. Some of them are: Member of the Wyoming State Highway Commission 1974-76, Member of Governor Hathaway's Legislative and Executive Reorganization Commission 1971, President of Wyoming Association of General Contractors 1951-52 and Chairman of the Converse County Republican Central Committee.

Some of the outstanding honors he has received are: Wyoming Outstanding Business Man for 1963-64 by the College of Commerce and Industry at the University of Wyoming, the Charles M. Smith AGC Civic Activity Award 1974 and the Wyoming Recreation Achievement Award 1977.

The first nine holes on the Douglas-Converse County Golf Course were designed by Vern. He is forever thinking of ways to improve the course even if it is the high grass around the green that raises the handicaps and wrecks the scores.

Vern and Edith Clayton Morton were married in 1954. One daughter, Jill (Feldhausen), was born to them. She presently lives in Tucson, Arizona.

Edith had previously been married to James Morton, son of John and Sarah Morton. They were married in 1934 and had four children: James Jr., Margaret (Picchetti), John and Sarah (Monroe).

Vern has two children by a previous marriage: Nancie (Rauch), died in 1976, and Jay.

Knittle, Frank Severn and Mary

Frank Severn Knittle first traveled to the West from the family home in Port Carbon, Pennsylvania, to spend a summer in the Black Hills of South Dakota, with his brother. A diary kept by him detailed his trip by train to Nebraska, and then by stage to the Hills. It also recorded hunting and fishing in the area.

In 1888, his brother, Robert H. Knittle, moved to Douglas, Wyoming, where in 1890, he organized the Douglas Hardware and Lumber Company which later became the Florence Hardware Company. Frank Knittle moved to Douglas and joined his brother in the business.

Mr. Knittle was active in the affairs of the growing town of Douglas. He returned to Pennsylvania, where on January 12, 1893, he married Mary Priscilla Stockett. After honeymooning in the South, the couple resided in Port Carbon until March when they returned to Douglas where he had built a home on North Third Street.

They were blessed with seven children, all born in Douglas. Five graduated from the Converse County High School and the two youngest boys from Natrona County High. Only the two younger boys are living, one in Greybull and the other in Littleton, Colorado. Three of the sons were ex-service men in World War I, one serving in the Canadian Army. The sons became professionals; two accountants, two civil engineers, and one an agent of the FBI.

Frank Knittle served as Postmaster, County Surveyor, and Superintendent of a division of the State Water Department, while residing in Douglas. As a surveyor, he had probably walked all of Niobrara and Converse Counties, staking land for homesteaders and oil and mineral prospectors.

At Douglas, he was active in the local gun club. Undated news clippings relate that the team of Knittle, Morton, Jesurun, Richards, Rutherford and F. Foxton scored 205 out of 300 clay birds, only to lose to the team of Hardenbrook, Rimington, Barrow, Cooper, Dickson and G. Foxton, with a score of 216. On another match, Rimington, Cooper, Knittle, and Jenne outshot Jesurun, Hardenbrook, Richards and Rutherford. Losers entertained the winners and their wives at the LaFayette Restaurant at elaborate banquets prepared by Chef Olivereau.

In 1928, the Knittles moved to Casper, Wyoming, where Frank became City Engineer for this booming oil town. He held this post intermittently until the late forties. After moving to Casper, he took up golf, aiding the building of the City public course. He won a number of awards, and was runner-up in a state tournament.

He was active in the Masonic bodies, becoming Grand Master of the Wyoming Grand Lodge. He also held offices in the Shrine and Consistory.

Mrs. Knittle was one of the founders of the Job's Daughters and in 1918, she was Worthy Grand Matron of the Order of Eastern Star. She also served as state and local president of the American War Mothers, and was a member of the DAR.

Mrs. Knittle died in Casper in 1948, and Mr. Knittle died in Denver in 1950. As of 1983, two children, eleven grandchildren and nineteen great grandchildren survive these Wyoming pioneers.

Koch, Jacob and Elizabeth

Jacob "Jake" L. Koch was born September 11, 1890 at Merna, Custer County, Nebraska. He was the fourth child of Johann and Mary Koch. Johann and Mary were from Wurtenberg, Germany. Johann had been married to Katherine Flickinger, previously.

After Katherine died, Johann married Mary Deinen-ger and had even more children, making 13 in all. Jake belonged to this second family.

Johann moved his family from Pearl City, Illinois to Custer County, Nebraska in 1889. The three older boys from this first family moved with them. The three younger children had died before they moved. These three older boys were a great help to Johann and Mary in their new homeland.

They purchased a small farm in Custer County. They first had a sod house. They lived and worked hard and happily together until April 17, 1899 when Johann was burned to death in a prairie fire. He had soaked down the hay stack and left the older boys with extra barrels of water to protect themselves. He started back to the house to be sure Mary and the younger children were safe. They found his burned body in a ditch where the fire had caught up with him before he reached the house.

Jake was just eight years old when this happened. The older boys continued to help Mary and the four remaining children. They built a new frame house which made life a little easier for Mary.

In 1907 Mary married Jacob B. Klump and they moved into Broken Bow, Nebraska. He died in 1924 and she was again left a widow. Her older children resented this second marriage and spent little time at home after this.

Jake and the other children attended school in Merna but had lots of work and chores to do at home as well. Jake went to school four years.

Jake grew up with Mary to guide him and as she was a good Christian and church member, Jake too was a good Christian. As he moved around, there was not always a Lutheran Church so he and his family attended the church services available to them. Later in Verse there were usually only traveling missionary services. When they moved to Sheridan they joined the First Christian Church and were able to attend regularly.

Jake grew up working on farms around Custer County. He worked hard and played hard, too. No one loved a practical joke more than Jake. He was always teasing, joking and laughing.

On June 29, 1910, he married Elizabeth Grace Haefele at McKinley, Custer County, Nebraska, at the home of her parents, Joseph Haefele, born November 20, 1864, Pottstown, Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, died April 18, 1930 at Calloway, Custer County, Nebraska and Mary Belle Booth, born December 10, 1870 at Kalamazoo, Kalamazoo County, Michigan, died January 5, 1935 at Calloway, Custer County, Nebraska.

Elizabeth was the first child in a family of eleven children.

Jake and Lizzie leased farms around Merna, McKinley, and Lillian for the next twelve years. In 1921 Jake and Ralph Haefele went to Verse, Wyoming where they had heard there was good homestead land. They filed claims and April 1922 the Koch family moved to Wyoming.

By this time they had five children:

Lawrence Leonard, born October 13, 1911 at McKinley, Custer, Nebraska, married Geneva Izetta Whipple Harris on May 17, 1933, died August 29, 1965 and was buried in West Lawn Cemetery, Gering, Nebraska.

Raymond Eugene, born December 9, 1913 at Merna, Custer, Nebraska, married Frances Pauline Hollister on October 31, 1937.

Warren George, born April 4, 1916 at Lillian, Custer, Nebraska, married Lois Pauline James on February 15, 1943, died May 2, 1979.

Helen Bernadine, born September 2, 1918 at Merna, Custer, Nebraska, married Ward Rea on December 12, 1938.

Orval Loren, born February 8, 1921 at Merna, Custer, Nebraska, married Patricia Lee Hughes on May 17, 1953.

On the new dry farm they were even more isolated than in Nebraska. It was 60 miles south to Douglas, the county seat, where they went once a year to buy the year's supply of groceries, clothing and other supplies. It was 60 miles north to Gillette and nine miles to Verse where there was a small general store, post office and school. Ralph and Charles Haefele (brothers of Lizzie) each had homesteads four miles south. Visits with these neighbors and others were their chief form of entertainment. They would sometimes go after chores were done to have supper, spend the night playing cards, have breakfast and return home to the morning chores. The children played together until they fell asleep. The families had dances at their homes that lasted all night, also.

The yearly trips to town were an important occasion. One time Warren had an accident with a .22 gun and had to go to Douglas to have a doctor sew it up and remove the bullet from his hand. He was so happy to go to town he didn't mind the injuries. The doctor did not find the bullet. It later worked down into Warren's finger and Jake removed it with a straight razor.

Water in Wyoming was a scarce commodity, especially good drinking water. Much of the water was alkali. On the homesteads was a good, cold, sweet water spring but it had to be hauled about one mile in barrels for drinking. They also had a pump for stock water and a cistern to catch rain water for washing, etc. They couldn't build the house right by the spring as it was in a draw and flash floods would come down and wash it away.

They also needed a flat place for house, barns, shed and garden and the field crops. In spite of the fact that they had to haul water so far, one of their favorite fun things was water fights. They used buckets to throw water on each other until the barrels were empty.

Jake, Lizzie and children moved to Wyoming in a Buick touring car but horses were used to do the work on the homestead. A team and wagon were used in the fall to get the years supplies.

In winter, Jake worked in the Best Coal Company coal mine to help supplement their income. In spring, starting in February to June, Jake went shearing sheep. When the boys were old enough, they went too. Jake sometimes worked in the oil fields at Midwest. It was west of the homestead about 50 miles. This left Lizzie and the children home alone a great deal. The boys also worked on neighboring dry farms putting in and harvesting crops. They worked from daylight to dark (4 to 9 o'clock) driving six head of horses harrowing or disking for 50¢ a week.

The children attended the nearest one-room school on horseback, carrying a lunch with them. Some of their favorite teachers were Mrs. Kane, Ruth Walker and Gladys Hanlin. When it came time to go to high school, they could go to Verse for one year but had to stay all week with people at the store and work for board and room or go to Douglas or back to Nebraska and stay with relatives and work for room and board. Lawrence and Raymond both returned to Nebraska. Warren finished ninth grade at Dry Creek then went to work to help earn money to pay Bernadine's board and room in Douglas. Bernadine earned her own way but Warren did buy her class ring. It cost $8, a lot of money in those days. Bernadine graduated from high school in 1937. Orval went to school in a cement house (Fuller's) and then to Verse school through the eighth grade.

Living on the homestead was a hard life but they were a happy family. Their first home was a one room shack on skids. That way it could be used to "prove up on" the next homestead when one family got their house built. The last home Jake and Lizzie had on the homestead was a two room log house. Lights were first, candles, then kerosene, then gasoline.

The variety of food was not great; both Lizzie and Jake ended up with false teeth. Lizzie became quite thin and ill before she finally had hers all pulled. Lizzie was hard of hearing so in later years was happy to have an earphone. The veins in her legs sometimes ruptured and drained. It was caused by an allergy to nylons, which rayon hose cured.

In 1940 war was going on in Europe. Selective Service was voted in by Congress so all young men over 18 were required to register. Warren's registration card is dated October 2, 1940. Warren and Orval joined the National Guard of Wyoming in Douglas February 18, 1941. When Pearl Harbor was attacked December 7, they both went into active service and shipped out to the West Coast for patrol duty. Warren remained on the coast until August 29, 1943 when he was transferred to Army Reserve and sent to work in the Anaconda Copper Mines in Butte, Montana. Orval transferred from 115th Calvary F Troop to the Paratroops. He was sent to Florida for training and then directly overseas to England and on D-Day was in the attack on Normandy. He was taken prisoner that day and remained a prisoner for eleven months. Jake and Lizzie received a telegram that he was missing in action and eventually a prisoner of war. No letters were received from him until peace was declared.

One Fourth of July when all the family was home for vacation and trying to get ready to go to the rodeo, Bernadine couldn't find her toothpaste. Jake says, "here, take mine," so she took her glass of water and went outside to brush her teeth. When she came back he asked how she liked his toothpaste. He had given her the stuff to make his false teeth stick in his mouth. He had all the grandchildren trying to take theirs out like Grandpa did.

In 1948 Jake and Lizzie decided to sell out the homestead and move to Sheridan, Wyoming. They held a farm auction, selling all their cattle and horses and machinery, etc., except the milk cow and chickens and household equipment, and moved.

Jake was still playing jokes on everyone. He kept the handles of brooms at the mill well greased. On their 50th wedding anniversary June 19, 1960, the whole family gathered at their home to celebrate. Jake got an empty pancake mix sack at the mill and filled it with plain flour. Bernadine made pancakes for the crowd, adding extra eggs and shortening to make them good. She finally said, "This is the worst pancake flour I've ever used. I think I'll stick to Aunt Jemima." Lawrence and Raymond were polite enough to eat them without complaining. Although Jake has been playing these kinds of tricks all their lives, Lizzie and all the children still fell for them every time except for Warren. He liked a joke and so looked for the trick first.

On the 29th of August, 1965 Jake and Lizzie were visiting Warren at Daniel, Wyoming when they received word Lawrence had passed away. I've heard of people's hair turning white overnight. Jake's did, from gray to silver white.

About the last time we went to their home, Jake served us prepared cereal in a dog biscuit box. It was labeled bone meal. Warren's family all ate it without comment but when the other children arrived they refused. "No, my God, I'm not going to eat dog biscuits." Jake had lifted the inside wax sack out of a cereal chex packet and placed it in the dog biscuit box.

May 19, 1966 Lizzie died in Sheridan, Wyoming and was buried in the Sheridan Municipal Cemetery in Sheridan.

On February 16, 1967, while visiting his daughter, Bernadine, in Buffalo, Dallas County, Missouri, Jake dropped dead of a heart attack. His body was shipped home to Sheridan and he was buried beside his beloved Lizzie in Sheridan Municipal Cemetery in Sheridan.

He remained a true jokester to the very end. Bernadine worked at the school lunch counter in Buffalo so went that night to work at a ball game. She always fixed the electric percolator so it could just be plugged in to start coffee in the morning. She found the percolator handle greased, so cleaned it up and went to bed. Jake was the last one to go to bed but when they heard him fall they rushed downstairs to find him dead. Bernadine then went to make a pot of coffee and grabbed a handful of grease. He had regreased the percolator handle just before he died.

Jake and the boys were all mechanically minded. Their car was an important part of their lives. Lizzie, however, never learned to drive. She always depended on Jake.

Kollars, Tony and Ethyl

Anton R. "Tony" Kollars was born in Menominee, Cedar County, Nebraska on October 10, 1894. He grew to manhood there, earning his living as a farmer. He entered the army in 1917 and was discharged in 1919.

In 1922, Tony took a homestead 35 miles northeast of Douglas. In 1923, he married Ethel Maxwell who had an adjoining homestead. After their marriage, they combined the two properties. They had no children.

The Kollars had an orchard and received many Wyoming State Fair awards for their excellent fruit.

Ethel died in January 1965; Tony died December 10, 1966, the result of a one car accident on the Walker Creek Road.

The Kollars' property was placed in a trust for two children's homes — one in Casper, the other in Torrington. One-fourth of the property was to be sold each ten years.

Kornegay, George and Lela Family

George Elgin Kornegay, in the year 1915, heard that homesteads of 160 acres were available in Converse County, Wyoming. Having the spirit of a true pioneer and with the encouragement of his wife, Lela, he set out with the hopes of finding a new frontier to settle and a better way of life. He selected a homestead nine miles south of Shawnee, Wyoming.

Over the years, more and more of their neighboring homesteaders moved away. George and Lela were able to increase their holdings to 4200 acres by gradually buying up this land. Some of the lands acquired were the original homesteads of the Warden, Tobin, Shelley, Hetu, Meigs, Pickering, Kiouss and McCann families. George kept and worked his beloved land until his death there on September 23, 1951.

George Kornegay was born May 30, 1886, in Siloam Springs, Arkansas, to John W. and Mary M. Kornegay, one of seven children raised on a farm. George completed his education at the Fox Squirrel School in Siloam Springs. As a young adult he was the pitcher for the local sandlot baseball team. He never lost his love for the game, and was an ardent fan of the New York Yankees as he grew older. He worked for the Kansas City Southern Railroad until he was 23 years of age, when he left the area to marry Lela Ardella Pickering.

Lela Ardella Pickering was born June 21, 1887, in Atlanta, Nebraska, to Abel and Hannah Anthony Pickering, one of twelve children. The family left Atlanta, Nebraska when Lela was seven years old. Lela remembered her job well on the journey, for it would be repeated again on her move to Wyoming. It was her responsibility to tend the white cow and keep her with the wagon so the family would have milk. After completing her schooling in Siloam Springs, Lela returned to Atlanta, Nebraska, and married George there on June 27, 1909.

George and Lela honeymooned in Denver, remaining there four years while George worked in construction. His experience in both carpentry and masonry enabled George to construct all the buildings on the ranch in Wyoming. When construction slowed down in Denver, they moved to Scottsbluff, Nebraska, where George worked in the sugar mill for one year. Weary of the long hours, poor working conditions, and with an intense desire to be independent, George quickly took advantage of the opportunity to homestead in Converse County.

It was a day to remember, this typical hot and windy August 15, 1915, as George, Lela and their sons, Paul and Hugh, arrived at their homestead with two horses, a cow, and a dog. In order to have transportation and a place to live, the family made the five day journey from Scottsbluff, Nebraska by covered wagon. As they set up their wagon, which was to be their home for two years until the first home was built, they were soon aware of their situation. There were no fences or close neighbors, only the still of the night and the occasional howling of the coyotes. When they looked out at a herd of antelope grazing, and realized they could see forever, they knew they had made the right choice. Never looking back, they devoted their lives to their land, raised their family, and contributed to the development of a community while suffering the hardships and joys of life on the frontier, the hallmarks of true pioneers.

They had the foresight to bring woolen clothing and bedding for winter arrived early. They gathered firewood, hauled water from a spring one mile away, cleared sagebrush, built fences, bought more cattle, and planted ten acres of wheat the first year. One of the most difficult days for Lela occurred when a herd of wild horses from the open range trampled her garden, even though she was waving a white cloth and trying to herd them away. During the first three years Lela often took care of the homestead while George worked for Harry Haas, the first postmaster and general store operator at Shawnee, Wyoming. George generally took his wages out in staples to supplement what they were raising.

Over the years it was necessary for the Kornegays to diversify. They always raised a commercial grade of cattle, using the F Lazy F (F) brand. During the depression years they sold milk and cream and raised chickens and hogs that were butchered. The meat, as well as, the eggs were sold to friends and door-to-door in Douglas. As more and more sod was plowed under and cultivated for feed and cash crops, George, being very progressive, recognized the need for mechanization. He bought the first tractor in that part of the country, a John Deere. With bigger and better equipment he increased the acreage under cultivation to 1000 acres.

Transportation influenced every aspect of family life. The horse or the horse and wagon were the standards for the Kornegays, as they were for all the pioneer families. When the family was able to construct a wagon with rubber tires, and the older boys had a two-wheel cart for courting, they felt they were experiencing luxury. Up until 1930 the cattle were trailed to Shawnee or Orin, Wyoming, and loaded on Chicago Northwestern Railroad cars. George accompanied the cattle to market in Omaha, and always brought special treats from the big city back to the children.

When church services weren't available, George and Lela sang hymns in harmony as their children gathered around their knees. The big social event of the year was threshing time, which went on for weeks. Every meal was a feast as neighbor helped neighbor for miles around. The power for the threshing machine was John Nance's big black steam engine which was appreciated by all ages. The whistle could be heard for miles and was blown at frequent intervals, to the delight of the children.

George and Lela bought their first car in the early 1920's. In 1928, the Dodge touring car they bought fulfilled their dream of taking their family back to their roots in Siloam Springs, Arkansas, to visit family and friends. The month-long trip was all they expected it to be; however, one of the things remembered most was the number of flat tires, due to the gravel roads. The occasional trip to Douglas on Saturday, by car, was greatly anticipated by the Kornegay children. A walk along the streets with friends, a visit to the dime store, a cone or hamburger at the Kandy Koop, and time in the Carnegie Library to gather the box of books for next week's reading, filled the entire day. During their high school years the Kornegays attended public dances Saturday night at Shawnee, Lost Springs, or Glendo, with Lela ever present as their chaperone. The state fair in Douglas became the highlight for entertainment for the year.

The coming of the car not only affected individuals but it changed communities. More and more families went to Douglas during the 1930's where they could tend to all their business in one day. Shawnee, which had been the heart of the community, dwindled from a business district of two grocery stores, a post office, two meeting halls, a newspaper, bank, and lumberyard, to a combined general store - post office and a filling station. During the early years George and Lela hauled their produce to Shawnee by team and wagon, returning with needed goods or a load of coal from the mine north of Shawnee. This was replaced by trucking produce and livestock to Douglas, and hauling coal back to the ranch from Gillette, Wyoming.

All of the Kornegay children, except the two youngest, started school in the one-room school house one mile south of their home. Occasionally the teacher lived in the school house, but generally lived with the Kornegay family. After 1932, all the children went by bus to the schools in Shawnee. They all graduated from Shawnee High School except the two youngest; Calvin graduated from Douglas High School and Lois from Glenrock High School, as there were no longer enough students to justify keeping the high school at Shawnee open. George and Lela advocated higher education as a major goal in life, which greatly influenced their children. All of the children moved away from Converse County except Calvin, either to attend a university or to enter the job market. After completing his tour in the military service, Calvin returned to the ranch.

Throughout their married life, George and Lela took an active role in community affairs. They were available when neighbors needed help, assisted in building meeting halls and schools, and were members of the Methodist Church. Their chief interest was education for all children evidenced by George's serving 17 years on the school board and Lela being elected to fill the office vacancy when he stepped down. He was most influential in getting electricity through the REA to the ranches south of Shawnee in the early 1940s. Prior to this he had provided electricity to his own household by a wind-charger and battery system he developed.

Lela carried on the ranching activities after George's death in 1951, with the assistance of son Calvin, who shared her love for this kind of life. Lela moved to her home in Douglas in 1966. She was semi-retired from the ranch until it was sold to Jim Bright, a neighbor, in 1970. Calvin purchased a ranch six miles south of Douglas and continued to operate it until his death on April 11, 1977. His wife, Frances Anderson Saffels, operates the ranch with his two children, Shawn Lee Kornegay, born May 17, 1966, and Heidi Ann Kornegay, born December 12, 1975.

George and Lela Kornegay were the parents of eight children: Paul A. (now deceased) married Ruth Frederick in Sidney, Nebraska in 1945, and had three children, Corri, Elena, and Kevin. Hugh married Marie Pilcher in Wheatland, Wyoming in 1943, and had one son, Harley. Faye married Archie Black at Lusk, Wyoming in 1936, and had two sons, Allan and Larry. Sidney married Florence Rentz in Cheyenne, Wyoming in 1947, and had five children, Gary, Burl, Debbie, Julia, and Glenna. Shirley married Russell Vaudrey in Tucson, Arizona in 1946, and had two children, Sharon and Daniel. Lila married Herman Schoenfeld in Salt Lake City, Utah in 1947. Calvin married Frances Anderson in Ft. Collins, Colorado in 1966, and had two children, Shawn and Heidi. Lois married Harold Smith in Houston, Texas in 1946, and had three children, Stanley, Connie, and Candance.

Lam Family

Andrew Calvin Lam and Susan Ann Anderson, of Rockbridge County, Virginia, were married June 6, 1872, and had six children, three of whom came to Wyoming: William Irby Lam, James Finley Lam, and Claude White Lam.

William Irby Lam (called Irby) left his home in Rockbridge County, Virginia, in 1896 for the San Joaquin Valley in California, where his mother's brother, Rush Anderson, lived. He remained there for four years and then came to Glenrock, Wyoming in 1900. When he first arrived, he worked for John Higgins. Later he homesteaded and bought land north of the Platte River and ran sheep. He married May Kimball, daughter of another pioneer family, Col. and Mrs. Emerson H. Kimball, in November 1904, and she and her child died at childbirth in 1909. He later married Margaret Smith, a teacher, and she and her child also died at childbirth in April 1918. He never married again but lived out his life in Glenrock. He was Justice of the Peace for a number of years and had a furniture store. In his spare time he built barbecue pits, fire places, benches and tables for the city park, which made it a pleasant picnic grounds for the townspeople. He also planted trees and shrubs at the Glenrock Cemetery, being a kind of unpaid caretaker. He died November 16, 1951 at Glenrock.

James Finley Lam came to Glenrock in 1903 by train. His mother's cousin, Stuart Anderson, had homesteaded in Nebraska but found the results discouraging, and had gone to Wyoming. He went back to visit in Virginia and induced some Virginians to come to Wyoming to work.

Irby Lam

James F. Lam was one of these, as well as Bill McMasters, Pres Miller and others. All remained in Glenrock or vicinity until their deaths.

Irby and Jim worked for John Higgins on his ranch when they first came to Wyoming.

Jim married Aurora "Roe" Smith, daughter of the Martin Smiths, also a Wyoming pioneer family, March 17, 1908. They had four sons: Harry, Gordon, Howard, and Gene. Howard married Mary Hildebrand and still lives in Glenrock. Harry married Helen Gillespie of Douglas; she lives in Douglas.

Jim and Roe owned a ranch on Deer Creek east of Glenrock, on what is now known as the Olin Place. They operated a dairy and their sons delivered milk in Glenrock in the mornings before school. Later, oil was discovered on their ranch.

Jim preceded his wife in death in September of 1958. Roe died February 2, 1973.

Harry Lam was a submariner in World War II. Gene Lam is a physician and served in the Korean War. He was a prisoner of war and the first doctor in the history of this country to be awarded the Silver Star.

Claude White Lam came to Glenrock from Virginia when he was 20 years old, arriving August 12, 1905. He rode cross country on the train, changing stations across town in Chicago. His mother had given him a basket of fried chicken and a bottle of wine to eat and drink on his journey. Why he didn't develop food poisoning in the heat is a mystery, but apparently they had some secret then that we don't know now.

Claude got off the train in Parkerton, Wyoming. He was supposed to get off in Glenrock but had fallen asleep, so he had to walk back to Glenrock from Parkerton.

Claude went to work for his brother Irby, herding sheep. Later he bought 100 head of bum lambs and ran them with Irby's herd, and finally built up a herd of his own. He filed and proved up on a homestead north of Glenrock, on Sand Creek. On one occasion Claude accompanied a trainload of livestock to the stockyards in Omaha, Nebraska, which also carried some of their own sheep.

On one of his trips to town he met a Glenrock girl, Grace E. Fenex, daughter of William L. and Sabra Fenex, also Wyoming pioneers. They were married October 2, 1908, at Douglas during the Wyoming State Fair. Grace's lingerie for her wedding was hand-sewn by Mrs. John Higgins, a Frenchwoman raised in a convent in France, whose husband built the Higgins Hotel (now the Tabor Hotel) in Glenrock. Grace rode in a horse race that day at the fair. She was a superb horsewoman, having grown up riding half-wild Indian ponies. Since they were married at the State Fair, they went to the fair nearly every fall. In 1958 they celebrated their golden wedding anniversary at the fair and rode in the parade.

Prior to her marriage, Grace had taken a teaching examination and started teaching at the age of 16, first at Edgemont, South Dakota, and next at Newcastle, Wyoming. Her marriage ended her teaching days.

The first years of Grace and Claude's marriage they lived in a sheep wagon (the forerunner of today's trailer) on their homestead. Their first child, Preston, was born September 29, 1909, and he spent most of his first year in the sheep wagon. Grace would put a tarpaulin on the floor of the sheep wagon and set him on it, but the wind blew so hard that it often lifted the tarp and Preston off the floor, so she had to put him on the bed.

Trips to town were made in a buckboard drawn by a half-broken team. Grace held Preston between her knees while she drove. When they came to a gate she climbed down from the buckboard, set Preston on the ground, opened the gate, drove the buckboard through, then picked up Preston and they continued on their way.

Grace was also a crack shot and supplied part of their food by shooting sage chickens, rabbits and antelope. The smell of sheep is not the most pleasant odor in the world and mutton or lamb was never served in their home. As a matter of fact this writer never tasted either until well into adult life. The water was foul tasting, so mostly they drank canned tomatoes.

William Calvin Lam (called Bill and Kayo interchangeably) was born October 1, 1911, at the Fenex ranch west of Glenrock, where Grace and Claude had moved. The name Kayo was bestowed upon him by C. H. "Okie" Blanchard, because he was small like Kayo Mullins in the comic strip. Notwithstanding his size, he played football at the University of Colorado, and at one time held the nation's ground-gaining record. He was the first Colorado player to play in the East-West Game, and was chosen Cane Bearer (an honor bestowed upon the outstanding graduate) at his graduation in 1936.

Dixie Lam was born August 12, 1914, at Glenrock. Her mother, Grace, was one of the few ragtime piano players in the county and had often played for dances before Dixie's birth. Several of the better known rags she played were "Dill Pickles" and "Maple Leaf Rag." A number of persons came to Grace and begged her to play for some dances, but she refused as she was breastfeeding Dixie. A solution was finally found: Dixie slept in a buggy behind the piano while Grace played; at feeding time everyone took an intermission and Dixie was fed. This was satisfactory to all concerned, and it is said that the baby never cried.

Virginia Grace Lam was born in 1916 at Glenrock, but died at the age of 23 months in 1918, from the influenza which claimed so many lives at that time. She was an exceptionally talented child who could carry a tune perfectly, sing all the words and wait for the interludes. Bill and Dixie sang at gatherings and church, and Virginia would run up onto the stage to sing with them. Often she sang alone, one of her solos being "So Long Dear Old Mother, Kiss Your Soldier Boy Goodbye," a popular tune at the beginning of World War I. Mrs. Higgins always wept when she heard Virginia sing and said, "That baby is too smart. She will never live."

Meantime Grace and Claude had moved into a home in Glenrock to hold their growing family. A bad blizzard had killed all of Claude's and Irby's sheep in a pile-up, and all they salvaged was from the sale of the hides. Claude had become involved in other enterprises, one of which was a long-line skinner outfit of 16 horses. He moved heavy equipment and at one time moved an oil rig from Casper to Lost Soldier Field. Another enterprise was operating a livery stable in Glenrock with his brother Jim.

Later Claude worked for Continental Oil Company at its refinery in Glenrock, retiring in 1950. In 1957 he was appointed Justice of the Peace, was elected to that office in 1958, and held office until December 31, 1975.

Grace died June 25, 1973, at the age of 83. She was a fifty year member of the Order of Eastern Star and Republican Committee Woman for many years.

Claude died February 14, 1976 at the age of 91. He was a member of the Masonic Lodge. Many persons thought he resembled Will Rogers, and he was well known for the same brand of homespun humor.

Grace and Claude are both buried in the cemetery in Glenrock. The Claude Lam family tombstone ordered by Claude before his death bears the following inscription: "Let us cross the river and rest under the shade of the trees." Grace's grave marker states that she was the "Daughter of Wyoming Pioneers," and Claude's grave marker states that he was the "Son of a Confederate Soldier."

During World War II, William C. Lam was Flight Deck Officer on the carrier Yorktown, and Dixie Lam was a WAC in the Air Force.

Lane, William and Bell Family

William Lane was born on June 23, 1883 near Lincoln, Nebraska of English parents, Richard and Fannie Lane, who immigrated to a farm in the eastern part of Nebraska. Here William, the fifth child of nine, was educated and grew to manhood.

William, or Bill as he was better known, married Isabell (Bell) Julia Horton on October 1, 1907 at O'Neil, Ida, Bell and Ethel Lane on their school bus.

Nebraska. Bell was born January 31, 1888, near Stuart, Nebraska in a sod hut. Her parents were George and Frances Horton. They were also English, coming to this country on their honeymoon. Traveling overland in a covered wagon, they settled in Holt County, near Stuart; this is in the western part of Nebraska. In those days Indians raided the settlers, taking their horses. Because of this, George Horton kept oxen to do his work.

Bill and Bell Lane and their two daughters, ages 4 and 6, came to Wyoming in 1914, homesteading the present ranch on Shawnee Creek, 16 miles east of Douglas. Many more pieces of land were bought and added to the ranch. Son Chester now owns and runs the spread.

Being short of finances, Bill obtained work on the Northwestern Railroad receiving $1.50 per day. He walked the four miles to and from work. In those days you worked six days a week. In the evening after work, he fenced, plowed the fields and planted grain, often for many hours into the night if there was moonlight.

Many seasons Bell cooked for the community sheepherders at the Fisher Shearing Pens.

Bell was a skilled horsewoman. She took her older daughter four and one-half miles to and from school on horseback. Unable to leave the younger daughter alone, Ida was put in front of her mother, sharing the saddle. I rode behind. The teacher suggested that Mother should leave Ida at school for it would be a hardship on a small child to go back and forth, that far, to school each day.

Our school bus was a little gray Indian pony. She was a tough feisty one.

The ranch was a stop-over for many a wandering cowboy. They were always welcomed with a hot meal for themselves and feed for their horses.

One cowboy, who frequently stopped by, Jack Lassiter (called Peg-Leg Jack because of a wooden leg) was most welcomed by us girls. He always had a small bag of hard candy for us.

One time, after he had been hitting the bottle and was full of talk, he kept getting in front of Mother while she was preparing supper. Finally, he sat on the back of the stove directly over the reservoir. Suddenly he jumped straight up off the hot place, much to the delight of us girls.

Bell Lane did a great amount of tatting in those early days, selling her beautiful work to customers in Douglas. One time she tatted a trousseau that included lace for pillow slips, sheets, gown, and petticoat, a corset cover, dust cap, collar for a dress and edging for bedroom curtains. For this she received $100.00, a fabulous price then.

William died in July 1949 and Bell died Jan. 19, 1974.

William and Bell Lane were the parents of three children. Ethel Ann, who married Victor Olson of Marshall, Minnesota. To them were born four children: Richard Wayne Olson, Lovell, Wyoming; Robert Lane Olson, Los Angeles, California; Reita Lois Olson Ruddy, Santa Maria, California; and William Olson, Pismo Beach, California.

Ida Francis Lane married Floyd Jones of Thermopolis, Wyoming. They have no children.

Chester Ivan Lane married Minnie Taylor of Douglas, Wyoming. They have four children: Roberta Lynne Lane Follum, Texas; Carol Leigh Lane Follum, Douglas, Wyoming; Lee Frederick Lane, Douglas, Wyoming; Judy Luella Lane Blessing, Sturgis, South Dakota.

Langan, James and Adelee

In the spring of 1936, Stanolind Pipe Line Company, assigned me as Material & Time Supervisor to the project of reconditioning the oil pipe line which ran from Glenrock to Freeman, Missouri. Before any work actually commenced, I visited states along the system and accepted advance shipments of material.

When arriving at Welch Station (Clayton Tank Farm) on the banks of the North Platte River, some 15 miles east of Glenrock, it was interesting to see 150 of 80,000 barrel tanks full of crude oil and the pump station just as they had left it after litigation regarding the Tea Pot Dome controversy. The station held two 500 HP McIntosh-Seymour air injection diesel engines and two triplex plunger pumps. On the station grounds was a tall water tower and a smaller tower for fuel to run the diesels.

North of the station site were four two-bedroom houses with garages and a water tower. There was a schoolhouse at the tank farm about 100 yards west of the cottages. Our eldest child (Leroy) started to school there. Mrs. Bill Vollman, Sr. was his teacher. Mrs. Vollman lived with us during the week and returned to their ranch weekends during the school year.

During actual reconditioning work, I spent most of my time in Nebraska and Kansas. After reconditioning work was completed, I changed my work from construction to operating pump stations. In 1938 I was transferred from the station in Washington, Kansas to Welch Station. My wife and I with our one-year-old son were back in the Rocky Mountain area where we wanted to be.

Living in Glenrock, I had to drive to and from Welch Station day or night as my shift required. To overcome this inconvenience, I thought of buying a 40 acre spot of land between Welch Station and the river and building living quarters thereon. For some reason, that small spot had never been homesteaded or purchased. But I soon changed my mind when I saw the sand hill located thereon blown by every wind, and the winds were frequent. Now I see the sand hill is a half mile east of where it was then.

My work schedule was six hours a day, six days a week. Every three months the engineer moving from fourth shift to second shift had sixty hours off duty. My wife, Adelee, and our one-year-old son used these long shifts to see the surrounding country - Black Hills, Thermopolis, Laramie Peak, etc. I dieselized my Dodge coupe and on 6¢ a gallon we could go a lot. In hunting season, I once got an elk on my 60 hours off.

Two of our children were born at Welch. Dr. Tabor was our doctor and the prenatal care and home delivery cost was $35.00. The private nurse was an additional cost.

The Robert Hildebrands were our nearest ranch neighbors and much of my time was spent with Bob during haying, threshing and hunting seasons. Joe Paddick worked at Welch and we became friends. One dark stormy night when we were at work, Joe came into the station after gauging one of the oil tanks and told me lightning had struck one of the tanks and a ball of fire rolled around the top rim of the tank until it hit the vent pipe, then came down and went into the ground.

As the tanks were emptied, they were left standing until World War II. Then they began to be torn down. This continued on a daily basis for several months. Then our government declared that no more steel would be shipped after a certain date, so dismantling crews were increased and worked around the clock to get as much steel as possible before the deadline. An abundance of steel was left stacked at the site when the deadline date arrived. This made an excellent shelter for cottontail rabbits. I used to take my .22 rifle and sit on the tank dyke and shoot rabbits galore. We liked rabbit meat and when we couldn't keep up with the supply, Adelee would mix it with pork and make sausage. Her parents came from Oklahoma for an extended visit. After they were with us a while her dad told me, "Jim, if I eat any more rabbit I am going to start jumping."

An odd thing about the pipeline was that when it was built it had 17 stations to pump the oil, many of them never used. Once the oil went over the hill at Glendo, it was downhill the rest of the way. If a break in the line occurred in Nebraska or Kansas and it was necessary to stop the flow of oil in the line, they didn't dare close the valves down there until the valves west of the leak were closed; the farthest west closed first then the next east of there, etc. Otherwise, the line pressure would rupture the line. Of course, we had gauges to indicate the amount of oil pumped each hour, but we also had to record the number of strokes the pump made each hour, so we knew how much oil was put in the pipeline each hour. In addition to these checks we often would check the oil in the tank being emptied by having a hand tape measurement made of the oil in the tank. During cold weather this verification was worthless because the oil would be so thick it would have a higher level on the opposite side of the tank than on the outlet side where the gauge was taken. As long as the oil in the line was kept moving, the pressure would remain quite constant. However, if there was a leak in the line or mechanical trouble at the station, the pumping was discontinued. The oil would be difficult to start moving again after the cause of the interruption was eliminated. Sometimes in cold weather portable pumping units would have to be tied into the line at various places and the oil circulated and agitated until it was liquified and would flow through the line. It was interesting work and constantly checking the diesel engines, pumps and auxiliary equipment kept one alert.

The company made a change. They removed the diesel engines and installed electric motors to run the pumps. About all we had to do was to 'be there' and phone in our hourly report of barrels pumped and the pressure on the line. It was a responsible but an easy job with very few variations.

Some of us had gardens back of the garages toward the school house. One time, a lot of honey bees swarmed at the school house. Two of the engineers, Stewart and Morgan, decided to hive them. They were inexperienced and unprepared and some of the bees got up their pant legs. No matter that they were in the open in plain view of onlookers; they stripped to their birthday suits in a hurry.

Larkin, Miles and Anna Family

Miles Joseph Larkin was born February 22, 1891 in Lebanon, Missouri, the ninth child and fourth son of the 14 children of John and Bridget Gibbons Larkin. John Larkin, son of James and Winifred Larkin, was born in West Virginia in 1852. Bridget Gibbons, daughter of Miles and Ann Hastings Gibbons of County Mayo, Ireland, was born in Alton, Illinois in 1859. Miles Gibbons and James Cardinal Gibbons were first cousins. (In 1917, Theodore Roosevelt called Cardinal Gibbons the most respected, venerated, and useful citizen of the United States.)

The Larkin family lived on a farm about two miles from Conway, Missouri. Here Miles received his education which ended with the eighth grade.

In 1905, when Miles was 14, he went to work for his grandfather Gibbons on the railroad. Evidently the Gibbons family owned a railroad and was in the process of expanding it.

About 1914, Miles left Missouri and went north to Nebraska to the Tekamah area where he rented a farm. It was here that he became acquainted with the George Beaver family. The Beaver brothers and Miles Larkin were to remain lifelong friends.

In 1919, Miles came to Wyoming with Ernest and Raymond Beaver. They traveled in the Beavers' Model T truck. At first they lived in tents. Cabins were built after the arrival of three more of the Beaver brothers - Charlie, Bill, and Irette. Bill's cabin was built first, and the men lived together until the other cabins could be constructed. The men all helped each other and purchased needed equipment and supplies together.

Miles received the patent to his 640 acres on September 19, 1923.

During the '20s, Miles worked in the Salt Creek Oil Field. He was working here during the Salt Creek flood when all the oil field workers were called upon to aid flood victims.

After Ernest Beaver began the Douglas Co-Op, Miles returned to Douglas and worked for him. The salary was $15 per week. Miles was working here when he married Anna Catherine "Ann" Kirn, the daughter of Matt and Mary Scobe Kirn, on April 19, 1933 in Glenrock. Anna was born in Rock Springs on July 20, 1907.

John Ackard "the wheat king of Kansas" arrived in Douglas in 1934 with his doodlebug. He drilled two summers for oil on the Hiram Daniels place. Miles, Hank White, and Charlie Bauman were among his employees. No sign of oil was found.

Miles and Anna moved to Casper where Miles worked for Fred Goodstein. The couple's only child Catherine Ida "Kati" was born here on August 16, 1936.

Later that year, Miles went to Cut Bank, Montana as a roughneck. He was injured on an oil rig and received compensation of $75 per month for the next three years.

In April 1939, the Larkin family moved back to Douglas. They purchased from the Town of Douglas for $25 five 25 foot lots full of sagebrush and cactus in the Fairview Addition on Jefferson Street. At that time there were no streets and only about five houses. The addition was still outside of city limits and no modern facilities were available. Electricity came first; then in 1944, the water and sewer lines were laid by the WPA; natural gas was made available in the late '40s.

With the help of Frank Kirn, Ann's brother, they built a small house; in 1947, the house was enlarged and a basement added.

Because of his oil field experience, Miles was positive that there was oil on the George Beaver property (Peter Lewandowski homestead) in the Walker Creek area. In 1940, he started to drill an oil well and employed Hank White, Barney and Red Wensel, and his brothers-in-law Matt Kern and Frank Kirn. Finances played out before the well could be drilled deep enough to determine if there was more oil than the trace that was found. Today oil is pumped in areas surrounding this drill site, but no drilling has taken place near enough to determine if indeed oil was under that drilling rig.

In 1943, Miles worked on the construction of the P.O.W. Camp; and after its completion, he and Matt Kern went to work in the oil field at Lance Creek. He then went to Hamilton Dome where he worked in '45 and '46. Ann and Catherine would ride the train to Thermopolis on weekends and holidays to visit him.

After this, Miles worked mainly on highway construction projects. On one job, he was employed as a flagman trying to keep cars from running into the gravel piled along the center of the road. Along came a car driven by a New York lady. Vigorously waving a red flag, Miles tried to get the driver to slow down - to no avail. As the car sped by, the occupants waved at him. Suddenly the car hit the gravel pile and was mired up to its axles. Miles ran up and said to the lady driver, "Didn't you see me waving you to slow down?" The lady meekly replied, "I thought you were flirting with me." Miles threw up his hands and walked away. He never did say whether or not he helped her out of the gravel.

Ann worked at various jobs which included the Woodruff Seed House, John Fotes' cafe, and substitute mail carrier for Roy Wampler. In 1951, she began working as a maid at the LaBonte Hotel for Hazel Ball. She retired from the hotel 28 years later in 1979.

In December 1953, the family went to Missouri for a visit. This was the first time that Miles had been back since he left almost 40 years before. In 1958, Miles returned to Conway and purchased an 80 acre farm which joined his nephew's farm. Every fall he would drive to Missouri and spend the winter; he would return to Douglas in the spring.

Miles passed away in Douglas on March 15, 1963.

Catherine graduated from Converse County High School in 1954, a member of the last class to graduate from the high school building located at Fourth and Oak Streets. She was employed by LeBar Motor Company before attending college at the Colorado School of Mines in Golden. She then worked in Casper 18 months before accepting employment with the U.S. Forest Service in Douglas. In November 1957, Kati became the first full time district clerk to be employed by the Medicine Bow National Forest. Fire dispatching was the most interesting part of the job and provided many stories to remember. Kati resigned from the position in April 1974.

On Friday, September 13, 1974, Catherine married John R. Pexton, the son of Lisle and Lucille Pexton who was born in Douglas on September 27, 1925, in a ceremony performed in Washington Park in Douglas.

Kati's past activities include serving as recording secretary of the Wyoming Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs and several garden club offices before becoming the 1983-85 president of the Wyoming Federation of Garden Clubs, Inc. Governor Ed Herschler appointed her to a three year term on the Wyoming Council for the Humanities in 1979. She presently is serving as Secretary-Treasurer of the Wyoming Pioneer Association, a position she has held since 1979. Kati is currently Converse County's member on the Selective Service Local Board #5.

From 1948 through 1961, Ann worked for Converse County preparing the agricultural exhibits for the county's booth in the Agricultural Hall at the Wyoming State Fair. It was she who made all the grain and grass sheaves and cleaned the grains, beans, and other samples for exhibit.

She has exhibited her garden produce at the fair for almost 40 years. For 12 consecutive years, her cut flowers won the 25 mile radius sweepstakes.

Ann is regarded as an expert gardener and her yard is a place of beauty. In 1977, she was awarded the Yard of the Year plaque by the Jackalope Victory Gardeners Garden Club and the Douglas Jaycees. She continues to remain active and still resides at 1034 Jefferson Street.

Lass, Al and Mable Family

Al Lass was born April 1, 1886 and grew up at Clinton, Iowa. At an early age he decided to see for himself if the stories of the West were true and landed in Converse County, Wyoming. His first work was for the Cross-Leman family ranches in LaPrele country. It was there he met Mable Rice, daughter of Charles and Almina Rice. Mable was a talented enterprising lady for the times. From the time she was quite small, Mable loved to draw and paint. This would lead to an enjoyable and sometimes profitable hobby in years to come. Members of the family have sketches of her work while she was still in her teens, and she was very good at copying portraits with pastels. In addition, she set up a small business in the Rice home and very often the front parlor became a "sitting" room for pictures of friends and relation with her old-fashioned box camera complete with black cloth and tripod.

Al and Mable's wedding, February 10, 1909, was a neighborhood occasion with friends and relatives coming to celebrate with good food and dancing. Al and Mable set up housekeeping nearby and eventually gained more land around the original homestead acres. The first child, Stanley, arrived in 1910, then came Verna in 1913, Arthur "Jeff" in 1915, Maude in 1916, Houston in 1918, and Virginia in 1922. During this time Al sold horses to the army and one year ran a sale-ring in the south where horses were bought and sold. While there the family came down with the measles — all except Stanley. They waited for him to break out, and finally decided he would not get them. During the long train ride back Stanley did come down with them, and a very sick little boy spent the rest of the journey under blankets so the conductor would not make them leave the train. During this time Mable had become ill with a goiter. The doctors could not help, and during a winter storm on Jan. 4, 1926, she passed away. Neighbors and friends helped with sleds and horses to get her body to Glenrock for burial. Al decided to sell the ranch — the "Deadwood" went to the George Crosses, and other parts went to Charles Horr, and Charles Rice bought the original homestead. Stanley, the oldest, continued to live with his grandparents, the Rices, while Al and the other children left to live in Glenrock, Wyoming.

Ashland Steam Laundry

Alfred and Mable (Rice) Lass. 1909.

Al worked for a time at the Glenrock Refinery, but when the offer of marshal, and later, deputy sheriff, came along, Al accepted. This was a job Al enjoyed. Raising five children during the depression was not an easy task, but the family enjoyed good memories of those days. Al recalled to the family, during a family dinner one afternoon, how surprised he was one day when he went to "shake down" a train in the Glenrock yards he thought a wanted man may be riding in. When he got to the end cars, he noticed a bundle of clothes at the rear and thought he had his man! To his surprise, when he approached the "pile," it turned out to be his own son, Jeff, and a friend. They were "hitching" a ride to Montana to break wild horses. Al said he never did let on to the boys but what he knew they were there all along! Thank goodness he spotted them, or it may have been a long time between lunches for those two youngsters!

Prohibition brought with it a share of problems to any town, even one as small as Glenrock. And, then, like today, there were so many car wrecks involving teens. These were especially hard for Al as many of them were friends of his own children.

Verna was the oldest girl; and her brother, Houston, still recalls the "coffee cake" she made that turned out to have a bunch of funny specks through it! When the kids complained, "Each got a kick under the table from Dad!" It seems Verna had put coffee grounds into the cake instead of brewed coffee! "We had to eat that entire cake; grounds and all."

Al's scrapbook shows clippings covering many years of law enforcement. However, it is hard to get a clear picture of his career as the clippings are not dated, and the source is usually not given. Glancing through them the reader will find everything from murders, stolen cars, robberies, to returning a diving board to the Douglas City Pool after it was stolen by pranksters. Al became Sheriff of Converse County when Sheriff Ivester died in office. He held that position until he retired in 1955. He was particularly interested in youth and always helped them out when he had a chance — many would send him gifts from prison at Christmas time, and the grandkids always enjoyed the carnival or circus along with any kid he happened to see when the owner of the businesses would give the local sheriff some free passes. Al's career was laced with such incidents as a very cold "wade" in Morton's irrigation ditches on the case of a couple of wanted guys, breaking up slot machines throughout the county in 1951 — (definitely not a popular move!) and, also in 1950, investigating a "Flying Saucer" that turned out to be pieces of a scientific apparatus which had been sent aloft by the University of Minnesota cooperating with the Navy. The editor of the newspaper entitled the Flying Saucer picture, "Our Heroes," but toned it down a bit with a "tongue in cheek" explanation: "Our apologies to Messrs. Lass and (Heavy) White for the picture caption, but the impulse was too great to overcome." During the early days Al was deputy, and later, sheriff, and before the Highway Patrol Department was established, it was up to him to investigate all accidents, speeders, and stolen cars. To top it off, the sheriff was also the local brand inspector. The county got its money's worth from the Sheriff's department! A special memento to the family enjoys is a letter from J. Edgar Hoover in 1953 to Al congratulating him on the capture of William Guy Schultz. Schultz was on the FBI's most-wanted list at the time, and Hoover extended his personal thanks for his apprehension.

The children, meanwhile, had grown up and scattered. Verna and Virginia both passed away with effects of the dreaded tuberculosis. Verna's husband, Delbert Moore, was a casualty when the ship, Liscombe Bay, sank in World War II. A monument beside that of Verna rests in the Glenrock Cemetery for Delbert, even though his body was never recovered. Houston also served in World War II and saw action in the Southern Pacific. He married Carolyn Cowan, from Atlanta, Georgia, and has since made his home there with their daughter, Teresa. Maude married Kenneth Gaut and had three children, Jerry, Doug, and Marilyn Jo ("Lynn"). Jeff did pursue his childhood dream of breaking wild horses, and became a member of the old rodeo club, The Turtle Association. He enjoyed the sport, and the family was very proud of his success. He passed away in January 1941. The three girls and Jeff are buried beside their parents in the family plot in Glenrock, Wyoming. Stanley, the oldest, married Mary (George) and made his home in Converse County. They are retired from the ranch now and enjoy their home in Douglas. They have two daughters, Bette and Sharon.

When Al retired from the Sheriff's department, he made his home for a time in Glenrock, then enjoyed a few years in California before returning to Glenrock to live until his death on Dec. 8, 1964.

Mary and Stanley Lass met at a community dance near Douglas, Wyoming. Stanley and some of the neighborhood young men had formed a dance band and frequently were called upon to play for the Saturday night dances in local communities. These were a favorite form of entertainment during the rough times of the '30s. Stanley was the son of Alfred and Mable D. (Rice) Lass. Mary was the daughter of Hubert and Rose (Falkenburg) George. Mary and Stanley were married after her graduation from high school in 1935. They spent a year on his grandparents' ranch, the Charles Rices, before several years of trapping for ranchers in different areas of the State of Wyoming. This was an unusual life; long winters of being snowed in with a one or two-room cabin, furnished by the rancher, as home. Stanley trapped coyote, bobcat, and lynx during the winter; he set his traps so he rode in a circle from the house every third day, leaving in early morning and arriving home after dark at night. After a day in the saddle in below zero degree weather and howling winds on the Wyoming plains, the bed was a welcome sight! Mary had the company of a radio, enjoyed books and did hand-sewing to fill the long days. When a daughter, Sharon, came along in 1941, Stanley gave up trapping and leased a ranch near Glenrock, Wyoming. This home burned in May of 1944; the Lasses lost almost everything they possessed. They decided to start over on a small ranch southwest of Douglas, Wyoming. A daughter, Bette, was born in Aug. 1944, and the next May they moved to their new home. It wasn't much to look at! All the fences had to be replaced, the meadows reseeded, irrigation ditches dug, barns built, and the house remodeled. But the place gradually took on the appearance of a home and the family enjoyed ranchwork and pleasant memories.

Mary always had a huge garden, lots of chickens, and as typical, more work than a small person like herself should do — but she did it! Stanley milked cows and sold milk and cream for years — sheep were a major source of income with some feeder steers now and then.

Sharon and Bette went to school in the Douglas schools only four miles away. During the summer the only time we consistently went to town was Saturday afternoon for groceries and errands — and 25¢ allowance meant a comic book each and 15¢ to save for a special gift. There were always bum lambs to feed, chickens to care for and cows to get in at night. Stanley's nieces and nephews, from California, came each summer for a visit to round out playmates while school was not in session.

Sharon graduated from high school in 1959, attended business school in Denver during 1959-60, and came home to work until her marriage. Bette graduated in 1962 and worked in Douglas until her marriage in 1963 to Jim Hildebrand. Jim works for the U.S. Post Office at Douglas, Bette works with the Douglas Senior Citizen program, bowling and ceramics, and both enjoy coaching a Junior Archery Club. Their boys, Todd and Troy, and their father, Jim, fill a large wall with archery trophies. They all enjoy hunting with both rifle and bow and arrow. Sharon and Sam Field live in Cheyenne with their two children. Sharon is active in the Wyoming State Historical Society and the Cheyenne Genealogy Society. Both are active leaders in 4-H and enjoy working with young people.

Mary and Stanley decided to retire and move to Douglas, Wyoming. Mary is the past director for the Douglas Senior Citizens, and Stanley enjoys his summer work as the maintenance and groundskeeper, plus handy guide at old Fort Fetterman. There is always time to go fishing, garden and yard work, and to enjoy the grand-kids!

Layton, Frank and Ellen Family

Frank M. Layton, born on April 16, 1864 in Decatur, Illinois, was the son of Henry Clay and Martha Jane Layton.

Ellen Jane Hollonback, born June 15, 1877 in Woodford County, Illinois, was the daughter of William A. Hollonback. Ellen Jane and Frank were married at Wymore, Nebraska on September 7, 1890. Frank died June 19, 1947, Ellen Jane on February 17, 1952.

Frank M. Layton made his home in Nebraska, serving with the notorious Nebraska Company C at the battle of Wounded Knee. He was later engaged in the real estate business in Beatrice, Nebraska. He and Ellen Jane were the parents of three children, Albert Clay, Scott and Iva.

In 1919 Frank came to Wyoming with his two sons for the express purpose of helping them select homestead sites after they had been discharged from the military following World War I. All three of the Laytons found Wyoming to their liking and all three of them filed homestead claims. While Frank was in Douglas, he also approached the local school board in regard to a teaching contract for his daughter, Iva, who was teaching at the time in Nebraska.

The Layton family established residence in Wyoming on August 27, 1919. Frank opened an insurance and real estate business; the two sons set about proving up on their homesteads; and Iva, who had been hired by the school board (by photograph), prepared to bring her teaching career in Wyoming with the opening of the fall term. She was to teach domestic science as well as to serve as vice principal at the Douglas High School, a position she held for 13 years.

Clay Layton's claim was located about 24 miles northwest of Douglas. He started out in the cattle business with an old Guernsey milk cow which he had obtained through the trade of an ancient, tire-less, Model T Ford. He recorded a brand in 1920, the reverse 4L, to be used by all four of the Laytons, Frank, Albert C., Scott and Iva.

Clay Layton married Mary Isabel Negley, daughter of Daniel P. and Sophie Negley, on July 28, 1923 in Douglas, Wyoming. They were the parents of one son, Francis Clay "Pete" Layton. Pete grew to manhood in Douglas and received his education there, continuing on at the California Business College. He married Lois Bliss. To this union three children, Gregory, Patricia, and Albert Clay were born.

Clay died on December 7, 1978.

Scott E. was born on May 15, 1894 in Odell, Nebraska. He served in the U.S. Army during World War I. He with his partner Harry Anderson, started the first service station in Douglas, located on the site now occupied by the First National Bank. He later joined with Otto Rohlf in establishing the Yellow Dot service station at Fourth and Center Streets. The Table Supply Grocery was also owned by him. It was sold in 1939.

He was united in marriage to Virginia M. Ailor on December 25, 1924 in Douglas and to this union one daughter, Margaret "Peg", was born on August 18, 1931.

Scott died on January 14, 1971; Virginia on March 20, 1981.

Peg was confined to a wheelchair and could breathe only with the aid of a respirator after she contracted polio in 1952 while attending the University of Colorado in Boulder, Colorado. She learned to use an electric typewriter by hitting the keys with a wand she held in her mouth. She was an accomplished writer, writing for magazines and newspapers. The book "West of Yesterday" was also written by her. She married Ed Leonard in 1972. Peg died in April 1983.

Iva married William Trethewey, son of John W. and Margaret Libby Trethewey. William "Bill" was born April 11, 1889 in Marquette, Michigan. As a young man he was raised in Denver, Colorado and attended Barnes College in that city. After coming to Douglas as a building contractor in 1916 he followed that trade until his appointment as Douglas City Clerk for eight years during the 1930s. After his marriage to Iva they owned a restaurant, later taking over control of the LaBonte Hotel coffee shop and later the Douglas Coffee Shop on North Second Street.

Bill homesteaded south of Douglas near Sawtooth Mountain in the Laramie Mountains while his father homesteaded in the upper part of the Morrison Valley now owned by Charles Pexton. He later operated a sheep ranch near Irvine until his retirement in 1950.

Their children were Jack A., Dr. Robert W. and Beth (Mullison).

Bill died on May 31, 1972. Iva resides in Colorado near her children in 1985.

Lees, Chet E. and Maude Family

Chet Elmer Lees was born in 1877 in Iowa. Clarissa Maude Dehorety was born December 15, 1880 in Peoria, Illinois. They were married in Cleveland, Kansas in 1897.

They moved to Cora, Wyoming where Chet operated a freight service by team and wagon from the lumber camps around Pinedale to Rock Springs, Wyoming. He brought groceries and coal and supplies to the lumber jacks in the Pinedale area. Later, they moved to the ranch where the Lone Tree Bible Ranch is located now.

Chet and Maude Lees had seven children, all born in Wyoming. Rita, who died in early childhood, Vinus, Oliver "Ollie", Bill, Dorthy, Cora and Mary.

Chet was in ill health part of his life and died of heart trouble in 1925 when they were living on the ranch near Glendo (the present Lone Tree Bible Ranch).

After his death, Maude moved with her youngest daughter, Mary, to Orin. The other children were grown and had left home then. There she went to work in a restaurant for the railroad, operated by Harry Churchill. Later she worked on a ranch as a housekeeper and cook for Dave Gordon. Then she moved to Midwest for a time where she lived with her daughter, Mary, and son-in-law, Clifford Gillespie. Cliff and her daughter's (Dorthy) husband, Leo Adami, were working in the oil fields there. Mary and Cliff Gillespie then moved back to their ranch at Orin and Maude Lees moved to Douglas and lived in Riverview Addition. She worked on various ranches and as a cook, keeping her home in Riverview Addition until March 1952. At that time, Cliff Gillespie was killed when his pickup was hit by a train when crossing the tracks near their ranch at Orin. Maude then went to live with her widowed daughter, Mary, and her grandson, Calvin, in a home Mary bought in Brownfield Addition. Mary still lives there.

Maude Lees was a very hard worker all of her life. She had to take care of her husband because he was ill quite a bit, as well as care for her six children and help with much of the ranch work and the house work. She always took time, though, for her handiwork of crocheting and raising a large garden and canned many fruits and vegetables. She loved to play cards and belonged to a card club with several other ladies. She also belonged to North Platte Homemakers for many years. She took part in all the activities of her children and grandchildren including the rodeos and hunting.

In 1957, when she was 77 years old, she was on an elk hunting trip with the Red Coles and others at Meeteetse when all the people were snowed in. It was blizzarding and they were wondering what to do for food, when Maude and Cora Cole told everyone to pool their food. They cooked elk stew and other dishes for them until supplies were dropped to them by airplane. They tramped in the snow the word H E L P to let them know where their camp was located. The National Guard was called in to get most of the people out. However, the Coles were able to help get pickups out along with their horses.

Grandma Lees was mentioned on the television and radio and in the newspapers at that time. It was reported that a 77 year old woman was lost in a blizzard and would have to be rescued. Instead, Maude Lees was busy using the resources at hand and helping others much younger than she to survive this ordeal.

This is typical of Maude Lees and her life. She spent many years in Converse County, had many friends here, and contributed much to its history. She died in October 1966 at the age of 86. She is survived by three children: Dorothy Adami of Buffalo, Cora Cole and Mary Gillespie both of Douglas. Her sons, Ollie and Bill, lived in Converse County also and worked here in the lumber camps but have since died. We are proud of these pioneers and their contributions to Converse County.

Leman, Dennis and Bessie Family

Dennis William Leman was born on July 29, 1852 in Crossways House, at the Village of Sandford in the Parish of Winscombe, Somersetshire, England, of ancient English lineage.

Dennis Leman's father was a fine representative of the English farmer, intelligent, well-read, progressive and well-to-do. Dennis Leman and his twin sister were the fifth and sixth of a family of seven children. His father died at the age of 44 when Dennis was only eleven years old.

When Jim Leman, Jr., was in the army serving in Germany during 1954, he went to London and visited a cousin of his, who was the only living relative of Dennis Leman. She was terminally ill at the time and she gave him the old, old family papers. These are parchment deeds, leases, mortgages, wills, accounts and letters beginning with a will written in 1675, a parchment deed of a land exchange made in 1714 by a William Leman who was the great-great-great grandfather of Dennis Leman. There are 80 documents in this collection. The son of this William Leman was a Dr. Dennis Leman who died in 1788 and who has a marble tablet in his memory inscribed on the north wall of St. Martins Church of Worle, Somersetshire. This church is over 600 years old.

In 1872, at the age of 20, Dennis Leman and a friend,

Jack Douglas-Willan, left England and sailed westward to see what the New World had to offer. Fortune was their friend and they wisely made their way across the great Mississippi Valley to the far west, first stopping at Denver, Colorado; but in 1877 they came to Wyoming. Jack Douglas-Willan sometime thereafter, returned to England having, through the death of an older brother, come into the inheritance of an earldom.

When coming to Wyoming, Dennis had purchased some Texas cattle, so as to get started in his own ranching operation, but thereafter came a terrible storm and he said that after the storm when he tried to find his cattle he thought every dead animal he came across had the DL brand. Cattle were found in the tree tops after this storm, as high winds had drifted the snow into terribly deep drifts and few cattle of any kind had survived.

Thereafter, he worked for a number of years for an outfit owned in whole or in part by Joseph Kennedy on Wagonhound Creek. Joseph Kennedy later acquired the land and built the house where Bill and Barbara Cross now live on LaPrele Creek.

He was attracted to the beauty of the Upper LaPrele country and took up a homestead on Beaver Creek, a tributary of LaPrele Creek, patent for which was issued to him in 1890. He became a naturalized United States citizen in 1889. He later took up desert homesteads, purchased some other homesteads, and acquired state and other lands, making the home ranch some 500 acres, a good portion of which he put under cultivation. His first home was built of logs but this was later lathed and plastered on the inside, other rooms were added. Later the outside was sided making a very comfortable home. This, by the way, is the same house where James and Lois Leman still resided. It has not changed too much as to outside appearances during the years but has been beautifully remodeled inside. No one living today knows how old it is but it must be a little over 100 years ago when the first log was laid.

Dennis Leman and George H. Cross were partners for a number of years, the Cross holdings lying over a hill to the south of the lands acquired by Dennis Leman. This partnership lasted until 1905. When the partnership between Crosses and Lemans was terminated, there was an uneven number of horses owned by the partnership so one horse named "Mallett" could not be divided and Crosses had him for six months of the year and Lemans the other six months. Horses belonging to the partnership had been branded VE and after the partnership was discontinued, Crosses branded their horses bar VE while Lemans used the VE bar brand for a number of years, making rebranding the horses easier. Mallett had just the VE brand during his lifetime.

For many years Dennis Leman had a very special horse no one else was allowed to ride. He was a beautiful sorrel gelding singlefooter named Tony.

On September 15, 1897, Dennis Leman married Bessie Mills at the home of Peter and Amy George, a great aunt and uncle of Bessie Mills. The house where they were married has been torn down and moved, but it was on LaPrele Creek at the southern edge of the storage reservoir of the LaPrele Dam. Five children were born of this union.

The father of Bessie M. Leman was Fabius D. Mills who went to college in Madison, Wisconsin. Later, he taught school and was County Superintendent of Schools at Seneca, Wisconsin. Her mother, Louisa Copsey, was also a school teacher before her marriage. Louisa's mother was Susan Green, a descendent from William White, one of the pilgrims on the Mayflower. The Mills family moved with several other families, including the Fred George family, (Mary George was a sister to Louisa) to Custer County, Nebraska, in covered wagons, going there to take up homesteads. While they were moving, the Mills family had to stop over in Sutton, Nebraska, where Bessie was born on November 8, 1878. They stayed in Sutton, Nebraska until April 1879 and then moved on to live on their homestead in Custer County, Nebraska, near the town of Ansley and there to join up with former traveling companions. Bessie Mills was the seventh of 17 children, three of those older than she died when very young. F. D. Mills was admitted to the bar in Custer County, Nebraska and to provide for his large family, also farmed, sold insurance and wrote news items for the local paper.

Peter and Amy George, grandparents of Ed George, had settled in Converse County, Wyoming and Fred and Mary George, uncle and aunt of Bessie Mills Leman had moved on to Wyoming. Ella Mills, a sister of Bessie's had come to Wyoming to teach and had married John Robins, a rancher in the Wagonhound area at that time and so Bessie Mills, at the age of 17, came to Wyoming. She taught first at a school on LaBonte Creek, where the Willox children went to school to her. Edna Burns, who later lived at Glendo, Wyoming and James C. Willox, now deceased, being two of them. Often, some of her students were older than she; and because winters were so bad, school was held in the summer months instead of in the winter.

Dennis Leman was a member of the school board for the Beaver School District and in 1897 he hired Bessie for the next term to teach the Beaver School, then located on land belonging to Crosses not too far from the present Beaver School house. During the time she taught school there, Dennis Leman, whose home was less than a mile from the school house, went early each cold morning, had a fire going and water supplied; and in September of that year, Dennis Leman and Bessie Mills were married.

In early days the cattlemen were much disturbed by sheep being moved onto the open range which they had used as their own for so long and one night a number of men, masked with sacks over their heads with holes cut for eyes and mouth, had gotten a herder out of his wagon and burned the wagon and then scattered the sheep in all directions. Any of the cattlemen in the area who did not have good alibis was arrested for this, but at a hearing of those arrested, none would plead guilty or name anyone else they knew as being involved. John Jones was an elderly bachelor who had purchased the Peter George Ranch on the LaPrele and though he pleaded not guilty he said he thought he knew some who might be involved. When asked to point to anyone in the courtroom who was involved he started pointing to each and every one in the room, excepting the judge, but including the lawyers and visitors saying, "He was there, and he, and he." on around the room. He was dismissed as being an unreliable witness; and the defendants were all released for lack of evidence. Frank Virden, who was sheriff at the time of this incident, later purchased a ranch on the LaPrele next to that of John Jones and occasionally at community gatherings some mention was made of the arrests. No one admitted being there but those who mentioned it knew too much about it not to have had some inside knowledge of what went on that night.

Blanche George and Matt Carothers were married a short time before Bessie Mills and Dennis Leman were, but they had no children during the early years of their marriage and for a good many years they spent Christmas with the Lemans, while Lemans on Thanksgiving morning piled into the buggy and headed due east of their ranch home over the divide between the LaPrele Creek and Wagonhound Creek watersheds to Carothers. Dennis Leman always called this "Mattsgiving Day".

Bessie and Dennis loved to play cards; and many times there was only one visitor so they played Solo which can be a three handed game. There was a small table in the center of the living room with pedestal legs, and the lamp was taken off and set to one side so they could play on this table. Maud Dawes, a second cousin of Maude Ryan, was one of those who stopped frequently and played cards with them. Other people occasionally stopped by; and if they were interested in cards, they always had a chance to play.

During the summer months ministers from several of the Douglas churches in different years had services at the Beaver School house for the families in the neighborhood. This was quite an effort for a minister as he had to come by horse and buggy and it took some three hours to travel each way. Many times the minister was a guest at the Leman home for Sunday dinner.

There were quite often others living at the Leman ranch. Dennis usually had one or two men working for him. They lived in a bunkhouse but ate with the family. Bessie Leman, when her family was young, often had a girl to help her with the work. Louisa Mills died when her youngest child was only ten years old and F. D. Mills died four years later, so that a sister and several brothers of Bessie's as well as her father stayed at the ranch for weeks at a time, especially during summer months. There was always room for one more at this ranch, and nieces and nephews also visited at various times. Often, the teacher boarded with the Lemans.

The school house was moved from its original location on the Cross land south of the place where the Beaver School now stands to make it more centrally located for the area families and Jimmie (Cornelia) White, a sister of Betty Slonaker, was one of the favorite teachers who taught at the Beaver School for several years and stayed at the Lemans. She was a dear friend of Bessie Leman's as well as others in the neighborhood, and they were much grieved by her early death during the flu epidemic.

Dennis Leman was a good fisherman and hunter. Beaver Creek as well as the LaPrele Creek had lots of fish and getting a mess for a meal was never difficult. Sometimes when there were lots of us to cook for, we would take a seine and catch fish in the LaPrele and come home with a small washtub half full. There was no legal limit on fish at that time or restrictions on the seining of them, and none of them was ever wasted.

Dennis was always interested in national affairs and subscribed to the Chicago Tribune. Both Dennis and Bessie were active in school affairs, in the Beaver School District, serving on the school board at various times. Bessie was active in anything that went on in the community.

The advent of the auto industry resulted in changes having to be made and the trails that were good enough for horse, buggy and wagon travel became obsolete and impossible. Therefore the community, not having help from the county at that time, would form a day called "Road Day" where all the neighbors would gather and repair the trails into roads. Dennis was one of the first in the neighborhood to own an auto and although he attempted to learn to drive he always hollered "whoa" when they came to a gate. He finally got tired of repairing gates and turned the driving over to his wife and children and he enjoyed riding along.

On October 19, 1901, five members of the LaPrele community organized a club named Pleasant Hour Reading Club. Each member of this club was required to subscribe to at least two magazines and buy one new book each month. Meetings were held at the various member's homes and each two weeks, members put their books and magazines in a flour sack, mounted a horse which they rode side saddle and rode to the hostess' home, exchanging their books and magazines and discussing various articles which they had read and in which they were interested. The last meeting of this club was held on October 29, 1911.

Dennis Leman died August 20, 1920. Bessie had bought a house in town during his illness in 1920 and while she lived in town most of the time, she continued to manage the ranch with hired help in order to give her sons, James and Douglas, a chance to finish their education, but in 1926 she turned the management of the ranch over to her sons. They continued to enlarge the holdings of the ranch, buying land from Kennedy, the Bill Howard place from Glen Hudson and part of the Charlie Rice place from J. M. Stevens. Also, whenever possible additional land was added to their mountain summer pasture. Douglas Leman moved a house onto the Howard place and lived there until his death in July of 1969. His widow, Alice, some time afterwards purchased the home of Bessie Leman and now lives there. Bessie Leman died April 25, 1971. James Leman died on June 5, 1984. His wife, Lois, lives in Borrego Springs, California in the winter returning to the ranch home during the summer.

Some 35 years ago, Bessie Leman and her brothers and sisters scattered throughout the western part of the United States started a Round Robin letter which made its rounds in from four to six months. There remains today only two of the original contributors to this letter, Bessie's sisters, Mabel McArthur, who celebrated her 100th birthday in August of 1984 and Alice Goddard, aged 94 years. Both of these ladies have been in Douglas many times over the years. The Round Robin letter still makes its rounds as the second generation has taken up where the first generation was forced to stop and the third generation is beginning to take over from the second. The number who contribute to the letters averages around 20 now as several from some families write notes. The letter travels through Wyoming, into the state of Washington, down the coast of California, into Texas, and all over Nebraska before it heads back to Wyoming again. It keeps a great big family in touch with each other.

Bessie after moving to Douglas in 1920, was active in almost every phase of the social life of the town. I doubt there was ever a public card party which she did not attend. She was a member of the Douglas High School Board in 1925, became a member of the Episcopal Church and its Women's Guild in 1920, joined the Afternoon Card Club in 1922; became an Eastern Star in 1923 and later became Past Matron thereof; was president of the Carnegie Library Board starting in 1923; a charter member of PEO, and belonged to several other bridge clubs and played a number of foursomes. In fact, any time she could find three others to play with her she was ready for bridge. In 1964 she was nominated for "Mother of the Year" by Douglas organizations, headed by Converse County Cow-Belles.

The eldest child born to Dennis and Bessie was Grace, who taught school over on Wagonhound and lived at home, before she married Leonard Bartshe.

The second child, Edith, married Dana Browning and lived on a ranch on the LaPrele for a number of years. They had two children, Donna, married Don York and Marilyn married James Fitzhugh. Edith had been a legal secretary for Joseph Garst before her marriage and following the depression years and drought of 1936 she moved to town to get her older daughter in school, returning to her position as a legal secretary. After Garst sold his law practice to Dick Maurer she was appointed Clerk of Court to fill out a term left vacant by the death of the elected clerk. Afterwards, she was Deputy County Clerk and County Clerk for four years and in 1944 she purchased, from Mary Ryan and her associates, the Converse Land Title Company. In 1963 she sold a half interest in this business to Margaret Thurston and in 1970 she sold her remaining half interest to The Title Guaranty Company of Wyoming of Casper, Wyoming and retired from abstracting. Later she was hired as typist and executive director for the Housing Authority of Douglas and helped get the Irwin Towers project into construction. She finally retired in 1973. Her husband, Dana Browning, died August 2, 1952.

Ruth, the third child, married Charles G. Irwin.

The fourth child was James who married Lois Blenkarn and they had three children, Dorothy married Kenneth Taylor, Barbara married the late John Werner and James D. married Lois Vroman and at the present time live in Detroit, Michigan.

The fifth and last child was Douglas who married Alice Sullivan and they had four children, William married Maria Teresa Frenandez Leon, Thomas married Sherry Johnson, Mary Alice married Dennis Hand and Dennis Leman, who is unmarried, lives in Nebraska. It is interesting to note that the eldest child, Grace and the youngest Douglas, were both born on June 13 just seven years apart.

Leuenberger, Fred and Maryann

Let us begin the story of the Leuenberger family with the arrival of Grandpa Fred Leuenberger in the United States. Fred Leuenberger left his home in Switzerland in January of 1884, and immigrated by sailing vessel to New York City. He came as a "bound boy" to a baker, and he served out the cost of his passage across the ocean by working in the bakery. He spoke many times of the manner in which he had to whip up the soap suds that were added to the bread to make it rise. After serving his bondage, he joined his sisters, Rose and Elizabeth, at the Fourmile Community, south of Humboldt, Nebraska, where he worked on a farm and later at the Luthy Mill. He was first married to Rosa Luthy, who died in childbirth after two years of marriage. The child also died, and both are buried in Nebraska.

In 1891 he married Maryann Minger of Bern, Kansas. Maryann was a tall and lovely redhead, and this red hair appeared in many of her descendants. They lived on a farm southeast of Humboldt where their first son, Edward, was born on November 19, 1892. In 1894, another son, Jesse, was born; and later a third son, Albert, in 1896. Twelve years later, in 1906, a fourth son, Elmer, was born.

In 1917 rumors of war were rampant, and the three oldest brothers were restless and bored with working on farms for others. They wanted their own land, and knew it would be impossible to earn enough money to buy farmland in Nebraska. They had heard about free homestead land in Wyoming and Colorado, and early in 1917, Ed and a good friend, Carl Steiner, went to Colorado. Unable to find homestead land there, they worked on a ranch putting up hay to earn the money to take the train to Wyoming. Douglas, Wyoming was as far as the money would take them, and since it was also the county seat, they could file for homesteads there. They filed in Township 34, Range 73. Ed filed about 12 miles northeast of the town of Glenrock, and Carl Steiner's homestead was one mile south. Jesse soon followed Ed and Carl to Wyoming, and filed about two miles west of Ed. That left a section to be filed upon between Ed and Jesse; and in 1918, their father and mother and brothers, Al and Elmer came and took up the land between Jesse and Ed. Al filed two miles south, adjoining Carl Steiner.

In 1918, all of the brothers went to the service of their country in World War I. Jesse, having always been an expert marksman, was sent to France as a sniper, and Ed and Al were stationed in the United States. Following the end of the war, both Ed and Jesse were sent to Fort D. A. Russell in Cheyenne for discharge and found each other there. They came home together for a joyous reunion with their parents, and Al was discharged later that year. Since the time they had spent in the army also counted toward the proving up on their homesteads, they were soon the owners of their homestead. Ed said, "We felt so rich."

Since there was no way of earning money on the homesteads, Ed went to work in Douglas for Carl LeBar, at the Ford Garage. In later years he told many funny stories about that period in his life when automobiles were just becoming popular. Many people would go into the garage to buy a new Model-T Ford, and then not know how to drive it home. Ed helped many residents of that era learn to drive. He often joked that the hardest thing was to teach his students to step on the brake when they wanted to stop instead of hollering "Whoa!"

Jesse went to work in Glenrock at the Continental Refinery and Al and Elmer stayed on the homesteads to help with the farming. The first few years that they farmed were spent in trying to raise the same crops that they had raised in Nebraska, and they had quite a few failures with corn crops until they decided to turn to the raising of cattle and grains more suitable to the harsh Wyoming climate.

In the winter of 1920, Ed returned to Nebraska to visit his betrothed, Ida Rinne. While they did not plan to marry until the following spring, Ida's father, being a practical man, said he thought they should "just get married while Ed is here." Thus, Ed and Ida Rinne were wed on New Year's Eve, December 31, 1920. Ed had only enough money for the return ticket to Wyoming and had to borrow money for the license and ring from his future father-in-law. Needless to say, he made haste to pay it back as soon as possible, so as to remain on good terms with Ida's jovial father.

Upon returning to Douglas, Ed and Ida stayed for a few days at the old LaBonte Hotel. They then purchased a small home, where three of their four children were born. Jean, Rita and Glen were born in the little home.

1929 was the year of the stock market crash and the beginning of the great depression. New car sales at the Ford Garage had fallen off so that there was not enough work for everyone, and Ed felt the time would soon come that his employer would have to lay him off. Jesse had also lost his job at the refinery and they all felt the only thing they could do was to return to the homesteads where Grandpa Fred, Al and Elmer still lived. Grandma Maryann had died in 1922 and Fred had become mother and father, cook and housekeeper. It was agreed upon by all that Jesse, also Ed and Ida and their children should move again to the homesteads, and that Ida would care for grandpa and "the boys" as well as her own family. So began the unique arrangement which was to endure for more than four decades. All of the Leuenberger family lived together - Grandpa Fred, Al, Jesse, Elmer, and Ed and Ida and their three children. Ida now became mother, cook and housekeeper for this huge family, and most winters, the school teacher also boarded with the Leuenbergers!

I have many fond memories of the entire family sitting around the big kitchen table together. The conversation was always lively and the food superb. Ida was a wonderful cook, and although times were hard and money scarce, there was always an abundance of food from the vegetables, fruits, beef, chicken and eggs raised by the family.

In 1936, another daughter, Joy was born to Ed and Ida. This tiny infant quickly became the focal point of the entire family, as grandparent, parents, uncles, brothers and sisters vied for the privilege of caring for her. She indeed lived up to her name and brought much joy to the entire family.

Also in 1936, another event took place which caused much sadness in the family. Youngest brother, Elmer, left home and was unheard of for many years. In about 1944 he returned home for a brief visit and then disappeared again. Many years later, Ed and Ida discovered that he was living in Stockton, California, and went to visit him. At that time he promised to keep in touch, but again failed to do so.

All of the Leuenbergers were musically talented and played for many dances around the neighboring countryside. Al, Ed and Jesse had a small orchestra, and as Ed's children grew, they joined the musical group. I think the fondest memories of my childhood revolve around the many evenings when the entire family joined together in playing and singing. Those who did not play an instrument sang, and this custom has endured throughout the years whenever the family gathers.

All of Ed's and Ida's children attended the one-room Dry Farm School, located about two miles north of the home place. Most of the time, the children walked or rode horseback to school, but when winter blizzards were exceptionally cruel, their father drove them with team and wagon - one with a "bang-board" on the side to deflect the cold winds and snow. Many times the gentle team had to find the way home through the swirling snow. As they graduated from 8th grade, all four of the children attended high school in Glenrock.

The three sons and Ida formed a partnership on the homestead which was called The Leuenberger Banner L. Ranch. This partnership lasted 42 years. In 1969 they sold their place and all moved to Glenrock, where they lived out their remaining years. All were buried in the peaceful Douglas Cemetery.

Ed and Ida celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary in 1970, and I would like to quote here from a poem written for the occasion by Ida's sister-in-law, Ricki Rinne:

"Their days were not all sunny; years of toil and hardship too;
But their love never wavered, those 50 long years through;
They shared both joy and sorrow - sorrow that was hard to bear;
When death took Glen from their midst and left a vacant chair.
Friends and neighbors, loved ones, strangers came from miles to share Warmth and love and hospitality of this jolly, generous pair.
With friendly brothers, Jesse and Al, they too shared their family love, Surely for all this kindness they'll be rewarded from above."

For the sake of brevity, I have omitted many happenings throughout the years, but the writing of this saga has brought me much pleasure. May we keep to the traditions of family loyalty, integrity, and honor that have sustained us in the past. May we build so that our future generations will be as proud of us as we are of our ancestors.

Jean Leuenberger Slichter

LeVasseur, Jules and Florence

The present LeVasseur families are descendants of the nephew of Charlemagne, King of France, Roman Emperor of the West.

Jules LeVasseur was born in 1869 in Cacouna, Province of Quebec, Canada. He was the son of Benjamin and

Jules LeVasseur 1898

Mary Florence Briere LeVasseur 1898

Adele Voisine LeVasseur, the youngest of a family of six children, four girls and two boys. He received his education in Canada. At the age of 18, Jules came to Wyoming to visit his sister, Lea, who had married George Harry Cross in 1884. He was employed by his brother-in-law and paid a wage of $20 per month. From the moment of his arrival, Jules was awed by the beauty and splendor of Wyoming and he wanted to make it his home.

By the year 1890 Jules had begun to purchase small numbers of cattle. He also declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States. It is written in his expense book that the fee for the declaration was $2.00.

In the following year, he filed for a homestead in the vicinity of LaPrele Creek and gave up his job with his sister and her husband in order to develop his claim. The homestead was situated on Sawmill Creek, and near Cottonwood Creek. These creeks joined near the homestead and eventually flowed into LaPrele.

Indians had been fond of this particular location. They camped by the spring flowing from the base of the "Round Hill," Tepee rings are still in evidence to mark their campgrounds. When Fort Fetterman was being established, this was deemed a likely spot to set up a sawmill and a rifle range.

Jules spent a good deal of time cleaning up the refuse from the sawmill as well as from the rifle range. He piled up the debris and burned it. In doing so, the unspent rifle shells he inadvertently piled up with the other trash would explode. The result not unlike a Fourth of July celebration.

Pieces of the steam engine which powered the sawmill lay strewn about. Along with the stumps and rocks which Jules was obliged to move to clear meadow land, he also had to move the engine parts. Eventually he succeeded in developing the fertile valley along the creeks into hay meadows which produced winter feed for his livestock.

Jules returned to Canada where on December 8, 1898 he married Mary Florence Briere at Matepédia, Quebec, and brought his bride to the homestead cabin located at the edge of a meadow near Sawmill Creek. Florence was born in St. Charles Province. She was an accomplished tailorress; she was a perfectionist in any task she undertook.

Three children were born to Florence and Jules. All were born in Douglas, Wyoming. Ben, the oldest son, was born in 1903, and Ernest, the youngest, was born in 1913 and Alice's birthdate is November 1905.

The hay crop in 1913 was very good. Jules and the hired man were finishing the last stack late one afternoon. Unfortunately, Jules was the victim of an accident involving a work horse. He was seriously injured. Tom and John Sullivan came to help transport Jules to his home, and the following morning made a bed for him in the bottom of a wagon box. They took him and his wife into Douglas. Florence was about to deliver her third child and did so while Jules was confined to the hospital. Ben and Alice were taken by their Aunt Lea and Uncle George Cross to the Cross home to remain until Jules and Florence could return to their home. The family was reunited later that fall, but Jules hobbled about on crutches for some weeks after his release from the hospital.

Jules and Florence were quiet and unassuming people. They were good neighbors and parents. They did not criticize others, but looked for the good in all people. They taught their children to do the same. Both were lovers of nature, as were their children.

Florence LeVasseur passed away on July 16, 1938; Jules died in 1943. They are buried in the Douglas Cemetery. Ernest died June 21, 1971.

Lindmier, William C. and Mabel

It was in the month of April 1916, that William C. (Bill) Lindmier board a Chicago Northwestern train in Omaha, Nebraska. He accompanied his employer, Ed Kauffold. Kauffold was a carpenter-contractor who had been engaged by a group of six men to build their homestead houses on claims in Wyoming. The Lindmier and Kauffold families, as well as the families of the six homesteaders were residents of a common neighborhood in Omaha. They had been friends for some years. Young Bill, listening to their enthusiastic plans, longed to be a part of this great adventure.

Bill had been born to Sylvester Lindmier, of German descent, and Susan Campbell, a full blooded Scots-woman, in Omaha in 1894. He was the second of a family of four children. He completed eight years of schooling there, and had since worked for his father who owned a masonry construction business. Now Bill, with his father's blessing, packed his belongings and headed west.

The journey by train ended in Keeline, Wyoming. At that time, the town consisted of a general store, which housed the post office, a hotel, a depot, and a lumber yard. From Keeline the remainder of the trip to the claim sites northwest of Keeline was made by team and wagon.

Keeline, Wyoming 1916

By the third of May, 1916, Bill had filed for his own homestead. He had discovered that there was an unclaimed tract in the heart of the TJ Bar range on Harney Creek. Most of the tract was situated on the bottom land adjacent to the creek but had very little live water on it. As was the custom, the big ranches held the good water by squatter's rights, thus enabling them to control the open range. The TJ Bar was owned by Addison Spaugh who had come to the Wyoming Territory in 1877 with a trail herd from Texas. Spaugh was aware that as the land became more populous, the cattle business as he had known it would no longer exist. Therefore, he sold the TJ Bar to an Englishman, John (Johnny Bull) Howard. Together with his brother-in-law, Cody Shippen, and the Wanek brothers, John used the open range after he purchased the ranch in the spring of 1916.

The homesteaders were most unwelcome. The cattlemen felt that their "good life" was being spoiled, as indeed it was. The cattlemen were required by law to suffer the intrusion, but they could cause the homesteader a lot of misery and hardship and most of them did just that.

By the end of the summer of 1916, seven frame homestead shacks dotted the range within an area of perhaps four miles square. Except for the Lindmier claim, the houses were built on the adjoining corners of the claims so that two or three families could live close together for company, and to share the monumental tasks of "proving up".

In order to be granted his homestead patent, a settler must construct some sort of liveable dwelling, be it a frame shack, a sod shack, or simply a cave dug into a bank and fitted with a door. The grandeur of the dwelling depended on the affluence of the owner. A homesteader must break up approximately 20 acres of virgin prairie and plant some sort of crop. Lastly, he must reside upon his claim for seven months out of every year for a period of three years. It is of interest that the cost of filing was $12.00 with an additional $14.00 being required for the issuance of the patent. The homesteader could apply for an additional homestead patent consisting of 320 acres, after he had filed for his original patent.

In September of 1916, Bill returned to Omaha to seek employment for the winter months. He married Mabel Tallman of Mt. Pleasant, Iowa on September 27 in Galesburg, Illinois. They had been "keeping company" for over a year.

The following spring, the Lindmiers returned to the homestead on Harney Creek. Life for these homesteaders was certainly not easy. Some were fortunate enough to be able to afford a team and wagon, while others must trade their labor for the loan of horses and simple farm implements. Fortunately, the folks from Omaha were compatible and worked well together.

The homesteaders could exist on what the land had to offer in the way of meat. There was an abundance of cottontail rabbits, jackrabbits and sage grouse. Strangely enough, there were no deer or antelope on Harney Creek at that time. Staples such as flour, sugar, salt and lard could be purchased at the general store in Keeline. It is interesting to note that white flour was in short supply. The United States was at war. Everyone was required to purchase a "flour substitute"; that is, if one purchased 10 lbs. of white flour, then he must also purchase 10 lbs. of the substitutes which consisted of rye flour, corn and oat meal, and macaroni, or a combination of any of these. Macaroni was a favorite among the settlers since it would not spoil or become full of weevils. Then too, it was the cheapest thing on the grocery list. Potatoes, which cost an exorbitant $20.00 per hundred could also be had in Keeline, but the luxury items such as canned fruit and vegetables were "sent for" from the Sears and Roebuck catalog.

A rifle of some sort was a necessity for all families. The .22 caliber rifle was the most popular. It cost the least initially and the ammunition was reasonable.

Field corn and potatoes were the crops that Bill and Mabel planted that spring of 1917. If one peeled his spuds leaving a peeling of about one-half inch thick, he could eat the center, and plant the peelings. They had no money to buy fencing materials, so the grazing cattle from the neighboring ranches had free access to the crops. It was the law that the homesteader must fence his land or suffer the invasion of the cattle. The ranchers were not acting illegally when they drove bunches of cattle to the imaginary boundaries of the claim and left them there to "stray" across the line. This was a common occurrence.

Lacking a saddle horse, the Lindmiers must run the cattle off on foot. The semi-wild livestock paid the Lindmiers regular visits. One particular cow had developed a taste for green potato tops. She would appear nearly every day, and though she was stoned and cursed, her addiction to potato vines would always lure her into returning.

One hot day in the late summer of 1917, Bill went off to help a neighbor. Mabel remained at home to do her washing and to guard the crops. The Lindmiers had no water well of their own. They hauled their precious drinking water in barrels from a "drilled" well which belonged to a neighboring homesteader. The washing was done in water brought from Harney Creek. It was none too clean and contained too much alkali for human consumption. Repeated washings of any white article of clothing in the water resulted in turning the garment a miserable shade of gray.

Mabel had a crude bench outside the shack. It would accommodate two tubs, one for washing, the other for rinsing. The water was heated inside the house on a small stove of the sheep wagon variety. A washboard, bars of strong lye soap and a rope clothesline for drying completed her laundry equipment. Washing on the board was hot hard work. When Mabel finished the wash, she used the wash water to scrub the board floor of the shack. Since she had completed her work, she decided to sit on the shady side of the shack to rest. As she rounded the corner of the building, she was siezed by uncontrollable rage! That blasted cow was in the potato patch again! Mabel ran toward the cow, shouting and flapping her apron. The cow ambled out of the patch and stood chewing contentedly. Again, Mabel ran toward the cow which moved off a little further and stopped. Frustrated and thoroughly angry, Mabel once more charged the offending beast, only to have the cow move a short distance and turn to eye the wrathful woman.

Close to tears, Mabel ran into the shack. She yanked the rifle off the wall, loaded it and raced outside. She'd fix that cow! She would hit her in the leg, then the animal would depart to return for more. She raised the rifle and fired the shot. There was a hollow ker-chunk sound. The cow humped her back in pain. Mabel's marksmanship was somewhat less than perfect. The shot fired at the cow's leg had penetrated the paunch. She watched helplessly as the cow, grunting in pain, shuffled out of sight around the base of a small hill. She returned dejectedly to the shack. She had really done it! A flood of self-recrimination engulfed her. What awful consequences would there be as a result of her fury? Maybe the cow was not hurt at all. Maybe she had missed her completely, but, maybe she would die.

When Bill returned home, she confessed her sin. After the subject was thoroughly discussed, they decided that the wisest thing to do was to wait and see what happened.

The following day a couple of riders appeared. The cow was discovered, and cut open. The riders did not approach the shack. They remounted and rode away.

About a month elapsed. The Lindmiers, though still somewhat apprehensive, were hoping that the whole incident would be forgotten. They were cutting corn one day when a rider appeared heading straight for the field. It was the owner of the ill-fated cow, Cody Shippen. After passing the time of day, Cody asked Bill if he had shot the cow. The answer was an honest "no". Cody told Bill that the slug which killed her was a .22 caliber, and that he knew Bill owned such a rifle. Bill retorted that every homesteader owned a .22 rifle and any of them might have shot the beast. Cody did not ask if Mabel had done the deed and she was not about to volunteer that information. It was obvious that Cody believed Bill to be lying, but he had no proof. He turned his horse and rode away. The incident was closed, but strangely enough the cattle were rounded up and driven to other parts of the range for grazing. There were potatoes to harvest after all.

Some of the homesteaders completed their "proving up"; others decided that the rigors of that life were too severe, and relinquished their rights, and still others mortgaged their claims and eventually lost them. Bill was the only one of the original group from Omaha who kept his land. He bought some of the neighboring claims to add to his own.

Mabel was 25 years old when she returned to Mount Pleasant, Iowa for the birth of the Lindmier's first child, Versa Virginia, who was born in 1921. In 1924, she made the trip again with little Virginia for the birth of the second child, Ruth Eleanor and once more in 1926 she returned for the birth of their first son, William Clyde Junior. Their youngest son, David Charles was born 16 years later in Douglas, Wyoming.

In 1927 when Virginia was of school age, the family left the homestead since there was no school nearby, moving to Douglas, where Bill started a plumbing and heating business. He kept his cattle, hiring a man to care for them. In 1931, the family returned to live at Harney Creek until the great drought of the 1930's drove them out of the cattle business and back to Douglas. Bill again went into the plumbing business. He held on to his beloved land through all the hard times. To sell it would be the same as selling a part of himself.

In 1955, Bill was elected to his first term in the State Legislature. He served six terms in all, acting as Speaker Pro Tem in 1963.

Bill and Mabel sold the land on Harney Creek to their daughter, Ruth and their son-in-law, Tom Mitchell, in 1955. The Mitchells continued the work started by Bill and Mabel. What was once an unfenced homestead claim is now a well-kept ranch headquarters. There are no longer patches of "peelings" or corn. The bottom land has all been developed into hay meadows.

Bill and Mabel have 13 grandchildren and 10 great grandchildren. Versa Virginia, who was born in 1921, married Allen Lewis Swan in 1945. Allen and Virginia had six sons. The eldest, Stephen Paul, was born in 1946; James Allen in 1949, William David in 1951, Christopher Robert in 1952, Scott Lindmier in 1954, and the youngest, Lewis Alexander in 1956. James, William, Christopher and Scott are married. Jim has one son, Kenneth. Scott has a son, Frasier, and a daughter, Erin. Virginia died of leukemia in 1959. Allen's death was the result of a heart attack in 1971.

Ruth Eleanor was born in 1924 and married Thomas H. Mitchell in 1945. The couple had no natural children, but adopted a girl, Ruth Anne, born in 1954, and a boy, John Arthur, born in 1955. Anne has two children, a son and a daughter. John has one son. Thomas H. Mitchell died in 1979. Later, Ruth married Elmer L. Grant of Boxelder south of Glenrock. They make their home on Harney Creek in eastern Converse County.

William Clyde, Jr., was born in 1926 and married Vivian Irene Manning in 1948. They have three sons, Robert William, born in 1950, Thomas Allen, born in 1951 and Jeffery Leroy, born in 1953. All the sons are married. Robert has a son and a daughter, Thomas has two daughters.

David Charles was born in Douglas in 1942, and was married to Virginia Ruth Curtis in 1963. They are the parents of two daughters. Cindy Anne was born in 1965 and married to John Fitzgerald Harbarger in 1981. Amy Virginia was born in 1967 and is attending her senior year in Converse County High School.

Today Mabel resides on the land where she and Bill started their married life so many years ago. She is 88 years old. She makes her home with Ruth and Elmer.

Bill was confined in a rest home in Douglas for five years prior to his death on July 25, 1984. He is buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery.

Ruth is the present owner of Harney Creek, but the time approaches when she must turn over the operation to the next generation. Lewis Swan lives on the ranch and with his aunt Ruth manages the business of raising cattle.

It seems that the homestead will remain in the family for at least another generation, which is as it should be.

Mabel, who has supplied most of the information for this account, is positive that she and Bill would "do it all over again" though it was a hard, demanding life, but which offered rich rewards in satisfaction.

Lore, William H. and Effie Family

The Lores were pioneer settlers in Pawnee County, Nebraska with several branches of the family migrating to the Alliance area when Alliance was still a fort.

The older members of the William Lore family, Flossie Lore Lathrop, Floyd B. Lore and Faye Lore Bisiar came from Pawnee County, Nebraska to Converse County when the men returned home from World War I.

William Henry and Effie Morrison Lore (1865-1940 and 1870-1931 respectively) moved from Dubois, Pawnee County, Nebraska to Converse County with the two younger sons, Glenn and Virgil, in the early 1920's and settled in the Walker Creek area on what was called the "old Daddy Davis place". Flossie Lathrop was a widow with two small sons at that time and she lived with the family and was postmistress of the Walker Creek Post Office (in the home) for several years. As was the case with most families in those days, someone in the family had to work away from the farm to make money to feed the stock, and Glenn Lore drove the school bus in the Walker Creek and Dry Creek areas for several years. The family lived here until Mrs. Lore's death in 1931 when they moved to Douglas. They later sold the place to Fred Williams.

Flossie Lore Lathrop raised her two sons, William R. and Donald L. in Douglas. After moving to town she worked in one of the old landmark restaurants, the LaFayette Cafe for Alice Tevis; she also worked at the "Seed House" which was probably the first business to bring employment to many women in Douglas. In November 1940 she was elected Clerk of Court and served in that capacity until she retired in 1958. At that time she moved to Olympia, Washington to be near her sons. Mrs. Lathrop died in 1979.

Floyd B. Lore married Julia Eppenbach and they have eight children: Dorothy, Leonard, Mildred, Wayne, Valjean, Laurel, Frank and Floyd D. After leaving the homestead, Floyd and his family moved to Douglas. He was an expert plasterer and worked for the old contractors. One of his first jobs was with Fred Cannon when the Masonic Temple was built. Floyd was killed in 1946, the result of a very freak accident. He took a cow to the old slaughter house to be butchered. The man just ahead of Floyd shot his cow and the bullet ricocheted and hit Floyd. He died following emergency surgery. Mrs. Julia Lore was the cook at the hospital for many years, and still lives in Douglas. The eldest son, Leonard, is a prominent contractor in Douglas at the present time.

Faye Lore Bisiar and her husband, Charles Bisiar, lived in Casper and they had three children: Charlene, Charles and Virgil. Mrs. Bisiar died in 1983.

Virgil Lore married Lois Anderson, the daughter of Charles and Charlotte Anderson, also of the Walker Creek area and they had two daughters: Sandra Lore Bohart and Valerie Lore Borgan. Virgil was also a skilled plasterer and worked with his brothers. Lois died in 1958. In 1965 Virgil married Doris Little and they live in Casper.

Glenn Lore married Joan Miles and they have one son, Jack William. Glenn was also a skilled craftsman and worked in the masonry field with his brothers. During the housing boom of the 50's and 60's, the Lores plastered almost every new house in Douglas. Down through the years it was a standing joke in the lumber yards that the Lores either plastered or stuccoed half of Converse County.

At this time, Glenn is retired and Joan Lore is Clerk of District Court. Jack Lore married Sara Crane, the daughter of Tom and Velma Gunstrum Crane of Douglas. They have two children and live in Casper.

Lowndes, Joseph and Effie

Joseph Moyses Lowndes arrived in Douglas, Wyoming January 1, 1898. He was with Tom and Nellie McPherson until he settled in his own living quarters. Nellie McPherson was a cousin, being the daughter of Joseph's mother's aunt Sarah Moyses. He worked for Mr. Maurer in his bank, and had an interest in a band of sheep with Tom McPherson's father until a storm, April 13, 1912, killed four thousand sheep.

He joined Ashlar Lodge #10 A.F. & A.M., Masonic on January 21, 1901. Joe and his pals, Effie Daniels, Hiram Daniels, and Sophie Kimmey toured around Douglas, Natural Bridge and areas in the mountains.

Joe lived in Moingonna, Iowa during his school years. He graduated from Capitol City Commercial College in Des Moines, Iowa and worked in Des Moines for eight years. He played the bass drum in the Douglas band. They would play for the state fair in the early 1900's.

November 25, 1899 Joseph Lowndes and Effie May Daniels were married in the Congregational Church in Douglas by Reverend Stewart. They had three children, Frederick Daniels, Olive Irene and Joseph Hillard.

The family moved to Casper, Wyoming, March 10, 1911 after Joe went to work for C. H. Townsend in the Stockman's National Bank December 15, 1910.

October 23, 1915 Joe moved to Lander to organize the Stockgrowers State Bank, then moved back to Casper the spring of 1920 to work for the Casper Mutual Building and Loan Association and carried on full time as Grand Secretary of the Masonic Grand Lodge of Wyoming, having been elected to that office September 9, 1915.

Mr. Lowndes died in Glendale, California on February 6, 1943 while visiting his wife's sister. He was buried at Forest Lawn Cemetery in Glendale at that time.

Effie D. Lowndes died in Casper, December 9, 1977 in Casper, Wyoming and is buried at Forest Lawn Cemetery, Glendale, California.

Lundberg, Carl and Izola Family

Carl was born at Bloomfield, Nebraska on January 5, 1896 the son of Victor and Marie Lundberg. After high school he served in the 88th Division of the Infantry in France during World War I. In 1919 he filed on a homestead on Willow Creek in the Walker Creek Community.

Izola Gilfry was born at Arlington, Nebraska on July 3, 1896. After graduating from Lincoln College she taught school until their marriage on September 14, 1920 in Scottsbluff, Nebraska.

Their first child was the only one of five children to be born in a hospital. That was Duane - he married Vera Rogers Connor. Next, Lois - she married Jack Werner. Then another son, Lavaughn - better known to everyone as "Bud", he married Irene Johnson. Arlea decided she wanted Jim Smathers for her husband. Then the youngest - Marvalee, or as you know her - Punkie - thought a fellow from Kansas was very special, so she married Wayne Love.

The folks farmed "dry land" - mostly with horses. Lundberg Bros. had an Avery tractor that they shared for farming.

After a few years in a country school we changed to school in Douglas. We always looked forward to the weekends so we could go home to the country.

The whole family was involved in 4-H. At that time there were a lot of families in the community so people were involved in so many different activities. Dad played on the men's baseball team, their games were usually on Sunday. Then there were picnics - that meant a lot of good food, a ball game and then a dance. By daylight the next morning, everyone was ready to go home.

Dad and his brothers, Felix and Fred, known as the Lundberg Bros., played for most of the country dances. Sometimes even a wedding dance or for a political rally.

In 1945 the folks decided to move closer to Douglas so they bought a place in the LaPrele Community. By 1962 they decided they had worked long enough and retired. They enjoyed winters in Arizona and summers in Douglas. They didn't have too many years of "leisure living" before Dad was gone in October 1968 and then in July 1980, Mom was gone. Maybe people might say they lived a hard life, but it was a good one.

Lundberg, Felix and Dollie

Vyvienne and family returned to Douglas in 1963, Vyvienne having left in 1945 at the age of 20. Willis Lundberg (her cousin) drove them out to the old homestead. All that was left was a windmill, stock tank and a few trees.

Vi began to cry, for her parents and their 27 long hard years of sweat and tears to establish a home, and for what purpose? For herself, her brothers, sisters and the home they remembered so well, that was no more; for her baby sister Connie, who would never remember the home which was such a large part of her family's past; for the fields that had disappeared and the stubborn land that had returned as it was in the beginning. Then she remembered her Dad saying, "You can never go back." This, then is the story of Felix and Dollie Lundberg.

They had come as newlyweds in the spring of 1920, to prove up on the land Felix had filed on, on May 7, 1919. When they left March 19, 1947, their four older children had graduated from Converse County High School, the older three having already moved away. Felix, Dollie, their four youngest daughters, ages 19, 15, nine and one, a family dog the girls could not bear to leave behind, two old cars, a small house-trailer and $700 in cash, heading for the state of Washington. Dollie, for one, never looked back.

Felix's parents came from Sweden in the late 1800s in search of free land and a better life for their family. Felix was born April 2, 1891, near Bloomfield, Nebraska, in a dugout which was their home.

Dollie's family can be traced back to 1687 when Lewis Walker arrived in this country from Wales in search of religious freedom. A Quaker, Lewis joined others of his faith in Pennsylvania and there their family grew.

Our parents, Felix and Dollie, were wonderful storytellers and they made their young lives very real to us. Dollie left a handwritten autobiography for her children, and we will quote from her writings as her words tell their story far better than ours.

Dollie's Writings:

"On March 2, 1920 there was a bad blizzard, but Felix and I were married about noon by Rev. Van Valkenberg at Grandmother Brown's home in White River, South Dakota. We arrived in Douglas in April 1920. We had written Felix's folks, but the weather had been bad and the mail had not been delivered. We spent two nights at the LaBonte Hotel before his brother, Carl, came for us.

"We had our place 27 years in Wyoming and most every year it hailed, sometimes early or late in the year and it didn't hurt much. Usually it hailed during the growing season and there was a lot of damage to crops, even killing baby lambs and chickens. For about three years straight we had little or no rain.

"Every winter we had blizzards with the temperature falling as low as 40 below, wind coming through the cracks around the windows and doors into our house, snow drifting into barns and sheds. I remember during April of 1921, rancher Emery was bringing cattle out to the range when a blizzard hit. After it was over there were 96 dead cows on the one half section west of our house. They smelled all summer; every fly and mosquito we had, had been there first.

"Felix was out in one blizzard. He had shot a coyote and wanted the hide and bounty, so was tracking it. Finally realizing he was lost, he said 'Dell, (his saddle horse) take me home.' Dell made it home about midnight with Felix almost frozen as he didn't dare get off and walk in fear of losing Dell.

"Many the pail of water I carried from our little well down the hill east of the house. I use to know the number of steps, I still remember it took six pails for the baby's wash, two or three to fill the reservoir on the kitchen range and two for drinking. We also carried for the pigs, chickens and calves. Felix carried when he could and the older children as they grew stronger. First gallon cans and then two gallons, etc. Finally, when we had the money, we had a well drilled between the house and the barn.

"All of our wood had to be cut; pitch was hard to saw but we could split it and then break the pieces in two. Three loads of pitch, eight tons of coal, corn cobs and sagebrush would see us through the long Wyoming winters.

"We did have some beautiful summer days and nights, the sunsets and sunups were also pretty. The thunderstorms and cloudbursts were something else.

"I canned everything I could, my big year was 1,109 quarts. I canned vegetables and pickles from our garden, wild fruit from the mountains, windfall apples from Carehurst, beef, pork, chicken, antelope and deer.

"When Ben was one and a half years old, we were milking and had left the boys in bed. When we came back to the house, no Ben! Dad ran to the well and stock tank, I dashed to the hog pen, scared to death that I would find his little body torn to bits. Then I started to the pasture when I heard Felix call. Here came a little curly headed boy over the hill from the east with hundreds of cactus thorns in his little feet.

"During the depression, in 1932, the men rounded up 32 steers (three and four year olds), fat as butter, to ship to Omaha. When they were being loaded at Douglas a buyer offered $500 for them. Felix insisted if they were willing to pay that much in Douglas, they should get more in Omaha. They received a $295 check for prime beef (less than $10 a head). Later the government paid $25 a piece for culls which they killed and buried (it didn't seem fair). We were told we could dress out some of the meat for our own use, so I put up 200 quarts. This was a real treat as Felix would never kill a beef with a mortgage on it.

"You might ask how we survived in Wyoming. Well, we loved our children so much, also our love for each other, we had faith in God and we prayed a lot. I always said I never met an atheist on the prairie.

"It was hard to see your children leave, one by one. Felix would say; 'It is a wonderful feeling, Dollie, when you don't have to worry about a single one of our kids doing anything really bad.' As each one of you settled into your own home with your life mate, happy and busy, eager to create a livelihood for your family, we thanked God."

Our Memories:

We, the offspring of Felix and Dollie Lundberg, remember our years on the Wyoming prairie in a different way. It was mostly a happy time of living, loving and sharing.

We remember the beautiful summer nights, when the stars and the Milky Way were so close and so clear we felt we could reach out and touch them, the coyotes howling in the hills, the smell of the good earth after a much needed rain, walking barefoot in the puddles, the sweet, sweet smell of the Russian Olive trees in bloom.

We remember Happy Hollow School and our first friendships with the Mitchell, Helbig, Exley, Edward, Young, Lund, Henry, Hazen, and Miller children, and also the Miles and Lundberg cousins. Our first teachers were Edward Dolan, Alice McCoubrey and Tincye Wilson Murray (who still corresponds with our family). Later, as the population dwindled, the school was moved closer to our homestead and finally during the last years, Mrs. Wallace lived with our family, conducting school in our home for Marjorie and Lolita.

Remembering the calm after a blizzard, how beautiful to be on the inside by a warm crackling fire, looking out at the clean still world that looked so different. Then, after days of isolation, seeing the mailman coming and knowing once again we had contact with the outside world.

We remember the smell of clean bed sheets dried in the Wyoming wind and sun, the smell of fresh bread baked in the oven of mom's Home Comfort Range and the fun of box and pie socials, school programs, summer Bible school. There was Fourth of July picnics at Walker Creek, baseball games with rival communities, and especially the political years when the politicians would bring cartons of candy bars to give to the kids.

We remember fishing for bullheads and the smell as mother rolled the fillets in cornmeal, fried them in butter, seasoned with salt and pepper and finally the actual testing and eating of the delicacy for which we had waited so long.

The long winter evenings of sorting navy beans, shelling and grading seed corn, carding wool, and tying quilts are good memories and the very special evenings of music when Dad would play his "fiddle" and we would dance and sing.

Dad was a real "character" and we loved to tell stories about him. We still remember his famous quotes: "Keep a stiff upper lip; Every little bit helps; You are no better than anyone else but by God you are just as good; A man's greatest possession is his good name; The only thing you can take with you when you meet your 'maker' is your name and what it stands for; People are like radios, you can't send and receive at the same time; There but for the grace of God go I; Where there is a will, there is a way; and last but not least, "Be yourself."

Three of our favorite stories about Dad are: (1) Mom had asked him to pick up some inexpensive nipples for the baby's bottle when he was in town. Dad had a Swedish brogue, so when he asked the druggist for nipples he said "sheep" instead of "cheap." Needless to say, we had to darken the room before the baby would use the long black sheep nipples. (2) The time Dad came running for the rifle as he thought he saw a rabbit, but he put a bullet through the bottom of a brand new slop jar that was being aired. (3) The night we were awakened from sleep to pull feathers on a bunch of Mom's ducks that Dad had mistaken for jackrabbits, as he made his nightly round with his shotgun around the haystacks. We always wondered if it was an accident, as he never really liked Mom's ducks.

Which reminds us of Mom making rounds of rooming houses in Douglas, looking for room and board for Ellis and Ben during the school year and not realizing she was speaking with a Madam at a brothel.

Oh yes, once we sent a "traveling preacher" to the cellar to see Mom and Dad, who just happened to be bottling home-brew.

Ardy and Vi went for milk cows, saw a lone duck floating on the north dike, Ardy teased Vi that she couldn't hit the duck because she couldn't hit the broad-side of a barn. Vi aimed the rifle, pulled the trigger, shot the duck's head completely off. Then Ardy laughed and threatened to tell Dad if Vi didn't retrieve the duck. Dad always said we had to bring home any wild game we shot, i.e. rabbits, sagehens, because, "It was a sin to waste the food God provided." Vi was so afraid of the water, but finally rode her horse, "Old Prince," into the dike after the duck.

Young and old remember the dances at Walker Creek, Dry Creek and LaPrele, especially when the "Lundberg Bros." played. The younger also remember collecting the tin cups for the ladies in the kitchen and going to sleep on coats, piled high, behind the piano on the bandstand.

How much fun we had with our cousins, the children of Elof, Fred, Carl Lundberg, Ancel Miles, Lewis Hansen, Les and Harry Wileman and our aunt Alyce Lundberg at family gatherings. We also remember, with kind thoughts, some of our neighbors; Lund, Robinson, Edward, Swanson, Clausen, Hageman and Hublein families.

One of the most spectacular sights we remember seeing was on January 3, 1942 when Ellis and Ben were leaving with their buddy, Paul Sybrant, for the Army Air Force. We awoke that morning to see a herd of about 230 antelope bedded down west of our home, on a bed of new fallen snow. As the sun came up, the herd moved out, running, jumping, following their leader to the northwest. Our mom, with tears rolling down her cheeks, felt it was an omen from God. She knew her boys would be safe and return from the war.

When we think about our parents and their years in Converse County, it seems the "real meaning of their life" was in raising their children to be honest, upright, hard working, productive, happy individuals. This they accomplished so well. They encouraged each of us to be the best we could be and to do the best we could in everything we attempted to do. The two of them set an example that was hard for us to follow. For this we thank them.

The family of Felix and Dollie Lundberg

Lundberg, Fred and Delia Family

My grandparents, Victor and Marrie Ellen Carlburg Lundberg, came to America from Sweden in the spring of 1883, settling in Moline, Illinois where my father, Fred, was born (March 22, 1888.) Shortly after his birth, the family moved to Knox County, Nebraska and took up residence on a farm eleven miles northwest of Bloomfield where they lived until 1919. Their next move was to Scottsbluff, Nebraska where daughters Alyce and Anna had a millinery shop. In 1920 they moved to Douglas where they lived until grandmother died in 1924. Grandfather was an invalid in a wheelchair for the last 26 years of his life and lived with his children until his death in 1928.

Fred married Emma Adelia Oak at Harrington, Nebraska, June 12, 1919. Delia, as she was called, was born in Cumming County, Nebraska, October 22, 1889, the daughter of Oscar and Anne Sophia Oak. Her family were also pioneers to this country coming to America from Sweden in the 1840's, moving from Illinois to Iowa in 1849 and to Burt County, Nebraska in 1855. One of the first settlers in the area, John Oak became the first official postmaster of May 11, 1868 in the town of Oakland, named after him.

Fred and Delia came to Converse County in 1919 and homesteaded north of Douglas near Lightning Creek, neighboring with the Herman Wulffs, starting their life in a sod house until more suitable accommodations could be built. Fred Willis was born while they were living in the sod house, January 15, 1921. Also, a cousin, Ellen

Fred and Emma "Delia" Lundberg

Marie Lundberg, orphan daughter of Elof and Hulda Lundberg, born March 15, 1913 in Bloomfield, Nebraska lived with us part of the time. She was like a member of our family and loved by all. I remember the folks telling about Ellen at age eight, lying on a bed in the sod house and seeing a snake come crawling down the wall, and Mother finding a rattlesnake in Willis' sandpile after he came in the house insisting there was a "rat" out there.

We later moved farther east across the road from the Felix Lundberg homestead. While living there, I (Norma Lee) was born March 18, 1924. In the spring of 1927 we moved to Gurley, Nebraska to join Felix and farm some land the Lundberg Bros. had there. While living in Gurley, Delores was born July 21, 1927. So much time was spent traveling between Douglas and Gurley, they finally decided to get rid of their land in Nebraska; and in about 1930 we and the Felix Lundbergs moved back to Douglas where Stanley was born July 13, 1931.

Willis was especially glad to be back to his old school friends and Happy Hollow School, where I started my second grade. Those were fun times, we had a lot of school programs which all the parents and neighbors attended, sometimes having oyster or carry-in suppers for a more social occasion. Two of our teachers were Edward Dolan and Alice McCoubrey.

About 1934 when the Lundberg Bros. dissolved their partnership, we moved farther south to the old Miller place west of Flattop. It seemed like the end of the world to be so far away from our relatives and old neighbors, however, we still went to Happy Hollow school. Howard Young was our bus driver. Some of our new neighbors were the Exleys, Bill Halls, Hagemans, Mitchells, Munkres, Gillespies, McColls, Mays and Porters.

When I started the fifth grade we had to transfer to a new school, Laramie View. Skirlo Walkinshaw was our first teacher and later taught us geometry in Douglas

High School. He also taught three of my sons, Jeff, Randy and Eddie George. Gretchen had him for a teacher when she took driver's education. My parents lived there until my father's death in 1946, then my mother moved to Douglas and lived here until she passed away in 1972.

Everyone worked hard and had their share of chores to do every day but we have a lot of fond memories: No electricity or telephones, sitting around the dining room table in the evenings doing our home work or playing cards or games by a gas lantern or the old Rio lamp, listening to Amos and Andy on the radio. The old Home Comfort Range with a reservoir for heating water, on bath nights the kitchen door was closed and everyone took their turn in the old washtub. Gathering around the old pot bellied stove to get warmed up before going out to do the chores or going to school. The long winter underwear we had to wear that never fit around the ankles and always made a bulge in our socks. The nice clean air and Dad taking us to school in a sleigh when the snow was too deep to walk the two and a half miles to school at Laramie View.

I have memories of the dances at Walker Creek and Dry Creek when Lundberg Bros. orchestra played, Dad and Felix on violin, Carl on piano and Ralph Randall on drums. The dances were always a family affair, the younger ones sleeping on benches or coats when they finally gave out. Dad always played with his eyes closed and was always kidded about not knowing when the dance was over. We found out that wasn't always so, as he always seemed to know if any of us were up to any mischief.

There were the ball games at Walker Creek and Dry Creek, everyone rooting for their home team. There was usually a picnic with plenty of fried chicken and home-made ice cream. We had big holiday gatherings of family and friends, Dad checking with Larry Olsen before Christmas to make sure he had ordered his lutefisk.

It was an unwritten law that even if we weren't home the doors were never locked as someone might be lost, need refuge from the weather or have car trouble. Mom always had the coffee pot on for anyone stopping by, and on Sundays we never knew how many people we would have for dinner.

I remember the neighbors helping each other out during harvest and shearing, the women helping with the cooking and having a good visit. I remember the wild horse herd in the north country, and taking a .22 rifle with us while trailing sheep or rounding up the cows at milking time, sometimes bringing home a duck from the dikes or a sage hen.

Dad's sense of humor, ready wit and cheerful outlook on life helped us through a lot of bad times. He always taught us to look for the good in everyone and everything whether it be the depression, a blizzard, hailstorm or drought; that no matter how tough things got, there were a lot of things to be thankful for and there was always someone worse off than we were. He said that if you tried to live a good life and follow the golden rule and had faith and trust everything would work out. I remember their faith during the war when Willis was in Guam and we hadn't heard from him for over three months. One of Stanley's school mates told him some Jap had probably gotten him. He came home and surprised us on Christmas Day. I remember the time Delores had a runaway with a load of hay. The front wheels came off the hayrack and she decided she would do like they did in the old westerns riding on the front wheel to try to stop the team and almost killing herself, almost scaring Stanley to death watching it all.

Our parents' hard work, honesty, understanding, trust and encouragement played a very important part in the development of our lives. We indeed have a lot to be thankful for.

Norma Lundberg George

Lutcavish, Charles and Lovina

Charles Lutcavish's father came from Poland, his mother from Ireland. The name at that time was spelled Lutkiewicz, pronounced Lutcavish. There were ten children in Charles' family. One son, Joe, continued to spell his name Lutkiewicz while another son, Lester, changed the spelling to Lucavish.

Mary Lovina Rice was the second child and oldest daughter of the six children of Edward Rice and Elizabeth Westfall Rice who lived on a farm near Dahinda, Illinois. Edward died when his younger children were quite small and Elizabeth raised the family by herself.

Elizabeth is remembered as a jolly lady with a good sense of humor who was always busy knitting or reading during her leisure hours. She would turn to the back of a book to read how the story ended. If she liked the ending, then she would read the book. She died in 1914 or 1915.

Lovina was obliged to go away from home to work at the age of 15. She was employed by a family named Harrington. She worked for them until 1891 and was paid a salary of $2.00 per week. Lovina met Charles Lutcavish while he was also employed by the Harringtons.

Lovina Rice and Charles Lutcavish were married May 6, 1891 and lived in Yates City, Illinois. Their children, Bertha Elizabeth, Harry Archie, Anna Marie and Trella Lovina (born April 27, 1903) were born there.

In 1904, the family moved to Nebraska and later to a farm near Woodruff, Kansas where Robert Earl was born in 1906. In 1907 they moved nine miles northeast of Cambridge, Nebraska. Edith Lillian was born there on November 7, 1909. They moved four miles south of Cambridge in 1915 and lived there until January 1917 when they moved near Lisco. In 1922 they moved to a farm east of Dalton and lived there until March 1926 when Charles, Lovina and Edith moved to Wyoming to homestead north and west of the Dry Creek community close to the Cheyenne River.

Anna Marie Lutcavish married James Franklin House on March 18, 1920. Their son, Robert Perry, was born July 22, 1921 in Kansas City, Kansas. Anna and James were divorced in 1923. On August 7, 1924, Anna married Frank E. Kemper. Their first son, Kenneth Dale, was born July 25, 1925. The Kempers lived in Broadwater, Nebraska until 1926 when they homesteaded in Wyoming near her parents (on the north side of the Cheyenne River). Their second son, Ronald Fred, was born August 20, 1928 at Dr. Lynch's home at Dry Creek. The Kempers moved to Laclede, Idaho in the fall of 1934.

Frank died February 20, 1951 at the V. A. hospital in Spokane, Washington and is buried in Laclede, Idaho. Anna sold the Idaho farm in 1955 and moved to Mercedes, Texas. She married Jesse Bell Alliss at Sterling City, Texas on May 5, 1958. They lived at Weslaco and Mercedes, Texas. "J. B." died January 30, 1983 and Anna presently lives in Springfield, Missouri.

Trella Lovina Lutcavish married Cecil Clarence Oskins (born April 8, 1897 at Tecumseh, Oklahoma, the son of Wayne and Martha Staten Oskins) in the fall of 1920. They were the parents of three children: Eleanor Marie (born July 1, 1922), Leonard Raymond (born July 25, 1924), and Helen Louise (born September 6, 1928). In the late 1920s the Oskins also homesteaded near her parents. Cecil died January 12, 1936 as a result of a hunting accident which happened the previous fall. Trella married Wilson S. "Red" Grable in July 1941 in Scottsbluff, Nebraska. They lived in the Torrington area. Grable died in May 1982 and Trella passed away October 25, 1984 in Casper. They are both buried in the Fort Laramie Cemetery.

The Oskins' home was moved to 704 Hamilton Street in Douglas. It was later remodeled by Lincoln and Ruth Pellatz.

Helen Louise Oskins married Harold A. Schmidt, son of Ted and Veronica Fitzsimmons Schmidt, on April 6, 1947 in Douglas. Harold works for Amoco Pipe Line Company as Division Right-of-Way Agent and is also in the ranching business. They have the 6B Ranch east of Dull Center and a ranch south of Glendo by the North Platte River. They live in Casper and in Denver. Their children are James A. Schmidt, Janet M. Schmidt Egecombe and Michael A. Schmidt.

Edith Lillian Lutcavish married Thomas Howard Shaw (born in 1894 in Copperas Cove, Texas, the son of John and Eva Witt Shaw; Tom came to Douglas about 1907) on April 7, 1930. They had one son, David Lee. The Shaws were divorced and Edith married Henry Albert "Hank" Eberspecher in Cheyenne on July 28, 1951.

Tom Shaw died January 30, 1959 in Douglas.

David Lee Shaw presently lives in Glenrock.

Sometime in the late 1930s, Charles and Lovina Lutcavish moved to Laramie, Wyoming where Charles died June 8, 1940 and Lovina died October 17, 1944.

Lynch, Dr. H. G. and Jerusha

Horace Greeley Lynch was born in Columbus, Ohio in 1850. He graduated from medical college in Ohio and began his medical practice in Greenfield, Iowa (Adair County). He was also editor of the "Greenfield Transcript" there.

He married Anna Stahl. Two sons were born to them: Roy Lynch on July 29, 1879 and Eldon R. Lynch on July 11, 1884. In 1887 Anna Lynch died from an accident leaving two small sons, Roy and Eldon.

In later years Dr. Lynch married Jerusha May Busby, a school teacher. To this union two sons were born: Donald Lynch and Edgar Lynch. The doctor continued to practice medicine and although his office was in Greenfield he still drove his horse and buggy to make house calls in adjoining towns and counties.

Dr. H. G. and Rhue Lynch on their golden anniversary.

Roy Lynch became an Iowa farmer. In 1900 he married Sarah (Sadie) Johnston whose parents lived near. Sadie had gone to Chicago where she became a stenographer and a model in one of the large department stores. Roy and Sadie moved to Creston, Iowa (Union County) where Roy became a barber. Later he owned the Union Hardware Store. In 1904 a son, Lysle Raymond, was born and in 1909 a daughter, Anna Lenore. Lysle had a short life. He died in 1910. Daughter Anna Lynch Owen is still living and remembers well making rounds in the buggy with Dr. H. G. Lynch. She was his first granddaughter.

Roy's younger brother, Eldon, at age 17, became a fireman for C.B. & Q. Railroad, shoveling coal. He stayed and became an engineer for 47 years. Eldon was married and had two sons, Gene and Raymond and two daughters, Mildred and Eldona. After Eldon's retirement they moved to California. He was preceded in death by his wife and his son, Raymond. Eldon died in 1965.

Donald Lynch was a newspaperman most of his life. When he died in 1954 he was with the paper in Sheridan, Wyoming.

In 1917 Dr., Mrs. Lynch (Rhue as she was known) and Edgar decided to move to Wyoming due in part to H. G.'s failing health and his love for the great out-of-doors. Wyoming climate certainly did benefit him for he reached the ripe old age of 92 before he died in 1942.

He and Rhue filed on a homestead 40 miles north of Douglas, later known as Dry Creek community. They donated the land on which the Dry Creek Hall still stands. Edgar Lynch was a linotypist. He worked in Douglas for Mr. Clough, who owned the "Douglas Enterprise" for a number of years. Edgar married Virginia Orwin whose father built most of the older houses still standing in Douglas. Edgar and Virginia moved to Guymon, Oklahoma. He remained a newspaper editor until he died in 1960.

Only another homesteader knows the trials and tribulations that Dr. and Rhue experienced those first years. Town was 40 miles away with only a team and wagon for transportation. Neighbors were few and very far between. The Lynchs lived in a tent until they hauled enough lumber and supplies to build one room. Wyoming winters were not conducive to living in a tent. Even in Wyoming people got sick, had babies, met with accidents (including gunshot wounds) and they kept Dr. H. G. so busy he couldn't seem to get in enough crops to feed two people and two horses. There was no buggy to make house calls. Usually a horsebacker rode up and said, "We need you! Can you come with me?" If patients were able, they were brought to the doctor. Money was not only in short supply, there wasn't any. But as more people came, some of them helped Doc build on another room for an office and for patients to stay (his former office is Web Stoddard's granary). Dr. Lynch and friends organized a Sunday school in a little Fairview School house east of present Dry Creek. Years later Dry Creek Community Hall was built and Sunday school was held there. Mrs. D. W. Ballard was a faithful superintendent for years.

Meantime, back in Creston, Iowa, Roy Lynch and wife decided to come to Wyoming. Anna had graduated from high school and completed two years of junior college. She had always wanted to be a teacher and thought Wyoming would be exciting. So in 1927 three more Lynchs came to Wyoming.

Roy and Sadie lived at Fiddleback Ranch on Box Creek where Roy was foreman. Anna lived in Douglas where she worked for Mr. Clough at the Enterprise for 35¢ an hour mostly folding newspapers and odd jobs and took a fifth year normal training course taught by Mrs. Scott Layton. Miss Maud Dawes was County Superintendent and Mr. Raymond White was Superintendent of School District #17, (including Douglas and many small rural schools).

So in September 1929 Anna began her teaching career which lasted for 45 years. (In fact she is still going to Middle School helping kids who need help!) Her first contract was for $640 a year for eight months school. The building was located about ten miles west and three south of Dry Creek Community Hall. It was a small dilapidated building, built for a granary, that had been moved back and forth over the prairie several times. Anna stayed at Amos Stone's home and walked six miles a day to and from school. Twelve students came, including five Reeds: Earl, Ellis, Wesley, Richard and Murray. Later in the year Violet Reed (Strand) joined. Also two Edwards boys, Warren and Arthur, two Hyltons, Fayne and Wilma (Amos Stone's stepdaughters) and three Hendricks girls. Many fun times were shared there as well as a few not so fun. One of these remembered by all who participated: a real old-fashioned Wyoming blizzard came up suddenly. During the daylight hours, teacher and pupils dragged what coal was in the shed and filled every available inch not occupied by twelve kids with winter clothes and the teacher, who kept the pupils all night in the afore described building. It was pitch dark by four p.m. The temperature was minus 30 degrees. No lunch, no water, no electricity or light whatever. Just a red hot stove with no grate. Of course the parents had no way of knowing whether kids had left the school house or not. They couldn't find any horses in the storm. They tried walking but after some frozen fingers and toes and being lost, they gave up. A little after noon the next day, the kids were rescued via a hay ride, none the worse for wear, except cold, ravenously hungry and grateful for the comforts of home.

Next year Mr. White, quite flabbergasted by the condition of buildings in rural district #17, caused to be built, his first consolidated school on land donated by Dr. Lynch—a beautiful new building with two rooms and a basement full of coal. Years later it burned to the ground so the one in use presently is made up of two old buildings moved in. There were buses on mud roads even worse than the one to Douglas. Glenn Lore drove one bus; Fred Reichelt another; Roy Shelden a shorter route. Later Babe Reed drove another, Emmett Carver taught grades six, seven and eight in one room and Anna Lynch taught grades one through five in the north room. Sometimes as many as 40 children came. After Emmett went to Douglas to teach, his brother, Scott Carver, came to teach grades six, seven and eight and one year of high school. Scott married Lois while at Dry Creek.

Anna bought the old Ballard School House (about 15 miles south of Dry Creek) and got Jim Stevens to move it to the corner beside Dry Creek School. It is the house Munkres occupy today. Anna took up a homestead (under Taylor Grazing Act) so she drove her second hand Model A Ford (from LeBar Motor Company) three times a week to the homestead (ten miles west and three south of Dry Creek near Funk's homestead.) She stayed at Dry Creek the other nights especially during stormy weather.

By that time a great many tons of coal were being hauled from the Antelope Coal Mine (Jess Morsch) into Nebraska and other destinations. It was hauled in Model A and other small trucks (by today's standard). They could not make it from Douglas and back on one tank of gas. Roy and Sadie joined Anna and made a deal with Conoco (Slonakers) to deliver gas. Oscar Wysong was the driver for a long time. Thus Dry Creek Filling Station was established. If you look in the cement you can see 1930 scratched there with a stick by Anna in 1930. Of course the pumps were operated by hand as electricity had not yet arrived. Now the truck drivers stopped for gas all hours of the night. They were always hungry and asking for Bull Durham. Sandwiches, tobacco and cold drinks appeared (hauled by Anna in her Model A from Wyoming Grocery in Casper.) The tin building housing the store presently was bought from Boehler up at Verse by Anna Lynch and moved to Dry Creek. Thus Dry Creek Community Store began.

Next came the demand for a post office. When Lynchs applied, the inspector from Washington came and said, "It costs a lot to create a new post office because all the maps in the United States would have to be remade to put Dry Creek on it." At that time there was a small post office called Bill in the home of C. C. Dickson (six miles from Dry Creek). Why can't we pick up Bill and move it to Dry Creek? "You can if you call it Bill (six miles won't interfere with Washington's progress) but it has to be housed in a separate building and it has to be called Bill." Anna moved her homestead house over to Dry Creek and Dry Creek became Bill, Wyoming.

In 1938 Roy Lynch lost his eyesight and the store was sold to R. H. Stoddard, who became the new postmaster. Roy and Sadie moved to Douglas where Anna was teaching at South Grade. She taught in District #17 for 27 years before she moved to Cheyenne where she taught at Fincher School Grade Five for twelve years. Meantime

Dr. H. G. Lynch had given up his practice and moved to Douglas where he died in 1942. Sadie had a heart attack and Anna returned to Douglas to be with her. She died in April of 1954. Anna was elected County Superintendent of Schools for Converse County. She received a Coe Fellowship for outstanding service, made Who's Who of American Women and earned a Civil Service Rating GS-9, called Education Research and Program Specialist (earned by meeting educational standards, teaching at least 25 years, furnishing ten written recommendations from superintendents, etc. for whom you have worked and five character references, and passing a difficult civil service exam).

In 1955 Anna and Charles "Clinton" Owen were married and moved to his ranch 50 miles northeast of Douglas. No more school she said. But within six months she was teaching Nachtman School 15 miles from home. Nachtman School (including Linda, Jerry, Lona, Susie and Jimmie) and teacher, were invited by the State Department of Education to come to Cheyenne and give a classroom demonstration on Cheyenne television. In 1964 Mr. and Mrs. Owen moved to Douglas where they still reside. In 1967 they were saddened by the death of Roy Lynch who died at the age of 87. Roy and his seeing eye dog had become a familiar sight in Douglas and is missed by many of his old time friends.

Now fancy cars go speeding down the oiled highway, past the old homestead where Doc and Rhue struggled for an existence. You can't tell they ever lived there, reminding us that everything, even life itself, is for a little while. But even progress itself cannot erase the memories, held in the hearts and minds of so many people, of the babies delivered, family members nursed back to health, numerous ailments cured, along with emotional and spiritual help, all given with love from an old country doctor.

Madison, Edward and Mary Lucas, Reuben and Lena

Edward Walter Madison, born in 1846, was married to Mary Emma Duchouquette. Mary was born in 1848 in Ste. Genevieve County, Missouri. To this union three children, Lena Sarah, Edward Walter, Jr. and John Frank were born. Edward and Emma came to Fort Fetterman where they lived until they moved into the new town of Douglas. Douglas, a tent town, gradually gave way to a small cluster of wooden buildings. Later some new buildings made of brick were erected.

Mr. Madison was appointed "Receiver of Public Monies" at Douglas by President Grover Cleveland on April 17, 1894. In addition he was the owner of a hardware store located in the Bolln Building. He served as Justice of the Peace and was liked by everyone who knew him. Judge Madison is remembered as the gentleman with the white goatee. Edward Walter died on November 16, 1916, his wife on September 24, 1910.

Reuben Black Lucas was born in DeKalb County, Missouri on April 3, 1863. He moved to Colorado where he lived as a youth, later trailing cattle into Wyoming. There he worked up from a common ranch hand to manager and foreman of several of the more prominent cattle and sheep outfits in Converse County.

Reuben started an outfit of his own on Antelope Creek in the northern part of the county and built up an extensive operation.

He was married to Lena Sarah Madison. To this union two sons and two daughters were born. Emma Laura married Ralph Merritt and was the mother of one son. Cecil Madison married Josephine Donan Gerber and to this couple one son was born. James C. Lucas died in infancy. The fourth child, Margaret Mary, was married to Ben LeVasseur and to this union two children were born.

Reuben, who died December 20, 1939, is remembered for his favorite saying, which was: "People are more like sheep than sheep are!"

Madsen, Mart

Mart Madsen arrived in Douglas before the turn of the century. He played a vital part in the growth of the town and Converse County.

Mart was a native of Denmark and was born on October 22, 1860. He came with his parents to America in 1886 and found employment in a Wisconsin lumber camp. In 1887 he went to Nevada where he worked at various jobs until 1888, when he went to work for John R. Morton in the sheep business near Rawlins.

He came to Douglas in 1891 as a herder. About this time Mart started working on shares for Morton. Taking advantage of the opportunities offered him, Mart, by the latter part of 1892, went into the sheep raising business for himself.

Within a comparatively few years he became one of the county's principal sheepmen.

In 1918 he formed a partnership with Andrew and Rhea Tillard and formed the present Mart Madsen Sheep Company. Mart owned part of the Fiddleback Ranch at one time. He also owned the Tom Fleming place at Orpha.

Mart was an easy touch when it came to buying stocks and bonds. He owned many, many shares in a host of ventures, such as gold mines, copper mines, oil and gas, hotels, etc. One of the interesting stocks he owned was in the Douglas Good Roads Club. The president of the Douglas Good Roads Club was Jess Morsch, another early pioneer of Converse County.

Mart never married. At the time of his death he had a sister still living in Denmark. Mart died on February 14, 1942. He was laid to rest in the Douglas Cemetery.

Magee, William and Mabel Family

William "Bill" Ward Magee of Peoria, Illinois and Mabel May Thompson of Iowa were married in 1902. Bill was a former streetcar motorman. They homesteaded in the Wagonhound area near Douglas and were the parents of six children: Roy, Raymond, Wesley, Lucille, Fred and Leland. Mabel died in 1918 during the influenza epidemic. At the time of her death, Leland was only a few months old, and William allowed him to be adopted out. As a result the other children lost track of their youngest brother.

Raymond Cecil was born in Douglas on July 28, 1913. When he was 14 years old his father married Emma Murray who had two children of her own, John and Mae. Mae later married Art Berry.

Raymond joined the C.C.C. in 1934, spending one year in Arizona helping to build roads through the cactus and desert. Later he moved to Laramie, Wyoming to live and work. In 1938 he was united in marriage to Patricia Spracklen, daughter of Willis Spracklen.

Raymond returned to Douglas where he was employed by Lee Reno, later by Roy Combs, and still later he worked as a cook in Lee's Tavern, a cafe and bar owned by Lee Peterson.

Raymond served for four years and nine months in World War II, being a member of the 115th Cavalry. He served in the capacity of cook for his entire tour of duty, receiving his discharge in November of 1945.

His law enforcement career began in 1950 when he was employed in Newcastle, Wyoming. He acted as police chief for two years under Mayor Tye Thomas. He then worked as a police officer in Glendo and in 1957 he returned to Douglas where he served under Bob Ainslie until 1970. At that time, after suffering two heart attacks, he was forced to retire. He served 23 years as a police officer.

Raymond and Patricia had no children and were unable to qualify to adopt since Raymond was a policeman and the couple made their home in a trailer-house.

After retiring from active police work, Raymond was employed for seven and one half years as a school bus driver for the Douglas school system.

Roy Magee is living in Rockford, Illinois, Wesley in Seattle, Washington. Fred passed away in Santa Rosa, California, Lucille in Iowa, several years ago. Raymond's step-brother, John Murray, is now deceased as well, but his step-sister, Mae Berry, lives in Douglas, Wyoming.

Magnussen, Seth and Emma

Seth S. Magnussen was born in Chicago, Illinois on April 24, 1879. In 1895 he moved to Chapman, Nebraska with his parents and lived there until 1898 when he went to Janesville, Wisconsin to take a course in telegraphy. He held various positions in railroad work throughout the middle west before coming to Orin, Wyoming in April 1913 to be the agent for the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad.

On April 2, 1913 Seth was married to Emma Singby of Hutchinson, Kansas. Two children, Ruth and Charles were born to them.

They owned a farm near Orin and also had a town house located about three blocks east of the school, with a barn, corral and shed for their carriage. The carriage was the envy of the neighborhood. It was a two-seated affair with a fringed top. On Sundays, the Magnussens hitched their handsome team to the carriage and went visiting in the neighborhood.

On June 13, 1922 there was an incident in which he was fatally wounded. It happened when a shoot out occurred at the time Ernest E. Tubbs and his wife, Jessie, were holed up in Orin after trying to evade imaginary pursuers. Seth, at the depot, heard the commotion and left the depot, walking along the wooden platform toward the store. Though Seth was not actually involved in the incident, he was in the line of fire when the argument erupted into violence and was shot in the abdomen.

They loaded him into a car and started for Douglas. It was a rough, slow trip and Seth, in agony, begged them to go even slower. The road followed the railroad to Carmins Hill and then proceeded north to a ford across Sand Creek and then over the big hill east of Douglas. Seth lived only a few hours after he arrived at the hospital.

Mrs. Magnussen lived at the farm after the death of her husband. The land, which had been irrigated from a ditch carrying water from the Platte River, no longer had the luxury of water during dry weather because the ditch was not kept up. Mrs. Magnussen took care of the farming and managed to keep her children in school until the "dirty thirties", after which she gave up trying to dry farm and moved away.

Manning, Aubrey and Marie

Aubrey Manning was born in Marengo, Indiana on November 12, 1892 where he grew up and farmed on his father's farm. He was the youngest of the five sons of William and Martha Manning.

On June 1, 1918 Aubrey went into the army where his job was saddle breaking and generally taking care of the horses for the U.S. Cavalry. I do not know where all he was stationed, but do know that at least part of the time he was in Kentucky. When he was discharged from the army after the armistice, he came back to his homestead on Bear Creek northwest of Douglas. For some time after that, he owned teams of horses and did a lot of freighting; quite a lot of it over in the Salt Creek area around Midwest, Wyoming. It was during this time that he met and courted Marie Spellman.

Marie and Aubrey Manning

Marie Spellman was the daughter of George B. and Florence Spellman. She was born at Emporia, Kansas on March 17, 1903. She later lived in Parry, Saskatchewan, Canada and Los Angeles, California. While in California, she took piano lessons and was proficient enough that she was qualified to teach piano. She also played the ukelele to some small degree. In the early 1920's her family moved to a homestead in the Bear Creek area near all of the Manning homesteads. She was working in the ranch home of the LeRoy Moore family at Ogalalla at the time she was dating Aubrey Manning. Her parents did not approve of Aubrey. For what reason, I do not know.

Aubrey and Marie eloped by train to Chadron, Nebraska and were married there on December 27, 1922. Walt Forbes, also a Bear Creek homesteader, went along and stood up with them for their wedding ceremony.

They immediately returned to the Bear Creek area. They lived for a while on the homestead of Aubrey's father, William Manning. Sometime in between 1923 and 1927 they leased a small place on the Cheyenne River where they raised sheep. During this time, Aubrey and brother, Carl, were in partnership in their sheep business.

Aubrey and Marie had three children; Edith (now Mrs. LeRoy Lewis) born on Aubrey's 33rd birthday, November 12, 1925, Robert was born on November 7, 1929 and Irene (now Mrs. W. C. Lindmier, Jr.) was born on December 23, 1930.

In the spring of 1935, Aubrey and family moved onto the old Vincent place that Carl had bought in 1929. It was one mile south of the Bear Creek store. In later years, Carl and Aubrey dissolved their partnership. Carl moved to Skunk Creek and Aubrey kept the Vincent place and Aubrey's, Carl's and William's homesteads. The Vincent place was Aubrey's and his family's permanent home.

In the late 1930s and early 1940s Aubrey bought the George W. Pike ranch bordering him on the west and the Curt Sears ranch bordering him on the east. He raised both cattle and sheep. He loved his land and his livestock and gave them the very best possible care. He took great pride in topping the Livestock Sales Market at Sioux City, Iowa several different years.

Marie suffered a severe stroke at the young age of 28 in 1930 which left her badly handicapped, but it never dampened her love of life! Her cheerfulness and enthusiasm were greatly admired by all who knew her. She was able to maintain her home and raise her children in spite of her handicap.

When Edith was ready for high school in the fall of 1939, Aubrey and Marie bought a home at 403 South Fourth Street in Douglas. Marie and the children resided there during the school months and then moved back to the ranch in the summer months. This continued until all three children had graduated from high school.

Marie permanently moved into the house in town on a full time basis around 1950. Robert married Mae Ann Amend on February 11, 1951 and they made their home in the old family ranch home. Aubrey made his home in both the ranch home and the town home.

In the fall of 1952, Robert and Mae Ann bought a place on 20 Mile Creek, 20 miles north of Lost Springs, Wyoming and made that their home. He and Aubrey continued to ranch together.

Around 1969 Aubrey went into a semi-retirement and Robert took over almost full management of both places.

In 1970, Marie suffered another severe stroke and never fully regained her health. By this time, Aubrey had already made his home strictly in the home in Douglas. Marie passed away on January 7, 1972. About one and one half years later, Aubrey's health too, gradually failed and he passed away on January 1, 1980.

Edith married LeRoy Lewis on November 14, 1946. They made their home in Douglas and have resided there ever since. Shortly after they were married, LeRoy went into the automobile sales and service business as Douglas Motors. They sold that business in 1955. In 1956, LeRoy opened Bear Alignment Co. which he operated until ill health forced him to sell and retire in 1976. They have three children: Linda Ashmead Eaton, Daniel Lewis and Connie Jolley and four grandchildren.

Robert and Mae Ann still live on their home place on 20 Mile Creek. After Harry Manning's death in 1976, they bought his ranch. Then following Aubrey's death in 1980 they bought his ranch. They have a son, Alvin Wayne, and a daughter, Debra Murray and three grandchildren who all live on the "Manning Spread."

Irene married Wm. C. Lindmier, Jr. on June 23, 1948. First, Bill was in the plumbing business with his father. Later, he opened his own shop, Bill's Plumbing and Heating, in Douglas and managed that until February 1981 when he retired and they moved to their present mountain home near Laramie Peak. They are the parents of three sons; Robert, Thomas and Jeffery and have four grandchildren.

Manning, William and Martha

I am Ferol Manning Baker. My grandparents were William and Martha Jane Sloan Manning. They were married at Elmira, New York where Grandpa lived. Grandma was from Marengo, Indiana and as all of her folks still lived there, she and Grandpa gradually made their way back there in the next ten years. They lived on a small farm there for over 25 years.

Five sons were born to them; Ed (1882), Fred (1883), Harry (1887), Carl (1890) and Aubrey (1892). My dad was Ed Manning.

In 1904, Ed, my dad, married Flosse Temple. Her folks, the Hughes and Temples, came from near Marengo. Dad farmed a few acres that was the homeplace of Grandma's family. He also taught school. We three girls, Georgia (1904), Lanore (1906) and Ferol (1908), were born there and went to school, taught by Dad, along with 37 other children in all eight grades.

Fred and Harry finished school and left to go west. They made their way to Douglas, Wyoming by hopping freight trains. There they worked on the building of the LaBonte Hotel. They helped dig the basement. They also worked on the LaPrele Irrigation Project at Bedtick, where a crew had been hired to dig a tunnel through the mountains. While there, they acquired a piece of land on Dogie and Deadwood Creeks. They bought a few teams and a couple of wagons and began running freight and hauling wood for ranchers. In 1911 they sold their ranch to C. W. Horr, a pioneer rancher, and were later hired to work on a general land survey.

The survey started at a point near the old stockyards northwest of Douglas, and went 24 miles south to Laramie Peak region, west 48 miles to the edge of the plains and 48 miles east back to the stockyards. It also included Boxelder and Casper Mountain areas.

Carl was threatened with tuberculosis. As some of Grandma's brothers and sisters had died with it, and as Wyoming had a dry climate, the opposite of Indiana's damp climate, Carl went west and joined his brothers. He worked on the survey with them.

They all three made a few widely spaced visits back home, but Grandma was very unhappy with them being so far away. In 1913, Grandma and Ed made a visit to Wyoming to see the boys and see the country. As Ed's daughter, Lanore, had weak lungs, they all decided to go to Wyoming where homesteads could be obtained. The land was better than the poor rocky soil of southern Indiana.

Those that were left in Indiana; Grandpa, Grandma, Ed and family and Aubrey, held a sale to get rid of what they couldn't take with them and loaded their belongings, which included twelve hens and a rooster each for Mom and Grandma, on an emigrant train car and took off for Wyoming in April of 1916. That is, the three men did. We womenfolks arrived on June 16, 1916. Dad and Fred met us in Douglas in a nice rented three seated buckboard and we went out to Bear Creek the next day. Grandpa was just coming home from Ray Vincent's place a quarter mile east of them. He'd been down to help water their garden.

We lived on Carl's homestead that summer as he had a house on it. The house had just one room about 12' x 16'. We cooked and ate in it and Grandma and Grandpa slept in it. Dad, Mom and we girls had a tent to sleep in.

We girls had a great time that summer! Carl had some greyhounds, a mother and four grown sons, and we would take them and go hunting jackrabbits. We carried a long slim stick and as the dogs caught the rabbits, we'd slice a slit in the leg tendons and slide them on the stick. Rabbits were plentiful and lots of days we'd have 12 or 15 to take home. Then we'd feed them to the hounds. We only had one rule to obey, "Never go outside the fence," but when the rabbit and hounds went under the fence we went under too. But I don't think we went out of sight of the fence. We didn't let that be known at home.

Grandpa, Dad and Aubrey built Grandpa's house and ours first. They hauled logs from the Laramie Mountains. Lots of cattle ran on the open range. As the men were returning home one evening, the aforementioned hounds following, a bunch of cows took after the hounds. The hounds took after the men for protection and the men ran for the fence. Luckily, Mr. Vincent had his land fenced. Just before reaching the fence, Grandpa fell down so he just rolled the rest of the way under the fence. Grandpa was 67 years old then.

We moved into our house that winter and Grandpa moved in theirs before too much snow fell. Carl, Aubrey, Fred, Harry and a couple of men that worked with them, Fay Harris and Joe Wright, moved in with them. The men each had a round-up bed which they would unroll at night and sleep in and then roll it up next morning and pile them to one side. As soon as they got Fred's house built, Fred, Harry, Joe and Fay moved into it.

Grandpa's and our houses each had two rooms 15' x 15' with a cellar dug underneath. Between the two rooms was a space three and one half feet wide where the cellar door was. We cooked, ate and Mom and Dad slept in the kitchen. In the living room were us girls' beds, a heater and rocking chairs.

We could get coal at several places near us. But we got ours about three miles west of Carl's place. It seemed to be a large vein but not too thick. It was along the creek under a bank. Several people got their coal there. Most of them spent a lot of time getting the coal uncovered and blasted loose, then hauled to their homes.

To have a school we had to have six students and furnish a school house. As there were only the three of us Manning children and one Vincent child we didn't have school the first year. The second year, Dad built a school house out of logs and the school district hired one of the Ryan girls (Emma, I believe) to teach. She brought her little brother and sister along to make the six pupils. They stayed as long as needed to qualify for the school, then went back to their home. The County Superintendent visited our school. It was Maud Dawes and she came out with a team and buggy and a driver. It was 40 miles out there, but they'd come out one day and go back the next.

We had good gardens in those days. We watered ours from our windmill well near the house and grew most of the vegetables they had grown in Indiana except sweet potatoes. Mom and Grandma canned all the vegetables they could. We ate a lot of navy beans in those days. We also had bacon, gravy, potatoes, sometimes antelope, there was no season on them then, and the canned stuff or fresh garden stuff.

In the early days the antelope herds were much smaller than now. And as the hordes of homesteaders came in, they got smaller and smaller. With no season and the homesteaders being poor, the antelope meat was a big help. I knew one homesteader who boasted that he never shot antelope one at a time. He lined up at least two of them and killed both with one bullet. But, as with many things, they became too greedy and only took the choice parts when they killed an antelope, leaving the rest to rot. So as the antelope became so scarce the Game and Fish put a closed season on them for several years.

The mail came out three times a week. At first they carried it in buckboards and teams, changing horses at Sage Creek, Eighty Eight Ranch and Ross. Then the following day they returned to Douglas changing horses at the same places.

We traveled in a farm wagon or rode horseback. We had one buckboard which could be used to make a trip to town if in a hurry. Otherwise, we used the bigger wagon to haul supplies. Mom got sick one summer and had to be taken to town and kept there for a month. Georgia got bucked off a milk cow and her shoulder thrown out of place, so she got a trip to town in the buckboard.

Harry, Carl and Aubrey were in World War I. Harry was the only one to go overseas. He helped take care of the horses and learned to mend harnesses and saddles. He was sent overseas with a shipload of 1700 head of horses and the Armistice was signed on the way over. So they took care of the horses and saw the sights and came back across in the spring. Carl and Aubrey were sick a good part of the time they were in the army.

My mother passed away on January 16, 1919 from uremic poison. We girls went to live with Grandma's family. Dad went to Lance Creek to work in the oil fields and Grandma took us down in the fall so we could go to school. We came back to Bear Creek for the summer.

Dad got real good wages for those times. He worked as a toolpusher for two years and saved his money and then came back to Bear Creek in the spring of 1921. He built a store and became Postmaster to the post office in his store. He ran this store, with us girls' help, almost the rest of his life, about 25 years.

Harry and Fred had a good sized bunch of horses when we arrived and Carl and Aubrey got the fever and went into raising horses in a big way, but it wasn't too profitable so they sold them and increased their cattle. In the late 20's Carl and Aubrey went into the sheep business too.

Aubrey married Minnie Marie Spellman on December 27, 1922. He and Carl bought the Vincent place and they moved there to live.

After we came back from Lance Creek, Lanore and I rode to school over to Cheyenne River. There was a school at the Harland place. Georgia had graduated the last spring we were at Lance Creek. Lanore and I only rode until Christmas vacation, then the weather got too bad, cold and lots of snow. It was six miles each way. We started in the next year going to the same school and driving Grandma's horse and buggy. But that year we only lasted until Thanksgiving. Then the school board got us a teacher and we had school from the 20th of January until the 4th of August, when we graduated. That winter we went to Douglas to high school and worked for people for our room and board. It was a long four years as we only got to come home at Thanksgiving and Christmas.

Grandpa (William) died on June 29, 1937 and Grandma (Martha) on October 19, 1930.

Georgia became Dad's assistant in the store and post office. She also did most of the cooking. Lanore and I didn't fare so well as cooks. We made lots of cakes, but most of them were failures, so we just ate them before Dad and Georgia came down from the store. If we stewed anything, it was sure to go dry and burn. We took cooking and sewing in high school and improved somewhat.

There were several homesteaders living in the area at the time and because of the convenience of being able to get their mail and groceries close to home, Dad did quite well with his store.

The cattle on the open range were a bother. They were used to grazing in this area before homesteaders fenced the land and they continued to come back. Some of the ranchers moved their cattle back towards headquarters in the fall, some didn't and some cattle were missed in the fall roundups. We usually had quite a few strays, and as winter set and it was cold and snowy and grass outside grew short, we had trouble keeping them out of our pasture. Some were Texas Longhorns and fences meant nothing to them. I had a horse to ride but no saddle. As I tried to chase them out, my horse, which was a good cutting horse, could turn on a dime, and when he did, I went off. He wouldn't leave me but I'd have to lead him to the fence and climb up the wires and jump off on him, which I did in a great hurry, as I had great respect for those long horns! But none ever chased me.

In the early 1930's we had both cattle and sheep; and during a dry summer, Carl leased some land up in Montana and took the cows up there. The grass didn't last long and it got so bad up there that Carl and Aubrey killed their calves as they were born to give the cows a chance. That fall the government bought cattle, paying $12, $16 and $20. Dad sold all his that he brought back from Montana except one two-year-old heifer. He had refused to let the boys kill his calves, as he didn't think it was that bad. He got $12 for his calves. But Beryl Musick wouldn't sell his cattle to them and shipped them to Sioux City, Iowa. They sent back for shipping charges as the cows didn't bring enough to pay it.

Fred and Harry sold their ranch in 1927 and bought another place down on Twenty Mile. They had to move their cows down to Wounded Knee Indian Reservation in South Dakota in 1934 as the grasshoppers cleaned out all the grass. They were down there for three years.

Fred married Imo McCreery in 1930. He wasn't too well the next few years and they made their home in Douglas until his death in 1937.

Harry continued to ranch on the Twenty Mile place his remaining years until he finally moved to town and lived in an apartment at the LaBonte Hotel until he was no longer able to care for himself. Then he moved to Michael Manor and passed away in 1976.

Carl married Genevieve Heine in 1937. They had four sons, Donald, Roy, Warren and Harry. Donald and family live in wheatland. Roy was killed in a mine accident in Colorado. Warren and wife Judy Russell and two sons live on the home ranch on Skunk Creek. They raise sheep and some cattle. Judy is a nurse. Harry and wife Veletia live on a ranch south of Wheatland. They raise cattle. Carl died on July 20, 1958.

Dad married Eulalah McMichael from Milltown, Indiana on June 18, 1931. They continued to run the store and raise cows. He bought another ranch, Tom Fleming's place on Cheyenne River in 1942. Since he wanted to move down to the new ranch in the winters, he closed the store as it wasn't too lucrative a business any more. He enjoyed his cattle and sheep on the new ranch for another five years and passed away September 13, 1947.

Georgia went to California in 1925 to live with Grandma Temple Stroud. She worked in a hotel there until she married Claude Berry from Texas. They came back to Wyoming and tried ranching for a while, but returned to California and went into the motel grocery business. They had three children; Everett, who lives in Yuba City, California with his wife, Liz. He is an engineer and builds bridges, roads, etc. Liz teaches. They have two children, Bridget and Scott. Paul lived in San Diego after spending 20 years in the navy. He passed away on July 2, 1980. Patricia married Terry Ewoldt, an electrician. They have three children: Kevin, Tamara and Allison and live in Colfax, California.

Lanore and I taught school for many years. Then she married Harvey Middaugh, a jack of all trades, and lived mostly around Gillette except for a few years when they lived in Douglas with Harvey barbering and Lanore working in the seed house. They had twins, Ruth and John.

Ruth married Earl William Lensen and they had two children. After she divorced Earl she married Clarence Richards and they have a son, Alvin. Alvin married Rebecca Bennet of Grace, Idaho, and have twins, Kandi and Shantel and live in Idaho. Earl Jr., her older son, married Norma Forney. They have three children; Penny (Warren), Wayne and his second wife, Beverly Achenbach Lenzen, have a son, Harvey Adam Lensen. Earlene has two children, Robert Ray and Amer Lanore. She is married to Bill Ferguson.

John married Jeri Collett of Cokeville and they moved to California with the Baren Company where he worked as electrical engineer. He's worked for them for many years flying all over the world to check out and install their equipment. They have five daughters: Michele; Julene Jolley who has two children, Sarah Lyn and John Mackay; Kristine Sandoval has a little boy; Pamela; and Kimberly.

I married Roy C. Baker from Lusk in 1942. He came back to Dad's ranch in 1944 and worked for him until he passed away in 1947. Then we bought out the girls' shares and ranched with my stepmother until we bought her out in 1968. Our two children, Ed and wife, Linda, and their two sons, Rick and Tim and our daughter, Kathy, and her husband, Dave Blaylock, and children Wendy, Ranae and Davy all live here at the ranch, one family on each side of us. Kathy has some horses and Dave works as a pumper on nearby oil wells. Ed has a tractor with a snow plow and has spent the last six weeks plowing roads free of snow for in and out traffic for these oil companies and to get hay to the cattle.

Marburger, George and Addie Family

George and Addie Marburger came to Converse County, Wyoming from Keya Paha County, Nebraska in March 1916. They loaded an "emigrant car" on the Northwestern Railroad at Burke, South Dakota with household goods, farming tools, two milk cows, three horses, barrels of cured pork and several sacks of flour and potatoes. Addie's brothers, Orlando, Carl and Harold Cram came with the car and looked after the stock. George, Addie, their daughters, Gladys, Alice, Althea and sons, Roy and Fred rode the passenger train to Shawnee. They rented a house in Shawnee so that they would have a place to live until their home was completed on the homestead about four miles west of Shawnee. Their home was partially underground with a log house on top about 12 x 42 and they lived in the "dug out".

The four older children drove to Fisher where they went to school for five years. Roy drove the buggy to school. They later attended school at Shawnee until 1924 when the family moved to Careyhurst. Gayle, the youngest member of the family, was born on the homestead with Addie's mother, Lorinda Cram, acting as midwife, on April 4, 1922.

In 1933, the family moved to the Hamilton place near Natural Bridge where Gayle attended Pleasant Valley School and Fred rode horseback to the Jenne place to catch the school bus to attend high school in Douglas.

In 1940 they moved to the Stewart place on Irvine Road. Gayle had taken a teaching position at Willowdell School out of Glenrock and later went to Lander to teach. She met Jack Armstrong while in Lander. They were married in 1941 at her parents' home in Irvine. She worked several years in the Fremont County Sheriff's Office, retiring recently.

The Marburgers moved from the Irvine Ranch to Mortons Ranch to work as cook and chore hand until 1949 when they moved to Fred's ranch on the North Platte River west and south of Orpha.

George and Addie worked in the LaPrele community, helping to build the LaPrele Hall and assisting at many of the dances that were held there. They celebrated their 50th wedding at the hall in 1953.

Addie received the Quealy Award for Outstanding Homemaker in 1948.

Fred married Hazel Wright in 1935. They met when she came to the Pleasant Valley School in 1934 to teach. After George's death in 1957, Addie lived with Fred and Hazel at their ranch until they moved to Douglas in 1959 and she lived in a house close to them. Addie died on December 19, 1967.

Fred and Hazel lived at Careyhurst working for Gladys and Floyd Cady until September 1936 when they moved to Dubois, Wyoming. They left Dubois after Georgia was born and moved to the Rookstool place out of Douglas. In 1939 they moved to the Unland place, where the KOA Campground is now and in 1941 moved to the ranch on the North Platte River, west and south of Orpha. He drove the school bus for his children and many of the children to attend Orpha School. Later he drove the bus to Douglas for all of the children to attend grade and high school in Douglas when the Orpha School closed.

He was very proud that he got to escort all of his daughters down the aisle to be married in the First United Methodist Church in Douglas. Each of the girls was given to a Robert!

During the '49 blizzard, we were snowed in for six weeks before the county plowed us out. We were able to get around and feed out stock with a team and hay rack. All of us went as we were afraid to leave the children at the house with coal and wood fires. We kept warm by clapping our hands and jumping up and down. It was impossible to keep them all filled up as the cold weather seemed to demand a constant food intake. We ran out of coffee and butter. Fred and the kids skated up the river to our neighbors, Adolph Whitings and they gave us the butter and coffee until we could get into town. We were snowed in from January 1 to February 22, 1949. It was a happy day when we could get out and also to get the children to school.

Fred was killed by lightning on July 7, 1976 on Walt Reynolds Ranch, while riding his horse after working livestock.

Margritz, George and Dorothy

George Oliver and Dorothy Elizabeth Dahl Margritz came to Converse County, Wyoming from Stuart, Nebraska in about 1915. They were farmers in Nebraska and came out to get a homestead in Converse County. They had eight children. One child had died very young. The other seven children were all grown by the time they went to Wyoming. The youngest of the children was Earl Forrest who came out to Wyoming a short time later. He made the trip out with a nephew, Forrest Dawe.

George and Dorothy Margritz took a homestead as did a daughter, Grace, and her husband, Fred Dawe. A nephew of George and Dorothy Margritz named Ed Walter and his wife, Mildred, also took a homestead. When Earl Margritz arrived in Wyoming, he took 320 acres and after he had proved up on it, he received the other 320 acres. These four homesteads adjoined each other and were located about twelve miles east of Douglas.

Earl Margritz and Forrest Dawe came out to the Douglas area in a covered wagon drawn by horses. They shot rabbits and prairie chicken to supplement their food supply. Sometimes they would get a rancher along the way to trade a rabbit for a chicken. When they reached the Wyoming line, they had to wait several days for a veterinarian inspection.

The Margritzes built a log cabin first and had a well drilled for water. In time, they built some more buildings for their livestock and chickens. They went over to a ravine with a wagon and dug coal out of the ground to burn in their stoves. They had a garden and raised sheep, goats, ducks and chickens.

Whenever some of their family came out to visit them, they would take them to Ayres Natural Bridge because it was the main geological attraction. They also went to the Wyoming State Fair. The women in the family did fancy work and made butter and canned goods to be displayed at the fair.

After Earl Magritz had been in Converse County about four years, he built a small one room log cabin for himself and then went back to Stuart and married his childhood sweetheart, Lela Florence Bailey, and brought her out to Wyoming. They drove a Model T Ford car out and when some of the hills were too steep for the car to go up, Earl would back it up the hill because it had more power in reverse. They arrived in the night time and ever since, Lela was turned in directions.

In their small log cabin, they had a bed in one corner, one little cupboard made out of the table leaves, a little table that belonged to Earl's mother and a broken down stove with only three legs. They put bricks under the one corner where the leg was missing. The wood box was under the window and they just opened the window and threw the wood into the box.

One day, Lela decided to change the furniture around and accidentally pushed the corner of the table through the window. She baked her own bread and mixed it up at night. She put the sponge mixture in fruit jars and put the fruit jars in a suitcase then put the suitcase under the covers at the foot of the bed in order to keep the dough warm.

One time when Lela went back to visit her parents in Stuart, Earl built on a nice back bedroom and dug a hole under the house for a food cellar with a trap door. Lela was pleased when she came back to her little cabin. One day, Lela stepped back, forgot the trap door was open, and fell through. After that, they always shut the door.

The ducks and the billy goat didn't like Lela. Their wash house adjoined the house with just a small space between them. The billy goat took a notion to chase Lela one day. She ran between the wash house and the house and the billy goat got his horns caught between the buildings. They finally sold the billy goat and Lela was glad.

On the homestead where George and Dorothy lived, there was a huge outcropping of rocks. When relatives came out to visit them, they took pictures of the people on the rock pile. On the flat plateau overlooking a large valley to the north were many circles or rocks where Indians had pitched their teepees in years gone by, so they could have a good view of the valley below them. The Indians laid rocks on the bottom edge of the animal skin walls of their teepees to hold them down. Earl Margritz found many arrowheads in this area.

After about four years of married life, Lela got pregnant and went to the doctor. All the doctor did was tell her she was pregnant and gave her a string to measure her stomach to see if it was growing. She was afraid out there away from her family and she was sure she was going to die when the baby was born, so Earl and Lela moved back to Stuart, Nebraska.

Earl's mother, Dorothy Margritz, had heart trouble. The doctor said she couldn't live out there anymore, so then George and Dorothy Margritz came back to Nebraska also.

When George and Dorothy Margritz died, their homestead was split up between the children. Earl and Lela rented their homestead to a neighbor, Henry Reese, who grazed sheep on it for many years. After Henry Reese died, they rented it to Mrs. Reese and later to their son. Then later, it was rented to Lester and Grace Wintermote. Since Lester's death, it has been rented to Grace Wintermote.

Earl Margritz died on January 12, 1971 and Lela Margritz died on July 24, 1977. The homestead was passed on to their three children, Jean Ingram Margritz Walker, Robert Earl Margritz and Glenn Edward Margritz.

Marsh, Clarence and Anna

Clarence Milton Marsh was born on December 20, 1875 in Kansas City, Kansas, the son of Frank and Emma Marsh. After his father passed away, his mother married George Goodwin in 1891 and moved to Wyoming bringing Clarence and his sister, Dell, with them.

He attended a photography school in Kansas City; and after coming to Wyoming, he followed the photographers trade. Many of his early photos are marked with the address of Guthrie, Wyoming on them. Later he also had a photo shop in Douglas and also operated a "three-for-a-dime" booth. For many years the Marsh Studio was the only photography shop in Douglas and for many years took all the school pictures.

Mr. Marsh married Anna Hildebrand Pexton, the young widow of Glen Pexton and daughter of Fred Sr. and Mary Hildebrand, on April 14, 1920. Clarence and Anna became the parents of three children: Edward F., Clarence M. and Mary Ellen.

The Marshs purchased a farm under the LaPrele Dam located immediately south of Chalk Buttes, southwest of Douglas where they lived for a while. The Glen Russell family live there in 1985.

The Photo Studio was located in the Goodwin Rooms Building. Mrs. Marsh also ran the Goodwin Rooms for many years.

Clarence died on February 18, 1960: Anna died on April 8, 1971.

Martin, Harley and Nellie

My father and mother, Cal and Annie Martin moved to Wyoming from Minnesota in June 1917 with the four of us kids. There was my brother Charlie, my sisters, Dicy and Adeana and myself, Harley. We homesteaded north and east of Glendo where we went to school in a little log school house. There were twelve kids in the school including the teacher's boy. The teacher's name was Elvira Shull.

The spring when I was 15 I went to work for Platte Valley Sheep Company as kind of a roustabout. I was helping at about everything that had to be done around the Muddy Ranch. The last job was herding buck sheep. When they were put in with the ewes in December, I left and went home to school.

The next spring I went back to work for them the first day of May. I was to help with the lambing. We pushed the sheep onto Indian Creek. The coyotes were so bad everyone had to sleep out with the ewes and lambs and we used lots of lanterns. When we were through lambing we worked the sheep up country and finally landed in Morrison Valley for headquarters. The Wilsons had three bands of ewes and lambs that summer. I helped at moving camp and hauling sheep, salt and groceries. It was all done with horses and wagons. The distance between McKinley Ranch and the sheep wagon seemed a million miles.

That summer we had some trouble with the bears. We put out lanterns and that didn't stop them. We tried sleeping out with the sheep, but that didn't stop them so we had to move the sheep out of that camp. That fall when we were loading lambs on railroad cars at Orin it rained steady for a day and a night. Everyone was soaked. That was the fall when they had the Cole Creek flood. That winter I stayed on at McKinley Ranch. My job was to haul hay to eleven hundred ewes and odds and ends of cattle. Each night I took the mail to Spur. That winter they shipped lots of wool blankets out of McKinley. I'd come back and milk cows and take care of the team and two saddle horses. The next spring the Wilsons decided to lamb on the Muddy Creek. It rained a lot that April and there was no bottom in what roads we had. Anytime you went between the ranches you had to pull someone out with a car out of a mudhole. There weren't many cars in those times.

We started to lamb just west of Jewell Springs and everything was going just fine until the tenth of May, 1922 when we got one of the worst blizzards I ever saw. The drop herd was southwest of Sturgis Lake up on a bench. Of course the night herder couldn't hold them so he got inside a small sheep tent and stayed until next evening when the wind went down.

I was sleeping with a bunch of ewes across Muddy Creek and never got out of bed until the next afternoon. There wasn't a sheep in sight. Our sheep boss, John McKinsy, started drifting with the drop herd trying to hold them together, but he was losing them all the time. At two o'clock he got into Fay Lewin's homestead cabin. They begged him not to go out again, but he was bound to try to find the sheep. He wasn't found for twelve days after the storm, frozen to death under the snow. Two weeks after the storm we were still digging sheep out of drifts and skinning sheep and pulling wool.

Later that spring someone pulled a sheep wagon in on Willow Creek just below Ernie Adams' cabin, bringing a herder with a bunch of yearling ewes. The herder wanted to quit so Byron Wilson told me to take another herder down and bring the other one back. I hitched up the buckboard and hauled the herder down. As it was only three miles to my folks' place I decided to go over and spend the night. The next morning Willow Creek was like the Platte River. I had to go a quarter of a mile downstream to find the wagon. When I was able to get across the herders told me they woke in the night and thought the wind was blowing the wagon. One of them opened the door and the water rushed in and leveled off right under the bottom of the bed, and the wagon settled and stopped. If they had gotten in the main current it would have been bad. As it was, all the grub was ruined and I had to go right back to McKinley for more.

The next spring we lambled in February. I was doing the night work. We had a good lamb crop, but had to put the sheep out on grass too early because we ran out of feed and lost some lambs because of it.

I quit that fall and decided to help my father and brother with some dry farming. We raised some wheat and quite a bit of corn. We picked all the corn by hand and would start in October and work till December. At that time people were giving dances all across the country. My brother and I went quite a bit on saddle horses and had lots of good times. I went to work on the highway one winter when they were building it from Glendo to Orin. They had tents put up on Elkhorn Creek. That was where we camped until we got as far as Shaw's and then we stayed there. We used mules. They had three old trucks but we couldn't keep them running. Red Cole and Happy Mick were two guys who worked with me. Baggly from Wheatland had the contract.

Nellie McCormick came out there in the fall of 1925 to teach school. We started seeing each other and on February 12, 1927 we were married. That spring we moved on Spanish Creek. We bought the Bud Gill home and lived there for 28 years, where we had six children, four boys and two girls. We had some hard times and went through 1934 when the government bought the cows, as I remember twelve dollars for old cows and eighteen for young ones. They killed the old ones right on the place.

But from then on things picked up. We began to buy more grassland. The loan companies were glad to get rid of it for $1.50 to $2.50 an acre. In 1954 we sold out to George Reese because we were having so much trouble about school. About that time our oldest daughter, Dorene, married Don Craft and moved eleven miles east of Hat Creek Store. We bought the old Bill Riff farm south of Wheatland and were there two years. We moved from there to Douglas, first on the Eastman place, then on the Anthony place. This was around 1956 and I rode ditch one summer there. In the fall I helped Etta Nichols get her hay in.

We moved from there to a place south of Casper, then on to Pavillion, Wyoming where we bought a small farm and lived there from 1960 to 1977 when we moved back to Wheatland. We have raised registered Corriedale sheep since 1950 and are well known all over the state for our good rams.

My grandfather told us that his father and some neighbors moved from Kentucky before the war between the states in covered wagons and homesteaded in Iowa. The wagons were pulled by oxen and they drove a herd of white hogs with them. My grandfather only had one brother and he was killed in the war.

My children are:

Don Martin .....	Gillette
Dorene Martin Craft .....	Lusk
Sherman Martin .....	Guernsey
Albert Martin .....	Hartville
Mary Martin Foy .....	Evanston
Calvin Martin .....	Ft. Sumner, NM

Martin, Tom and Hazel Family

Tom Martin was born in Westfield, Massachusetts on June 29, 1871. His grandfather, George Martin, died in 1845 in County Meath, Ireland at the time of the Irish potato famine. After selling their land, Tom's Grandmother Ellen (Emma) Martin brought her son, Philip, and six other children to America where they worked and bought land and farmed. Philip, Tom's father, went west to the gold rush, then later returned to Massachusetts and married an Irish lass, Rosanna Dugan, January 19, 1864. The fourth child born to their marriage was little Thomas. The family remained in Westfield, Massachusetts until Grandmother Ellen (Emma) passed away. Then, Philip sold his farm and took his wife and six children west about 1879. They traveled by railroad into Missouri where a seventh child was born and then on west to Sheridan County, Kansas where the family settled. Here they built a soddie for their home.

Tom's father got the wander-lust again and soon took his young son west to work in the mines of western Montana. When they returned to Kansas, Tom was still in his teens. Tom liked the mountains he had seen and soon left home to see more of the Rocky Mountain area. About 1890 Tom worked as a cowboy helping to trail the big herds of cattle being brought north from Texas into Wyoming. In 1895 he joined Peck Harris in Deer Creek

Thomas J. Martin 1905

Park where they ranched, bought and sold cattle. In 1906 Tom bought out Mr. Harris' share of the ranch and the ranch became known as the Tom Martin Ranch located in Deer Creek Park of Converse County (where the VR has their cow camp now).

From this point on in my story I'll call Tom Martin "Dad" as this is what he was to me.

There was a cabin, shed, small shop and other buildings on Dad's ranch. He had a desert claim where he raised hay and grain. Dad prospected the Deer Creek Mountains for any minerals that could be mined. A fortune teller once told him that he would make his fortune from the ground. Dad interpreted this to mean mining but his life was devoted to the soil, ranching and farming, and he was successful at that.

Dad had many friends in Converse County. Among them were Peck Harris, Tom Robinson, Sr. and Buzz Philbrick. Dad said that as young men they thought nothing of riding 30 or 40 miles horseback to a Saturday night dance.

Dad loved his horses and cattle. He bought and sold cattle and strove throughout his life to build a high quality breeding herd of Hereford cattle.

One summer Tom Robinson, Sr. worked for Dad during haying. At the end of the summer Robinson received a team of horses for his summer's work.

Dad bought horses from the Indians and carried whiskey in his roundup wagon to trade for the horses. If the whiskey wasn't hidden, the Indians would raid his camp and steal the whiskey. Dad would dig holes in the creek bed, put the jugs of whiskey in the holes and cover them with the creek gravel. They were well hidden as the creek soon covered any trace of the digging. After the horse trading was done and the Indians were paid for their horses there was still a challenge to outsmart the Indians as they would happily steal the horses back at night. Dad and the hired man would start trailing the horses home but when they corralled them at night, one of them would sleep in the corral gate so they would be awakened if the Indians came for the horses.

Trapping was another of Dad's interests and he was good at it. He trapped for beaver pelts. With so many different streams and so many miles of stream to search for the beaver in the fall of the year, Dad soon learned to do a good bit of his searching with field glasses. He would study the distant creeks looking for a leaning tree with dried browned leaves which contrasted sharply with the green and gold foliage of the live trees. This brown leafed tree was a sign that beaver had tried to fell it but it had hung up in the other timber. Then Dad would ride to that area, locate the beaver dam and set his traps for a successful trip.

One time Dad spotted such a place but when he rode into the site, he found a dead trapper sitting upright leaning against a tree. The old man was in the process of skinning a beaver when he died and he had several pelts on willow stretchers nearby. The man had apparently died of exposure or a heart attack.

Men who worked for Dad always liked him. He was never too busy on a hot summer day but what they could take a break to go fishing or take a dip in a nearby stream.

Dad always had a pistol nearby, even under his pillow at night. There were snakes, bear and other undesirable creatures in the early days, even unfriendly Indians. One moonlight summer night he was aroused from a deep sleep. Something white moved ominously in his open bedroom window. He quickly drew his revolver and fired but it turned out that his intruder was only a white faced steer. Dad frequently told that story on himself and enjoyed a good laugh.

On June 3, 1915 he planned to be married to Hazel Dell Stephens, whose father had homesteaded in Deer Creek Park. A wedding reception was planned and arranged for at the apartment of Hazel's sister, Bess, and her husband, Carl Price, who lived in Casper. When it came time for the wedding, Hazel's father refused to sign the papers as Hazel was not yet 18. Consequently, the reception refreshments were stored in the icebox while Hazel and Tom boarded the train for Harrison, Nebraska where they could be married without parental consent. They returned the next day to participate in the postponed reception. Mom and Dad made their home in Deer Creek Park.

My brother, Tommy, was born in 1916 and my sister, Edna, was born in Denver in 1918, the year that Tommy died. I was born on the ranch in Deer Creek Park in the summer of 1920. When I was not yet three, Dad sold the ranch and we moved to Denver for a brief time. Then Dad bought the George Martin Ranch in Bates Hole of Natrona County. We were not related to the former owner. We moved there about March of 1923. I was three that summer and my younger sister, Laura, was born in November. Sometime later Dad bought cattle from Texas. They were mostly horns. They were supposed to be two-year-olds but they had horns that were two to three feet long. Dehorning them was a wild and bloody mess, and I wasn't allowed to watch.

Bates Hole was not unfamiliar to Dad when we moved there. Even before he was married he had made a special and difficult trip to the area. Rancher John Tobin offered him a considerable sum of money to bring his grain separator, better known now as a threshing machine, into Bates Hole. It was a very large, top-heavy, cumbersome piece of equipment and it took several teams to get it there. After leaving his ranch the teams pulled the separator up the west fork of Deer Creek to Camp Rock, then to the head of Smith Creek and to Dead Cow Spring, and through to the old Medicine Bow Road which is now called Bates Creek Road. When the side hills were very steep, Dad would hook several teams to the upper side of the separator and the teams would have to walk sideways, pulling against the weight of the machine to keep it from tipping over. It was a treacherous but successful trip.

Dad was a member of several pioneer organizations: The Old Time Cowboy Association, a life member of the Wyoming Pioneer Association, the Wyoming Stock Growers and an organizing member of the Wyoming Production Credit Association.

Dad ranched in Bates Hole for the remainder of his life. He bought and fattened Longhorn steers, traded horses and continued to improve the quality of his Hereford cattle. The apple and cherry orchards provided cash crops during the depression of the '30s. He saw to it that his children got the education he never had. Then, while I was in the service during World War II, Dad suffered a series of strokes. I saw him only once after my discharge. He died October 28, 1945 at age 74, a proud and honest man.

Masek, John and Della Family

"Della Strickland= Expect to be there this evening arrived McCook with love= Jack"

It's a simple enough message, but this is no ordinary telegram. It's an invitation to a wedding.

On January 15, 1931, Miss Lu Della Strickland and Mr. John L. Masek were married in Lincoln, Nebraska at the home of close family friends, Mr. and Mrs. Charles VanPatten. The young couple, having met several years earlier at a dance held at the Summit Inn, located between Cheyenne and Laramie, Wyoming, had discovered an immediate dislike for one another. It wasn't until six months later that either one of them was willing to chance a second date. This time they attended the Cheyenne Frontier Days and it was love at second sight.

During their courtship and for a short while after they married, Miss Strickland, better known as "Della" to family and friends, worked as an obstetrics supervisor at Memorial Hospital in Cheyenne, Wyoming. She had obtained her job at Memorial after graduating from the University of Nebraska in June 1928 with a degree in nursing. Her specialty, obstetrics (the care of pregnant women and new-born infants), would prove to be a long-lasting and rewarding career.

John Masek, also known as "Jack" or "Doc", was similarly involved in providing health care as a chiropractor in Sterling, Colorado. He had received his education at the National College of Chiropractic in Chicago, Illinois and at the Denver College of Chiropractic, Denver, Colorado. His career, too, would span decades and provide many rewards, the least of which were monetary. In the early years of his practice he was as likely to receive a chicken or sack of potatoes in payment as he was to receive cash.

When Della, as a new bride, joined her husband in Sterling, Colorado, her knowledge of infants and infant care was invaluable, even though she was not employed as a nurse during their stay in Sterling. She and John had started their own family and were blessed with their first child, Rosemary, on September 7, 1931. Their second child, John Alan, was born a year later, on September 14, 1932. It was a time of happiness, the hopeful beginning of a new family, but it was also a time of despair, the frightful beginning of the Great Depression.

Money was scarce, with little or no work for a chiropractor. Fortunately for the Masek family there was an alternative means for survival. If John couldn't support them by practicing chiropractic in Sterling, then he would take them back to the land, back to his homestead in Wyoming.

On December 21, 1922, John Masek, then 21 years old, had received a grant of 640 acres, 14 miles east of Douglas, Wyoming from the President of the United States, Warren G. Harding. The land was designated as a "homestead." Young John was positive there was oil on the land and that someday he would see wells drilled on it. Several pieces of correspondence, dated in 1935 and 1936, illustrate John's interest in seeing "geologizing and drilling operations" begun on his land. However, back in 1922, before he could realize his dreams of discovering oil or see to his education as a doctor of chiropractic, he had to meet certain requirements in order to retain his homestead. He had to "prove up" and that he did, where among other things, he built a small one room house. It was back to this setting that he moved his young family in the spring of 1933.

Their mailing address was Shawnee, Wyoming. They owned one milk cow (bought with four tons of coal) and one Chevy coupe. The car was cantankerous in the winter and the cow spent more time wandering the prairie than she did in the barn. One day, while Della was searching for the ever-roaming cow, little John and Rosemary, "a mischievous pair, who took every advantage", got into the stove blacking and before their mother returned home, they had completely covered themselves in the black goop. Della was forced to give them a bath in kerosene before she could give them a water bath. She recalls being annoyed at having to waste "all that good water" which had to be hauled to the house by hand. Rosemary recalls that she and John had "lots of fun."

It was during this time that the elder John operated a coal mine on the homestead property in order to pay the bills and "keep his family in groceries." Paying bills presented a special problem with creditors having to wait months before receiving payment for goods.

As was true with the majority of Americans during the depression, the getting of food for oneself and one's family was a daily struggle. There were times when the only food in the Masek house was oatmeal and that was what the family ate three times a day. It was on just such a day, toward evening, that Della noticed an old car coming up the road to their place. Having been convinced that "western hospitality" dictated that you always shared a meal with company when they showed up at meal time, she worried out loud, "We haven't anything to feed them." Three year old John overheard his mother and took matters into his own hands. Before he could be stopped he ran out to the car and exclaimed to the strangers inside, "We haven't anything to eat!" As it turned out the people in the car were selling melons. Touched by the child's candor and being generous in nature they gave the family several free melons.

Generosity during those hard years often meant the difference between living a day with hope or living it with despair. During 1935 the Maseks had virtually no money, and at Christmas time that year, with the temperature at 40 degrees below zero, there was no chance of reaching the Shawnee Post Office or grocery store. The Chevy coupe wouldn't start and for John to walk the seven miles to Shawnee and back, even with his booted feet and legs wrapped in gunny sacks, was out of the question in the freezing weather. Just when it seemed that the situation was indeed hopeless, a neighbor, from several miles away, came by in his truck and offered to take John to town. When he returned home, he was laden with packages and the makings of a simple Christmas dinner. It seemed relatives and friends, far and near, had remembered them in their isolation. There were warm clothes and toys for the children. It was indeed a happy, hopeful Christmas.

By the fall of 1936 conditions had improved a good deal for the Masek family and they were able to move to Casper, Wyoming. Rosemary was old enough to start school. Dr. John Masek was able to resume his practice of chiropractic and Della was able to resume her nursing at Memorial Hospital in Casper. On September 27, 1940, a third and last child, Tommy David, was born to Della and John. As for John's dream of discovering oil on the homestead property, "Well just like they say, thar are gold in those hills, if you know where it is..." Joseph Neuzel wrote to his cousin, John, on November 23, 1935. And there was gold "black gold", in those hills outside Shawnee. Ironically, however, oil wasn't discovered until 1981, twelve years after John's death. But, as Joseph also reminded his cousin, back in 1935, "A fellow is never lost until all hope is lost. But let's keep up hope and then some more hope." And John Masek never gave up hope.

Mason, Clarence, Velma, and Ruth

My father, Fred D. Mason, was born July 4, 1877 in Franklin County, Iowa. He died April 18, 1938 in Sioux County, Harrison, Nebraska.

My mother, Carrie A. Frazier, was born December 14, 1876, in Missouri Valley, Iowa. She died March 13, 1950 in Natrona County, Casper, Wyoming. She was Scotch and Irish descent. My father was English descent.

Fred D. Mason and Carrie A. Frazier were united in marriage January 13, 1898. To this union were born three children: Beatrice Fern, born November 4, 1898, died January 5, 1943; Clarence Sampson, born December 10, 1902; and Margarete Kathryn, born September 21, 1905 and died in Luray, Virginia.

I, Clarence Sampson Mason, was born near Fort Robinson, Nebraska on Soldier Creek where my folks ranched at that time. I grew up in that community and my early education was in a country school near our home.

When I was eleven years old my mother and father separated and divorced. I went to Petes, Colorado to live with my father's brother, Lester Mason, who farmed. I worked in the harvest fields until that seasonal work ended, then I worked on other farms in that area for about three years. In about 1917 I came back to Andrews, Nebraska to live with my father and his second wife, Victoria Sundstrom. Father was maintenance foreman for the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad at Andrews, Nebraska then.

At the beginning of World War I, I was drafted on the labor force on the railroad until the Armistice was signed November 11, 1918.

On November 11, 1918 I was working on a small extra gang repairing railroad track at Node, Wyoming. To celebrate this happy event we took about 75 old ties from a pile near by, set them on fire. Nearby ranchers and farmers seeing the smoke thought the Node Post Office and store was on fire. They came as an army. When they learned the true motive, food, music - everything was quickly recruited and what a celebration we had. We danced right on the ground until wee morning hours.

This same fall I quit working for the railroad and worked on farms and road grading crews around Harrison, Nebraska. Then May 2, 1923 I went back to work for the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad.

November 14, 1923 I married Velma Alice Wright of Harrison, Nebraska in Hot Springs, South Dakota. This same fall I took the foreman's job at Fisher, Wyoming located seven miles west of Shawnee, Wyoming.

To this union were born two children: Dorothy Jean, born December 29, 1925 at Fisher, Wyoming and died February 14, 1983 at Forsythe, Montana; Donald Lee, born May 22, 1934 at Fetterman, Wyoming.

We lived in a boxcar at Fisher, Wyoming. I was stationed there for three and one half years, then we moved to Fetterman, Wyoming. In the years that followed, we moved 17 times in 19 years, being located as far east as Crawford, Nebraska, and as far west as Natrona, Wyoming. In 1939 we moved to our first location in Shawnee, Wyoming. We saw some real hard times, used orange crates for cupboards, spike kegs for chairs and ate many rabbits and sage chickens. But by staying on the job we had enough to keep us going.

Three events were outstanding experiences during this entire period of time:

In the fall of 1946 the whole area of Douglas and east to include the Shawnee area, suffered a destructive and killing rain and hail storm. The hail was as large as baseballs - killing calves, lambs and any kind of birds, hawks, etc. Roofs were battered and the overhang of eaves were broken as though one had taken a sledge hammer to break them. Needless to say, the rodeo and afternoon program at the Wyoming State Fair came to a sudden end. People in the grandstands fainted from shock and fright. Much track and many bridges were washed out from Casper, Wyoming to Crawford, Nebraska.

The second event - The Lost Springs track foreman, Dan Tracy had his handcar on the track and was giving it a push to get it started to go west. He stubbed his toe and fell. The car started and got away from him. It ran to Orin Junction, Wyoming, where a section crew derailed it and got it stopped.

Third - The never to be forgotten blizzard of January 3, 1949. Velma and I had also established a residence in Douglas, Wyoming so she could send Donald to school. I had taken them to Douglas and by the time I got back to Shawnee the snow was so deep I drove in second gear. Many cars and trucks were stuck around Shawnee. About 50 people were stranded there and stayed at the Cunningham Store and individual homes for four to five days.

The snow was drifted from five feet to 25 feet deep. It took two steam engines and snow plows 17 days to go the 29 miles from Shawnee to Lusk, Wyoming. The wind blew so hard it drifted the snow back into the cuts as fast as we could clean them out. This deep snow and wind was a real problem until the first part of May.

Since 1949, I've heard folks comment that a specific storm was as bad as the blizzard of 1949, but I do not believe they saw the part of the 1949 blizzard that I saw. I've never seen a storm that bad before or since.

My first wife, Velma, died March 10, 1951, Converse County, Douglas, Wyoming.

In 1952 I married a longtime friend of Crawford, Nebraska, Mamie Jensen Bridge. She died in 1956.

In 1956 I married a local friend, Ruth Shippen Cherrington.

I retired from the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad April 2, 1957 after 35 years of service.

We devoted our full time to ranching then on the ranch Ruth had at Lost Springs, producing sheep.

In 1967 we sold our ranch, but reserved the privilege of living there. In 1969 we bought a home in Manville, Wyoming where we now reside.

The equipment that is used on a railroad today is a far cry from what we used to do our work in the 1920's and 1930's. In fact, the continuous advancement in mechanized machinery is almost unbelievable. One piece of machinery does the work of many men. All of our work was done the hard way; by pick and shovel, now it is all done by pressing a button and pulling a lever.

As I look back, at the age of 81 years plus, over that vague and foggy road of yesteryear, I am enjoying taking life a bit slower and counting my many blessings.

Mason, Louis J. and Betsy Family

Louis Joseph Mason was born in Grand Rapids, Michigan, August 8, 1880. He became an orphan when under three years of age. He was placed in a Catholic orphanage from which he was adopted by an elderly man with a grown family. He was known as "Old Man" Mason, (William?).

The sons were Jack Mason who was said to have settled near the Canadian border and Jim Mason who went to North Dakota. The daughters married name was Cartwright, (Cartright?). It is believed she went from Michigan to North Dakota.

"Old Man" Mason died when Louis was under ten years old. Louis went to live with the sister, probably in North Dakota. Life was hard for the young boy. He had so many chores to do he couldn't get to school until 10 o'clock or later. He quit school after the third grade.

Louis Mason

When he became old enough to leave home he went to work for his brother Jim Mason who had a large farm of around 1200 acres. Louis worked around the stock and when an epidemic of nose flies showed up in the horses, no one knew what it was. Jim's wife, (Jim had married his housekeeper scolded him severely and unjustly for neglecting the horses.

Louis got mad and headed south as far as he could go and ended up around Brownsville, Texas near the Mexican border. He rode the freight trains and walked the tracks. He said the rattlesnakes ran him off the tracks and the wild Texas Longhorn steers ran him back onto the tracks.

Louis returned to Michigan and went to the orphanage to see if he could find records of his birth and relatives but found that the orphanage had burned along with all the records.

Around 1915 he went back to work for his brother Jim and at this time he met Betsy Kaarbo, a Norwegian immigrant who was working as a kitchen helper for Mrs. Jim Mason.

Betsy Kaarbo was born in Norway not far from Narvik. Her father died when she was small. Her mother married again when she was about nine years old. They moved to Holandshann, Lofotan, Norway, (an island north of the Arctic Circle).

Betsy had four half-sisters all much younger. Times were tough, so alone, she traveled to the United States; her destination Hallock, Minnesota. She arrived at Ellis Island, New York City, in November 1904.

Betsy worked at a poor farm and other places around Hallock including being a substitute mail carrier. In 1908 she went to Daggett, Michigan, where she worked as a cook. She spent one winter in Winnipeg, Canada.

In 1910 she was back in Hallock, Minnesota. In 1914 or 15 she started to work her way to Seattle. On the way she stopped at Ellendale, North Dakota where she went to work for Mrs. Jim Mason. There she met and married Louis Mason in 1915.

Shortly after they were married they continued west together. In March 1916 they took a train to Douglas, Wyoming looking for a homestead.

A. P. Knight took Louis out in a buckboard to look for land suitable for farming. Louis saw the land at Brown Spring Divide two miles south of the 88 Ranch and decided it was what he wanted. Louis and Betsy bought a team and wagon and moved onto their homestead the tenth of May. They were caught in a late spring snowstorm at the lower Sage Creek Crossing. One horse had a colt that night and kicked the dickens out of everything, including the other horse.

They lived in a tent until they had built a house and barn.

That same summer the Henry Liggetts homesteaded two miles south. Eph Knight homesteaded one half mile north. On the Knight place, freighters had developed a spring and well from which the Masons carried their water in a wooden barrel.

Louis cut posts at Pine Ridge that summer and fall of 1916. During the spring he had plowed a small field. The next year he plowed more and built a fence around it.

In October 1917 their first child, a boy, was born. They named him Lewis James.

More homesteaders were coming in and the Masons began to have many neighbors. They were: Floyd Turner, Carl Hornbeck, Carl Judson, Ruth Judson Osburn, Hank Lander, A. D. Fisher, Charles Schmuck, Ada Fleetwood, Fred Strey, Billy Johnson, Earl and Lucretia Lenzen, Fred Finger, Monica and Oscar Burkner, Elmer and Sid Cronk, Harry Duggans, Hoopes, Shipps, Charley Stricklers, Hiscocks and Ed Hower.

This was the Brown Springs Community. The 88 Ranch to the north and the ranches of Sears, Wheeler Eskew, Williams' Duck Creek Ranch, Fleming, Amspoker and Dick Hornbuckle.

The summer of 1919 was dry and hot with very little grass. The following winter was very hard. In December, another son was born, William Henry.

During that winter they ran low on hay for their eight head of cattle. Finally Louis was able to get to town to buy more hay. He fed them too much, and the cattle got sick and most of them died.

Liggetts had a little store on their place where they sold sugar and flour. The Masons ran out of flour so Louis hitched up his team to the sled and went over and bought some at double the price.

One Longhorn steer died just outside the house in a violent spring snowstorm. At that time the range was mostly open and livestock could drift for miles. A lot of cattle died that winter.

In 1921 a baby was stillborn to Louis and Betsy. It was buried on the homestead.

A daughter was born to them in 1923. They named her Betty Virginia.

In the fall of 1924 Louis and Charlie Schmuck and others moved the old Harlan School from Cheyenne River to a location half-way between their homesteads on to the Eph Knight's place. The first teachers at the Brown Springs School were Mr. Bowman, a Mrs. Hayhurst (she later married Chess Negley) Beulah Fisher, Mrs. Avaneil, Ferol Manning, Ruth Numrich and others.

Rains were plentiful and crops were good. Louis was now farming 40 acres of land. The community was now having Sunday School and picnics, etc.

In 1925 Louis became sick and on October 4 died of typhoid fever. Fred Domsalla and Carl Hornbeck were taking him to Douglas Hospital but he died near Mortons Ranch. Betsy was pregnant at the time; and on February 8, 1926, Lois Patricia was born.

With help from the neighbors, crops were put in by Floyd Turner, A. D. Fisher and Earl Lenzen until the boys grew up enough to do the planting.

The house burned down in the fall of 1933. A sewing machine was saved with two albums and some papers. A lot of keepsakes and pictures were lost. The neighbors all helped find a house to replace the one lost in the fire. Charley Schmuck found one in Glenrock, and it was moved to the homestead.

This was in the depression. About this time, Fred Finger, a bachelor, was run over by his hay rack and was found dead. Also, during this time, Mrs. Eph Knight died. She was very religious.

In 1934 Liggetts moved to Washington. In 1935 the Ray Weavers went to the Pacific Northwest. 1935 saw the Schmuck family move to Pavillion. Also, the Fishers left. Eph Knight and Willis moved to Glenrock. Billy Johnson sold out to Judsons. The Loyd Hutchison family moved on to the Eph Knight place for a couple of years. He was a government trapper. Later, the Floyd Turners moved to Douglas.

In 1937 Betsy became ill and on December 11, 1941 passed away and was buried in the Douglas Park Cemetery. At this time, Jim was in the army stationed in Fort Lewis, Washington. He flew home to join his younger brother and sisters.

In 1943 Bill joined the Marines, returning in 1946. Lois and Betty stayed on the homestead until Betty married Jim Gwartney in February 1948.

In September 1951, Jim Mason married Priscilla Brown. Lois married Orville Hakalo in July 1965.

Bill married Mrs. Laura Smith in 1974. They still own the old homestead that Louis and Betsy homesteaded 68 years before. This is in 1984.

Maurer, Charles F. and Mabel

Charles Maurer was born in Cedar Rapids, Iowa on August 19, 1861, the third child in a family of seven. His parents were Henry F. and Henrietta Miller Maurer.

Charles spent his childhood on the family farm, being educated in the public schools in Iowa. He received his higher education from Coe College in Cedar Rapids after which he read law in the offices of Rickel, Stoneman and Eastman and those of B. F. Heins during the period from 1881 to 1883. He graduated from the University of Iowa Betsy Kaarbo carrying mail, 1904.

School of Law in 1884 and for a short time was engaged in his own practice in Cedar Rapids.

In 1885, Charles was in South Dakota looking after lands for some of his clients when he heard of the building of the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad to "Fetterman Country." He determined to try his fortune in the west and so came to Douglas in 1886.

Charles was married to Miss Mabel Parsons, a native of Iowa City, Iowa in 1887. One son, Richard C., was born to this union on September 12, 1899.

In the company of other early settlers, he took part in the development and building of Douglas, Wyoming. He entered into a law partnership with Daniel Pillott for several months until the death of Mr. Pillott. Then he continued practicing on his own. In 1916 he entered into partnership with Floyd A. Walker, forming the law firm of Maurer and Walker. This partnership continued until 1927 when Charles' son, Richard, bought out his father's interests in the firm.

Charles Maurer never had the inclination to hold public office since he regarded the pursuits of his private life of prime importance. He did, however, serve two terms as County Attorney, but declined to become a candidate for the bench. He served as city treasurer from 1890 until 1894. He was president of the Good Roads Club for a time and was largely responsible for the founding of the Carnegie Library in the city. He was a director of the First National Bank, served for 21 years on the local school board, acted as the local representative for the Pioneer Townsite Company and was the father of the Wyoming Pioneer Association.

Privately, he invested his money in ranches and livestock with great success. In addition to being retained by the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad as their attorney, Mr. Maurer was identified with many corporations in the area in a legal capacity, and at one time, Charles conducted a loan and brokerage business.

In the company of John Morton, John T. Williams, Jacob Jenne, Mart Madsen and A. D. Chamberlin, Maurer was one of the prime movers in forming the Unity Temple Building Association which established the Unity Temple Business Block on Center Street.

Fraternally, Mr. Maurer was a member of the Masonic Lodge, belonging to the Mystic Shrine and in the Scottish Rite he attained the 32nd degree. He was also a member of the Odd Fellow and Elk Lodges.

Mr. Maurer is remembered as one of the community's finest citizens, staunchest friends and most splendid builders.

Charles F. Maurer died in Denver in 1931 and is buried in the Douglas Cemetery. Mrs. Maurer who was born in 1866 died in 1956. She is buried beside her husband.

Richard married Lenore Jolley on January 25, 1923. Two sons, Richard and William were born to them.

Richard Jr. graduated from the U.S. Naval Academy. William is an officer in the U.S. Army.

Richard Sr. died in 1963. Lenore died in 1973.

McCartney, G. H. and Lula Family

George, G.H., McCartney was born in Chappell Hill, Texas on April 14, 1864. He married Lulu Townsend, daughter of William Townsend, on April 24, 1889. Lulu was born in Texas on March 20, 1871.

G.H. and Lula had 14 children of whom three died at an early age.

They moved to Wyoming in 1915 bringing William, James Edward, Julia, Chester, Gus, Jessie, Flora, Albert and Minnie with them. They filed on a homestead northeast of Douglas on Lightning Creek.

The family lived in two dugout caves at first until a log cabin could be built. The caves continued to be used for sleeping quarters.

G.H. died on November 3, 1943; Lulu on May 22, 1943.

Julia married William Rankin. They had three children, Kathryn, Wanda and Roy. Kathryn married

L. to r.: Phyllis McCartney, Ernest Beaver, Frances Beaver, Ed McCartney and Lawrence McCartney.

Robert Jenne and Wanda married Clinton Copeland. Julia died in 1945.

Chester married Lucille Meisner, daughter of Tom Meisner. They had one daughter, Jane, who married Bill Harrop and after his death married Dennis Irwin.

Jessie married Frank Batton, an early time cowboy and later time Sheriff of Converse County. Their children were Alva, Mona and Frank Jr. Alva married Bob Wilson, Mona married Merle Dunham and Frank Jr. married Helen Yardley.

Minnie married Wayne Batton.

James Edward "Ed" was married to Helen Keller. Their children were Jimmy, Marjorie, Phyllis and Lawrence. Phyllis is married to John Rickabaugh. Ed died on August 1, 1974. Phyllis McCartney Rickabaugh

McCarty, Tom and Anna

Thomas Ford McCarty was born to Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Patrick McCarty at Neligh, Nebraska on November 22, 1887. His father was a lieutenant colonel in the Civil War. Tom attended public school in Neligh and then attended military school. On June 10, 1910, he was united in marriage with Anna Sievers of Ewing, Nebraska.

Anna was born to Theis and Katherine Sievers in Ewing, Nebraska on February 18, 1890.

The McCartys moved to Douglas, Wyoming in 1920 where they homesteaded ten miles east of Douglas on the old Shawnee Road, what is now County Road #52.

Tom and Anna legally adopted Byron Muck as their son. Byron was the son of Charles "Chuck" and Nellie Hartford Muck.

Anna McCarty taught school several years during the early years to help keep "the wolf away from the door."

They continued to ranch until 1957 when ill health forced them to sell their ranch holdings and move to Douglas. Don and Donna York now own their property.

Tom served four years as Converse County Commissioner and also as a member of the Converse County Airport Board. He speculated in livestock buying and selling.

Tom passed away May 10, 1964, and Anna passed away in January 1976.

The McCartys were good neighbors and would help anyone in trouble if they possibly could.

McCrillis, Matthew, D.D.S. and Emma

The grandfather of Matthew, Thomas McCrillis (McCrellos) age 34, arrived in New York Port on the ship Wilmington, after leaving Belfast, Ireland July 9, 1803. Though shown on the boarding list as a farmer, he was reported on the census later as being engaged in commerce in Perry County, Ohio where he married and reared a family. Records show he purchased eleven acres of land there in 1826 for $59.50. One of his five children, David, a teacher, married Margaret Pence and David fathered six children, losing three of them before they reached the age of three. David himself died of measles at age 43 while in the Ohio Infantry. His wife died two years later, leaving Joseph, 13, Matthew, age nine and Martha Jane, age three, to be raised by grandparents Isaac and Katherine Pence. At age 21, Matthew went to Findlay, Ohio to study dentistry. After traveling to California for further study, he returned to Somerset, Ohio where he took over the practice of a Dr. H. C. Greiner, who had been elected as a State Representative for the second term. It is stated in the history of Perry County "Dr. McCrillis has taken full charge of the extensive and growing business of the firm during the temporary absence of his distinguished partner and is noted for the correctness of his habits, for devotion to his chosen occupation and that gentle charity which makes him a favorite in the best social circles of society."

In May 1884, when he was 28, he married pretty Emma Catherine Jackson, age 26, who was the youngest of eleven children. To them three children were born in Somerset, Ohio, Wm. Wallace, John Joseph and Mary Margaret. This family arrived in Cheyenne, Wyoming in 1893.

Setting up his practice in Cheyenne, Dr. McCrillis also traveled the railroad all directions out of Cheyenne on designated days, doing his work at hotels. He carried a folding wooden cabinet with his instruments and materials, a clamp-on headrest that could be used on an ordinary high-back wooden chair, and a foot-pumped engine for running the drill and polisher. Among the materials in the case was the rubber to be vulcanized for the denture plates; an alcohol lamp; sheets of gold for crowns and a roller to roll gold coins to the correct gauge should he not have enough sheets; and laudanum, a tincture of opium, for pain. He wore a high-top silk hat, a beard, and his clothing, even for the office, was a wool suit and white shirt.

While the family was in Cheyenne, three more children were born; Beatrice Catherine, a boy who died before two, and Phillip M. As soon as the eldest, Wallace, was old enough to be of assistance he often was taken on the train routes, causing him to miss school, but all of the time he was learning about dentistry.

Dr. McCrillis was attracted by the new town of Douglas and decided to move his family and practice there. He purchased Lot 10 Block 16, October 1898 and personally began construction of a small house with the front to be used as a temporary office. It sat back on the lot enough to allow an office to be built onto the front and against the street. The office had a large skylight as he needed light since Douglas had no electricity then. (This building, on the south side of Center Street in the 300 block, was known in the 50's as the Style Shop owned by "Shorty" Brooks and is presently the office of Robert Wilson, Attorney.)

While living there, Beatrice recalled that the sink water ran into a cesspool, Douglas having no sewer. Tadpoles would hatch there in the summer. One day, when she was playing alone she reached too far to grab one and went in head first. She had the terrifying experience of the black mud at the bottom holding her head tight as she struggled until, with a sucking sound, it released and she popped up. She recalled having bum lambs to feed and fatten and a milk cow picketed to help with the family fare. In winter the most remembered fun for the children was sledding down the hill, later known as the "David Hill", (subsequently owned by Eleanor Williams) until total exhaustion and aching legs sent them home.

By 1907 Douglas was getting electricity and the doctor needed a better equipped office in anticipation of his son, Wallace, becoming a dentist and joining him. He purchased a lot around the corner on 4th Street, Lot 29. A house on a basement having indoor plumbing and a central furnace was then built with the new office attached to the northeast corner projecting toward the street. It was the talk of the town, being circular, surrounded by windows of which the frames were curved requiring curved glass. It had its own turret roof. (This house later became three apartments then later was moved to 522 South Eighth to make room for the Safeway Store.)

In 1908 Wallace graduated in Douglas at age 20

having missed school while apprenticing. He went on to the University of Illinois for his formal studies, returning in 1912 as a D.D.S. He practiced with his father until he married Dema George of Douglas in 1914 and moved into his own home and office. In November 1917 he volunteered to be a dentist in the army. Dema stayed behind until the birth of her daughter, Mary Margaret, in December and then with two year old son, Wm. Kellerman, joined Wallace. This was the first of many moves, as Wallace remained in the government services as a D.D.S. for 39 years, retiring at Thousand Oaks, California where he died December 14, 1974. He is buried at Sawtelle Military Cemetery.

Daughter Mary also graduated in 1908, soon afterward marrying a Douglas lad Luther Blaine. They moved to the Blaine family ranch northeast of Lusk almost to the Nebraska line, then Spencer Post Office. Son Russell was born in 1910. Life was so hard for Mary in this lonely dry country that Dr. McCrillis first set them up in the grocery business, which in short order did not succeed, so he decided he could send Luther to dental college since Wallace was just finishing.

Beatrice, my mother, remembers these as lean years, the new home being meagerly furnished, rooms rented out during state fair week while the family slept where they could, old clothes being made over, and singing in the choir of different churches and a stroll to the library as "fun". The $40 her father charged to pull a set of teeth and make the dentures had to go many ways. Especially the country people many times paid on "time payments," bringing in milk, butter, eggs or meat until the bill was satisfied.

The meager budget did not allow for Mary and son to accompany Luther to college, as married couples do today. She stayed with her parents and worked in the Federal Land Office. She would take orders to make linen maps for people on her own time. Before Luther graduated he asked Mary for a divorce as he had another love. She didn't grant it. She later was transferred to Salt Lake where she contracted Black Smallpox, dying February 2, 1923. Her 13 year old son, Russell, had been vaccinated so didn't become ill. He was raised by his Grandmother Emma McCrillis and his Uncle John until he made his way at an early age working with radio. He taught electronics in a junior college during World War II while he worked on attaining a belated high school diploma.

John, the third in the family, graduated in 1910 and began teaching school. His career was shortened when he contracted diphtheria while teaching and living at the Sullivan ranch on LaPrele some 20 miles into the mountains. Dr. McCrillis borrowed a team and buggy (or wagon) and went to bring the boy home. It must have been a very trying trip to transport a fever ridden, violently ill person over the rough roads in cold weather, for the trip back would have taken at least three hours. The illness left John unable to walk because of paralysis for a while and a strained heart. He could play the piano very well which helped him to recuperate. He filed on a homestead and received his patent to the N $\frac{1}{2}$ N $\frac{1}{2}$  Section 10-32-71 (just east and north of D Hill) on December 23, 1914. The following May, Grandfather McCrillis, while walking to the homestead to enjoy working with the animals kept there, picked up a tick on his clothing which bit him, giving him Rocky Mountain Spotted Fever from which he died June 14, 1915.

John managed somehow to get through veterinary school at Ohio State, perhaps with some aid of Ohio relatives. He started his practice in California, never returning to Wyoming even to visit. His mother was under his care until her death in Pasadena in August, 1936. John practiced until his death in 1968 and was buried in Sawtelle Military Cemetery.

Beatrice had graduated in May 1914 and was married that November to James A. Moran of a pioneer Glendo family. She lived 45 years on the ranch at Horseshoe Creek, raising her four daughters; Margaret (vonForell), Mildred (Twiford), Doris (Cundall), and Barbara (Tichac-Clay d. 11-79) on the ranch then retiring to Glendo to a custom made home built by their son-in-law, Robert Twiford in 1959. She was almost 90 at her death, August 1983.

Matthew McCrillis' death left his wife, Emma, the responsibility of closing a practice and without means of support. John sold (or gave) her his homestead in 1916 and volunteered for the cavalry. Phillip, at 17, hadn't been attending school very regularly and felt it unnecessary to stay around to finish. He took out on his own, learning telegraphy and finally settling in California where he worked for years for the Southern Pacific Railroad until he retired. He died in Santa Ana, July 1981. Two sons, David and Robert, survive him.

In recounting the events in the life of the family of Matthew McCrillis, who was dead before my birth, I find him to be just as was stated in the History of Perry County, Ohio... "Noted for the correctness of his habits, for devotion to his chosen occupation, and a gentle charity which makes him a favorite..." When I took census in 1970 I met a man who, knowing I was a granddaughter, pointed to a big crowned molar in his mouth and told me it had been placed there 60 years before by Dr. McCrillis.

McGehee, George and Ella Family

George R. and Ella McGehee and their two small children, Elta and Elbert, boarded a train in Richards, Missouri with high expectations. They came to Wyoming and homesteaded two miles west of Shawnee in April 1915. Their home was a one room frame building.

Coming from a state with sufficient rainfall to a state with a semi-arid climate, George decided that he needed to get work while proving up on his homestead, so he secured work with the railroad. He later worked for the O.L. Walker Lumber Co. in Glenrock. While working there he received word that twin daughters had arrived at his house. He immediately went home to see them. He waded the North Platte River which had slush ice on it to meet the Burlington train to go home. The trainmen saw him coming so they held the train for him. He rode the train to Orin Junction, then walked to his homestead. His daughters, Pauline and Corrine, arrived in April 1917. Ella related that she took care of the livestock on the homestead. She said, "I carried a shot-loaded whip when I was riding which I used to keep the coyotes from running the dog under my horse."

The McGehee family moved to Lost Springs during the winter months to send their children to school. The first year they attended school in Lost Springs. The school was a two-room school, grades one through eight with about 60 pupils in attendance. A Mr. Adler taught Upper Grades and Miss Lillian Meinzer, a sister of Art Meinzer, taught Lower Grades. Elta and Elbert attended there two years. George still worked for the Walker Lumber Co., only the branch where he worked was in Lost Springs.

After George and Ella sold their homestead, they moved from Lost Springs to a ranch-farm five miles north of Lost Springs in 1921 which was located in both Converse and Niobrara Counties. They farmed approximately 300 acres of small grain with horse-drawn equipment and had some cows and sheep. By this time they had three more children, Nona, George and Mable.

Dry farming did not suit them so in March of 1926 they moved to a small irrigated ranch southwest of Glenrock owned by I. G. Phillips which they rented for five years. They sold vegetables to the grocery stores in Glenrock. Part of the truck patch was used for potatoes. After the potatoes were harvested they found many Indian arrowheads. Their youngest son, Silas, was born there. The school was located on the ranch and Georgia Eggleston, then known as Miss Woolf, was one of their teachers. She taught all grades needed from first through two years in high school.

In the spring of 1931, George and Ella bought a ranch from one known as Zoraida Hutchinson, that was located on Little Box Elder Creek. They again raised cattle and sheep. They also milked cows and sold about 20 gallons of milk per day and grew a small acreage of sugar beets to help pay expenses. Their children attended school at the Careyhurst School one-half miles west of the old highway to the south side of Box Elder Creek. Their oldest daughter, Elta, took out a homestead while they were living there. Her homestead was located in the mountains near the Phillips place where George acquired other land also.

In 1937 George rented the Riverview Ranch across the river from Irvine for five years. Because of inconvenience of travel he and O. D. Ferguson traded ranches. George traded his ranch on Little Box Elder for a ranch located on Lower Wagonhound Creek. He moved to this ranch in the spring of 1941. George and Ella lived on this ranch until retirement.

They moved to Douglas after retiring. Ella died in 1965 at 79 and George died in 1968 at 81. Of their eight children, only one son Elbert now lives in Wyoming.

McGowan, Wm. Henry "Shug"

George Willard and Sarah Ann McGowan were the parents of nine children, William Henry, Melinda Ann, Estella Elena, Floyd Milton, Millard Wilbur, Clara Delome, Percy Herold, Charles Clifton and Frank Amos. The first four children were born in Nebraska, the next four in Douglas, Wyoming and the youngest in Canada.

George was born in Logansport, Indiana on January 30, 1849. He died in February of 1936 in Duffield, Alberta, Canada. His wife, Sarah Ann, was born on August 24, 1868 in Amish, Johnson County, Iowa, and died on December 1, 1944 in Edmonton, Alberta, Canada.

George's father operated a wagon train, hauling freight for the army. He was married to a woman whose maiden name was Grant. She was a native of New York, purportedly a cousin of Ulysses S. Grant. Eventually, George's father migrated into Nebraska, making his headquarters in North Platte. George began his freighting career at the age of ten years, helping his father drive the teams of oxen. In the interest of saving time, George's father traded all of his ox teams for teams of horses which could travel almost twice as far as the oxen could in a day's time.

On the morning that George and his father were to begin their first trip with their newly acquired horses, young George was sent out to corral the animals. He was absent for a long time, finally returning with only one horse. He had been unable to locate the rest of the herd so his father then left to search for the stock. He never returned and though George hunted for him for three days and nights without resting he found no trace of his father.

George's mother pleaded with George to give up his search, being of the opinion that her husband would eventually return. She was sure that the stock had been rustled by either Indians or thieving white men and that in time George's father would find them.

George disagreed with his mother. The two had a violent argument which resulted in George leaving his home and family. He did return some months later, bringing his mother and the family a load of provisions, but he did not stay.

In 1896 George and his family left Nebraska and came to Wyoming where they settled in Douglas. George started his own freighting business, making Douglas his headquarters. He made lengthy trips sometimes, traveling from the Texas panhandle to the gateway of Yellowstone Park.

The McGowan family lived about a mile north of the school in Douglas. When her husband was absent from home, Mrs. McGowan locked all her doors, placing a gun by each to protect herself and her children from the trailhands and cowboys who came into town at night.

George worked at various jobs in Douglas when he had no freight to haul. He and his eldest son, Henry, dug basements for houses and laid slab rock sidewalks in the vicinity of the school. The McGowan family lived in Douglas for about twelve years after which they moved to Canada to make their home.

William Henry McGowan was born in Unadilla County, Nebraska on September 15, 1886, coming with his family to Wyoming at the age of ten. Evidently Henry left home to make his own living when he was in his teens. It is not clear when he made his way to Lost Springs but it is known that he worked for the railroad there. He had the job of switching the loaded cars of coal from the Rosin Mine onto the main track of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad. He used a single span of mules to move the heavy cars.

It was during this time that Henry acquired the nickname "Shug," by which he was known all his life. He said that the nickname was originally "Sugarfoot" which was shortened to "Shug," though he would never say why he was called "Sugarfoot."

When Shug was about 32 years old he enlisted in the army. He was shipped overseas where he was a cook for his division. Mustard gas was being used by the enemy and Shug and his outfit were the victims of such an attack. He was hospitalized and after a time he was returned to the United States. He was to suffer periodically from the recurrence of "spells" for the rest of his life brought on from being "gassed."

After he returned to Wyoming Henry took a homestead. He met and courted a school teacher and they made plans to marry. They bought some cattle, borrowing the money to pay for them. They planned to pay off their debt on the livestock and then marry.

All of the cattle died the following winter as a result of heavy snows and bitter cold weather. Shug also suffering a debilitating attack from the mustard gas. He had not gotten a medical discharge so he was obliged to pay all his hospital bills. This, coupled with the loss of the cattle, evidently was the reason that Shug and his intended bride never married.

Later Shug applied for and received a medical discharge from the army and when he was stricken with the illness from the gas he would go to the Veteran's Hospital in Cheyenne for treatment.

Shug tried his hand at various occupations during the years that followed. He owned and operated a billiard parlor in Lost Springs at one time. He was the caretaker and janitor at the Lost Springs Town Hall. He was also an employee of Art Meinzer, who owned the Springs Garage, acting as janitor and handy-man helper.

Art had an old "barber's chair" which was situated in the small office in the front part of the garage. It was in this chair that you were apt to find Shug when he had finished his work, napping or swapping yarns with folks who came by. When Mabel Lindmier asked him how it was that he never wore out the seat of his pants since he sat around so much, Shug, with a twinkle in his eye, replied, "I sit still."

Shug was a big man, standing over six feet in height, with large bone structure. His face was interesting, etched with many deep vertical lines, his nose was prominent, and his mouth large. He had dark hair, which was greying and piercing eyes. He moved slowly, talked slowly and seemed to accept any problems which he encountered with stoicism. When there was a very dry spring in Wyoming and no prospect of rain, a farmer was worrying about putting seed in the ground for fear it would not sprout. Said Shug, "Well, if you leave it in the bin, it darned sure will not grow." Though he had no children of his own, Shug seemed to love kids. He amused them, rocking the younger ones, reading to the older ones.

Shug loved to eat. Among his favorite foods was lemon meringue pie. When he stopped by the Lindmier place to visit, Mabel almost always found time to "build" a lemon pie for Shug.

Eventually, Shug leased the Rosin Mine property and moved from Lost Springs to the mine to make his home. He built a log cabin and in addition, dug a hole in a bank which he fitted with a door to house his automobile. He spent some time digging coal out of the abandoned mine shafts on a small scale, since his health prevented him from doing much hard physical labor. He spent long hours sitting by the cabin door, chair tilted back and with his eyes closed.

Shug finally purchased the building which had housed the Jack Wright Mercantile business in Shawnee and moved there to make his home. Shug died in his bed at home on June 12, 1970. He is remembered by all of us who knew him with affection and respect.

McGrew, Delford and Julia

Delford McGrew was born in Marshall County, Indiana, July 30, 1877 to a Scotch father and Irish mother. He had three half brothers, one brother and one sister.

He married Julia Shafer in approximately 1899. She was one of seven children, six girls and one boy. The father was German and the mother was Holland Dutch. Delford and Julia lived in Walnut, Indiana where Delford worked as a carpenter. Their daughter Sina was born August 12, 1900 and their son Wayne was born September

Many Indianians, including Delford, decided to go west to Wyoming where homesteads were available and try farming. So early in 1910, Delford and Elijah Cannon with Elijah's sons, William and Ollie, arrived by train in Lost Springs, Wyoming. Delford homesteaded 320 acres six miles southeast of Lost Springs on the Converse County side of the Converse/Niobrara County line. Elijah homesteaded three miles south of Lost Springs. Later in the spring, Julia, Sina, Wayne, Mrs. Cannon and her daughter, Bess, arrived by train along with some livestock and chickens. One cow and some of the chickens belonged to Delford.

Meanwhile Delford had built the Stub Moore house where he housed his family while building a house on his homestead. The homestead house was a two story building with one large room both downstairs and upstairs. The outside was covered with black tar paper with a small shed built on the west side for storing the winter coal supply. The coal was hauled from the Onyon Mine north of Lost Springs by wagon which was an all day trip in those days.

The chickens were housed in a piano box at the Moore place. In a spring blizzard which came shortly after Julia's arrival, about half of the chickens perished. After moving into their unfinished house, Delford built a cellar which was used to house the chickens until a chicken house was built some years later.

Delford either built or helped build many of the homes in the area including the Burkholder, Dieleman and Frosheiser homes, walking to and from work. He later rode their first horse, a sorrel named Dolly, to work. Dolly was acquired from Pete Olsen in exchange for Delford's carpentry work. The first few winters the family returned to Indiana where Delford worked to provide for his family and to buy farm equipment.

Their daughter, Blanche, was born January 22, 1915, the only one of the children to be born on the homestead. Sina stayed with her mother while Delford hitched the horses to the sled in the middle of the night and went to get Mrs. Crabb, who lived on half mile east, to help with the birth.

Eventually the farm was fenced and with the first harvest a straw shed was built to protect the farm animals during the cold winters. Pigs were kept in a pen and shed behind the chicken house. Delford was an experienced butcher and each fall a pig was butchered, the intestines cleaned and stuffed with sausage. The sausage and hams were smoked in a large wood container. The balance of the pork was put in a brine or canned since there was no refrigeration. One of Delford's favorite dishes was sauerkraut and sausage so each fall a large barrel of sauerkraut was also made. During the early years many rabbits were eaten. Milk and butter were kept cold by submerging them, in their containers, in the drinking water barrel. A dog was a necessity to help bring in the cattle at milking time, keep the coyotes away and as a playmate for the children. The dog and cats lived on table scraps, milk and the mice they could catch. Those times were hard but there always seemed to be food on the table albeit little variety but all healthy and made from scratch. Flour, sugar and salt were the main store bought groceries. Most of the women's and girls' clothes were homemade.

Sina attended Prairie View School and at age 17 started teaching school. Her first teaching job was at the French School which was located south of the highway between Lost Springs and Keeline on the French farm. She rode a horse to and from school except during real bad weather when she boarded with the Balls and Olsens. Margaret Ball was one of her pupils at the French School. She then taught at the Prairie View School which was located in Niobrara County one-half mile north and one mile east of the McGrew home. She walked to and from school while teaching at Prairie View. A church was located near the school as well as the local cemetery.

A garage was finally built on the homestead, probably after the first car was bought. This first car was a Model T Ford with no top. Delford never seemed to be able to stop the car at the proper time and usually drove through the closed front gate. Wayne drew a large picture on the back of the chicken house with black paint, depicting this phenomenon which still remained when the farm was vacated by the family.

Wayne started school in 1915 at the Prairie View School. James Brink, who lived about two miles north of our house, was his first teacher. The Hoosier School, aptly named because of the large number of Indiana families that had homesteaded in the area, was then built in our district. Delford helped build this school which was located on mile west and one mile north of his house. Wayne then attended the Hoosier School. Starting about 1921 Delford and family moved to the Salt Creek Oil Field where Delford did carpentry work during the winter months, returning to farm the homestead during the summer. Blanche and Wayne alternated during the school year between Salt Creek Schools and the Hoosier School. During the trips to and from Salt Creek, Wayne and Blanche would sometimes have to sit on top of Delford's large wooden tool box for the entire trip, no matter what the weather.

Donald, the youngest McGrew child, was born in Salt Creek March 30, 1923. Sina, who was working at the cook-house in what was known as the Inland Camp, met and married Charles Harvey June 30, 1923. Their son, Don, was born September 13, 1927 in Douglas, Wyoming.

Social activities were limited mostly to visiting neighbors and occasionally a barn dance with music furnished by a local fiddler. In later years dances were held in the Lost Springs or Keeline town halls with music often furnished by local talent. Delford bought one of the first radios in the area, about 1925 or 1926, from Clyde Howell, another Indianian who, with his family, ran a hotel in Lost Springs. The Howells also owned a farm two and one half miles from our house. Usually the only time we attended church was when a traveling minister arrived in the community and held services in the Prairie View Church. They usually didn't stay long and only during the summer.

During those early years our mailing address was Keeline, Wyoming and mail was delivered to our homestead by Judson Watson. His buggy drawn by one horse was a welcome sight each day. About 1927 or 1928, our mailing address was changed to Lost Springs and we received our mail at the post office. We had a telephone for a period of time until about 1927. Since we were the only family in an area which required maintenance of about three miles of extra telephone line the telephone company thought it too expensive and removed the line. This was regretted as it cut off valuable contact with the neighbors.

In 1924 Delford bought 40 acres of farm land in the Salinas area of California and the family moved into a rented house there. Delford again did carpenter work but after only two months he became homesick for the Wyoming homestead, which they still owned, so they returned to Wyoming. From then on the winters were spent on the farm.

About 1925 the Hoosier School was closed permanently; and the children were transported by bus to school in Lost Springs. Delford became the first bus driver and drove the bus until 1928. Wayne was attending Lost Springs High School so he drove the bus many times for his father. Sometimes when snow was so deep that the roads were impassable a sled pulled by horses was used to transport the children to school. This also was impractical at times so the children were boarded in Lost Springs. In about 1931 the high school was closed in Lost Springs and the students were bused to Shawnee, Wyoming.

Wayne graduated from Lost Springs High School in 1927. During the summer he farmed with Delford or worked on highway construction jobs. He also worked at the Lost Springs Bank for a short period of time before it went broke. He drove the school bus from 1928 to 1931.

Julia developed cancer in 1928 and died August 9, 1929. She is buried in the Prairie View Cemetery.

Sina and Charley were divorced in 1939 and she and Don returned to live with the family on the farm. She returned to teaching and taught at various schools including the Stewart and McKibben Schools south of Lost Springs, Lindmier School north of Lost Springs, Stallman School north of Manville and the Lost Springs School.

Blanche married Carl Reuber January 7, 1933. They have two sons, Carl Jr., born January 1, 1934 and Jack, born December 23, 1937, both born at the Lusk, Wyoming hospital.

Before the 1929 depression Delford mortgaged the homestead to buy more land. Crops were very poor during the drought years of the depression and the homestead was lost due to non-payment on the mortgage.

Delford, Wayne and Donald moved to Shawnee in 1936 where Wayne leased and ran a filling station. Delford did carpenter work in Douglas until 1940 when he moved to California continuing to do carpenter work. Wayne left the filling station and joined his father in California where he went to work in January 1941 as a welder for Douglas Aircraft. Donald stayed in Shawnee to finish school, living with Lyle and Mae Cunningham who ran the Shawnee store. He graduated from Shawnee High School May 22, 1941 and joined Delford and Wayne in California where he went to work for North American Aircraft.

Blanche and Carl Reuber, who had been living in Lance Creek, Wyoming since 1936, also moved to California in 1941 where Carl went to work for the Calship Shipyard.

Wayne and Jill Collins were married October 20, 1942. They had met in Shawnee where she was teaching school. They have two daughters, Patricia, born May 18, 1944 and Beverly, born March 31, 1945.

Sina and son, Don, moved to California in June 1943. They lived in Inglewood where Sina still lives. She worked at Centinela Hospital for many years retiring from there in 1968.

Delford remarried in 1944 and lived in Long Beach, California. His health started to fail in 1949 and he died April 18, 1952. He is buried in the Inglewood Park Cemetery, Inglewood, California.

Donald served four years in the Merchant Marines during World War II. He then returned to work for North American Aircraft. He married Ruth Lanman, November 24, 1961. They have three children, Clark, born April 13, 1964, Donna, born November 17, 1965 and Dale, born November 9, 1969. Donald left North American Aircraft in 1967 and went to work for Los Angeles County. He retired in 1979 and lives in Palos Verdes Estates, California. Wayne retired from Douglas Aircraft in 1971 and lives in Lytle Creek, California.

Blanche retired in 1972 from Norton Air Force Base, San Bernardino, California where she worked as a civil service employee for the Air Force. She and Carl also live in Lytle Creek, California.

Don Harvey died April 11, 1976 of a heart attack. He is buried in the Inglewood Park Cemetery, Inglewood, California.

The homestead became part of several large acreages bought by large land holders. The buildings were torn down and nothing remains but the memories.

McKibben, Milford and Ada Family

Milford McKibben, the oldest son of George McKibben, was born in Cleveland, Ohio, August 10, 1872. They moved shortly thereafter to Zanesville, Ohio where he grew up. His father worked in a pottery mill.

Ada Douglas was born in Ohio, also in 1867. Ada and Milford were married in 1895 in Ohio.

Milford McKibben came to Wyoming in 1910 by train to file on a homestead near Lost Springs, Wyoming. He worked on a log cabin and buildings for his family and then sent for them a year later in 1911 when he had things more comfortable.

His wife, Ada, and their six children, Fay, eleven, Douglas, nine, Mary, seven, Kenneth, five, Harriet, four, and Jesse, three years old, came in the emigrant car. They rented a team and wagon to get out to the homestead.

They homesteaded on 360 acres seven miles south of Lost Springs. They weren't able to bring too much with them but Ada did bring a rhubarb plant clear from Ohio which she transplanted in her garden and carried water from the well they dug. The rhubarb really flourished and starts were transplanted by friends. Mildred AuFrance of Douglas still is growing rhubarb from the original plant.

The Milford McKibbens didn't have a car or even a horse on the homestead so Milford had to walk the seven miles to Lost Springs to buy groceries. He told of carrying a fifty pound sack of flour on his back from Lost Springs. His wife, Ada, baked bread every other day for their large family so she used lots of flour.

The children walked three miles to school. Fay tells of carrying extra pairs of long stockings to school when they walked in the winter time because they got soaked from the high drifts.

Later on, the McKibbens were able to get some horses and a lumber wagon and could go to Douglas to buy clothes such as shoes, coats, overblouses, etc. at Gentle's Golden Rule Store. Most of their clothes were made by hand by Ada at home however. They sent for material to make their clothes from the Montgomery Ward catalog. They also had to buy all their winter groceries because to go to town meant a three day trip to Douglas.

Milford plowed the land with one horse and a hand plow and cultivator. He planted oats and grain with a hand seeder. Their garden, together with sage hens and other animals they hunted, was their food for the winter. One time when Ada canned corn, some of it spoiled and, not thinking, she fed it to her chickens. She didn't realize it would hurt them, and several chickens died. This was a big loss to them, especially in those days.

Milford and Ada had another child, a little boy, Milford Jr., who was born on the homestead in Wyoming, but he died at birth.

Milford also worked as a carpenter; as soon as he could, he built onto their one-room house. They added a large living room to their kitchen and two rooms upstairs. Many years later they built two more bedrooms and had a screened-in porch. Milford also built homes for other homesteaders and worked on construction work in Douglas to help provide for his family.

Ada was a very good cook, but had to cook under trying circumstances as her stove didn't work very well. She had to bake her bread about half an hour, then dump it out and bake it half an hour more on the other side to have it baked through. She cooked lots of beans, potatoes, etc. for her family of eight.

Jesse McKibben, the youngest living son, was born January 15, 1908 in Ohio and was raised in Lost Springs on the homestead.

He finished the eighth grade in country school and then went to Midwest to work in the gas plant. He met Florence Hagen, daughter of John and Anna Wasserburger Hagen in Midwest. Florence's mother, Anna Wasserburger, of Montrose, Nebraska and her father, John Hagen, of Wien, Missouri were married the 15th of October 1912 at Montrose, Nebraska. They had three children; Florence, Dora and John. They lived in Nebraska on a homestead. When Florence was eleven years old, Dora was five and John, Jr. was just a baby. The family moved to Midwest where the father went to work as a pumper in the oil fields. They moved from a nice ranch home in Nebraska to an oil field shack, so it was quite a difficult move for Anna.

After quite a while in the oil fields, John Hagen, Sr. ran a filling station in Edgerton, Wyoming. Florence met Jesse McKibben at a New Year's Eve dance in Edgerton on January 1, 1932. They were married just a month later, February 1, 1932, in Casper in the house of Father Reilly. Her parents were witnesses. They moved from there to Lost Springs in 1938 when their daughter Patty was five years old and son Kenneth was two years old. They bought 640 acres there and raised cattle. Later they bought Grandpa Milford's ranch of 320 acres, also. Jesse drove the school bus there and was the town barber. They had an old barber chair in Art Meinzer's garage and when Jesse had to stay in Lost Springs until school was out, he cut people's hair.

Dan and Cora Dieleman, Roy and Bernice Pennington, Anne and Roy Nance, the Ed Kamps, Zadah and Stub Moore, Bill and Chloe Miller, Yank and Leola Stewart, Mr. and Mrs. Jim Stewart, Dorothy and Raymond Reese, the Kornegay family and the Brights (who still live there) were some of their neighbors.

They sold the place when Jesse's legs got bad from a pinched nerve. They then moved to Shoshoni in 1948. Jesse drove a gravel truck there for about two years while working on the Boysen Dam.

In 1950 they moved to Bill, Wyoming where they leased a place belonging to Mary Oakley (the Oakley place.) Patty went to high school in Douglas and stayed with Grandma McKibben. She graduated from Douglas High School in 1952 and married Albert Meier, Jr. of Douglas shortly after. The Meiers and their two girls and their families live now near Meeteetsee. Kenneth went to school at Bill, Wyoming and attended high school there. He married Linda Brannan, daughter of the late Opal Ireton of Douglas in 1954. The Kenneth McKibbens and their three children and their families live now on Deer Creek Road near Glenrock and one daughter lives west of Douglas.

While the Jesse McKibbens lived at Bill, Wyoming on the ranch, they ran sheep and Jesse drove the school bus to the coal mine and out to Haefeles and back to the Dry Creek School at Bill. Florence and Jesse boarded the school teacher at their home.

Florence had always been a very good cook and was offered a job at the state fair in 1949 as head cook. At that time they cooked for about 500 4-H and F.F.A. members. They peeled a ton of potatoes a week, about 100 to 150 pounds a day, by hand and washed all the dishes and pots and pans by hand. It was a 16 hour a day job. They really enjoyed Florence's cooking. She has kept that job for 35 years. She received an engraved silver tray in 1984 for 35 years service to the state fair. She and her crew now cook for 2,000 children and leaders a day, but they have all the modern conveniences, so it is quite a bit easier now.

The McKibbens lived on the Oakley Ranch out north for about seven years and then moved west of Douglas, where they bought a ranch. They ran cattle and raised chickens. They gathered about three hundred eggs a day and delivered fresh eggs in Casper and Douglas. They lived on this ranch about six years, then bought a ranch on the North Platte River west of town from Fred Marburger. They lived there and ran cattle and sheep for about seven years.

When Jesse died in October 1972 of a heart attack, Florence continued living there. She finally moved into town to her present home at 907 Riverbend in Douglas.

Florence is best known for her cooking and has been the head cook not only for the state fair for 35 years, but also has cooked for the police academy for seven years. She is still cooking for the Douglas Livestock Exchange Salebarn Cafe, Boys State and many other banquets, weddings and other celebrations in and around Douglas.

She has been an active lifelong member of the Catholic Church and the Dry Creek and later the LaPrele Homemakers Clubs of Douglas. She collects antique tea pots, does fancy work and paints ceramics besides her busy life as a cook, mother, grandmother and great grandmother.

She has always enjoyed life in Wyoming and has been very blessed by God, she says. Even though she has done some traveling to other places such as Hawaii and Seattle with her daughter, Patty, she is always glad to get back to wonderful Wyoming and her many friends here.

McWhinnie, C. H. and Caroline

Campbell Holt McWhinnie was born near Bushyheath, London, England on September 7, 1861, the son of John and Mary McWhinnie, the father being a native of Ayrshire, Scotland.

The lifetime career of C. H. was one of change. After attending school in Germany, Switzerland, Italy and England he commenced the study of medicine, but failing to acquire interest in it he threw aside his medical volumes and enlisted as a sailor in the merchant marine service, visiting many countries aboard the sailing ship "The Torrens."

At dusk on an early October evening in 1886, after a long trip by boat and train from his home in England, Campbell McWhinnie landed at Sherman, between Cheyenne and Laramie. His first night was spent in a primitive lodging where his initiation was a snow storm drifting through cracks in his "hostelry", and covering his pillow. After some five to six years at Sherman and Laramie he homesteaded near where the LaBonte flows into the North Platte River. This homestead property was later sold to a fellow Englishman, A. W. Phillips in 1899. Lloyd Nunn lives here today.

At the Charles A. and Sophia J. Pollard home (known as the LaBonte Road Ranch), Campbell Holt McWhinnie and Caroline Jones Pollard, daughter of Charles and

Campbell H. McWhinnie 1942      Caroline J. McWhinnie 1942

Sophia, were married on December 16, 1896 by the Rev. O. L. Corbin of the Congregational Church. Arthur W. Kenyon and Jennie Olivereau (later Mrs. Harry Pollard) attended the bride and groom.

The Campbell-Caroline McWhinnie family included six children, two daughters and four sons. Three were born at home on the ranch, two at home in Douglas, only the younger being hospital born at the original Douglas Hospital on North Sixth Street.

These Converse County natives of our family, the third generation, include the following as listed, beginning with the oldest:

- Ralph E. - DHS 1916 - M 9/24/32 - Bernice Appleby (D) 10/9/72
- Charles J. - DHS 1918 - M 12/7/29 - Edna L. Barnes (D) 11/15/77
- Arthur K. - DHS 1919 - M 12/26/29 - Roberta Brannan (D) 5/15/57
- Helen C. - DHS 1922 - M 6/2/26 - Donald Ricker
- Mary J. - Cheyenne HS 1925 - M 8/26/29 - Peter Hutchison (SD) 1950
- Campbell H. Jr. - Cheyenne HS 1928 - M 12/42 - Sue W. Anderson

Following their 1896 marriage, the McWhinnie residence in Converse County extended through 27 years before changing to Cheyenne in 1923. Family residence in the county was re-established in 1928 when daughter Mary returned as a public school teacher after her first two years at the university at Laramie. Her marriage to Peter Hutchison in 1929 again made Douglas her home for almost 30 years.

Successive places of residence during the 27 years mentioned include the LaBonte Road Ranch, eight years plus. Next was seven months tenure in what was then listed as Rutherford House on the west side of the 300 block on North Third Street, Douglas. The ranch was again home during the months of April 1905 to February 1906. Then the Todd residence in the 400 block of South Fourth comfortably sheltered the family, at that time totaling six, until October 14, 1906. On that date, the fifth birthday of our late brother, Arthur K. (Jim), 403 North Fourth became home until July 1923.

Our family's Converse County history hinges on the changes that marked our father's more than half a century in Wyoming. In that span of years he was a (1) ranchman, (2) Wyoming Oil and Development Company general manager, (3) County Treasurer, (4) State Fair Board member-Secretary, (5) merchant, (6) salaried worker in various county offices, (7) State Land Commissioner, 1923-27 and 1935-39 and (8) Board of Equalization member 1927-35.

Under the Governorship of Wm. B. Ross, "Dad" McWhinnie was appointed State Land Commissioner in March 1923, resulting in the family move to Cheyenne the following July.

He ran unsuccessfully for state offices in 1914 (Auditor) and in 1926 (State Treasurer).

The six months annual community service ("labor of love") he contributed as Board Member-Working Secretary of the state fair during the four years 1908-11 is not readily understood in comparison to today's fair organization built up through the years with more adequate funding. A modest compensation of $100.00 a month for six months which he received for the 1911 fair subsequently made the Board Secretary a political appointment for the next few years.

In the tradition of Attorney Fred Harvey, the pioneer Mayor of Douglas credited with starting tree planting on Douglas Streets, McWhinnie, as fair secretary, initiated and promoted the tree planting, expanded in later years, that makes our state fair grounds so attractive.

Regarding community service, history records show that C. H. McWhinnie served on the first library board in Douglas at a time when a single room in the first (1905) courthouse housed that facility. Other community endeavors included several terms on the school board at different times.

Serving as Mayor of Douglas was a mixture of rewards of friendship and goodwill as well as a few rocky experiences. Reconciling ardent "do-gooders" to the sometimes conflicting customs and practical ways of human behavior hardly qualifies as one of life's pleasures. Another nerve-wracking development as mayor was the temporary closing of a local saloon in which personnel were allegedly guilty of misconduct.

Our family relationship to Christ Episcopal Church, to the Masonic and Eastern Star organizations including the Scottish Rite bodies in Cheyenne and to the first Boy Scout Troop in Douglas all touch on early day Converse County history.

C. H. McWhinnie was one of the first scoutmasters of the first Boy Scout Troop. First in the county and possibly first in the state was a ten-day outing at Esterbrook over the 1911 Fourth of July holiday break. Refreshments enroute, at the ranch home of General H. B. Freeman, aided the weary lads on the second day of the three-day 30 mile trip. A lumber wagon drawn by a gentle, but at times balky, team hauled tents, bedrolls and groceries for the hikers.

Family history has a dramatic touch with the parents playing lead roles and the children as the supporting cast, carried over into succeeding years and generations. Our dad was a very gifted, compassionate gentleman and a great father. The supportive role of our mother was, and is, invaluable and indispensable.

As an emergency ranch hand when help was short, as an experienced but unlicensed practitioner of medicine for ailing youngsters, as a cook or director of cooks for hungry ranch hands or threshing crews, etc. early day Converse County wives and mothers wrote the unrecorded history. In Converse County and elsewhere in Wyoming there are and have been many unusual wives and mothers, all deserving the halos of history. Caroline Pollard McWhinnie was one of them, a loyal and steadfast wife and a precious mother.

Campbell and Caroline McWhinnie passed away in Cheyenne in 1944, he on June 1 and she on December 1. They are at rest in the Pollard-McWhinnie section of the Douglas cemetery.

Three of the six Converse County natives listed near the beginning remain in Wyoming while two reside in Colorado, with one a blessed memory. Comment following later reveals generations four, five and six totaling seven grandchildren, 19 great grandchildren and eight great, great grandchildren.

The University of Wyoming has provided an education and a life time career for Ralph, sometimes self-dubbed "a campus hanger-on of 68 years" and by some others as "Mr. University." He maintains that, "the best years of my life" were those 39 years (1932-1971) shared with his late wife, Bernice, memorialized by two annual scholarships awarded annually in her name.

Charles J. McWhinnie was the first boy from Converse County to go to the U.S. Naval Academy, graduating in 1922 and serving until he retired with the rank of Rear Admiral, having been awarded three combat decorations in WWII.

Thus endeth the McWhinnie Converse County history account of March 1984.

Mecham, Melvin and Georgia Family

Melvin Monroe Mecham and Georgia Smith Mecham came to Douglas from Omaha, Nebraska in March 1928 with four of their children: Lyle, born - 1910; Dale - 1913; Persis - 1916 and Alla Mae - 1925. He worked at various jobs in Omaha and was Chief of Police in Havelock, Nebraska before coming to Wyoming.

His eldest son, Vernon - born in 1907, was already in Wyoming, having come out to visit his aunt and uncle, the Jake Schneiders. He liked it so well, he decided to stay and persuaded his father to move out, too. Vernon had leased a farm just west of Douglas and the family settled there for a while. Mr. Mecham worked as a carpenter for Guy Squires and others and also for the City of Douglas. Later, he worked for Maud Dawes, who had a dairy farm and they lived there. Mrs. Mecham died March 12, 1931. Later, Mr. Mecham and Persis went back to Omaha for a short time and then back to Douglas. Then he went out to California where he lived until his death in 1952.

Vernon and Lyle worked on several ranches south of Douglas. Later, Vernon worked for the Standolind Pipe Line Co. (now Service Pipe Line) for about 30 years and took an early retirement and then worked for the City of Casper for ten years before retiring. His first wife was Velma Henley and they had three daughters, Joyce, Betty and Dorothy. Velma died in 1944 and he later married Edna Eccles, a daughter of Jonce Eccles of Powder River. They live in Casper.

Dorothy and Betty Mecham were excellent horsewomen and were in a horse race from Gillette to Douglas. Dorothy probably would have won if the spectators hadn't rushed onto the race track, frightening her horse to the side and causing her to dismount. Her father got her back on the horse and led it across the finish line just a minute after the winning horse.

Perhaps some of you have heard that Vernon won a Readers Digest Sweepstakes contest several years ago and receives $100 per month for life.

Dale worked for the City of Douglas. He married Viola Johnson. They had two children: Judy (Bocox), who lives in Cheyenne and Edward, who is retired from the navy. Dale died of a heart attack in 1975.

Persis married Stanley Tschovosky in California and they had five children. She later married Walt Mulholand and lived in Oregon until her death in 1981.

Alla Mae married "Babe" Marsh in Douglas. They had two children. She is now married to Wayne Stamper and they live in Redding, California.

Lyle married Helen Nix in 1932. He operated a dairy farm near Douglas then became foreman on the CY Ranch at Careyhurst for eleven years. After leaving the CY, he purchased a ranch west of Douglas and he and his wife operated the Douglas Coffee Shop. She passed away in 1962. Lyle and I were married in 1965. We had a few dates when I was teaching school south of Douglas, never dreaming we would meet again much later. We have lived in Casper ever since.

Lyle died in 1985.

Meinzer, Frederick and Maria

Frederick Wilhelm Meinzer was born on February 13, 1865 in Brownsville, Minnesota, the son of John and Louise (Nagle) Meinzer. John was born in Germany. Frederick married Maria Reils who was born in 1866.

The children were:

- Fred W. (1891-1982)
- Lillie Anna (1892-1971)
- Arthur Carl (1894-1977)
- Edna Stella (1896-1916)
- Lula Alma (1900-1971)
- Louie Emil (1906-1983)
- Mamie (Sister Francita)
- Mildred (Bricker)

The Meinzer family moved to Wyoming in 1916 from Omaha, Nebraska to homestead north of Lost Springs.

Fred was the last Meinzer to live on the homestead. He lived there until his health failed and was forced to move to a nursing home in Lusk where he died in 1982.

I, Dolly Spellman Meinzer, married Louie in Casper on November 19, 1927. We first lived on a ranch that Louie had leased in 1926 from R. R. "Dot" Smith 18 miles north of Lost Springs. We moved back to the Meinzer home ranch where we lived from 1932 to 1934. Louie and I were blessed with the birth of one son, Kenneth.

After living for a while at my parents ranch we moved to Shawnee where Louie found work in the oil business there. In 1942 we moved to Douglas where Louie did custom trucking until our move to Casper in 1953. We retired in 1962 and moved to Canon City, Colorado where I still live. Louie died in 1983. Kenneth married Betty Story. They live in Casper.

Meisner, Thomas and Anna Family

Thomas Jefferson Meisner was born on January 6, 1881, in Nemaha County, Kansas. He was the oldest of the nine children of Carlos and Rosa Minger Meisner. He received his education in the local schools, completing his education at age 16 with a teacher's certificate. However, he liked to farm and since his help was needed on the family farm, he became a farmer and later a cattle feeder. On August 26, 1903, he married Anna Barbara Stauffer Fankhauser. Anna Barbara Fankhauser was born on December 15, 1880 in Richardson County, Nebraska. The families of both Thomas and Anna Meisner immigrated from Germany and Switzerland; Anna's parents came to Nebraska from Berne, Switzerland.

Tom and Anna Meisner farmed on the Rosa Durner farm in the Four Mile area community near Humboldt, Nebraska. Tom had always suffered from severe asthma that worsened in his mid 30's and after several near fatal attacks, he was informed by his doctors that if he wished a long life he would have to move to a drier climate. During the slack seasons, he and his brother-in-law, Floyd Black, traveled throughout the western parts of the Dakotas and Nebraska and the plains of Colorado and Wyoming looking for suitable land for homesteading. He often said that there were two reasons why they chose Wyoming: first - the country, well grassed rolling hills; second - the best and most profitable herd of feeding steers he had fed came from the Wyoming grasslands.

In 1917, Thomas Meisner, Floyd Black and Harry Whittle, the proprietor of the general store in the nearest town, Bern, Kansas, filed on three adjacent sections of land 20 miles northeast of Douglas, Wyoming along the old Fiddleback trail in the Little Lightning Creek area. Before the Meisner and Black families were able to move to Wyoming, the United States had become involved in World War I. Raising food was of the highest priority and the nation's farmers were asked to get busy and produce. Since the western lands were unproven, farmers who were planning to homestead were granted the six months annual residency per year requirement and requested to remain on their producing farms. Once or twice a year during the slack season, Tom and Floyd would travel to their homesteads to make what improvements they could. In the summers their families would join them, making the long trip from DuBois in the southeastern corner of Nebraska to the Platte and up the North Platte valley to Douglas. The 20 mile trip from Douglas to the "place" was made by team and wagon in the first years (an all day trip) and then by model T which was nearly a two hour trip. The Fiddleback Trail was maintained by the Fiddleback Ranch Company; they would drag a large log or a railroad iron behind a freight wagon to drag down the ruts. It was one of the best roads in the country, but still not much to brag about. Highway 59 quite closely follows the old trail.

For the first few summers, most of the country was still unfenced open range. Many ranchers bought long-horned steers in Texas and turned them loose on the open range for a year or two to grow and fatten up on the good, rich Wyoming grass. The steers wore distinct cow paths which they used regularly to get from their grazing areas to the nearest water hole. One such cow path was between the Meisner house (the homesteader's inevitable tarpaper shack) and a small shed about 40 feet away. Every day a herd of these steers would march single file down this cow path to water and back again a few hours later to graze. When they were sighted topping the hill, the children and some of the adults as well would scurry to the nearest shelter and watch through the cracks and knot holes in wide eyed fright as those huge beasts walked slowly along, swinging their heads from side to side, with their enormous horns shining wickedly in the sun.
